1. Bethlehem Judah, called also Ephrathah, the home of David, 5 miles S. of Jerusalem. It is now a small white town on a spur running out east from the watershed. The inhabitants are Christians, and wear a peculiar costume. At the east end of the town is the Church of the Nativity and attached monastery, standing above the orchards of figs and olives, and the vineyards which surround this prosperous village. The . . . the oldest in existence founded for . . . rites: the pillars are those of Constantine's Basilica, commenced about A.D. 330; the mosaics on the wall above belong to the 12th cent. The oak roof was given by Edward III. To the north is the Latin chapel, and under this the cave-chapel, in which Jerome is said to have lived while writing the Vulgate. The Cave of the Nativity, under the choir of the ancient Basilica, is the only site (excepting the chapel on Olivet) connected with the history of Christ, which is noticed before the establishment of Christianity by Constantine. A cave in Bethlehem, supposed to mark the 'inn' of the Nativity, is noticed by Justin Martyr in the 2nd cent. A.D. (Trypho, 78): it was known to Origen, and appears to have been found, in the 4th century A.D., consecrated to Tammuz, and standing in a grove, which was cut down when the place was reconsecrated by queen Helena. An 'inn' at Bethlehem is possibly referred to in Jer 41<sup>17</sup> (RVm), the place being on one of the high-ways to the south. In the Hebron hills there are many rock-cut stables for cattle, which resemble the cave under the choir at Bethlehem, which possesses a rock-cut recess that may have been a manger.

Some scholars suppose Bethlehem to take its name from Lakhmu, . . . the Assyrian account of the Creation, . . . known that he was adored in Palestine. Under the name Ephrath, B. is noticed in Jacob's time (Gn 35<sup>16, 19</sup> 48<sup>7</sup>, if the gloss 'the same is B.' is correct), but it is not mentioned in the Book of Joshua (except in the added verse, LXX Jos 15<sup>59</sup>). The name Bethlehem first occurs in 1 S 16<sup>4</sup>. The cemetery is noticed in 2 S 23<sup>2</sup>, and the well in 2 S 23<sup>14-16</sup>. The traditional site of this well is a rock-cut cistern north-west of the town. Bethlehem is ill supplied with water, and depends mainly on the Roman aqueduct tunnelled through the hill. The most probable site is a well to the south in the valley.

The family of Caleb spread to Bethlehem (1 Ch 2<sup>49, 51, 55</sup>): the Philistines held the city in the time of Saul (2 S 23<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>16-17</sup>); the well is then described as being 'at the gate.' Bethlehem was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11<sup>6</sup>), and occupied by the Jews after the Captivity (Ezr 2<sup>21</sup>, Neh 7<sup>26</sup>). In the 8th cent. B.C. (Mic 5<sup>2</sup>) it appears to have been a small place, still known by its old name Ephrathah, as well as by the late- (כֶּמֶר). Ru 2<sup>41</sup>, but possessing cornfields and—in Jeremiah's age—an inn (?). Whether Bethlehem is intended in Ps 132<sup>6</sup> as a place where the ark was supposed to be, appears doubtful. The birth of Christ at Bethlehem is noticed in Mt 2<sup>1, 6, 8</sup>, Lk 2<sup>4, 15</sup>. The manger was not in the inn (Lk 2<sup>7</sup>), but probably belonged to it. The Gospels refer to Micah (5<sup>2</sup>) as prophesying the birth of Messiah at the home of David.

The city was sacred to Christians from the earliest times, and the first care of the Crusaders was to secure the safety of its Chris- . . . in A.D. 1099, before Jerusalem was . . . subsequently made a bishopric. One of the most remarkable Christian texts is that on the font in the Basilica, which is said, with true modesty, to have been presented by 'those whose names are known to the Lord.' The glass frescoes are of high interest, and were presented by Michael Comnenos in the 12th cent. A.D. The crests of knights who visited the church in the Middle Ages are drawn upon the shafts of the Basilica pillars. For a study of this church, see de Vogüé, Eglises de la Palestine, and SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. For population, see PALESTINE.

2. Bethlehem of Zebulun. Jos 19<sup>15</sup>, and perhaps Jg 12<sup>8, 10</sup>.—Now the village Beit Lahm, in the low hills, 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. SWP vol. ii. sh. v. C. R. CONDER.

BETHLEHEMITE (בֵּית לֶחֶםִי), a native of Bethlehem, is applied to Jesse in 1 S 16<sup>1, 18</sup> 17<sup>28</sup>, and to Elhanan in 2 S 21<sup>19</sup>. In 1 Ch 20<sup>5</sup> also we should prob. read בֵּית לֶחֶםִי for מִתְּלָחִי. See ELHANAN, LAHMI. J. A. SELBIE.

BETH-LOMON (בֵּית לֹמֹן), 1 Es 5<sup>17</sup>.—For Bethlehem of Judah.

BETH-MAACAH (בֵּית מַעֲכָה).—A descriptive epithet of the city of Abel, 2 S 20<sup>14, 16</sup>, where 'Abel and B.' should be 'Abel of B.' (cf. 1 K 15<sup>20</sup>, 2 K 15<sup>23</sup>). See ABEL, No. 1.

BETH-MARGABOTH (בֵּית מִרְגָבוֹת 'place of chariots'), Jos 19<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ch 4<sup>31</sup>.—A city of Simeon in the southern plains, near Ziklag, deserted in David's time. The site is unknown.

BETH-MEON.—See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MERHAK (בֵּית מֵרְחָק), 2 S 15<sup>17</sup> RV, for the AV 'a place that was far off'; RVm 'the Far House.'—Stade and others understand it to mean the last house of the city. No town so called is known between Jerusalem and Jericho.

BETH-MILLO (Jg 9<sup>6</sup> RVm; 2 K 12<sup>20</sup> AVm, text 'house of Millo').—See MILLO.

BETH-NIMRAH (בֵּית נִמְרָה 'place of leopard.' In Nu 32<sup>8</sup> Nimrah. See v. 36, Jos 13<sup>27</sup>.—The same as Nimrim, Is 15<sup>9</sup>. Now the ruined mound Tell Nimrin, at the foot of the mountains opposite Jericho. A good-sized stream flows N. of the mound to join the Jordan. The town, with others in the Shittim plain, belonged to Gad; the only city in this region assigned to Reuben being Beth-jeshimoth, south of the plain. In the 4th cent. A.D. Nunrim was known (Onomasticon, s.v. Betham-naram) as lying 5 Roman miles north of Livias (Tell er-Râmeh). See SEP vol. i. s.v. Tell Nimrîn. C. R. CONDER.

BETH-PAZZEZ (בֵּית פַּזֶּז), Jos 19<sup>21</sup>.—A town of Issachar near Engannim and Enhaddah. The name has not been recovered.

BETH-PEOR (בֵּית פְּעוֹר), Dt 32<sup>44</sup> 34<sup>6</sup>, Jos 13<sup>20</sup>. See BAAL-PEOR (Nu 25<sup>3-5</sup>) and PEOR (Nu 23<sup>28</sup>).—A Moabite town given to Reuben. The 'top of Peor' commanded a view of the Jeshimon west of the Dead Sea, and seven altars were here erected by Balak. The Shittim Valley was 'over against Beth-peor,' and from Nebo the body of Moses is said to have been taken to a valley in Moab, 'over against Beth-peor,' which was not the Arabah or 'the plain.' The name of Peor has not been found east of Jordan, but the site is placed near Heshbon in the Onomasticon (s.v. Abarim and Fogor). There is no doubt that Beth-peor was named from Baal-peor (פְּעוֹר), the god of the Moabites and Midianites; and a possible site for the 'top of Peor' is the cliff at Minyeh, south of Wady Jedeideh (probably Bamoth Baal) and of Pisgah (Nebo). The three points of view of the Israelite camp (Nu 23) were evidently on the edge of the Moabite plateau, whence alone Shittim was visible; and the view from Nebo appears (v. 12) to have been less extensive than from the other two sites, so that ridges extending farther west than Nebo would meet the requirement. This applies to the ridge above Wady Jedeideh, and to the ridge of Minyeh, the latter being the most southern, and extending farthest west. From it we may suppose (Nu 24<sup>18-21</sup>) were seen Edom, Amalek, and the 'nest of the Kenite' on a crag, indicating a position in the south of Moab, whence Edom and the conspicuous knoll of Yukin (Cain) are seen. The name Minyeh is connected with a legend, and means 'wishing,' being the name of a deity, Meni (Is 65<sup>11</sup>). Seven circles, including central altar-stones, still exist at the edge of the cliff. Farther east is a remarkable circle with three standing stones, at a place called et-Mareighât, or 'the smeared things'—evidently an ancient place of worship. Round the circle are numerous erect stones, and to the north a large group of cromlechs. This site, on the same ridge with Minyeh, may represent the old Beth-peor or 'temple of Peor,' while Minyeh itself represents the 'top of Peor.' To the south of the ridge is the fine ravine of the Zerka Ma'in—probably Nahaliel or the 'valley of God,' and this would be a natural site for the burial of Moses in a valley 'over against Beth-peor.'

In the added verse of the LXX, after Jos 15<sup>20</sup>, a Peor in Judah is noticed. This was also known in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Fogor) as near Bethlehem. It is the present ruin Faghâr, north-west of Bethlehem, and, though named from the same deity, is quite a distinct site.

LITERATURE.—Mem. East Pal. Survey, vol. i. for et-Mareighât, under those names, and Mem. East Pal. Survey, vol. iii. sheet xvii. for the Judean site. C. R. CONDER.

BETHPHAGE (Βηθφαγή), Mt 21<sup>1</sup>, Mk 11<sup>1</sup>, Lk 19<sup>29</sup>.—A village near Bethany, which see. The site is unknown. The name means 'place of figs.' See Neubauer, Geog. Tal. s.v. for the Talmudic notices, which do not, however, suffice to fix the site. C. R. CONDER.

BETH-RAPHA (בֵּית רַפְּהָא), perhaps 'house of the giant,' 1 Ch 4<sup>12</sup>. Perhaps not a geographical name. See REPHAIM.

BETH-REHOB (בֵּית רְהוֹב, δ ὄκος 'Ραβ, Jg 18<sup>28</sup>, 2 S 10<sup>6</sup>, in v. 8 'Rehob'; apparently also Rehob of Nu 13<sup>21</sup>).—A district of Syria near Hamath. From its situation in the valley in which lay Dan, or Laish (Jg 18<sup>27-28</sup>), Robinson was led to suggest Hunin, which commands the plain of Huleh. If Rehob means a 'broad place,' or 'boulevard,' it could hardly be at Hunin. Thomson would place Beth-rehob at Banias. (See REHOB.)

A. HENDERSON.

BETHSAIDA (Βηθσαιδα, 'House of Sport,' or 'Fisher-home').—Opinion is much divided as to whether this was the name of two places, or only of one, on the northern shore of the Sea of Galilee. That one B. stood to the east of the Jordan, near its entrance into the lake, in the district of Lower Gaulonitis, is beyond dispute. It was this village, 'situated at the Lake of Gennesaret,' that Philip 'advanced to the dignity of a city, and called it by the name of Julius, the same name with Cæsar's daughter' (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 1; see also Ant. XVIII. iv. 6; BJ II. ix. 1; III. x. 7; Life, 71, 72, 73; and Jerome, Com. on Matthew, 16<sup>18</sup>). This corresponds to Bethsaida of Lk 9<sup>10</sup>, near which was the 'desert place' of Mt 14<sup>13</sup> and Mk 6<sup>51</sup>, where the 5000 were fed. Codex  $\alpha$  stands alone, possibly as the result of an interpolation, in describing the scene of this miracle as near 'to Tiberias.' In this neighbourhood also probably lay the 'desert place' where the 4000 were also miraculously supplied, whence Jesus sailed with his disciples to 'the parts of Dalmanutha,' in 'the borders of Magadan' or 'Magdala,' returning thence 'to the other side,' 'to B.' (Mt 15<sup>32-39</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-29</sup>).

As to the existence of a second B., west of the Jordan, on the lake shore, there is great diversity of opinion; but where such authorities as Reland, Robinson, Stanley, and Tristram agree, there is at least a pre-emption in their favour. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. p. 423) suggests that the Jordan may have divided the town, the western part being 'in Galilee,' the eastern part being that 'which Philip repaired and called Julius.' In Smith (DB, art. 'Bethsaida'), it is suggested that 'if there were only one B. it was probably near the mouth of the Jordan, and perhaps, like Kerak (Tarichæa), surrounded by the river, and so liable to be included at one period in Galilee, and at another in Gaulonitis.' G. A. Smith (Hist. Geog. p. 458) says: 'B. in Galilee need not mean that it lay W. of the Jordan, as the province of Galilee ran right round the lake, and included most of the level coast-land on the E.' But none of these suggestions quite satisfies the requirements of the Gospel story. The feeding of the 5000 took place on the other side of the sea from Capernaum, near B. Julius. Thence Jesus sent His disciples 'to go before him unto the other side, to B.' (Mk 6<sup>45</sup>). John (6<sup>17</sup>) describes them as going 'over the sea towards Capernaum.' B., whither they were sent, and Capernaum, were therefore practically in the same direction from the place where they embarked. This could not be true of B. Julius and Capernaum, even if the latter were at Tell Hâm, which is most unlikely (see CAPERNAUM). If, on the other hand, Capernaum were at Khân Minyeh, and B. say at et-Tibghin, the direction from the E. coast would be practically identical, and a very slight deflection from its course by the storm would be sufficient to bring the boat to land in Gennesaret. Again, it would be difficult to prove that the 'province of Galilee ran right round the lake.' Josephus is indeed guilty of confusion in speaking of Judas of Gamala, who headed a revolt against the Romans, now as a Gaulonite (Ant. XVIII. i. 1) and again as a Galilean (Ant. XVIII. i. 6), but nowhere does he indicate that the district of Gamala belonged to Galilee. It is true that subsequently, for military purposes, Gamala, 'as the strongest city in these parts,' was put under Josephus along with the two Galilees (BJ II. xx. 4), but he was careful to distinguish what belonged to the different provinces. Thus he says that along with other cities 'in Gaulonitis,' he fortified Gamala (BJ II. xx. 6). Jesus retired to B. on hearing of the murder of John the Baptist, and the presumption is that he went out of the district of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Gaulonitis. Julius had been in the province of Galilee, Philip would hardly have ventured to interfere with it. But Josephus explicitly says it was in 'Lower Gaulonitis' (BJ II. ix. 1). For 'B. of Galilee' we must therefore turn to westward of the Jordan.

B. Julius has usually been identified with et-Tell, a considerable ruin situated E. of the Jordan, just where the river leaves the hills, and enters the plain of el-Bateiha. In the absence of any definite proof, however, it is natural to suppose that the city, 'Fisher-home,' stood much nearer the lake. This supposition is supported by the existence of an ancient site, by the mouth of the river, close to the shore, called Mas'adiyeh, wherein we may detect some resemblance to the old name. The remark of Josephus (BJ III. x. 7) that the Jordan 'passes by the city of Julius' into the Sea of Galilee would apply to either of these sites, but perhaps most appropriately to the latter. Attention may be drawn to the abounding grass, covering the rich plain, and running up like a wave of emerald over the lower slopes of the E. hills. There is no place round the lake where the natural luxuriance was so likely to call forth John's remark, 'now there was much grass in the place.' The Arab. barrīyeh 'the wilderness,' or wild grazing land beyond the cultivated plots surrounding the town, doubtless corresponds to the 'desert place' of the Gospels.

The most probable site for 'B. of Galilee,' as yet suggested is et-Tell (?) on the N.W. corner of the Sea of Galilee, in a little vale, bordering a beautiful curve in the beach, E. of the rocky promontory of Tell 'Areimeh,—the monkish 'Mensa Christi,'—which forms the N.E. boundary of the plain of Gennesaret. Capernaum (Kharā-Minyeh) to the south-west, and Chorazin (Kharāzīn) among the hills to the north-east, B. would here occupy the middle position, probably indicated by the order in which Jesus refers to these cities (Mt 11<sup>21-23</sup>). This seems to be confirmed by Willibald (A.D. 722), who, coming from Magdala through Gennesaret, passed first Capernaum, then B., whence he went on to Chorazin. Perhaps also a reminiscence of the ancient name is found in that of the local shrine of Sheikh 'Aly es-Saiyādīn 'Sheikh 'Aly of the Fishermen.' Copious streams of water from the warm springs on the E. edge of the vale served in time past to drive several mills on the shore, being conducted thither by aqueducts now crumbling and covered with ferns and ivy. They also afforded supplies, led round the W. promontory, to water part of the plain of Gennesaret (see art. CAPERNAUM). The vale is extremely fertile, and has been chosen by the Prussian Catholic Pal. Society as the site of B., for the establishment of a religious colony. The shallow water round the little bay literally swarms with fish, attracted thither by the warm water from the springs. This place, and the coast of el-Bateiha, near the other B., are to this day favourite haunts of the fishermen from Tiberias.

BETH-SHEAN (in OT בֵּית שֶׁאֵן or בֵּית שֶׁאֵן; in Apoc. Βαιθσάν, 1 Mac 5<sup>32</sup> 12<sup>41</sup>, or Βεθσά, 1 Mac 12<sup>40</sup>, also Σκυθῶν πόλις, 2 Mac 12<sup>2</sup>, cf. v. 30 Jth 3<sup>30</sup>; in Jos. also Σκυθόπολις; in some class. writers, as Pliny, HN v. 74, and on coins Nysa. In modern Arab. Beisān).—A town between the Little Hermon and Gilboa ranges, on a plain about 300 ft. above the valley of the Jordan, and about 3 miles to the W. of that river. The old town was built on the basaltic plain now occupied by the small village of Beisān and the tell or mound to the N. of it. To the S. is a large extent of marsh, between which and the town runs an ancient road leading from the N. end of the Jordan to Jenin. The tell is bounded on the N. by the river Jalud, beyond which the ancient sepulchres still exist. Both mound and plain are covered with the ruins of temples, walls, and a large amphitheatre. In OT Beth-shean does not play an important part, apparently because, although according to 'the oldest book of Heb. history' it was apportioned to Manasseh (Jos 17<sup>11, 15</sup>, cf. 1 Ch 7<sup>29</sup>), it remained in the hands of its own people (Jg 1<sup>27</sup>). After the battle of Gilboa the bodies of Saul and his sons were carried by the Philistines to Beth-shean, and there fastened to the wall (or in the 'broad place'), whence they were removed later by the men of Jabesh-gad (1 S 31<sup>10-13</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>12</sup>). In the reign of Solomon the city seems to have given its name to a district (1 K 4<sup>12</sup>).

The name Scythopolis given to this city as early as the 3rd cent. B.C. seems to contain a trace of an invasion of Scyths mentioned in Herodotus, i. 105 (cf. Pliny, HN v. 74), or to be due to the use of the word 'Scyths' to denote barbarians generally. In the 3rd cent. B.C. Scythopolis paid tribute to the Ptolemies. In 218 it surrendered to Antiochus the Great. About a century later it fell into the hands of John Hyrcanus, but was taken from the Jews by Pompey, restored by Gabinius, and became an independent town of the Rom. Emp. and one of the most important cities in the Decapolis. In the 4th cent. A.D. it was the seat of a bishopric.

BETH-SHEMESH (בֵּית שֶׁמֶשׁ 'temple of the sun').—Three places so named occur in the OT in Pal. 1. Jos 15<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>15</sup>, 1 S 6<sup>7-10</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>4</sup>, 2 K 14<sup>13</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>8</sup>, 2 Ch 28<sup>18</sup>=Irshemesh of Jos 19<sup>4</sup>, a city of Judah given to the Levites, and afterwards included in Dan. It was here that the ark rested by a stone (see ABEL), and it was a chief city of Solomon's province of Dan. Amaziah was here captured by Jehoash of Israel, and the Philistines took it in the time of Ahaz. It is the present ruin Ain Shems, in the valley of Sorek S.E. of Zorah. (SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.) 2. Jos 19<sup>8</sup>, a city of Naphtali in Upper Galilee. See Jg 1<sup>8</sup>. The site is unknown. 3. Jos 19<sup>22</sup>. A city in Issachar. The site is also doubtful. There is a Tell esh-Shemshiyeh in the Jordan Valley, but it seems to be too far north to be in Issachar, although its proximity to Tabor would perhaps suit (Pal. Survey Map, sheet ix.).

It is to be noted that No. 1 is specially noticed (2 K 14<sup>13</sup>) as belonging to Judah, to distinguish it from the other sites. Bethshemite occurs as gentile derivative from this name in 1 S 6<sup>14, 15</sup>.

BETH-SHEMESH.—'The pillars of Beth-she-mesh that is in the land of Egypt' (Jer 43<sup>13</sup>).—The LXX, being written in Egypt, gives simply τοὺς στύλους ἑλίου πόλεως τοὺς ἐν Αἴγυπτο, 'the pillars of Theracolis that are at On.' The place is therefore in the desert of Egypt. Like Heliopolis, 'city of the sun,' Beth-shemesh, 'house of the sun,' is here a translation of Per Ra, 'house of the sun,' the sacred or temple name of On. The pillars, στολοι, στήλαι, must be the obelisks characteristic of the worship of Ra, the sun-god. See AVEN and ON.

F. L. L. GRIFFITH.

BETH-SHITTAH (בֵּית שִׁטָּה), 'place of the acacia,' Jg 7<sup>22</sup>.—In the vicinity of Abel-meholah. It is the present Shutta, a village on a knoll, in the Jezreel Valley. See SWP vol. ii. sheet ix.

R. M. BOYD.

BETHULIA (Βαιθουλίαν), Jth 4<sup>6</sup>, 7, 61<sup>11</sup>, 13, 14, 71, 7, 10, 13, 21, 13<sup>10</sup>.—A town near Dothan, on a hill overlooking the plain, with springs in the valley. The site was unknown in later times, and placed at Safed, in Galilee, in the Middle Ages. The village of Mithiliéh answers in position to these requirements, being south of Dothan, on a hill at the edge of the plain. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xi.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ZACHARIAS (Βαιθζαχαριά), 1 Mac 6<sup>32</sup>, 33.—A village on the mountain pass, south of Jerusalem and west of Bethlehem, now the ruin Beit Skaria. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

C. R. CONDER.

BETH-ZUR (בֵּית זֶר), 'house of rock,' Jos 15<sup>58</sup>, 1 S 30<sup>27</sup> (in LXX), 1 Ch 2<sup>45</sup>, 2 Ch 11<sup>7</sup>, Neh 3<sup>16</sup>. The Bethsura of 1 Mac 4<sup>29</sup> etc. A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, fortified by Rehoboam, and still important after the Captivity. Judas Maccabaeus here defeated the Greeks under Lysias in 165 B.C. The present ruined site, Beit Súr, on a cliff west of the Hebron road, near Halhul, is remarkable for a ruined tower, probably built in the 12th cent. A.D., and for more ancient rock-cut tombs. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

C. R. CONDER.

BETIMES is 'in good time,' as Pr 13<sup>24</sup> 'he that loveth him [his son] chasteneth him b.' (i.e. in early life); the Heb. is בִּשְׁמֵי יָמָיו, lit. 'visits him [diligently] with chastisement,' the idea expressed by 'betimes' being contained in the verb, which however means 'to seek [wisdom],' as RVm, rather than 'to seek early'; see on 2 S 12. In Gn 26<sup>31</sup> 'they rose up b. in the morning,' the idea expressed by 'b.' is again in the verb (עָרָא), and b. or 'early' is the correct idea; so 2 Ch 36<sup>15</sup> 'b.' (RV 'early'). Besides the above, see Sir 6 (heading) 'Seek wisdom b.' (in ref. to v. 18 'gather instruction from thy youth up'), 6<sup>38</sup> 51<sup>20</sup>, 1 Mac 4<sup>52</sup> 5<sup>30</sup> 11<sup>67</sup>. Betime is found only in Bel v. 16 'In the morning b. the king arose' (καὶ ὄρθριον ὁ βασιλεὺς τὸ πρωτῆ). J. HASTINGS.

BETOLION (Β Βετολίω, Α Βητ., AV Betolius), 1 Es 5<sup>21</sup>.—52 persons of this place returned from captivity with Zerub. (See BETHEL.) Ezr 2<sup>23</sup> has 'the men of Bethel and Ai' 223, and the number 52 belongs to the next named place, Nebo. 1 Es has perhaps dropped a line in the Hebrew.

BETOMASTHAIM (Βαιτομασθαίμ, Jth 15<sup>4</sup>, AV Betomasthem); BETOMESTHAIM (Βαιτομεσθαίμ, 4<sup>8</sup>, AV Betomestham).—Apparently N. of Bethulia and facing Dothan. There is a site called Deir Massin W. of the Dothan plain, but the antiquity of this name is doubtful.

C. R. CONDER.

BETONIM (בֵּית נִימ), Jos 13<sup>26</sup>.—In N. Gilead. The name may survive in that of the Butzin district, the extreme N. of Gilead.

BETRAYAL OF TRUST.—See CRIMES. BETROTHING.—See MARRIAGE.

BETTER.—As a subst. 'one's betters,' the word is not used in AV, but the adj. in Ph 2<sup>3</sup> shows how that expression arose: 'let each esteem other b. than themselves' (ὑπερέχοντας). The verb is found Mk 5<sup>28</sup> 'was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse' (i.e. made better, lit. 'profited,' ὠφέλεω).

J. HASTINGS.

BETWEEN, BETWIXT.—'Between' was once used freely with a reflexive pronoun to express that which is confined to two (or more) persons. Thus Tindale's tr<sup>n</sup> of Jn 11<sup>56</sup> is 'and spake bitwene themselves' (μετ' ἀλλήλων, AV 'among'). AV has Lk 23<sup>12</sup> 'they (Pilate and Herod) were at enmity b. themselves' (πρὸς ἑαυτοῖς TR, edd. mostly αὐτοῖς); Ac 26<sup>31</sup> 'they talked b. themselves' (πρὸς ἀλλήλους, RV 'they spake one to another'); Ro 1<sup>24</sup> 'to dishonour their own bodies b. themselves' (ἐν ἑαυτοῖς TR, edd. mostly αὐτοῖς; see Sanday and Headlam in loc.; RV 'among themselves'). We still retain the phrase 'b. ourselves!'

Between and betwixt were for a long time interchangeable; the latter is now archaic or local. Betwixt is used in Gn 17<sup>11</sup> 23<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>23</sup> 30<sup>38</sup> 31<sup>37</sup>, Ec. 1<sup>3</sup>, Job 9<sup>38</sup> 36<sup>32</sup>, Ca 1<sup>3</sup>, Is 5<sup>3</sup>, Jer 39<sup>4</sup>, 1 Mac 12<sup>44</sup> 16<sup>5</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>. RV retains all except Job 36<sup>32</sup> (see RV and Davidson in loc.), and adds Job 4<sup>20</sup> 'B. morning and evening' (AV 'from . . . to').

J. HASTINGS.

BEULAH (Heb. בְּעֻלָּה 'married' (of a wife)).—Is 62<sup>4</sup>. An allegorical name applied to Israel by the Deutero-Isaiah. She was no longer to be a wife deserted by God, as she had been during the Captivity, but married (1) to God, (2) by a strange man, the figure, to her own sons. In 110<sup>1</sup> the figure in its first application is reversed. There it is used to point out the faithlessness of Israel to her Spouse.

F. H. WOODS.

BEWAIL as a reflex. verb occurs only Jer 4<sup>31</sup> 'the daughter of Zion that beth herself' (נָס; [all], 'to breathe,' hithp. 'gasp for breath,' as RV). In Lk 8<sup>52</sup> 23<sup>27</sup> the meaning is 'to beat the breast in grief (κόπτομαι, used without an obj. in Mt 11<sup>17</sup> 'ye have not lamented,' RV 'did not mourn,' and 24<sup>30</sup>). See MOURNING.

J. HASTINGS.

* In Gn 24<sup>50</sup> the words 'and Bethuel' were probably inserted by R. See Ball's note in Haupt's Heb. OT.

† On this double accus. see Davidson, Syntax, § 77.

BEWITCH.—Ac 8<sup>9</sup> 'Simon . . . used sorcery, and b<sup>d</sup> the people' (ἐξίστημι, RV 'amazed' as frequently, and as AV in v. 13; but see BESIDE); so 8<sup>11</sup>. In Gal 3<sup>1</sup> 'O foolish Galatians, who hath b<sup>d</sup> you?' (RV 'did b. you?'); the Gr. is βασκαλῶ, 'to speak evil of,' next 'bring evil on,' and so, as here, 'lead into evil' (see Lightfoot, ad loc.); it is used here only in NT, but in LXX Dt 28<sup>54, 55</sup> (for נָקַד, Sir 14<sup>18, 19</sup>). Bewitching.—Wis 4<sup>12</sup> 'the b. of naughtiness' (βασκαλία φανόλητος, Vulg. fascinator). It seems probable that in all these passages (as in 4 Mac 1<sup>26, 25</sup>, βασκαλία) the reference is more or less consciously to 'the evil eye' (cf. βάσκανος for נָקַד Pr 28<sup>22</sup>). See DIVINATION, EYE. J. HASTINGS.

BEWRAY, distinct in origin and meaning from 'betray,' is to reveal, disclose. Cf. Adams, Works, ii. 238 'Well may he be hurt . . . and die, that will not bewray his disease, lest he betray his credit.' Pr 29<sup>24</sup> 'he heareth curs<sup>ing</sup> and will uttereth nothing' (RV 'he heareth the cursing and uttereth nothing,' חָשֵׁה, 'shew,' פָּתַח, 'proclaim,' so RvM, but RV 'encountereth' from נִקְּחַ, 'light upon'); Is 16<sup>3</sup> 'hide the outcasts; b. not him that wandereth' (נִקְּחַ, 'uncover,' 'reveal'; Amer. RV 'betray.' Sir 27<sup>17</sup> 'if thou b<sup>d</sup> his secrets' (ἀποκαλύπτω; so 27<sup>21</sup>); Mt 26<sup>38</sup> 'thy speech b<sup>d</sup> thee' (ῥῆσιν σε πωλεῖ, 'makes thee manifest'). Bewrayer, only 2 Mac 4<sup>1</sup> 'a b. of the money, and of his country' (ἐνδελκτής, 'one who reveals,' RV 'who had given information of the money, and had betrayed his country'). J. HASTINGS.

BEYOND.—1. This is in AV the occasional rendering of Heb. מֵעַד בֶּ'עֲבֹהֶר, which, when attached to יַרְדֵּן 'the Jordan' (cf. i. w. i. e., except Jg 11<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 31<sup>7</sup>, Jer 25<sup>22</sup>) assumes considerable critical importance. In AV מֵעַד בֶּ'עֲבֹהֶר is tr<sup>d</sup> 'beyond Jordan' in Gn 50<sup>10, 11</sup>, Dt 3<sup>20, 25</sup>, Jos 9<sup>10, 13<sup>8</sup></sup>, Jg 5<sup>17</sup>; 'on this side J.' Dt 1<sup>15, 16, 44, 45, 47</sup>, Jos 14<sup>15, 19, 12<sup>7</sup></sup>, 22<sup>7</sup>; 'on the other side J.' Dt 11<sup>30</sup>, Jos 2<sup>10, 7<sup>7</sup></sup>, 12<sup>24, 24<sup>2</sup></sup>, 14<sup>15, 16</sup>, Jg 10<sup>8</sup>, 1 S 31<sup>7</sup>; and 'on the side of J.' Jos 5<sup>1</sup>. RV gives 'beyond J.' in every place. Again מֵעַד בֶּ'עֲבֹהֶר is used with יַרְדֵּן, Nu 22<sup>1, 32<sup>15, 16, 32</sup></sup>, 34<sup>15, 35<sup>14</sup></sup>, Jos 13<sup>32, 14<sup>18, 17</sup></sup>, 18<sup>7</sup>, Jg 7<sup>25</sup>; and the simple מֵעַד Dt 4<sup>40</sup> (AV 'on this side'), Jos 13<sup>37</sup> (AV 'on the other side'). Now it is true that the phrase may equally well be tr. 'across J.'; it is also true that it is used of either side of the Jordan (cf. Dt 3<sup>8</sup> east, with 3<sup>20, 25</sup> west); it even seems that 'beyond Jordan' may be used of that side of the Jordan on which the writer himself stands (Jos 5<sup>1, 9<sup>12</sup></sup>); but the critical importance of the phrase lies in this, that wherever the author of Deut. speaks in his own person (as Dt 1<sup>15, 16, 44, 45, 47, 49</sup>) it refers to the country east of Jordan; wherever Moses is introduced as the speaker (as Dt 3<sup>20, 25</sup>, 11<sup>30</sup>) it refers to the west.* From which the conclusion is drawn that the author (at least of Deut.) must have lived after Moses' day, from whom he is careful to distinguish himself.

BEZAI (בְּזַי).—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10<sup>28</sup>). 2. The eponym of a family

* The only exception is Dt 3<sup>8</sup>, where, although in a passage attributed to Moses, 'beyond Jordan' means the land of Moab; but 'the long archaeological note' in which the phrase occurs is held to be a comment of the writer's or of some editor, not original to Moses. See Harper, Deut. p. 5 that returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2<sup>17</sup>, Neh 7<sup>28</sup>)=Bassai of 1 Es 5<sup>18</sup>.

בְּזַלְעֵל (בְּזַלְעֵל, Bezaleel, AV Bezaleel).—1. The chief architect of the tabernacle. The name occurs only in the narrative of the Priests' Code and in the Bk of Chron. (1 Ch 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>2</sup>). It probably signifies 'in the shadow (i.e. under the protection) of El.*' In both the sources named, B. is given as 'the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah.' The various links in the genealogical chain will be found in 1 Ch 2<sup>18, 19, 20, 21</sup>. There is no ground for identifying the grandfather of B. with Hur, the brother of Moses (Ex 17<sup>10</sup>). According to P's account, B. was expressly called (בְּזַלְעֵל) by God to superintend the erection of the 'tent of meeting,' and endowed with the special gifts of wisdom for the proper execution of his task (Ex 31<sup>1-3</sup>). He was also charged with the construction of the furniture for court and tabernacle, as well as with the preparation of the priestly garments, and of the necessary oil and incense. Yet while B. is represented as, in the main, merely carrying out the Divine instructions, he is also said to be endowed with originality of invention as regards details (Ex 31<sup>3, 4, 5</sup>). Among the gifts thus bestowed on him, not the least was the gift of 'wisdom,' which he was himself a master, in the construction of the tabernacle (Ex 35<sup>34</sup>), the chief of whom was Aholiab (Ex 31<sup>1</sup>, 35<sup>34</sup> etc.). See TABERNAACLE. 2. B. occurs in Ezr 10<sup>30</sup> as one of the eight sons of Pahath-moab that had married foreign wives in the days of Ezra.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BEZEK (בִּזְקָה).—Two places so called are perhaps to be distinguished in OT. 1. Jg 1<sup>5</sup>. A place attacked by Judah after Joshua's death, probably Bezakah, a ruin W. of Jerusalem, in the lower hills. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. 2. 1 S 11<sup>8</sup>, where Saul gathered Israel before advancing on Jabesh-gilead. The most likely site in this connexion is the ruin Ibzik, N.E. of Shechem, opposite Nablus. This site was known in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Bezec), but identified with No. 1. It was 17 Rom. miles from Shechem, on the road to Scythopolis (Beisân), which is correct. (See Moore on Jg 1<sup>5</sup>).

C. R. CONDER.

BEZER (בְּצֵר 'fortress').—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7<sup>37</sup>).

BEZER (בְּצֵר, Bēzôr).—A city belonging to Reuben, situated 'in the wilderness, on the מִדְבָּר,' or flat table-land, E. of Jordan (Dt 4<sup>8</sup>, Jos 20<sup>8</sup>), a city of refuge (ll. cc.), allotted, according to P, to the Merarites (Jos 21<sup>38</sup>, whence 1 Ch 6<sup>78</sup> (53)). It is mentioned also by Mesha' (Moab. Stone, l. 27), as being in ruins in his day, and as having been rebuilt by him, after his revolt from Ahab, and expulsion of the Israelites from the territory N. of the Arnon (which, though assigned formally to Reuben, was occupied by the Moabites; see MOAB). From its being described as being in the 'wilderness' (cf. Dt 2<sup>9</sup>)—i.e. in the great rolling plains of grass or scrub-land—stretching out on the E. of Moab (Tristram, Moab, p. 118, 119), it may be inferred that it was situated towards the E. border of the Moabite table-land. The site has not yet been recovered. Euseb. (Onom. 232) identifies it wrongly with Βοττρὰ, in Bashan, the capital of the la tribu de Gad of 'Aralia' (G. A. Smith, Geogr. Bibl. 1891). Bshêr, which has been suggested, about 15 miles S.E. of Dhiban (see the map in PEFS 1895, p. 204), is too far to the S., being on the S. side of the Arnon, and consequently not in the territory of Reuben at all (Jos 13<sup>19</sup>): the name, moreover, does not correspond phonetically as it ought to do. Bezer is not improbably identical with Bograh (LXX Βογρά), one of the cities in the possession of Moab, mentioned by Jer (48<sup>24</sup>), and also, it is implied (v.<sup>21</sup>), situated on the 'table-land.'

* Cf. Sil-Bêl, a king of Gaza in the time of Sennacherib and his successors, see COT under Jos 11<sup>22</sup>; also Ina-sili-Bêl, Ges. Lez 12).

S. R. DRIVER.

BEZETH (Βηθέθ), 1 Mac 7<sup>9</sup>.—A place apparently near Jerus. Jos. calls it Bethzetho (Ant. XII. x. 2), and mentions it as a village. The situation is doubtful. It may be a corruption for Berzetho.

A word or two of explanation may be desirable as to the purpose which the article 'Bible' in a Bible Dictionary is intended to fulfil. Its design is twofold, according as it has in view the internal or the external relations of the sacred volume. The whole Dictionary being intended to explain the form and illustrate the contents of the B., the special article should, as far as may be, afford the means of gathering the information thus supplied into the unity of a system, of exhibiting it in 'optical rather than in chronological order, so that the usefulness of a dictionary may be, to some extent, combined with the convenience of the lexical arrangement.' Particular, the article should, in its form and ordered form, an account of the various parts of which the Bible consists, and the various forms in which it has appeared, including such subjects as Canon, Text, and Versions, referring to the special articles so entitled for details. In this way it will be of use to those who desire no more than an outline or summary of these subjects, or who wish to understand their mutual relations. It should include, of course, the particulars respecting the B. as a whole, such as its names and arrangement. Having thus, in the first part, surveyed its internal relations, the article should proceed in the second part to consider the B. as one of the sacred literatures of the world, its claims to uniqueness and authority, its reception in the Christian Church, and the position accorded to it there. Into the two divisions thus indicated, the present article will fall.

A. INTERNAL RELATIONS OF THE BIBLE.

I. NAMES.—The word 'Bible' is derived from the Greek. Ancient books were written upon the Byblus or Papyrus reed, and from this custom naturally came the Gr. name βιβλος (Mt 1<sup>1</sup>), in the diminutive form βιβλίον (Lk 4<sup>7</sup>) for a book. As the recognised records of Divine Revelation, the writings which made up their sacred volume became known to the Greek Christians as τὰ βιβλία, 'the books' par excellence. This expression is said to appear for the first time in this connexion in the 2nd Epistle (14<sup>2</sup>) falsely attributed to Clement of Rome, and to have passed towards the middle of the 2nd cent. and the word afterwards became very common, though generally qualified by an adjective such as 'holy,' 'divine,' 'canonical.' In its Latin form, however, by a misunderstanding in which there is not a little significance, the neuter plural 'biblia' (gen.

bibliorum) came to be regarded and treated as a fem. sing. (gen. biblæ), the transition being no doubt assisted by the growing conception of the B. as the one utterance of God rather than as the multiplicity of books written for Him. As a singular name, biblia has been adopted into the language of the Western Church, and is employed in the tongues of modern Europe.

Another name, 'Bibliotheca,' appears to have been commonly used for the B. throughout the Middle Ages, as evidenced by the paronomasia—'Habeo bibliothecam in mea bibliotheca'—which was then current. It appears with this meaning in old English, and was technically employed by mediæval writers to designate a complete MS of OT and NT. When originally used by certain of the Lat. Fathers, such as Jerome, the adjective 'Divina' had been prefixed to 'Bibliotheca,' but this was ere long dispensed with, and, as in the case of 'the Books,' the Scriptures became pre-eminently 'the Library.' This change of the point of view from plurality to unity is, as we shall see afterwards, precisely that which modern thought and investigation find it necessary to some extent to reverse. But it is interesting to observe the process thus embodying unity in language.

The names employed in OT and in the Apoc. for the Jewish Scriptures are such as 'the books' (Dn 9<sup>2</sup>), 'the holy books' (1 Mac 12<sup>9</sup>), 'the book of the law' (1 Mac 1<sup>56</sup> 3<sup>43</sup>), 'the book of the testament' (1 Mac 1<sup>57</sup>). In the NT the usual term is αἱ γραφαί, 'the Scriptures' (Lat. scriptura), that is, the sacred writings (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>, Lk 24<sup>32</sup>, Jn 5<sup>39</sup>, Ac 18<sup>24</sup>). It is to be noted, that while the Jewish Scriptures as a whole are thus designated, ἡ γραφή, in the singular, is always used for a special passage (Lk 4<sup>21</sup>, Jn 20<sup>8</sup>, Ja 2<sup>8</sup>), and not as with us, the Scripture. ἡ γραφή is employed perhaps even more collectively than in the special case of the αἱ γραφαί for the simple αἱ γραφαί we find γραφὰς ἀγίας (Ro 1<sup>2</sup>) or τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>). Another variant is when the leading (Jewish) divisions of OT are indicated, as 'the law, the prophets and the psalms' (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>), 'the law and the prophets' (Ac 28<sup>23</sup>), 'the law' (Jn 12<sup>34</sup>). The same practice is also common in rabbinical writings. Sometimes, instead of the divisions, the number of the books is given, and the OT is known as 'The Twenty-four'; sometimes, again, the simple term 'The Reading' is employed, which, in contrast with αἱ γραφαί, reminds us of the use of the Scripture in the services of the synagogue. By the early Christians the most common designation for the whole B. was 'The Scriptures,' accompanied as a rule by some such adjective as in the case of Biblia.

The term 'Testament,' in the expression 'Old and New Testaments,' applied to the two great divisions of the B., has an interesting history. There can be no doubt that it is due to an accidental mistranslation of διαθήκη, which, originally meaning 'arrangement' or 'disposition,' came to signify a testament or will. But in the LXX the word was adopted as the tr. of the Heb. בְּרִית or 'covenant,' and the 'new covenant' was in due time expressed by the same term. St. Paul speaks of the Heb. Scriptures read in the synagogue as the 'old covenant' (2 Co 3<sup>14</sup> RV), and of the ministers of Christ as 'ministers of a new covenant' (2 Co 3<sup>6</sup>). Only in He 9<sup>17</sup> is it said that the sense of διαθήκη is more probable than that of covenant. By the end of the 2nd cent., accordingly, we find ἡ παλαιὰ διαθήκη, the old covenant, and ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη, the new covenant. The same expressions for the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. Origen, in the beginning of the 3rd cent., the literature recognised as sacred when Ezra read the Torah in the hearing of the whole people (Neh 8). To this would ere long be added such records of Israel's history and such portions of the writings of Israel's prophets as survived, forming the second of the great divisions. Then, finally, the miscellaneous collection known as the Hagiographa would be formed for the third division. Those works which were deemed worthy of being placed beside the Law and the Prophets. As to the occasions of these steps being taken, and in connexion with the whole subject, there are traditions, some of which were accepted in Christian times, but which are in general to be regarded with suspicion, even where they cannot be shown to be absolutely untrue. Thus the second stage mentioned above is in 2 Mac 2<sup>18</sup> ascribed to Nehemiah, who is said to have 'founded a library' and 'gathered together the acts of the Kings and the Prophecy, and the writings of David and the epistles of the Kings concerning the holy gifts.' The Letter to the Jews of Alexandria, 2<sup>a</sup>, mentions an effort of Juda to recover the documents which had 'fallen out' during the great war. Hence, and it may have been on this occasion, the bulk of the Hagiographa was brought together. A more famous tradition is that of the Great Synagogue, which, beginning its work under the presidency of Ezra, still existed in the time of Simon the Just. To this body the formation of at least the first two divisions of the Canon was ascribed. These two had at any rate obtained general recognition, while the third was at least in course of construction when, probably in the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., the Prologue to Ecclesiastes speaks of 'the Law itself, the Prophets and the rest of the Books.' The reference in Josephus to the 22 Books is in terms which indicate that the Canon had already been for some time completed, and his Canon was evidently identical with ours. Though it is true that certain books, as Ec and Ca, were still disputed by the Jews themselves as late as A.D. 90, it may be held that, so far as historical indication goes, the OT Canon was practically completed a century before Christ. It was certainly the uniform tradition of the Jews that prophetic inspiration ceased with Malachi, and it is worthy of remark that the very myths with which they ultimately surrounded the formation and close of the Canon could have arisen only in the course of a considerable period of time.

Before glancing at the way in which this problem has in modern times been attacked from another side, it may be well to refer to the so-called Alexandrian Canon and OT Apocrypha. The LXX (see below) was made up partly of translations from the Hebrew, partly of productions in the Greek language of later Jewish literature. The conclusion that there was a recognised Alex. Canon distinct from that of Pal. has found much favour with Rom. Cath. critics, as it seemed to give authority to the Apocrypha. These books were extensively used by the Church Fathers, and Jerome himself included Judith among the Hagiographa. But it is more probable that there was no intention to erect a separate standard of Canonicity, and that the additional books were admitted partly owing to the Canon of Palestine not having yet been definitely or authoritatively fixed, partly owing to a certain liberal view. It is to be noted that Sirach indicates no knowledge or any other than the Heb. Canon, and that Philo, though he took a wide view of inspiration, is said, like NT itself, never to cite the apocryphal books. The books so named vary greatly both as to their contents and value. 1 and 2 Mac are histories—the former highly, the latter much less, trustworthy; others (1 Es, To, Jth, 3 and 4 Mac) are rather historical romances. Some (Wis, Sir) are collections of wise sayings or philosophical treatises; others are intended to supplement the canonical books, or to illustrate the acts and words of persons mentioned in the latter. It was by popular tradition that these books obtained their places in the Greek B., which, it must be remembered, was the B. of the apostolic age, and so formed part of the heritage of the Church.

The problem of modern criticism has been, not so much the formation and completion of the Canon as an authoritative collection, regarding which it has been able to add little to the meagre historical indications already noticed, as the rise of OT as a literature and its relation to the religious life and thought of Israel. Certain features of the sacred narratives—such as, double accounts of the same event, differences of expression and phraseology, differences even of tone and modes of thinking, and, in the Pent., references to events long after the time of Moses—had been early noticed, and could scarcely fail to suggest that they had been compiled from still earlier documents, or had had notes and explanations inserted by later hands than those of the original authors or compilers. The serious analysis, esp. of the Pentateuchal writings, began when, in 1753, Astruc, a French physician, pointed out that the more remarkable of these lines of cleavage coincided with the respective use of Elohim or J' as names of God. Astruc himself set the example, which was only too readily followed by succeeding critics, of excessive detail in his analysis, since he parcelled out the Book of Genesis among no fewer than twelve different writers. The documentary theory, to which he called attention, however, obviously needed explanation, and, when they were found pervading other books, and esp. the Book of Joshua, seemed to prove, not only that these writings were of a later date than had previously been supposed, but that they belonged to a later date than had previously been supposed. His successors assumed at first that the Elohist, whose narrative begins with Gn 1<sup>1</sup>, was the earlier; and his writing was known as the basis or Grundchrift, the sections marked by the use of the name J' being held to have been inserted into this Grundchrift as supplementary to it. A more careful investigation undertaken by Hupfeld, and published in 1853, showed not only that the Jahwistic portions belonged to a document which, originally in Hebrew, had been interwoven with the Elohist, but that there were at least two Elohist sources whose respective work could be traced throughout the Pentateuch. Taking these two together, it may be stated as a fact now generally accepted, that there are three great divisions discernible in the Pentateuch, or elements rather of which it consists—(1) The work of the Deuteronomist belonging mainly to the fifth book; (2) that of an Elohist writer, to which the name of Priestly Code, Priestercode, is commonly given, beginning with Gn 1<sup>1</sup>; (3) the work of the Jahwist and a second Elohist. It is true that analysis, following the lines of Astruc, has often gone much further, and that OT criticism has been brought into disrepute in many quarters and laid itself open to counter-criticism, not only by this excess, but by the great divergence of view among the earlier critics, and the confidence, and even arrogance, with which they pronounced upon the smallest detail. But while the disagreements of critics show that their work is yet far from complete, and that there are probably many points as to which certainty is no longer attainable, the main results of their work cannot be ignored, and are no more to be disposed of by a general appeal to inspiration than Hugh Miller's question as to how the fossil shells came to be in the rocks was answered by the quarryman's explanation—'When God made the rocks, He made the shells in them.' Thirty years ago the problem of the Pent., and with it that of the whole OT, took a new phase, when not only literary but also historical considerations were brought to bear. It was also considerations derived from a closer examination of Israel's history and of the progress of its religious thought and practice. The whole question has been made to turn on the chronological relation of the Priestly Code (P) to the Jahwistic-Elohistic document (JE). Formerly the author of P was regarded as the oldest writer, even by such critics as Hupfeld, Ewald, and Knobel; now he is regarded as the latest, not only by Kuenen, Wellhausen, and Reuss, but even by Delitzsch and Driver. Critics, however, when maintaining the late date of a writing in its present form, often admit that earlier documentary or traditional elements may be embodied in it. It is indeed sixty years since the view which has recently commended itself to so many was broached by W. Vatke. Vatke was led to his conclusions, however, mainly by a priori considerations, and his book lay long neglected in consequence of the philosophical and technical form in which it was written. A similar theory was independent of him by Reuss of Strassburg, and made popular by his pupils, H. Graf in a work issued in 1874, and Kayser in one published in 1874. Kuenen followed up the same views in his Religion of Israel (1869-70), and in his publications of 1876 and 1878 carried them to the furthest point which they have yet reached. It is claimed as a special merit in Wellhausen's work that it 'excited interest in these questions outside the narrow circle of specialists by its skilful handling of the materials, and its almost perfect combination of wide historical considerations with the careful investigation of details.' The Grafian, or Graf-Wellhausen, hypothesis was made known, or at least popularised, in Britain through the writings of Robertson Smith. The starting-point of the theory is found in a study of the legislation contained in the Pent., and a comparison of the religious history and practice of Israel with what might have been expected had the whole of this legislation been known and observed from the beginning. It seemed to Vatke impossible 'that a whole nation should suddenly sink from a high stage of religious development to a lower one, as is asserted to have been so often the case in the times of the Judges and Kings.' It is claimed that the only explanation of the religious life of Israel is that many of the laws were either unknown or non-existent. Again, when the three components of the Pent. were examined, each was found to contain a distinct legislation in a historical setting. Of these the simplest and probably the earliest was that known as the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), while the most complex, and therefore presumably the latest, was that of the Priestly Code. Between these came Deuteronomy. Not without exception perhaps, but in a sufficiently striking manner, the course of the history was found to reflect, and to be best explained by this order of the laws. The spiritual tide which lifted the life of Israel from stage to stage, leaving at each its memorial deposit of legislation, was due to the prophets, who, by their impassioned appeals and denunciations of abuses, were the means of purifying the religion of their people, and raising it to a point of elevation, after reaching which it unhappily fell into that petrification which is not only decay, but death. The Law is the product, not the antecedent, of the prophetic. To reverse the order is, in the words of H. Graf, 'to begin with the roof instead of the foundation'; but if the legislations fall into the order above indicated, it almost necessarily follows that the narratives in which they are respectively embedded must be regarded as contemporaneous in the same order. To separate the law from the history was the defect of Graf, corrected by Kuenen and Wellhausen. But to accept law and narrative as emerging in the portions and order supposed, is to revolutionise the whole conception previously entertained of Israel's history, and of its literary development. We conclude this brief account with the verdict pronounced upon the theory by a master in this department, A. B. Davidson of Glasgow. 'The strength of the theory lies in its agreement with the practice, as we observe it in the historical books, and in the general outline of the religious history which it draws. Its weakness lies in the incapacity which as yet it has shown to deal with many important details, and the assumption, absolutely necessary in the ancient historical books have been edited from a Deuteronomistic point of view.'

The following table of the OT literature, founded mainly on the chronology of the OT, may be found useful:—

13th-11th cent. B.C. (period of Judges). Song of Deborah (c. 1200 B.C.); Judges (c. 1100 B.C.); sources incorporated in Judges and Samuel; 1 and 2 Kings (8th cent. B.C. Amos, 760-746; Hosea, 746-734; Zechariah (chaps. 9-11, which, however, include also 12-14, if they are not, as some hold, 721 marking the end of the 7th cent. B.C.); Micah (7th cent. B.C.); Samuel (sources earlier); Ruth; Nahum (earlier years of Josiah, i.e. 639-621); Habakkuk (608-598); Jeremiah; 1 and 2 Kings (sources earlier); Lamentations; Obadiah (partly before and partly after 586, which is the date of Exile); Proverbs (partly before 586, partly after); Job; II Isaiah (taken captive 597. The last three fall c. 586-536); Haggai (520 seq.); Zechariah (520 seq.); Jonah; Zec (12-14); Malachi (probably c. 450-400); Ezra and Nehemiah (c. 450-430) incorporated in our Ezr-Neh.

4th cent. Ecclesiastes (not earlier than latter years of Persian rule, ending 332); Esther (early years of Greek period, beginning 332, or 3rd cent.); 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezr-Neh in present form (3rd cent. B.C. or later); Daniel (2nd cent. B.C. or later); belong to most of these periods, including even the Maccab. (168-165), but chiefly to the later ones (ex. and post-ex.).

ii. NT Canon.—The Jewish Scriptures became the B. of the early Christian Church. Round them in course of time gathered collections of Christian writings to which canonical authority was ultimately ascribed. But as in the case of OT the process was gradual. There was clearly no deliberate intention on the part of NT writers to make Scripture. The Jewish reverence for OT which the apostles inherited would prevent any such thought arising. That NT should have been written at all by men who shared in such a traditional feeling has been characterised by Westcott as a 'moral miracle of overwhelming dignity.' The writings were evidently called forth by the circumstances of the Church, and only as a second thought gathered together and invested with authority. In order of composition the Epistles naturally took precedence of the Gospels. The facts of the Gospel history formed the staple of the apostolic preaching, and, though in the earliest years communicated orally only, must have tended to assume a fixed traditional form. So long as the apostles survived, and the Church had not extended beyond the reach of their personal instruction, the necessity of committing this tradition to writing would be scarcely recognised. The conviction widely held during that first age, that the end of the world was near, would also tend to discourage any effort of this kind. With the extension of the Church, the rising doubts as to the impending catastrophe, and the removal of the apostles, the need for a permanent record would be felt and supplied. The earliest collections of memorabilia, notes of apostolic preaching, were made and circulated we know on the testimony of St. Luke, whose object is expressly declared to be the displacement of these by a more trustworthy account (Lk 1<sup>12</sup>). Meanwhile the apostles had supplemented their personal activity by epistolary communications, and thus the material for a new (Christian) Canon was accumulated. It is probable that all the books composing our NT were written by the end of the 1st cent. of our era. This, indeed, is generally acknowledged, except where, as in the case of Baur and the early Tübingen school, a speculative reconstruction of early Church History necessitates the ascription of later dates to certain of the books. However, of NT books by the Church, authorship and authority was longer time. It is not until the 4th cent. that all the books of the present Canon are found included in any list. The Didaché, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, an early treatise, the MS of which was discovered so recently as 1873, makes it clear that in the quarter whence it emanated in the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. only a few of them were known. It was only to be expected, however, that certain books, or small collections of books, should be known and received within comparatively limited areas, from which they gradually came to the use of the Church at large. There was no formal attempt to create a Canon, and for long no formal decree of it, a certain Christian wisdom and common sense seen at work in the selection of writings both individually and collectively. The criterion was from the first, immediate, or all but immediate, communion with the apostles. Only those books were admitted which could be regarded as the most faithful records of the work of Christ and His apostles, and as the suitable foundation of Christian teaching. The need which was so soon felt, of the truths characteristic of Christianity in opposition to the paganising mysticism of the gnostics and the fanatical development of Montanism, hastened the process, by driving men to the study of the primitive records of the faith. For this purpose the oral teaching, which still continued, was insufficient, as it could not be put into the written records. These could be regarded as mere private and occasional writings; they became more public books which might be publicly read for edification; they were the recognised arbiters in a great doctrinal contest; to them both sides appealed, and the foundations of NT were laid.

The chief sources for the history of NT Canon in the period of its formation are the Christian writers, esp. those who took part in the great controversies with heretics. During the 2nd and 3rd centuries, the fragments of the heretical writings themselves, the ancient versions, and sundry lists of recognised books which have come down to us. We can trace (Canon of the NT) the history of this period as follows:—I. A.D. 70-170, during which time, though the evidence adducible is fragmentary, it is of wide range, direct, and comprehensive; a margin still remained of books whose authority was disputed or at least unrecognised, and the idea of a Canon was implied rather than expressed. Its 'formation' may have been gradual, but it was certainly undisturbed. It was a growth and not a series of contests. II. A.D. 170-303, during which the available evidence is largely augmented and the consciousness of a collection of sacred books becomes more distinct. Still its work is 'to construct and not to define,' the age 'was an age of research and thought, but at the same time it was an age of freedom.' Even controversy failed to create a spirit of historical inquiry, and thus the evidence gathered from writers of the 3rd cent. 'differs from that of earlier date in fulness rather than in kind.' III. A.D. 303-397, during which the Canon formed the subject of deliberation and decree at great Councils of the Church, at one of which, the third Council of Carthage, held in the year 397, the books of NT recognised 'are exactly those which are generally received at present.'

Some of the chief points of this development can alone be indicated here; further information will be found in the special article (NEW TESTAMENT CANON). Justin Martyr, the apologist about A.D. 150, records the fact that certain apostolic writings were read along with the prophets on the Lord's Day in the churches both in city and country. Among these writings he expressly refers to what he calls 'The Memoirs of the Apostles,' which almost without doubt were the Canonical Gospels. He refers to the Apostles by name, and evinces an acquaintance with several of St. Paul's Epistles. The list known as the Muratorian Fragment, from Muratori, who published it at Milan in 1740, which probably represents the view of the Roman Church towards the end of the 2nd cent., refers to the Gospels, to the Acts as the work of St. Luke, enumerates 13 Epp. of St. Paul, acknowledges St. Jude, 2 Epp. of St. John (probably the 2nd and 3rd), and the Apoc. The fragment is somewhat mutilated, and in this way the incompleteness of its reference to the Gospels, and its omission of 1 P and 1 Jn are possibly to be accounted for. It adds the Apoc. of St. Peter, though with an indication of doubt, and expressly excludes two Epistles which had been circulated under St. Paul's name—one to the Laodiceans, and the other to the Alexandrians. The Peshitta or Syriac Version of NT was the B. of the Syrian Christians of a period not later than the end of the 2nd cent. It included all the books of our Canon except 2 and 3 Jn, 2 P, Jude, and Rev. The old Lat. Version, also of the 2nd cent., omitted only He, Ja, and 2 P. The heretic Marcion, about the middle of the same cent., composed a Canon of his own in accordance with his peculiar views. This embraced the greater part of the Pauline Epp. and a modification of St. Luke. Tatian's Diatessaron, or 'Harmony of the Four Gospels,' which, as has recently been conclusively proved, were the four Gospels of our Canon, not only testifies to the existence of these, but signalises by this treatment of them their peculiar position and authority, which was similarly emphasized a little later by the famous analogy by which Irenæus sought to show that there could be only four Gospels. By A.D. 250 we have the evidence of Irenæus as representing the churches in Gaul, Clement of Alexandria and Origen representing the Egyptian churches, and Tertullian representing the churches of North Africa, practically concurring in their testimony to the contents of that body of Scripture which, with increasing distinctness, was taking its place as the authoritative Canon. Doubt still affected only Ja, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, and Rev, while Hebrews was in the churches of Rome and Africa not recognised as Pauline. Eusebius in his Eccles. History, composed about A.D. 325, gives valuable information and testimony as to the state of the question in his time. He distinguishes the books which claimed to be authoritative as Homologoumena, or universally acknowledged books; Antilegomena, or disputed books; and Notha, or spurious books. The Antilegomena included Ja, Jude, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, also Hebrews and Rev. Eusebius hazards the opinion that Hebrews may be a Greek tr. of a Heb. Pauline original. St. Jerome, towards the close of the 4th cent., gives much the same account of the state of opinion in his time, while he himself accepts all the books of our present Canon. St. Augustine likewise accepts the Canon in its present form, and was present at that Council of Carthage (397) at which, as already stated, ecclesiastical sanction was given to it. It must be admitted that this conclusion was reached rather on popular and consuetudinary than critical grounds, and it is no matter for surprise that the question of canonicity was reopened at the Reformation, and again within the last half century. Nothing, however, has been proved which affects the claim of the large majority of NT books, and those of chief interest and value, to be the record of the faith once delivered to the saints. The wisdom with which, on the whole, the line has been drawn is only made more apparent on a consideration of those books, such as the Epp. of Clement, the Ep. of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which long maintained a position on the very borders of Scripture, and are given at the conclusion of NT in certain very ancient MSS. It only remains to mention the large number of apocryphal Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypses, such as those of Eusebius, of which some, as the Gospel of Nicodemus, the Acts of Paul and Thekla, have long been known, while of others, as the Gospel and Epistle of St. Peter, fragments have only recently been discovered.

V. TEXT.—i. Hebrew.—Until the invention of printing, in the 15th cent., the only mode of transmitting ancient books was by the slow and laborious method of copying one MS from another. Hand-copying, like typography itself, is subject to special tendencies to error. Since any mistake may be confined to a single MS, though almost certain to be continued in any copies made from it, it is obvious that the work of tracing out the original text by a comparison of MSS is a difficult and delicate one. It forms the subject of a special study, called Textual Criticism, and demands no little ability, patience, and tact. For many centuries the rolls written for use in the synagogue have been prepared with scrupulous care, and the texts which they represent have been preserved, it may be said, free from variation. This applies to the books of the Law, the Haphtaroth or lessons from the Prophets, and the five great books (Ca, Ru, La, Ec, Est) used at the great festivals. It applies, however, only to the consonantal characters, since these rolls were written without points and accents, and does not apply to the period before the scribes of the Jewish tradition took the rolls under their special care, nor so strictly to the MSS intended for private use, which had the vowel points together with the Massoretic notes and commentary. It is said that the earliest Heb. MS of which the age is known dates from A.D. 916, but few are extant which have come down from an earlier period than the 12th cent., and these, as will readily be understood from what has been said, represent a single tradition, and are of no use for comparative purposes. The work, first of the Talmudists between the 1st and 5th centuries, and then of the Massoretes from the 6th to the 11th centuries, has fixed the Heb. text (hence called the Massoretic) to the utmost attainable degree of exactness. But that prior to the time of the Massoretes the Heb. Scriptures had been subject to the ordinary conditions of MS copying, is evident from the numerous and important variations found in the Samaritan Pent. and the LXX. These agree together in many particulars in regard to which both differ from the Heb. text, and they are comparatively independent witnesses—the one to the state of the text in possibly the 5th cent. B.C., the other to that in the 3rd.

ii. Greek.—Many ancient MSS contain the LXX version of OT along with the text of NT. It seems, therefore, more convenient to divide MSS into Hebrew and Greek than into OT and NT. Two facts in the early history of NT Scriptures are worthy of note. The one is the wholesale destruction of the sacred books during the persecution of Diocletian (A.D. 302), and the other that in A.D. 330 fifty large and carefully prepared copies of the Scriptures were made by order of the Emperor Constantine for the use of the churches of Constantinople. The former event is doubtless accountable for the fact that no MS exists which is older than the 4th cent. For a thousand years the sacred text may be traced in a continuous and increasing stream of MSS. About 100 of these are Uncials, written, that is, in capital letters—a mark of early date; the remainder, numbering nearly 2000, being Cursives, that is, in the smaller running hand which was used from the 9th cent. onwards. An interesting class of MSS are the Palimpsests, in which the sacred text has been more or less obliterated and some later work written over it. Short articles on the five leading uncials will be found under their respective symbols: viz. (1) the Codex Sinaiticus, known by the symbol  $\aleph$ , (2) the Codex Vaticanus (B), (3) the Codex Alexandrinus (A), (4) the Codex Ephraemi (C), and (5) the Codex Bezae (D).

VI. VERSIONS.—Renderings of the Scriptures from the original into other tongues are not only interesting in themselves as giving us the form in which the B. brought its message to the various peoples of the earth, but (esp. those of ancient times) are of very great value for determining what the original text itself was. They tap, as it were, the stream of MS evidence at various points from which we have parallel and independent streams available for comparison with the parent stream and with each other. It is evident that, to derive the full benefit from this circumstance, a critical text of the VSS must be prepared with the same care as of the MS, and it is obvious how important it is in deciding between rival MS readings, as also for purposes of interpretation. The weakness of this branch of textual criticism is the defective state of the text of even the most important versions. Along with the VSS proper are justly reckoned those references in the writings of the early Fathers, which are in effect fragmentary MSS or VSS, according as they are quotations or translations.

Of OT the most important version is the Alexandrian, known as the Septuagint (LXX), from the tradition that the portion of it embracing the Law was made by 72 scribes or scholars sent by the high priest from Jerus. to Alexandria at the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285-247). This tradition, afterwards extended to the whole version, has not only been overlaid by many mythical elements, but originally rested upon a letter by one Aristeas, which is now admitted to be a forgery. It is, moreover, contradicted by the differences in merit and value which distinguish the several books, as well as by the divergence in the methods of paraphrasing and interpretation employed. There can be no doubt that a succession of translators of varying capacity and skill were engaged upon this version. The work was carried on probably during the 3rd and 2nd cents. B.C., the greater part being completed at the latest by B.C. 132, the date alluded to in the preface to the Greek rendering of the Book of Ecclesiastics. There were other Greek VSS, such as those of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus; but none of these was so widely influential or so extensively used as the LXX. It is of importance not only as an aid to the study of the Heb. OT, but as introductory to the Greek NT, the language of which is largely based upon it. From it spring other VSS, such as the Itala or Old Latin Version, certain Syriac VSS, the Æthiopic, Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, Georgian, Gothic, and Slavonic VSS, together with the Arabic VSS, which were not taken directly from the original. The Targums or in-interpretations were rather paraphrases than translations. The necessity for them arose from the substitution of Aramaic for Heb. as the ordinary language of the Jews after their return from the Exile. The most important is the Targ. of Onkelos on the Pent., which keeps more closely to the original than the others, and is remarkable for careful as well as skilful work.

Of VSS which embrace both OT and NT, one of the earliest and most valuable is the Syriac Peshitta, the name meaning 'simple' or 'faithful.' Its relation to one or two VSS of equal or greater antiquity is still sub judice. It dates from the 2nd cent. A.D. Its place in the history of the Canon has already been mentioned. The Philoxenian or Monophysite Version is not an independent rendering, but a peculiar modification of the Peshitta. The Old Lat. Version (the Itala) prob. arose in N. Africa, was made (as already mentioned) from the Greek of the LXX, and is only known from citations in patristic writers. It was in the course of revising the Old Latin that Jerome conceived the design of making a new translation of OT direct from the Hebrew. This work, begun in A.D. 390, occupied him fourteen years, and was for long the standard version in the West. It was accused of being too literal, and it received its name later.

It was recognised by Gregory the Great, but 200 years more elapsed before it became in the West the generally received and authoritative version, thenceforward known as the Vulgate or 'popular' version. The text of the Vulgate is in a very unsatisfactory condition, having been almost from the first corrupted owing to the existence and use along with it of the Old Latin, and the not unnatural transference of readings from the one to the other.

On the maintenance of modern VSS of the B. it is impossible here to speak. Our own English B. has a long and interesting history (see under art. VERSIONS). Most modern VSS differ from the ancient in the extent of the critical apparatus on which they are based. They do not depend upon a single MS or a single version in another tongue. This is esp. the case with the most recent revisions, which, as for instance our own RV, attempt to present, both in regard to text and interpretation, the nearest possible approach to the language of the original writers of the Scriptures.

B. THE EXTERNAL RELATIONS OF THE BIBLE.

Having now, so far as space permits, analysed the B., shown the parts of which it is made up, the forms in which it has appeared, their relations to each other, and their history up to the point at which this collection practically assumed its present form, we turn to its consideration as a whole, its character as a literature, and its relation to Christianity and the Christian Church. The B. is the sacred book of Christianity. Round it—its origin, history, and contents—circle many of the most important questions which affect the nature and claims of Christian faith. As Christianity is admittedly the highest and purest form of religion known to man, it may be said that the religious destinies of the race depend upon the B. He, certainly, who would understand what Christianity is, must have a clear conception of what the B. is and teaches.

I. THE LITERATURE OF OTHER RELIGIONS.—As, however, there are other religions besides Christianity, there are other literatures which are regarded as sacred and authoritative by the adherents of these religions. Some of them, indeed, claim to be the vehicles of Divine Revelation. It may be well, therefore, to consider what a sacred book is, and how it acquires this character, and to give a brief account of the chief sacred books of the world. It is one great characteristic of them that they have in every case grown; they are collections, literatures, rather than books; not composed at once, or proceeding from one hand, but combining many elements, and generally receiving the sanction of a community of a religion during a considerable period of time. This is to a great extent true even of the Koran, which is more of the nature of a book than any of the others. With the exception again of the Koran, it is probable that large portions of their contents were handed down by tradition before being committed to writing. Religion began in custom rather than in thought, and was embodied in ceremonies before these were explained by means of doctrines. However simple the primitive worship might be, it naturally tended to assume fixed forms; the same words would be used in incantation and prayer, and these would be accompanied by the same acts and observances. When religious custom became more complicated and more highly organised, the tradition was preserved first by means of a sacred caste or priesthood, and then by writing down the tradition itself. Hence the most ancient portion of such literatures usually consists of liturgical formulas and ritual texts, where the former give the words to be used and the latter give the directions for the accompanying acts. The priestly class being naturally the learned class, and their writings remaining for a long time the only national literature, it was to be expected that many matters of interest would receive notice in that literature which could not be strictly and absolutely described as religious. Thus mythological and historical traditions which were already ancient, and which were held in reverence, would be preserved and handed down. Laws first of ceremonial and then of moral worthiness, the precepts of religion in its exercise even about civil matters, the legends of the heroes of the nation and of the prophets, and other registers,—all, in fact, which was regarded by those who were identified with the religion as having permanent value became a part of the sacred book. These features can be traced in OT itself, and are generally characteristic of what are known as the Bibles of mankind. The canonical position acquired by such writings is due to their acceptance by nations or religious communities as of decisive authority especially in matters affecting faith and worship, and is usually supported by ascribing to them a supernatural origin, or at least the authority due to them as the work of the founders of the respective religions, or as belonging to the period of development when the influence of the founder was still fresh and his initiative unimpaired.

For our present purpose it is only necessary to take account of the literary monuments of the chief ethnic religions. Fuller details may be found in such works as Chantepie de la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte (of which the first volume has been translated); Tiele, Outlines of the History of Religion; Menzies, History of Religion; and in the literature as cited in these works. For a brief sketch of the religions themselves, see RELIGION.

The sacred books of China bring us face to face with the practical paradox, that, while none have ever been more influential in moulding the life of a people, no inspiration or supernatural authority is claimed for them. They are received with the reverence due to the sages from whom they proceeded, and their guardians are not so much priests as scholars. The five chief books of Confucianism are termed King,—i.e. classical, canonical,—and are partly the original work of the master, partly compilations and selections by him from pre-existing literature, with possibly, to some small extent, later additions. In character they range from extremely dry chronicles to the interpretation of magical formulas, rules of conduct, and sacred songs. The Li-Ki contains laws for domestic and social life at once comprehensive and minute, and by them the life of the whole Chinese Empire has been moulded; and it is full of finely conceived and inspiring thoughts. The four Shoo, or records of the much that is of interest,abilia of Confucius himself and the writings of Mencius, one of the most powerful and practical of Chinese thinkers. The teaching of the latter as to human nature has been compared with that of Bishop Butler, since it regard human nature in its ideal as a system or constitution in which the rightful ruler of the entire nature is the moral will. The Tao-ti-King is the sacred book of Taoism, which divides with Confucianism and a form of Buddhism the religious homage of the Chinese people. The author of this 'Book of Doctrine and Virtue' was the philosophic mystic Lao-tsze, who was born about half a century before Confucius (B.C. 600). Lao-tsze traces the origin of things to an impersonal reason, and directs men to seek the supreme good by way of contemplation and asceticism; at the same time many of his utterances are marked by great beauty and genuine moral insight.

In India we meet with a twofold stream of literature,—that of Brahmanism and that of Buddhism,—the former being the main factor in the development of modern Hinduism. The Brahmanic literature includes the Vedas proper, consisting of four books or collections of hymns, the Brahmanas, or ritualistic commentary upon these, and the Upanishads or speculative treatises containing the philosophy of the universe which the Vedas and hymns seemed to imply. All these form part of the Veda, or knowledge par excellence, and belong to revelation or 'Śruti' (hearing), as having been communicated to inspired men from a higher source. A second order of books is similarly termed 'Smṛiti' (recollection or tradition), and includes the law books, the great Epic poems, and the Puranas or ancient legends. Of these various works the most important and interesting from our present point of view are the Rigveda, the Laws of Menu, and the Epics. The Rigveda is of the greatest antiquity, and reveals much of the life and manner of thinking and feeling of the earliest invaders of India from the north of whom anything is known. The hymns are spirited and intensely national in tone. They were designed for use at the sacrifices, of the ritual of which they formed an essential part. The gods addressed in them are pre-eminently Nature deities, whose power is extolled and whose aid and favour are invoked. The Laws of Menu form one of those codes for the regulation of conduct which have gradually grown into shape. Much of it is believed to have been of prehistoric times, and the main body of the code is undoubtedly very ancient, though in its present form it is probably not older than the 2nd cent. A.D. It has been described as 'a kind of Indian Pentateuch, resting on the fundamental assumption that every part of life is essentially religious.' It is either in a particular locality or with a particular school, but gradually extended its authority over the entire Hindu people. It consecrates the system of Caste, but, while it exalts asceticism, its regulation of ordinary life is touched with a fine spirit and marked by a practical morality. The great Epic poems, the Rāmāyana and the Mahābhārata, chiefly influenced the transition from the ancient Brahmanism to modern Hinduism. With their countless legends and deep personal interest, they appealed to those whom neither speculation nor ritual could move. They are the Bibles of the people, and celebrate the achievements of the ancient heroes, Rama and Krishna. The latter is regarded in the Mahabharata as an incarnation of Vishnu, one of the supreme Hindu deities. The idea of incarnation of deity is indeed the chief addition made by these poems to the religious thought of India, and was probably developed under the necessity of competing with Buddhism for popular favour. Turning to the sacred literature of Buddhism, it is best represented in what is known as the Southern Canon, the form in which the books are used by the Buddhists of Ceylon. They are written in Pāli, while those of the Northern Canon are in Sanskrit. They are otherwise termed the Tripiṭaka, or three baskets, from the manner of preserving the leaves in each volume, and were accepted as canonical about B.C. 250. The three 'baskets' are the Vinaya Piṭaka, which gives the rules of Buddhism as a religious community, and especially of its monastic order; the Abhidharma Piṭaka (the philosophical or speculative doctrine); and the Sutta Piṭaka consisting of reminiscences of the parables and sermons of Buddha, in which the religion is adapted to common life. To the last belong the Dhammapadam, the 'sentences of religion,' the most popular or all the Buddhist books. The Dhammapadam and the Sutta-nipata are said to rank among the most impressive of the religious books of the world.

The religion specially identified with Persia is Zoroastrianism, and the B. of Zoroastrianism is commonly known as Zend-Avesta. Properly, however, 'Avesta' is the text,—like the Indian 'Veda,' it means 'knowledge,'—and 'Zend' is the commentary or annotation upon it. The commentary is in a different language from the text. The latter consisted originally of 21 books, but practically only one of these has survived. It consists of three parts—the Yasna, a collection of liturgies and hymns; the Visperad, consisting of prayers; and the Vendidad, an ancient law book, with which are incorporated a number of legendary narratives. While the prevailing character of the Zend-Avesta is that rather of a book of devotion than of the Bible in our sense, there is a variety of religious conceptions which illustrate its essentially composite character. At the same time it contains many passages of an extremely noble and exalted character, and the religion of which it is the basis has had no inconsiderable influence upon both Judaism and Christianity.

The only other sacred book of the first rank which it is necessary for us to notice is the Koran of the Mohammedans. The name signifies 'reading.' It has already been remarked that the Koran differs from other sacred literatures in being the production of one man. Mohammed is its author, the revelations being written down by the followers of the prophet, after whose death the fragments were gathered together and formed, unfortunately with a total lack of arrangement, into the unity of a single book. The attempts of modern scholars to set the suras or chapters in chronological order has largely increased the interest of the book, and thrown light upon the spiritual development of the prophet himself. In such an arrangement the earliest utterances are seen to be full of emotional fire, brief, poetic, pointed. The later are longer and more prosaic, dealing with all varieties of subjects, personal and domestic, civil as well as religious. They contain also elements drawn from Jewish and Christian sources. Yet the Koran throughout claims to be inspired in the strictest sense, its words are the words of God Himself.

II. THE BIBLE IN RELATION TO THE LITERATURE OF OTHER RELIGIONS.—What, then, is the relation of the literature thus briefly described to the Christian Scriptures? It is not necessary to depreciate the former in order to exalt the latter. We have already noted that there is wisdom, truth, and spirituality in these books of non-Christian faiths. They and the religions with which they are connected have been the light of generations of human beings. They are associated with the civilisations of the world and its great historical epochs. What we have now to ask is, whether, apart from the question of Divine Revelation, to which we shall presently advert, any of them possess the qualities fitting them to become the sacred books of the world, or whether the B., from this point of view, has any manifest superiority over them? If we turn to Confucianism and its authoritative literature, we find everywhere a consecration of the past, even where it is not understood, which is the deadly enemy of progress; the life of the people is bound in fetters of habit and ceremony which political changes and revolutions have not sufficed to break. The characteristics of the Chinese mind, with its want of comprehensiveness, and excessive attention to minute detail, are reflected in its 'classics.' Moral and spiritual life is crushed out under the burden of external precepts and directions, and there is a determined adherence to the level of the purely human, an avoidance of all reference to the divine, which is not only fails to mutilate the higher side of man's nature, and to deprive him of an ideal. It is no wonder that the mysticism of the Taoist King had no attraction for those out of whom the great religions have not wholly crushed. But the Chinese mind, with its ethical excellences, as a whole is a failure, and shows how little it can do without a historical religion.

The B. is not only by its immense extent, but by the great variety of standpoints represented in it. We are not to expect that a single people can scarcely be expected to satisfy the entire human race. The Vedic hymns exhibit the instability of polytheism. The Brahmanic system endeavoured to meet this defect by means of its philosophical developments; but in so doing unfitted itself to be a popular religion. Hence India, during the supremacy of Brahmanism, had in reality two religions, the speculative and the idolatrous and mythical. The separation between the two tended to intensify their several peculiarities as well as to degrade the popular faith and deity which was only partially met by the incarnation ideas which emerge in the great Epics. Even Buddhism, which presents a personal object of affection and imitation to the worshipper, is condemned by its one-sidedness. If in Confucianism we have a religious positivism which will not look at the Divine, in Buddhism we have an agnosticism which cannot find it. It is a religion of despair; it cannot become the spring of human effort, promote civilisation, or contribute to social progress. The sacred books which have sprung up on soil like this, reflecting the peculiarities of their origin, must be held as falling short of the required conditions on which alone they could supersede all others. Zoroastrianism as a religion may be said to be already dead, modern Parsism being a comparatively unimportant modification of it. The Zend-Avesta is of interest, as we have seen, for the noble elements contained in it, and for the traces of its thought which are to be found in the teachings of other faiths; but even in the portions which have come down to us, it shows itself, like the literature of Brahmanism, a mixture of diverse views and standpoints. Its mainly liturgical character, and the view presented in it of the supreme Deity, so far as a dualistic system can be said to have a supreme Deity, prevented it from spreading much beyond the region of its origin. The Mohammedan Koran is equally unfitted to become the book of a universal religion. Like Confucianism, though in a different way, Islam is a foe to progress. Its ideas are bald and poor; it grew too late; its doctrines and forms were developed at the very outset of its career, and do not admit of change. Its morality is that of the stage at which men emerge from idolatry... its doctrine is after all no more than a negation of other gods. Allah is but a negation of other gods. He does not enter into humanity, and therefore he cannot render to humanity the highest services.

We have seen that the B. contributes to the Cambridge edition of the OT Scriptures under the heading of 'The Bible.' In no case is the revelation or authoritative rule given in them represented as embodied and wrought out step by step in the life of a people. The doctrine is announced and explained, and fenced in by the prophets who unfold and grow, which at once shows the B. as a revelation of God's will to man, and as a revelation of man's will to God. 3. They are partial. In their most complete form they may be said to be a Psalm completed by a law or ritual. On the other hand, the B. contains every element which the representatives of different races have found to be the vehicle of religious teaching, and every element in its fullest and most fruitful form. If these features, we may add, are conspicuous on a comparison with the OT, the argument is strengthened when the NT is brought into view. There the highest reaches of doctrine are reached; there the culmination of the revelation is reached; there in amplest measure are to be found the sources of man's purest and highest life. And the B., thus completed, is a point of distinction which properly does not belong to the OT alone. The sacred Scriptures are essentially national, or at least racial; they are bound by limits of place and time, the conditions of their origin, the circumstances in which they arose; they are bound to the needs of the people to whom they are addressed, and most of all, they are bound to the hearts of men of varying countries and climes.

i. Revelation.—A usual feature of the sacred books we have been considering is the claim made by them, or on behalf of them, that they are vehicles of a divine Revelation. The Chinese alone do not claim that their books are inspired, though they regard them with a reverence as deep as anything connected with their religion calls forth. The three parts of the Veda, as we have seen, are distinguished as 'S'ruti,' 'revelation,' from the 'Smṛiti,' or 'tradition.' The Vedic hymns themselves were held to possess supernatural powers, and were raised to the rank of a divinity. The Avesta had been, according to the Persians, communicated to Zoroaster (Zoroaster) by Ahura, the good god, himself. The Koran, according to the Mohammedans, is an earthly copy of a heavenly original, which the angel of revelation made known to the prophet during his ecstasies; it was the subject of one of their greatest controversies whether the Koran as it stands, down to the very word and letter, was not uncreated and eternal, and free therefore from every possible imperfection. The motive of such conceptions lies upon the surface. If, on the one hand, it is man's way of expressing his boundless reverence for that which is ancient or of proved value, it is, on the other hand, due to the desire of feeling himself on solid ground in regard to the highest and most mysterious concerns of life, those which relate to the power above him and the future before him. Somewhat similar claims are made on behalf of the B. It also brings a revelation from God; it also is an inspired book. Are all such claims equally futile? Because they are made on behalf of many books, are they true of none? Such a conclusion would be obviously inept. If a revelation is necessary for man, and if it is in the highest degree unlikely that God would leave man without this necessary guidance,—points which we cannot fully discuss in this place,—it must be somewhere, and the fact that there are unfounded claims to its possession should stimulate the search for it, not lead to its abandonment. And these claims, if nothing more, are a pathetic confession of man's sense of helplessness in presence of the deeper problems of existence, of his felt need for higher guidance. Nor is it necessary to deny that the conviction so strongly held had a relative justification. A better and juster view of the religions of the world than that formerly entertained, leads us to see that in them also God was educating the world for Himself. In their higher phases, by means of their loftier spirits, a message was delivered to the nations, in which they were not wrong in recognising His voice. In comparison with Christianity they may be classed as 'natural' religions, but at least God was speaking in the worthier manifestations of the 'nature' which He had made. We are prepared, therefore, rather than unfitted by their study, to recognise in Christianity a divine revelation, and in the B. an inspired book, while the question of degree of Inspiration, and as to what Inspiration itself involves, is directly suggested by it.

ii. Inspiration.—The Christian doctrine of Inspiration was largely an inheritance from the Jews along with the OT, to which alone it at first applied. After the disappearance of Prophetism, and the reconstitution of the 'Church-people' of Israel on the basis of the written law, it is not surprising that rigid and even mechanical views of Inspiration prevailed. The Talmud, while admitting degrees of Inspiration, declared that the Pentateuch at least had been divinely dictated to Moses; while Alexandrian Judaism, doubtless under Platonic influences, and on the analogy of the heathen Mantic, held that it involved a total suspension of the human faculties. The first Christian writer to propound a theory of this kind is Justin Martyr, who could not conceive of the things above being made known to men otherwise than by the Divine Spirit using righteous men like a harp or lyre, from which the plectrum elicits what sound it will. This view was followed with more or less emphasis by such writers as Tertullian, Irenæus, Origen; while others, like Chrysostom, Basil, Jerome, were disposed to recognise the inspiration of the several writers as moulding their individual work. While Eusebius affirms that it would be foolish to say that the sacred penmen could have substituted one word for another, and Augustine sometimes ascribes to them an absolute infallibility, the latter betrays some disposition to recognise the human element when he says that the evangelists wrote 'ut quisque memorat et ut cuique cordi erat.' Two circumstances probably prevented the early Church from definitely adopting an extreme doctrine on this subject. One was the struggle with Montanism, which led to a clearer distinction being drawn between inspiration and ecstasy. The other was the authority still ascribed to the tradition of the Churches, which was so much on a level with that attributed to Scripture that Irenæus could complain of the difficulty of dealing with heretics who could appeal from one to the other, as suited their purpose. The same duality of resource characterised the common practice of the Church of that age, whose bishops invoked now the B. and now tradition in favour of their judgments. In the succeeding period, the inspiration of the B. was in many quarters maintained in an uncompromising form, while practically the B. was more and more subordinated to tradition as embodied in the Church. On the one hand, it was held to be useless to inquire the name of the writer of a passage of Scripture since the Holy Spirit was the author of all Scripture, or it was asserted that the Holy Spirit formed the very words in the mouths of prophets and apostles; on the other, the Church placed itself between the individual Christian and the B., which gradually became more and more unknown and inaccessible. Its authority was so much obscured as ignored. This position was maintained through the Middle Ages—a position definitely formulated by the Council of Trent and the later Roman Catholic theologians. It was the Reformers who revived the appeal to Scripture in opposition to the authority of the Roman Church and its traditions. This they did, however, without pronouncing upon the questions which the authority they ascribed to the B. seemed to a later age to involve. It was enough for them that the 'good news' was declared in it, that by its use a soul could draw near to God without priest or rite. Luther proposed to revise the Canon, or at least to estimate the value of the several books by the distinctness with which Christ was preached in them—a criterion which, it is evident, was at once too narrow and too wide, excluding some books which not only Christian antiquity, but devout usage, had consecrated, and including, if consistently carried out, masses of Christian literature. Zwingli and Calvin maintained as firmly as Luther the supremacy of the B., while also keeping an open mind as to its several parts. For them the substance and content was everything, the form of secondary importance. The Confessions of that epoch in general share this freedom of attitude, though those of the Reformed Churches are more explicit than the Lutheran. The 17th cent. was a period at once of violent controversy and of rigid definition. The Jesuits on the one hand, the Socinians and Arminians on the other, attacked the authority of Scripture in the interests of Ecclesiasticism or Rationalism. Protestant orthodoxy, whether in the Lutheran or Calvinistic form, intrenched itself on the foundation of the B., identifying inspiration with infallibility, and the record with the revelation it conveyed. The sacred writers were regarded as the passive instruments, the amanuenses, of the Divine Spirit. Inspiration was defined as including the impulsus ad scribendum, the suggestio rerum, and the suggestio verborum. The diversity of style apparent in Scripture was explained as the voluntary accommodation of Himself to the writers by the Holy Spirit. At the same time, with so exalted an authorship, the language could not be anything but pure and exact; no barbarisms or solecisms could enter into the Greek of the NT, and even the vowel points and accents of the Hebrew text were inspired—an opinion stamped as orthodox by the Swiss Formula Consensus of 1675. From the theory of inspiration thus formulated (and exaggerated) followed the attributes (affectiones seu proprietates Scripturæ sacræ) which the dogmatic writers ascribed to the B. These are primary and secondary. The primary are: 1. Divina auctoritas, resting upon its external evidences and internal qualities; but, above all, upon the testimonium Spiritus Sancti, or the witness of God in the soul. This authority constitutes the Scriptures the sole tribunal in matters of faith and life. 2. Perfectio or sufficientia; the B. contains all that is necessary to salvation. 3. Perspicuitas. The B. is self-explanatory. Passages may be more or less obscure, but these must be explained by means of the simpler and clearer declarations. Rightly used, it requires no other interpreter. 4. Efficacia. The B. is a means of grace, having the power of converting the sinful and consoling the sad. The secondary attributes are necessitas, integritas et perennitas, puritas et sinceritas fontium, authentica dignitas. These indicate generally that a revelation must be written, and that, in all respects, the B., as we have it, is the B. as it was intended to be.

It is unnecessary to pursue further the history of the idea of Inspiration applied to the B. Enough has been said to show the position which it held, and how it was liable to be modified according to the circumstances in which the Church of successive ages found itself placed. Before touching, however, upon the position accorded to the B. at the present day, attention must be directed for a moment to the relation in which the question of canonicity stands to that of inspiration, since these together have determined the manner in which the B. has been received in the Christian Church. The formation of a Canon at all implies that authority is attributed to the writings included in it. The history of the Canon has shown us that it was formed gradually, as the result of local usage, which fixed and extended itself, and not as the outcome of criticism or even formal determination on the part of the whole Church or its more important divisions. By the end of the 4th cent., as we have seen, the B. stood practically as we have it now. Yet its limits were not settled in such a way that the Reformers of the 16th cent. felt themselves precluded from rediscussing them. Their tendency was, in the first instance, to examine this and other accepted usages of the Church in the light of historical inquiry. But the opportunities and the material for a competent historical investigation were wanting. The questions at issue were largely decided upon the basis of feeling, either individual or general. The exigencies of controversy necessitated a rapid arrival at a decision which should be practical and readily intelligible. While, therefore, it was not upon the authority of the Church, but through an intuitive perception supposed to reside in the believing Christian, that the contents of the B. were received, the B. thus acknowledged was nevertheless the same B. as that of the 16th cent. And this once determined, the doctrine of Inspiration was frequently employed to lift it out of the region of historical criticism, and to make its limits and contents a matter of dogmatic definition. Thus we have the rather remarkable result that inspiration in the sense of a supernatural guarantee for their truth and authority is claimed for a series of writings, while no claim is, or can be, made for a supernatural determination of the precise writings which are to be included in the series. If the latter question is still open to historical criticism, and must be determined, as every book on Biblical Introduction proves to us anew, on grounds of historical criticism, it is impossible for a dogmatic definition to be applied in more than a general way to such a series of books; and in that case the question, what inspiration is, and what are its limits or degrees, is again opened up. So long as inspiration cannot be claimed for the process by which canonicity is determined, canonicity cannot be held to fix the bounds of inspiration. It is true that, as Westcott remarks (Brie in the Church, pp. 293, 294), the usage which fixed the Canon 'is only another name for a divine instinct, a providential inspiration, a function of the Christian body'; that 'history teaches by the plainest examples that no one part of the B. could be set aside without great and permanent injury to the Church which refused a portion of the apostolic heritage. We are now in a position to estimate what would have been lost if the Epistle to the Hebrews or the Epistle of St. James or the Apocalypse had been excluded from the Canon. And, on the other hand, we can measure the evils which flow equally from canonising the Apocrypha of the OT, and denying to them all ecclesiastical use.'

In more recent times, and at the present day, cases may be pointed out of almost all the varieties of view on the subject which our brief historical sketch brought to light. Some carry inspiration to the extreme of literalism, some appear to deny it in any sense in which it is not applicable to poetry and other forms of art. Unreserved condemnation should not be poured upon either of these extremes. The first is held not only by the unthinking multitude,—'the indolence of human nature,' Mr. Gladstone remarks (Butler, iii. p. 17), 'would be greatly flattered by a scheme such as that of the verbal inspiration of Holy Scripture,'—but by thoughtful men who have seen in it the logical conclusion of their religious theories; the second, not only by those who are indifferent to religion, but by fine spirits who have not seen the possibility or perhaps the need of anything further. The large majority of inquirers, however, recognise frankly the true inspiration of the B., and also that the determination of its nature, degrees, and limits must be the result of an induction from all the available facts.

On the one hand, full weight must be given to that remarkable testimony of history which Westcott, in the passage quoted above, signalises. But a still more remarkable phenomenon of the same kind is apparent in the pages of the B. itself. From one point of view, nothing can be more unsystematic and fragmentary than its contents. It is full of contrasts and surface-discrepancies. It is made up of extracts from the lives of individuals and the experiences of a people. All forms of literature are represented in it (see The Literary Study of the Bible, by R. G. Moulton). It presents no systematised theology or ethics. Yet a closer observation reveals the unity underlying all this variety. A progress is discernible from the first page to the last. Revelation corresponds to revelation, like the outcropping of the same rock-stratum in different places. One thought, one plan, is seen to pervade the whole, and to make the B., if the product of many minds, the outcome of one Spirit,—not a 'library' only, as has been said, but a 'book.' Again, in so far as the B. is admitted to be inspired, its testimony to itself, the testimony of part to part, cannot be ignored. This is an argument which may easily be pushed too far and made to prove too much; its application in any absolute way would require, for example, the question of canonicity to be already settled. But the great argument for the real inspiration of the B. in a special sense is that it commends itself to the minds of those who devoutly receive it,—what the Reformers designated the testimonium Spiritus Sancti. The relation of this to other evidences for the unique authority of Scripture is expressed by the Westminster Confession (ch. i. 5) thus: 'We may be moved and induced by the testimony of the Church to an high and reverend esteem of the Holy Scripture, and the heavenliness of the matter, the efficacy of the doctrine, the majesty of the style, the consent of all the parts, the scope of the whole (which is to give all glory to God), the full discovery it makes of the only way of man's salvation, the many other incomparable excellences, and the entire perfection thereof are arguments whereby it doth abundantly evidence itself to be the word of God; yet, notwithstanding, our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth, and divine authority thereof, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit, bearing witness by and with the word in our hearts.' This is the religious test of the value of Scripture. But it obviously applies only to the revelation, the vehicle. It is religious, not less historical or scientific. However real and important the fact to which it points, it bears upon it a stamp of individuality, subjectivity. As seen at work in Luther, for example, 'it is impossible to read his comments on Holy Scripture without feeling that he realises its actual historical work and consequent spiritual meaning in a way which was unknown before. For him the words of apostles and prophets are "living words," direct and immediate utterances of the Holy Spirit, penetrating to the inmost souls of men, and not mere premises for arguments or proofs' (Westcott, l.c. pp. 245, 246). But a criterion which in Luther and other Reformers was compatible with a large degree of liberty, gave rise in its later and more formal application to the 'summary method,' as Westcott calls it, of cutting the knot of a difficulty, disposing of evidence by dogmatically pronouncing it superfluous, and assuming that history has been fully interpreted and has spoken its last word, and so converting a great truth into a fetter and a falsehood.

On the other hand, while the elements which thus make for the inspiration of the B. and its unique authority as a spiritual guide are widely and fully recognised, the human element in Scripture has in recent times forced itself upon the attention of the thoughtful. Here it is not merely that by evident signs the biblical writers show that they were not simply amanuenses writing to the dictation of a Spirit above them; it is not the occurrence of discrepancies and inconsistencies in the B. itself, or in connexion with external history and modern science; it is rather the recognition of a process of revelation in the B., that it contains the record of the struggle between the Divine light and human ignorance and sin, that the revelation is conveyed to us in such measure and manner as each of the writers was able to apprehend it and give it forth. Thus the process traced in an earlier portion of this article, whereby the 'books' became the 'Book,' the change of the point of view from plurality to unity, is one which wisdom, though it, and investigation find it necessary, to some extent, to reverse. In order to understand even this unity aright, it is found essential to scrutinise the several parts of which it is made up, the manifold media through which the revelation has been given, the several stages through which the B. as we know it has been evolved. This side of it will fall to be more carefully considered in the article THEOLOGY; in the meantime it is needful to observe that, as Gladstone remarks, 'if any development of Divine Revelation be acknowledged, if any distinction of authority between different portions of the text be allowed, then, in order to deal with subjects so vast and difficult, we are at once compelled to assume so large a liberty as will enable us to meet all the consequences which follow from the theory of a purely verbal inspiration' (B., iii. 17).

The subject of Inspiration and the B. is in our time canvassed mainly in two connexions—the rights of criticism, and the question of authority in matters of faith. Christianity as a historical religion cannot be exempted from the application of the principles of historical inquiry, nor can the

B. as literature be exempted from the canons of criticism which apply to the other religions of the world and their sacred books. So far all reasonable persons may be said to be agreed. The difficulties which have arisen in connexion with criticism have resulted from the division of the critics into two schools, one of which assumes that all the phenomena of the sacred history and its record must be explained by natural causes only, that the history of the Hebrew people is exactly parallel with that of Athens or of Rome, that the life of Christ is strictly of the same order as that of Socrates; while the other school recognises and allows for the element of the supernatural when it is seen at work. The one school, then, the historian, development without sympathy, therefore without understanding; the other avoids presuppositions, and seeks to set the facts from within as well as from without. The latter, no less than the former, feels that the respect due to the Christian documents themselves imposes the duty of a careful examination and appreciation of them in the light of their history. The object of criticism is not destruction only, it is a means of ascertaining truth, and it is not true reverence which would place the B. outside of its sphere of operation.

More pressing, perhaps, than even the distrust of criticism which prevails in many quarters, is the search for a unity. If the B. is not to be like an Act of Parliament, operative 'to the last and farthest extremity of its letter,' how is it to retain that quality which the Westminster Confession ascribes to it of being the final court of appeal in all controversies of religion? How is the divine and authoritative element to be separated from the human and fallible? How, in fact, is revelation, in the sense of communicated knowledge, possible by means of the Scriptures? We may briefly notice two recent attempts to meet this difficulty.

Denney (Studies in Theology, ix.) quotes with approval the words of Robert C. Marsh, which he gives a modern rendering: 'the Scripturae are us Sancti: "If I am asked what I believe, I believe in the word of God, and as the only source of revelation, I believe with all the fathers of the Church, because the B. is the only record of the revelation of God, because in the B. alone I find God speaking to man in Christ Jesus, and declaring to us in His own words, "I am God, and this record I know to be true in my heart, whereby I am assured that God Himself is able to speak such words to my soul." The fathers have pointed out a message to man, not a doctrine of the text of Scripture.' His view is that coming to Scripture 'without any presuppositions whatever, without any antecedent conviction that it is inspired,' we become convinced that it is inspired because 'it asserts its authority over our world; it has power to lodge in our minds Christianity and its doctrine as being not only generally but divinely true,—its power to do this being "precisely what we mean by inspiration." A starting-point having been thus acquired, by 'working out from it the area of certitude may be gradually enlarged.' Having accepted the B. as in the man inspired and as a revelation, the same conviction may be indirectly confirmed regarding all which is not self-evidencing. The Canon is to be regarded on the general assumption that the Church as a whole is less likely to be mistaken than an individual inquirer. This is all that can be urged at by the multitude of Christian believers, or can be urged upon those whose minds are perplexed upon the subject; for the rest 'the theologian will know how to distinguish between the letter of the record and God revealing Himself through it.'

Fairbairn (Christ in Modern Theology, p. 496 ff.) appears to rest the authority of the revelation given in the B. upon the inspiration of those through whom it came—inspiration being described as a possession of the mind of man by the Spirit of God. This is the converse of the view of revelation, where the revelation and the response it awakes in the mind of the hearer or reader is the guarantee of the inspiration. Indeed, on Fairbairn's view the relations of inspiration and revelation seem to be reversed. 'God inspires, man reveals; inspiration is the process by which God gives; revelation is the mode or form—word, character, or institution—in which man embodies what he has received.' In this way a position is gained from which the adaptation of religious ideas to the circumstances of a people or age may be explained. But the attention and interests of men must ever be engaged with the revelation rather than the inspiration. The reality of the latter is a small matter apart from the character of the former. The essential function of inspiration is the formation of the personalities—both the minds for the thought and the thought for the minds—the essential function of the former is the creation of literature, the essential function of the latter is the creation of the articulate divine and the articulate human. How can the former be a guarantee for the latter? And in so far as inarticulate, how is the inspiration of Hebrew prophets and Christian apostles to be distinguished from that of Hindu or Persian poet or sage? It is true that ‘the inspiration of the men who read’ is made ‘as intrinsic and integral an element in the idea of revelation as the illumination of the men who wrote.’ But in both cases the theory promises a test which has all the subjectivity of the appeal to the testimonium Spiritus Sancti without the recognition of the divine quality of the revelation itself which enters into the latter. It seems open also to the same kind of criticism which Sir Win. Hamilton, in a well-known essay, applied to some metaphysical theory: the intellectual intuition being the source of consciousness, is no help to the question of what it alone or jointly creates, personality and impersonality, and personality, and writes: in writing therefore about the book, he writes what is to him as zero.' What, then, is the relation which man gives to his possession, in which it is

These instances serve to illustrate the difficulties surrounding the question. It is probable that no theory of inspiration will ever solve all these difficulties so far as they are entirely satisfactory. It may be fully and freely recognised that the B. has a unique excellence of its own, qualities which set it apart from even the greatest literary achievements of the race, while yet it has been constructed in such a way that the human element, the peculiarities and even the limitations of its writers, have been consistently maintained. In two respects, we of this age are perhaps in a more favourable position for dealing with the question than those who have gone before us. On the one hand, it is possible to compare the Christian religion with the teachings of the non-Christian religions, and to see how far the former has been known to the sympathy which in earlier times was bestowed upon it. On the other, a closer and more intimate knowledge of the Bible itself as a living book and not as a mere repository of proof texts, is one of the marks of our time. 'Criticism has, by bringing the sacred books into relation with sacred history, done something to restore them to their real and living significance . . . by binding the book and the people together, and then connecting both with the providential order of the world, it has given us back the idea of the God who lives in history through His people, and a people who live for Him through His word' (Fairbairn, l.c. p. 508). Whatever be the results of the literary analysis of the biblical books, or the bearing of archaeological discovery upon the history they record, this is the aim of historical criticism, and it can scarcely be doubted that the service it has rendered to classical and Oriental literature may be, and must be, rendered to the B. also. As a part of it, that practice which we have noticed of regarding the thought of the B. in its development and tracing it through its successive representations, is of the highest significance and value. In any case it is to be remembered that the B. contains the most ancient and most authentic documents bearing upon the origin, the nature, and the characteristic features of the Christian religion, and especially upon the person and work of its Founder. This gives to it an interest, if not an authority, which cannot be disputed. Of the revelation which we believe to have come through Christ, it is the early and reliable record. To it, therefore, the Church of later ages has naturally turned to correct her aberrations, and to obtain a renewal of her life. What the B. has been to individuals cannot be told. If the history of the world has a meaning, and is not a succession of fortuitous circumstances, we cannot fail to recognise the centre of that history in Christ, and the animating force of its later stages in the spiritual movement He inaugurated. Without the B. this movement could not be understood, or its influence continued and extended. We cannot doubt, therefore, that the God whose providence has ruled and shaped the history, who has moved and spoke in Christ, has also inspired the B. and made it what it is—the vehicle of the highest spiritual thought, the purest moral guidance man has known, and that it invites inquiry, and takes its place in the historical development. Sacred scholarship must finish the work upon it which it has begun. But withal the B. remains, and will remain, the most precious heritage of mankind.

BICHRI (בִּחְרִי).—In 2 S 20<sup>1</sup> Sheba is called 'the son of Bichri'; translate rather 'the Bichrite,' i.e. a member of the clan which traced its descent to Becher, the son of Benjamin (Gn 46<sup>21</sup>).

F. STENNING.

BID, bade, bid (2 K 5<sup>18</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>7</sup>) or bidden (Mt and Lk passim), 'to invite' to a feast, etc. (now archaic or local); 1 S 9<sup>18-22</sup> (אָרַךְ), Zeph 1<sup>7</sup> 'he hath bid his guests' (אָרַךְ, RV 'sanctified' with a ref. to 1 S 16<sup>5</sup>); Mt 22<sup>28</sup> 'sent for his servants to call (καλέω) them that were bidden (also καλέω, but in perf. ptcp.) to the wedding' (RV 'marriage feast'). In 1 Co 10<sup>27</sup> 'if any of them that believe not bid you to a feast' (καλέω, with no word for 'feast'); Lk 14<sup>12</sup> 'first they also bid thee again' (ἀντακαλέω).

To bid=to command, is common; but notice Lk 9<sup>48</sup>, Ac 18<sup>21</sup> 'bid farewell' (ἀποχαιρετίζω, used in Mk 6<sup>66</sup>, 'when he had sent them away', RV 'taken leave of them'; Ac 18<sup>18</sup> 'took his leave of'; 2 Co 2<sup>13</sup> 'taking my leave of'; Lk 14<sup>35</sup> 'forsaketh', RV 'renounceth').

J. HASTINGS.

BIDE, Wis 8<sup>12</sup> 'they shall bide my leisure' (περιμένω, translated 'wait for' Ac 1<sup>4</sup>, so RV here). 'Bide' is mostly replaced in mod. Eng. by 'abide' (which see).

BIDKAR (בִּדְקָר, possibly for בִּדְקָר; but this and similar contractions are highly uncertain).—A chief officer of Ahab and subsequently of Jchu (2 K 9<sup>25</sup>).

C. F. BURNEY.

BIER.—See BURIAL.

BIGTHA (צִיִּתָּה Est 1<sup>10</sup>).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. For the name compare Abagtha (צִיִּתָּה) and Bigthan (צִיִּתָּה). In the LXX the names are different, Βασιλῆ, Βασιλῆ B, Βασιλῆ A, taking the place of Bigtha.

H. A. WHITE.

BIGHAN (חִנָּן Est 2<sup>21</sup>), BIGTHANA (חִנְאָה Esr 6<sup>2</sup>). — One of two chamberlains or eunuchs of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) who conspired against the king's life. Their treachery was discovered and foiled by Mordecai. B. M. BOYD.

R. M. BOYD.

BIGYAI (בִּגְיָי).—1. A companion of Zerub. (Ezr 2<sup>2</sup>=Neh 7<sup>7</sup>, cf. Ezr 2<sup>14</sup>=Neh 7<sup>19</sup>, Ezr 8<sup>14</sup>, where the name appears as the head of a family of returning exiles). 2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10<sup>18</sup>). See GENERALOGY. J. A. SELBIE.

BILDAD (בִּלְדָּד, LXX Βαλδὰδ, 'Bel hath loved'?).—Described in Job 2<sup>11</sup> as one of Job's three friends. He is called 'the Shuhite,' indicating his descent from Shuah (שׁוּא), son of Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25<sup>2</sup>). Abraham is described as sending Shuah, with other sons of concubines, to 'the East country,' and his descendants probably lived in a district of Arabia not far from Idumæa. The region is not to be confounded with the trans-Hauran Schukla, or the Σακκαλα of Ptolemy, to the east of Batanæa. The LXX describes B. as τῶν Σαυχαίων τύραννος. For a description of the part taken by B. in the colloquies, see JOB, BOOK OF. It may be here briefly said that his position is in every sense intermediary between Eliphaz and Zophar. He speaks after the one and before the other; his speeches are shorter than those of Eliphaz, longer than those of Zophar. He is also more violent than the older and graver Eliphaz, but less blunt and coarse than the third spokesman who follows him. He speaks three times, in chapters 8, 18, and 25, the last time very briefly. W. T. DAVISON.

BILGAH (בִּלְגָּה 'cheerfulness').—1. Head of the 15th course of priests (1 Ch 24<sup>14</sup>). 2. A priest who returned with Zerub. (Neh 12<sup>18</sup>). The same as Bilgai (Neh 10<sup>8</sup>). H. A. WHITE.

BILGAI.—See BILGAH.

BILHAH, PERSON (בִּלְהָה, Βάλλα; in B of 1 Ch 7<sup>13</sup> Βαλῆμ; Bala, Bara).—A slave-girl given to Rachel by Laban, Gn 29<sup>23</sup> (P), and by her to Jacob as a concubine, Gn 30<sup>4</sup> (JE); the mother of Dan and Naphtali, Gn 30<sup>4</sup> (JE) 35<sup>25</sup> (P) 46<sup>25</sup> (R), 1 Ch 7<sup>13</sup>. She was guilty of incest with Reuben, Gn 35<sup>22</sup> (P). The etymology is uncertain. These narratives are to be regarded as embodying only the connection to the origin and mutual relations of the tribes, rather than personal history. Tribes are traced to a concubine ancestress, because they were a late accession to Israel.

W. H. BENNETT.

W. H. BENNETT.

BILHAN (בִּלְחָן).—1. A Horite chief, the son of Ezar (Gn 36<sup>27</sup> = 1 Ch 1<sup>4</sup>). 2. A descendant of Benjamin, son of Jediael, and father of seven sons who were heads of houses in their tribe (1 Ch 7<sup>10</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

R. M. BOYD.

BILL.—1. A bill of divorce or divorcement, Dt 24<sup>1, 3</sup>, Is 50<sup>1</sup>, Jer 3<sup>8</sup> (בִּלְיָהּ קִרְיָהּ sépher kériṭhâth, lit. 'a writ of cutting off' (see Driver on Dt 24<sup>1</sup>, who compares Sin 25<sup>1</sup> ἀπόρριψε αὐτήν, 'cut her off'); Mk 10<sup>4</sup> βιβλίον ἀποστασίου, the LXX τῆς sépher kériṭhâth; also used Mt 5<sup>31</sup> AV, RV 'writing of divorcement'; and 19<sup>7</sup>, AV as 5<sup>31</sup>, RV as Mk 10<sup>4</sup>). See MARRIAGE.

2. A debtor's written account, Lk 16<sup>7</sup> (TR τὸ γράμμα, edd. τὰ γράμματα, RV 'bond'). Edersheim (Jesus the Messiah, ii. 272 f.) points out that the Gr. word here employed was sometimes used in rabbinical writings (Hebraised gerammaton), and corresponded with the Syr. shutre, which denotes 'writings' that were either formal, when they were signed by witnesses and the Sanhedrin of three; or informal, when only the debtor himself signed. The latter were most frequently written on wax, and thus easily altered. See DEBT.

BILSHAN (בִּלְשָׁן 'inquirer').—A companion of Zerubbabel (Ezr 2<sup>2</sup>, Neh 7<sup>7</sup> = Beelsarus, 1 Es 5<sup>8</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

BIMHAL (בִּמְחָל for בִּמְחָל 'son of circumcision'?).—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7<sup>38</sup>).

BINEA (בִּנְיָה).—A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8<sup>37</sup> 9<sup>43</sup>).

BINNUI (בִּנְיָי 'a building').—1. Head of a family that returned with Zerub. (Neh 7<sup>10</sup> = Bani of Ezr 2<sup>10</sup>). 2. A Levite (Ezr 8<sup>33</sup> (prob. = Bani of Neh 8<sup>7</sup> and Bunni of Neh 9<sup>4</sup>), Neh 12<sup>2</sup>). 3. A son of Pahath-moab (Ezr 10<sup>30</sup> = Balnuus of 1 Es 9<sup>31</sup>). 4. A son of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>38</sup>). There appears to be a confusion in some instances between the similar names בִּנְיָי, בִּנְיָי, בִּנְיָי. See BAVVAI, GENEALOGY.

BIRSHA (בִּרְשָׁה, etym. and meaning unknown).—King of Gomorrah at the time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gn 14<sup>2</sup>).

BIRTH. Among the Hebrews, as among the Orientals generally (comp. Herod. i. 136, of the Persians), a high value was placed upon the possession of children (see, e.g., Gn 16<sup>2</sup> 29<sup>31</sup> 30<sup>1</sup>, 1 S 1<sup>6</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>14</sup>, Ps 127<sup>3, 5</sup>), and especially of sons (see 1 S 1<sup>11</sup>, Jer 20<sup>15</sup>, Job 3<sup>3</sup>), while childlessness was regarded as a heavy reproach (Gn 30<sup>23</sup>, Lk 12<sup>25</sup>) and punishment (2 S 6<sup>23</sup>, Hos 9<sup>11, 14</sup>). Parturition seems generally to have been easy (Ex 1<sup>19</sup>, yet see Gn 3<sup>16</sup>), as it is with Syrian and Arabian women at the present day, and cases in which the mother died in childbirth (Gn 35<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 4<sup>20</sup>) were probably quite exceptional. From the phrase used in (1 S 3<sup>7</sup>, cf. 30<sup>5</sup>), it has been supposed that in early times the child was actually born upon its father's knees (see Nowack, Heb. Archaeol. i. 165), according to customs of which traces are found in several primitive peoples (Ploss, Das Weib,<sup>2</sup> ii. 177 ff.); or at least that the newly-born infant was placed in its father's lap as a token of recognition and adoption. We find, however, no clear reference to such customs in historical times. Indeed, the father was not present at the birth of the child (Jer 20<sup>18</sup>); the mother was attended by other women (1 S 4<sup>20</sup>), and the assistance of a midwife was often called in (Gn 35<sup>17</sup> 38<sup>28</sup>, Ex 1<sup>18</sup>). Compare article MIDWIFE. The newly-born infant, after its navel-cord had been cut, was bathed in water, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling-clothes (Ezk 16<sup>4</sup>, Lk 2<sup>7</sup>). The practice of rubbing infants with salt is still retained among the fellaheen of Pal., who believe that children are strengthened and hardened by this means (ZDPV iv. p. 63). The child received its name from the mother (Gn 29<sup>32</sup> 30, 1 S 1<sup>20</sup>, 1 Ch 4<sup>9</sup>) or from the father (Gn 16<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>18</sup>, Ex 2<sup>22</sup>, Hos 1<sup>4</sup>); see especially Gn 35<sup>18</sup>), the choice of name being often determined by special circumstances attending the birth. In later times, at any rate, a boy received his name at his circumcision on the eighth day (Lk 1<sup>59</sup> 2<sup>21</sup>). The mother was regarded as unclean for the space of seven + thirty-three days after the birth of a son, or for fourteen + sixty-six days after the birth of a daughter (Lv 12). This difference may probably be explained from the belief, which existed also elsewhere, that the symptoms of a puerperal state continued longer in the latter case (Hippocr. ed. Kuhn, i. 392; Dillmann on Lv 12<sup>8</sup>). See PURIFICATION. The rabble before Job. So in Is 30<sup>28</sup>, instead of 'a bridle in the jaws of the people,' read 'a halter on the jaws of the peoples' (רָסָן עַל לִפְתָּי הָעַמִּים).

3. מַחְסוֹם mahsom, is a muzzle. Hence, 'I will keep my mouth with a bridle' (Ps 39<sup>1</sup>) should clearly be 'with a muzzle,' as in RVm. To lose the distinction is here to lose the meaning, which is enforced silence. A bridle is not used to keep a horse from biting. The muzzle is the basket of rope network that was not to be put on the oxen of the threshing-floor, but must be put over the mouth of the horse, mule, or donkey that bites its companions, the other beasts of the field, and causes disarrangement of their herds. (G. M. MACKIE.

BITHIAH בִּיתְיָה 'daughter,' i.e. worshipper, 'of J<sup>h</sup>'.—The daughter of a Pharaoh, who became the wife of Merod, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4<sup>18</sup>). Whether Pharaoh is to be taken here as the Egypt. royal title or as a Heb. proper name, it is difficult to determine. The name B. may indicate one who had become a convert to the worship of J<sup>h</sup>, which would favour the first supposition. LXX B reads Πηδύ. If the other wife of Merod is identified as 'the Jewess,' RV (AV Jehudijah), this further strengthens the supposition. But the text of 1 Ch 4<sup>17, 18</sup> appears to be defective, and does not afford ground for more than conjecture. (See Kittel, ad loc. in Haupt.)

BITHYNIA (Βιθυνία), a country in the north of Asia Minor, bordering on the Propontis (Sea of Marmora), the Bosphorus, and the Euxine (Black Sea), was bequeathed to the Romans in B.C. 74 by the last king, Nicomedes III. The coast of Pontus was united with it in a single province by Pompey in B.C. 65, and the joint province was administered according to the principles embodied in a lex Pompeia. But the two parts of the province always retained a certain distinction from one another; the official name was regularly double (Bithynia et Pontus); there were two high priests, the Bithyniarch and the Pontarch (like Asiarch, Galatarch, Lykiarch, etc.); and hence Pontus and B. are mentioned separately in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>. Bithynia adjoined Asia, and hence, when Paul and Silas were prevented from preaching in Asia (Ac 16<sup>6</sup>), they naturally proceeded towards B., but, were not permitted to enter it; they proceeded towards the W. through Mysia till they came out at Troas. B. was a senatorial province governed like Achaia (which see); but Pliny gave it on a special mission from the emperor, 111-3, and wrote the reports to Trajan which give so much information about the province and the Christians in it. B. was a rich, fertile, peaceful, and highly civilised province. Jews in B. are mentioned by Philo. Legatio ad Gaium, § 36 (Mang. ii. 587); but they are not noticed in the list given in Ac 2<sup>9-11</sup>. It is remarkable that Byzantium (Constantinople), along with, doubtless, the peninsula at the end of which it was situated, was included in the province of Bithynia et Pontus, as we learn from Pliny, ad Traj. Ep. 43, 44. Two great roads traversed B., one connecting Nikomedia and Nicæa (the two chief cities) with Dor.; the other connecting them with Ancyra direct—a road which in later times became important as the route of European pilgrims by land to Jerusalem.

BITTER, BITTERNESS.—In the literal sense of b. to the taste, the word occurs in such passages as Pr 27<sup>7</sup> (of food, opposed to sweet), Ex 15<sup>3</sup>, Ja 3<sup>11</sup>, Rev 8<sup>11</sup> (of water), and Is 24<sup>9</sup> (of strong drink). See also article BITTER HERBS. In most of the passages, however, where the words above given are used in Scripture, it is in a figurative or tropical sense. The examples that follow do not claim to be exhaustive.

i. We may note, in the first place, the use of 'bitter' in an objective sense, of cruel, biting words (cf. πικροὶ λόγοι), Ps. 64<sup>3</sup>; of the keenness of the misery which results from forsaking God, Jer 2<sup>19</sup>; from a life of sin in general, Jer 4<sup>18</sup>, and of impurity in particular, Pr 5<sup>4</sup>. It is applied to the misery of servitude, Ex 1<sup>14</sup>; and to the misfortunes due to bereavement, Ru 1<sup>20</sup>, Am 8<sup>10</sup>.

ii. In a more subjective sense, bitter and bitterness describe such emotions as sympathy in bereavement, Ru 1<sup>13</sup>, and misfortune, Ezk 27<sup>31</sup>; the poignant sorrow of childlessness, 1 S 1<sup>10</sup>, and penitence, Mt 26<sup>75</sup>; the keenness of disappointment, Gn 27<sup>34</sup>; and the general feeling of misery and wretchedness, Job 3<sup>20</sup>; emotions often relieved by a corresponding 'b. cry,' Gn 27<sup>34</sup>, Est 4<sup>1</sup> etc., and by the shedding of 'bitter tears' (cf. Homer's πικρὸν δάκρυον), Mt 26<sup>75</sup> and often.

Under this head may be classed the cases where 'bitter' in the original refers rather to fierceness of disposition, as in 2 S 17<sup>8</sup> ('as a bear robbed of her whelps'), allied with a readiness to take offence,

iii. Another set of fig. applications belongs rather to the sphere of ethics than to that of psychology. Thus Isaiah characterizes those who would subvert the fundamental distinction of right and wrong as putting 'b. for sweet, and sweet for b.' (5<sup>20</sup>). So also Dt 32<sup>32</sup>, where the reference is to the moral poison exhaled by the corrupt nations of Canaan. The same idea of moral depravity is somewhat differently expressed in Dt 29<sup>18</sup> (17), from which (see LXX rendering) are derived the expressions 'gall of bitterness,' Ac 8<sup>23</sup>, and 'root of bitterness,' He 12<sup>15</sup>.

iv. Finally, there is to be noted the term. techn. 'the water of bitterness that causeth the curse' Nu 5<sup>18</sup>. RV (cf. Kautsch's tr.: das fluchbringende Wasser des bitteren Wehs), which plays so important a part in the ordeal there described.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BITTER HERBS (מֵרֹרִים mérôrim, κριπιδες, lactuce agrestes).—It is hardly possible for an Oriental to dine without a salad, and these salads are composed of many kinds of herbs, some mucilaginous, as the purslane, Portulaca oleracea, L.; others crisp, as the cucumber; others aromatic, as parsley; others bitter, as the watercress, Nasturtium officinale, L.; the pepper grass, Lepidium sativum, L.; the endive, Cichorium Intybus, L.; the lettuce, Lactuca sativa, L. Such as these and many others like them can be found everywhere, and suit the requirements of the Passover ordinance (Ex 12<sup>8</sup>, Nu 9<sup>11</sup>). More bitter still are the numerous medicinal plants, as colocynth, wormwood, scammony, poppy, and many others which were in the prophet's eye when he said (La 3<sup>15</sup> m), 'He hath filled me with bitteresses (mérôrim); he hath made me drunken with wormwood.'

The use of bitter herbs at the Passover was not to remind the Israelites of the bitterness of their bondage (Ex 1<sup>14</sup>), but, as in the case of bread without leaven, to remind them of the haste with which they fled. A meal of unleavened bread, roast lamb, and a salad of bitter herbs, was the simplest and quickest that could be prepared.

BITTER WATER.—See MEDICINE.

BITTERN (קָבִיר, קָבִיר kippôd, εχίμος, ericius).—Gesenius regards kippôd as the same as the Arab. kunfudh, the porcupine; and with him agree most of the VSS. Tristram, Houghton, and others favour the rendering bittern of the AV. They argue as follows:—(1) That the porcupine has not been noted as an inhabitant of ruins. But this is equally true of the bittern, and it is far less probable that it should be said of the bittern than of the porcupine. The bittern is a swamp bird, and would not choose ruins, but reeds and fens, for a residence. The porcupine, however, is a shy solitary animal, and might easily choose its home among the fallen columns of Babylon (Is 14<sup>23</sup>), Nineveh (Zeph 2<sup>14</sup>), or Idumaea (Is 34<sup>11</sup>). (2) That the porcupine could not climb to the capitals of columns. This is not essential, however, as the allusion is rather to the fallen stones of a ruin than to the capital of a standing column. (3) That 'their voice shall sing in the windows' (Zeph 2<sup>14</sup>). Their, however, is not in the original, and we may quite as well supply a, and understand by 'a voice' the sighing of the wind among the fallen stones and through the empty casements, rather than the grunt of a porcupine, or the booming of a bittern, neither of which can be called singing. (4) That porcupines do not frequent water pools (Is 14<sup>23</sup>). This, however, is inconclusive, since Babylon was to be a possession for the kippôd, and (not in) pools of water—i.e. desolate ruins, where kippôd could live, and marshes.

The passages in which the name kippôd occurs are intended to express desolation and the absence of human residence. They are parallel to a large number of similar ones in which the desolation is symbolised by the residence of various beasts and birds. These are usually chosen because of their shyness, and the certainty that where they are man is far away. It by no means follows that in every case all of them, or perhaps any of the particular ones, should dwell in the ruin. It is quite contrary to the habits of the bittern to dwell in ruins. The porcupine, as a man-fearing animal, like the cormorant (RV pelican), owl, raven, dragon (RV jackal), owl (RV ostrich), wild beasts of the desert, wild beasts of the island (RV wolves), satyr (probably wild goat), screech owl (RV night monster), great owl (RV arrowsnake), and vulture, represents the idea of desolation in its concrete form. In the spirit of poetic exaggeration it is said (Is 34<sup>15</sup>), 'no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate.' To bind down this exalted imagery to literalism would convert every ruin into a menagerie, tenanted by a motley array of fabulous as well as actual beasts and birds. With the philological evidence in favour of the kunfudh (porcupine), and with the unsoundness of the foregoing zoological objections, we may safely follow the RV, which makes it porcupine.

PORCUPINE.

In the foreground, under the larger animal, are a full-grown and a young hedgehog.

The porcupine, Hystrix cristata, L., is found along the sea-coast, and in the lower mountain districts of Pal. and Syria. It feeds on roots, bark, fruits, and vegetables. It inhabits holes and subterranean clefts, and might well find a retreat among ruins. The flesh is eaten by the natives, who know it by its classical name kunfudh. It is about 2 feet in length, independently of the tail, which measures 5 to 6 in. It is covered with the familiar quills. When the animal is tranquil they lie appressed to its body. When it is excited they are erected. It is nocturnal in its habits, and seldom seen by man.

G. E. POST.

BITUMEN (Gn 11<sup>3</sup> בָּתַר, ἀσφαλτος, EV 'slime,' RVm 'bitumen').—The mineral substance which has given to the Dead Sea the name Lacus Asphaltites (Jos. Ant. I. ix.), in which case it is mineral pitch of the group of the hydrocarbons. This mineral is abundant in several Eastern countries, and was used in very early times as a substitute for mortar in the buildings of Chaldaea.* It is found in Persia, Assam, Upper Burma, at Rangoon, at Baku, near the Caspian, in the valleys leading down from the west to the Dead Sea, especially Wadies Dereh and Mahawat, in connection with sulphur.†

The bitumen in the Dead Sea basin is probably derived from the bituminous strata of the Cretaceous series, and reaches the surface through fissures in the rock. In the case of marine limestones or shales containing large quantities of animal or vegetable matter, either of terrestrial or marine origin, bituminization may take place under suitable conditions of temperature and moisture, giving rise to springs of bitumen or petroleum, and from such a source the bitumen of the Dead Sea basin may be supposed to have its origin.

E. HULL.

BIZIOTHIAH (בִּזְיֹתְיָה), Jos 15<sup>25</sup>.—A corruption for בִּזְיֹתְיָה, referring to Beersheba, as the LXX αἱ κώμαι αὐτῶν indicates (cf. also Neh 11<sup>27</sup>).

BETESTH (בֵּתֶשֶׁת), Jos 15<sup>25</sup>.—One of the seven eunuchs or eunuchs of the king, Ahasuerus. A suggested etymology is from בֵּתֶשֶׁת, 'bound', hence perhaps 'eunuch.' The LXX here reads Μαζῶν Β, Μαζῶν Β, Μαζῶν Β. H. A. WHITE.

BLACK.—See COLOURS. As a subst. b. is found in Sir 19<sup>25</sup> AVm, and Jer 14<sup>2</sup> 'they sit in b. upon the ground.' As a verb, Bar 6<sup>21</sup> 'their faces are b.' through the smoke that cometh out of the temple' (μελανω). Blackish, Job 6<sup>16</sup> 'b. by reason of the ice' (כָּהָה), used here of a turbid 'black'. J. A. H. WHITE.

BLAINS.—See MEDICINE.

BLASPHEMY (βλασφημία, vb. βλασφημεῖν, adj. and subst. βλασφημικός) is derived as to its second element from φῆμι, speech, but the etymology of the first element is still quite uncertain, opinions being divided among βλάπτω I injure (the root would then, properly, be βλαψιφήμια), βλάξ slack, doltish, βάλλω I hit in throwing (Eustath. ad. Hom. Il. 2, p. 219, δ ταῖς φήμας βάλλων, λοιδορός), and φαῖλος word (philes). The usage, however, is distinct. In classical and NT Greek (as also in Ev.) the word is not restricted, as in ordinary Eng. phraseology and Eng. law, to the divine relation, but has the general sense of slanderous, contumelious speech against either God or man. As a matter of fact, in classical Greek the human relation is the rule, βλασφημία being only by transference applied to the gods (Plato, Rep. 381 E); and, as often as not, in this connexion, it signifies a word not so much of irreverence as of ill-omen (opp. to εὐφήμια), a word amiss, an unlucky word, as when one unintentionally prays for evil instead of good (Eur. Ion, 1189; Plato, Legg. 800, 801). In the Heb. OT (mostly in the form giddēph, the word selected by Delitzsch in his Hebrew NT) and in the LXX there is always a notion of contemptuous sacrilege in word or act (1 Mac 2<sup>9</sup>) towards God (2 K 19<sup>2</sup>, cf. 18<sup>22</sup>) directly or indirectly, through men or things connected with Him, e.g. His people (Is 52<sup>5</sup>, Ps 74<sup>18</sup>), His champions (2 Mac 12<sup>14</sup>), His holy land (Ezk 35<sup>12</sup>), His temple (1 Mac 7<sup>28</sup>); once, by transference, towards a heathen god (Bel<sup>9</sup>). In NT the wider classical usage appears, and there is not always the same clear connotation of divine connexion, the word being sometimes equivalent to aggravated contumely, or slander (cf. Dem. pro Cor. iv. 12, 3, οὗτος πολλὰκις ἀπέσκωψε καὶ μέχρι αὐτοῦ βλασφημίας); Tit 3<sup>2</sup>, Mt 15<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>30</sup>, Ro 3<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>31</sup> (|| Col 3<sup>2</sup>), 1 Ti 6<sup>4</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>11</sup>. It is not, however, to be ignored that the recognised relation of God to all created beings may have induced the choice of the word βλασφημία to express what is in the last resort an offence against Him. (Cf. the OT use; also the parallel in Sir 3<sup>10</sup>, and the thought in such passages as 1 P 2<sup>17</sup> taken with Tit 3<sup>2</sup>.)

A special use in NT touches the human assumption of what is God's, the degradation of the infinite glory of the Creator to the finite nature of the creature. Thus the word is put into the mouths of the Jewish accusers of Christ (Mt 9<sup>3</sup> 26<sup>65</sup>, Jn 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 5<sup>21</sup>), and is employed likewise conversely by the NT writers and speakers to depict the sacrilegious and insulting denial by the Jews to Christ of what was His due status (Mt 27<sup>30</sup>, Lk 22<sup>65</sup> 23<sup>30</sup>), and the insulting charges against Him (Mt 27<sup>30</sup>, Lk 22<sup>65</sup> 23<sup>30</sup>).

The punishment of those who blasphemed, i.e. sinned in word or act 'with a high hand', i.e. in impious rebellion against J<sup>h</sup>, not in thoughtlessness and weakness of the flesh (see Keil, Bib. Arch. ii. 377, Eng. tr., on Sins of Ignorance), but wilfully and presumptuously, was 'cutting off' (Nu 15<sup>30</sup>) or death by stoning (Lv 24<sup>10-16</sup>). Instances of blasphemy in act are the profanation of the Sabbath by work (Ex 31<sup>14</sup>), the neglect of circumcision (Gn 17<sup>14</sup>), and idolatry in all its relations (Ex 22<sup>19</sup>, 1 Mac 2<sup>6</sup>). It was on the ground of blasphemy that Christ was handed over for execution to the Romans (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Jn 19<sup>7</sup>), and that Stephen was stoned in an irregular outbreak of priests and people (Ac 6<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>57</sup>). To the ordinary sins of blasphemy the Jews added the more technical sin of the 'pronunciation' of the name J<sup>h</sup>, through a mispronunciation of 'pronounce' in Lv 24<sup>16</sup> apart from its context. For this reason the LXX rendered J<sup>h</sup> by ὁ κύριος, and the Hebrew Jews substituted Adonai or Elohim, as they do to the present day.

In the teaching of Christ in the Gospels (Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Mk 3<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>), the 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost' was a sin of such surpassing heinousness that it was unpardonable. Not so, He says, the blasphemy against the Son of Man. Now, the Son of Man was God's Messiah, His pre-eminent representative; and blasphemy against Him would have been, in theocratic conception, put parallel with blasphemy against God Himself (Ex 22<sup>28</sup>). What, then, was this blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, this sin of unprovoked aggravation, so heinous that, contrary to Jewish notions, even death brought the sinner no nearer to pardon (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 12<sup>31</sup>)? In the context Christ is referring to special acts of His in which the Holy Spirit, as a moral power, manifested Himself obviously and unmistakably. Any man who, with such demonstration before his eyes, declared this power to be immoral (Mk 3<sup>30</sup>), openly denouncing as evil that which was plainly good, exhibited a state of heart which was hopeless and beyond the scope of divine illumination or divine influence; he was the most high-handed, wilful, presumptuous despoiler of the divine. In his position of blasphemer he could not be forgiven; for God to put such a sin behind His back was in the moral nature of things a contradiction and an impossibility. Not so culpable was the blasphemy even against the Son of Man; for in His state of humiliation, with the mists of the flesh about Him, His dignity was not so obvious, so unmistakable, so irresistibly convincing. In this case there might be 'defect'; in the other there was 'defiance.' So much for the strict context and the special occasion. When we reach out beyond these and seek to find a more general application, we have need of great diffidence. One point, however, seems clear: the context debars us from making the blasphemy simply the equivalent of continued impenitence in any sin, as if Christ had meant to say that any conscious sin, persisted in, becomes blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. It is hard to conceive that Christ in these words merely put into another form the maxim 'no repentance, no life'. At the same time we cannot wholly ignore those who assert that there is 'no connexion' whatever between the blasphemy of the manifest Holy Ghost and the sin of these sins are 'altogether dissimilar' (S. Davidson in Kitto, Encyc., s.v. 'Blasphemy'). Nor do we know enough to be sure that the 'sin unto death' in 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup> 'stands apart' entirely from the sin with which Christ is dealing. Yet, on the whole, it seems reasonable and consistent with the OT sacrificial theory (cf. Keil, as above) to affirm that any sin which is explainable by the defect of the flesh, its mere willingness and its weakness, is not to be classed with the wilful, arrogant blasphemy of good as observable in the crucifixion of Christ, which in He 6<sup>5</sup> is a metaphor for apostasy, is in Ac 3<sup>7</sup>, in its literal sense, attributed by St. Peter to ἀγνοια, ignorance. Doubtless, there is a time and a place wherein willingness shades off into wilfulness, and weakness into perverseness; neglect of the divine illumination is the plane towards the detestation of it; and when the heart can deliberately say, 'Evil, be thou my good,' its utterance is not far from blasphemy of the Holy Ghost.

† Tristram, Land of Israel, pp. 281, 358.

BLAST (from blasen 'to blow') is used in AV: 1. Of the blowing of a wind instrument, Jos 6<sup>5</sup> 'when they make a long b. with the ram's horn.' 2. The blowing of the breath of J<sup>n</sup>, Ex 15<sup>8</sup> 'with the b. of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together' (Heb. ruah, 'breath'; cf. Is 30<sup>28</sup> 'breath', 33<sup>11</sup> 'breath', 37<sup>7</sup> AV 'blast', RV 'spirit', 2 K 19<sup>7</sup> AV 'blast', RV 'spirit'). 3. The breath, i.e. the fury of violent peoples, Is 25<sup>4</sup> (Heb.). 4. Blowing both wither or curses, 2 S 22<sup>16</sup>, Job 4<sup>9</sup>, Ps 18<sup>15</sup> (Heb. neshamah). So blasted = 'blighted', Gn 41<sup>6, 23, 27</sup>, 2 K 19<sup>36</sup>, Is 37<sup>37</sup>; and blasting = 'blight' Dt 28<sup>22</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ch 6<sup>28</sup>, Am 4<sup>1</sup>, Hag 2<sup>17</sup>. The reference is to the effect of the sirocco east wind. See Hos 13<sup>15</sup> for its effect on water, and Jon 4<sup>8</sup> on man. Says Thomson, 'it rushes down every gorge, bending and breaking the trees, and tugging at each individual leaf. . . The eyes inflame, the lips blister, and the moisture of the body evaporates. . . you become languid, nervous, irritable, and despairing' (Land and Book, ii. 262). In Ps 18<sup>15</sup>, Pr. Bk. 'blasting' = blast.

BLESSEDNESS.—The word 'blessedness' is not found in the OT, and it only appears three times in the NT (AV), and then as the translation of a word (μακαρισμός) which indicates the ascription of blessing, not the state of the blessed, so that the Revisers have rightly expunged it, substituting 'blessing' in the first two cases (Ro 4<sup>8, 9</sup>), and 'gratulation' in the third (Gal 4<sup>15</sup>). Nevertheless, the idea which it conveys is the result of a legitimate generalisation from biblical statements. By the term 'blessedness' we understand the Summum Bonum regarded as a gift from God, or as enjoyed in some divine relationship—a divine Summum Bonum. The thought of the Bible this is centred in the idea of a more elementary stages as the normal human existence on earth, in its more advanced condition as eternal life (ζωὴ αἰώνιος). The Hebrew word ashrah (e.g. Is 2<sup>17</sup>) of days as a supreme blessing (e.g. Is 2<sup>17</sup>). Hence, while it is a most terrible curse for a man to be cut off in the midst of his days (e.g. Ps 55<sup>23</sup>), for his life to be spared is a blessing devoutly sought after (e.g. Ps 39<sup>12</sup>), so that to live on to a ripe old age is the crowning mercy (e.g. 1 Ch 29<sup>28</sup>). The OT idea of blessedness is largely temporal and external, though mingled with higher spiritual thoughts as in Ps 16<sup>10, 11</sup>. Next to the life of the individual is the extension of that life in his family and the perpetuation of it through his descendants, so that the natural human instinct for immortality is in a measure satisfied by contemplating the prospect of an endless posterity. For this reason, as also because of the present good which the possession of a family is to a man, that is an important item in the OT notion of blessedness. Earthly prosperity enters into the notion, not merely on its own account, but also as a sign of God's favour, although the latter point is disputed throughout the Book of Job. In the Proverbs, abundance of goods—one's barns filled with plenty (Pr 3<sup>10</sup>)—is treated as a great sign of prosperity, but wisdom is there regarded as the Summum Bonum (Pr 4<sup>7</sup>). In Messianic prophecy the thought of blessedness is expanded to signify the national weal rather than purely individual prosperity. This is to come in a golden age of widespread plenty and general happiness, following a triumph over the enemies of Israel. In particular, the good order will be established, and peace prevail (e.g. Is 11<sup>1-9</sup>, 65<sup>17-25</sup>). It is principally through the two ideas of righteousness and peace that the ideal is advanced to a more spiritual conception (e.g. Ps 119<sup>169</sup>). In the NT the idea of blessedness is greatly elevated. According to the Synoptists, Jesus Christ speaks of eternal life as the supreme boon of the future (e.g. Lk 18<sup>30</sup>). According to the Fourth Gospel, He dwells much more largely on this subject, and treats it as a central theme (e.g. Jn 6<sup>47</sup>). St. Paul follows, and speaks of the blessedness of eternal life as God's gift to man (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>). In the beatitudes with which He opens the Sermon on the Mount, our Lord describes, not only the characters that will be blessed, but also the nature of the highest good. The blessed are, according to St. Luke, the poor, they that hunger and weep now, and they who are hated, separated, and reproached by men; and their blessedness is to possess the kingdom of God, and to be filled and laugh (Lk 6<sup>20-22</sup>). According to St. Matthew, they are more spiritually regarded as the poor in spirit, they that mourn, the meek, they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, and they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; while their blessedness consists respectively in having the kingdom of heaven—elsewhere described as a pearl of great price (Mt 13<sup>46</sup>)—in being com forted, inheriting the earth, being filled with mercy, seeing God, being called the Son of God (Mt 5<sup>3-12</sup>). In the Parable of the Talents, future blessedness takes the form of high honour together with enlarged service (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>). The Apoc. describes the blessedness of the Church in the victory and reign of Christ and the coming of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21, 22). See also BEATITUDE, HAPPINESS. W. F. ADENEY.

BLESSING (ברכה, εὐλογία).—Throughout the Bible we meet with two forms of blessing. (1) Blessing by God. This is either (a) a direct and immediate act of God in conferring some boon, as expressed by the phrase, 'The Lord blessed Obededom and all his household' (2 S 6<sup>11</sup>); or (b) a divine utterance expressing the will of God to confer future favour, and thus approaching the general usage of the word, which is indicative of benediction, or speaking with a wish for the good of the persons concerned, e.g. 'God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful,' etc. (Gn 1<sup>22</sup>). The blessing of God is primarily of persons, and secondarily of things, as implied in the phrase, 'Bless, Lord, his substance' (Ps 33<sup>1</sup>). The secondary blessing is attached to a day in the benediction of the Sabbath, e.g. 'God blessed the seventh day' (Gn 2<sup>3</sup>). (2) Blessing by man. This is really an appeal for the first form of blessing, a prayer that God will confer His own blessing on the object of the speaker's good wishes. But it comes to be regarded as in some way directly beneficial, just as the evil eye is supposed to blight directly, while the curse proper is an appeal to Heaven to smite its object, as the true blessing is an appeal to Heaven to confer some boon. This seems to be the case with the patriarchal blessings, Isaac directly determining the destiny of Jacob; and yet the text shows that the actual source of blessing is looked for in God (Gn 27<sup>39-40</sup>). In such a case the peculiar privilege of conferring a blessing resolves itself into a peculiar right to seek certain favours of God. A similar condition may be discovered in Balaam's benediction of Israel. While the narrative implies a belief on the part of Balak that the seer has peculiar mystic powers of cursing and blessing, Balaam's utterances are simply prophetic, declaring the will of J<sup>h</sup> and predicting the destiny of Israel (Nu 23, 24). A man who is exceptionally blessed is taken as the model and type of blessing, and is then said to be 'a blessing' (Gn 12<sup>2</sup>); and others are said to bless themselves by him, in the sense that they appeal to the blessing he has received as a specimen of what they desire for themselves, e.g. 'The nations shall bless themselves in him'—i.e. by Him, by reference to His blessing (Jer 4<sup>2</sup>). When our Lord is described in the Gospels as blessing, no doubt the idea is analogous to the second form of blessing, the appeal to Heaven to confer favour, with the associated thought that Jesus Christ had especial power in making this appeal. Thus we must understand the action of the mothers who brought their children to Him for a blessing as they might have brought them to a holy Rabbi (Buxtorf, Syn. Jud. p. 138). But with those who perceived His divine nature, the act of blessing by Jesus Christ must have passed over into the primary and immediate act of God in conferring grace, e.g. in the final benediction (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>). This blessing of bread, of which we read in the Gospels, is equivalent to giving thanks for it, the thought being that good received gratefully comes as a blessing (compare εὐλογῶντες in Mt 14<sup>19</sup> and εὐλογῶντας αὐτὸν in Mk 8<sup>7</sup> with εὐχαριστοῦντας in Mt 15<sup>36</sup>). To bless God is to praise Him with acknowledgment of His goodness and expressed desires for His glory. The act of blessing was usually performed by the imposition of hands (e.g. Gn 48<sup>17-19</sup>, Mt 19<sup>13</sup>); or, where a number of persons were concerned, with uplifted hands (e.g. Lv 9<sup>22</sup>, Lk 24<sup>50</sup>). The priests pronounced a benediction after every morning and evening sacrifice, according to a triple formula (Nu 6<sup>22-26</sup>; Keil, Biblical Archaeol. ii. p. 457). A more primitive form of blessing seems to have been used under the kings (e.g. 1 K 8<sup>34, 55</sup>; Ewald, Antiq. pp. 15, 132). A benediction was regularly pronounced at the close of the synagogue service (Buxtorf, Syn. Jud., note subjoined to index).

BLINDING.—See CRIMES. BLINDNESS.—See MEDICINE.

BLOOD.—By the Hebrews, as by other peoples of antiquity, the blood, both of man and of beast, was regarded as the seat of the soul (נַפְשׁ), that is, of the vital principle common to all sentient organisms (Lv 17<sup>11</sup> 'the life' [EV, Heb. nephesh, 'soul'] of the flesh is in the blood; and parll. pass.). When we reflect how little we know even now, notwithstanding all our advance in physiology and allied sciences, of the mystery of life and death, we can in some measure realise the emotions of awe and dread—namely, the mixture of the superstitious—of the early Semites must have regarded the shedding of blood.

Inasmuch as all slaughter was originally sacrifice, the real significance of the provision, carried back by Heb. tradition to the days of Noah (Gn 9<sup>4</sup>), that the blood of animals slain for human food was forbidden or taboo, will demand careful investigation under the article SACRIFICE (see also FOOD). To the same art. belongs the study of the placular or expiatory efficacy of blood, which finds expression in the familiar words: 'Without shedding of blood is no remission' (He 9<sup>22</sup>).

Akin hereto is the cathartic or purificatory use of blood in the Jewish ceremonial law in cases of uncleanness of the person, as such as leprosy (Lv 14<sup>54, 56, 57</sup>), and of which belongs to the art. on PURIFICATION (which see also for the uncleanness caused by blood in the cases enumerated in Lv 12<sup>1, 15<sup>1-16</sup></sup>).

For another and very ancient blood-rite, the essential element of which survives even in the most recent forms of Christian worship (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), see COVENANT.

Among all nations blood has played a conspicuous part in magical rites, but the only trace of its superstitious use in the OT seems to be the incident recorded in 1 K 22<sup>33</sup>, and already explained in the art. BATHING (§ 3). BOANERGES (βοανήρης, deriv. uncertain, 'sons of thunder') is the surname given by our Lord to His disciples James and John. Considerable obscurity gathers round the question why it was given to the sons of Zebedee. It is mentioned only in Mk 3<sup>17</sup>, and never seems to have prevailed as Simon Peter's new name did. It is not likely either that it was meant as a perpetual rebuke of their unregulated zeal (Mk 9<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>54</sup>), or that it refers specially to their thundering forth the gospel. The obvious reason is that it is both descriptive and prophetic of the union of the passionate and vehement with the gentle and loving in their character, and of the fact that once and again tempests of long-restrained emotion would burst forth out of the deep stillness of their strong reserved natures.

BOAZ (בּוֹאֵז = 'swiftness,' from a root בּוּז not occurring in Heb., not as was supposed בּוּז = 'in him is strength,' Bōas, Bōaf).—The head of the Hezronites who I. . . after Elimelech's death . . . (Rt 2<sup>1</sup>). He is described as a mighty man of wealth (RVm 'valour'). His fields lay apparently at some little distance from Beth-lehem (v. 4). It was in them that he first caught sight of Ruth as she was gleaning. He had heard of her already as a faithful and loving daughter, and begged her to remain in his fields, assuring her of his . . . inviting her to partake of some food . . . (v. 5<sup>ff</sup>). One night, whilst B. was sleeping in his field, his daughter-in-law, Ruth, instructed by her mother-in-law, came, and by placing herself at his feet claimed to be taken under his protection. Thereupon he promised that if the kinsman who was nearer than he would not do his duty to her as next of kin, he would take that duty upon himself (ch. 3). B. therefore bought the right of redemption from the next of kin, and being in it the right to take Ruth to be his wife to raise up seed to Mahlon (4<sup>14</sup>). The marriage was celebrated, and in due course a son was born to B. and Ruth, called Obed, who, according to the genealogy at the end of the Bk of Ruth and in 1 Ch 2<sup>12-15</sup>, was the grandfather of David. How far this is an instance of the use of what is called the law of the Levirate will be found discussed in another article (RUTH). B. has a further interest for us, as his name occurs in both the genealogies of our Lord (Mt 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 3<sup>32</sup>). According to the Jewish authorities he was the same as Ibzan of Jg 12<sup>9-10</sup> (see Moore, Judges, p. 310). The difficulties of the chronology of the genealogy from Perez to David have not yet been satisfactorily cleared up. The narrator of B.'s marriage does not hint at any . . . in it such as we should expect if Ezr 9<sup>4</sup> and Nen 13<sup>2</sup> or even Dt 23<sup>3,4</sup> were known to him.

H. A. REDPATH.

BOAZ (בּוֹאֵז, LXX Βοαζ in B, and Βοός in A of 1 K 7<sup>21</sup>; in 2 Ch 3<sup>17</sup> the LXX h.

—The name of one of the two porch of Solomon's temple, the other being Jachin, 1 K 7<sup>21</sup>, 2 Ch 3<sup>17</sup>, Jer 52<sup>21,22</sup>. 'Boaz' stood on the left looking eastward, i.e. it was on the north side of the entrance of the temple. Its height was 18 cubits, its circumference 12, its diameter being consequently 3 $\frac{3}{4}$  cubits. . . 5 cubits high, ornamented with . . . pomegranates (Jer 52<sup>22,23</sup>). There is, however, a good deal of confusion as to the ornamentation of the chapiters, though all agree that they were . . . The apparent . . . is owing to the fact . . . ornament uniting the shaft to the chapter is sometimes included in the reckoning, and sometimes not. 'Jachin' and 'Boaz' were exactly of the same form and size; both were hollow and made of brass, the thickness of the brass being four fingers, i.e. 4 inches (Jer 52<sup>21</sup>).

Ewald, Thenius, Merx, and Nowack are of opinion that these pillars served for supports to the roof of the porch. Nowack (Bib. Arch. ii. 33) refers to Ezk 40-49 as showing that the pillars of Ezekiel's temple were supports; but the passage does not prove that they were more than ornaments. On the other hand, Hirt, Stieglitz, Cugler, Schnaase (all architects), Bahr, Riehm, Keil, and Lumby argue that the pillars stood in the porch, unconnected at the top, and that the only function they served was that of ornamentation. (See Keil, Bib. Arch. i. 169 f.). In favour of this opinion are the following points: (1) The ornamentation on the top . . . (2) Their height was 23 (18+5) cubits. Now the porch was, according to 2 Ch 3<sup>4</sup> and Jos. (Ant. viii. iii. 2), 120 cubits; according to Bertheau 30; but in the opinion of most critics it was 20 cubits high, answering to the length (see PORCH). None of those measurements would suit if the pillars stood under and supported the roof of the porch. (3) The pillars were hollow. (4) Hiram's work was to decorate, and not to build any essential part of the temple.

But, though no more than ornaments to the Israelites, the origin of these pillars must be sought among the Syrians and Phoenicians, who commonly erected such pillars in front of their temples. In front of his temple at Tyre, the Syrian god, Melkart, is represented by two pillars (Herod. 2. 44). Before the temples of Paphos and Hierapolis there were likewise two pillars. In these cases, the pillars . . . and they formed a part of that Phallic worship of which we are finding more and more traces in the ancient world (see Dudley, Natology, p. 130 f.; W. R. Cobb, Origines Judaicae, pp. 207-238; and Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, p. 230 n.). Nowack (ii. 34) and W. R. Smith (ES p. 191, note 1) incline to believe that even to the Israelites these pillars were symbols of J<sup>h</sup>, so that, if they are right, the true God was set forth by these Phallic emblems, as in the northern kingdom He was worshipped in the form of a young bull (בָּגֶל ēgel). But it is unlikely, to say the least, that if these pillars stood for J<sup>h</sup> we should have no intimation of it in the writings of the OT. Benzinger (Bib. Arch. p. 385) points out that pillars of this kind are found in the front of the temple of Amon in Egypt (cf. p. 250 of the same work).

Jesus our Lord, in whom we have b. and access'; He 10<sup>19</sup> 'Having therefore, brethren, b. to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus'; 1 Jn 4<sup>17</sup> 'that we may have b. in the day of judgment'; He 4<sup>16</sup> 'Let us therefore come boldly (RV 'draw near with b.') unto the throne of grace.' For the most part it is boldness of speech, but its foundation is the same: Jn 7<sup>26</sup> 'He speaketh boldly' (RV 'openly'); Ac 4<sup>31</sup> 'they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with b.'; 13<sup>46</sup> 'Paul and Barnabas waxed bold (RV 'spoke out boldly') and said'; 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup> 'we were bold (RV 'waxed bold') in our God to speak unto you the Gospel of God.' See COURAGE.

J. HASTINGS.

BOLLED.—Ex 9<sup>31</sup> 'the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolled' (RVm 'was in bloom'; Heb. גִּבְחִיל, lit. 'was bud', i.e. was in bud). The Eng. word boll (originally something swollen) is a seed vessel, a pod; hence 'was bolled' (= 'was in seed') expresses a further stage of growth than the Heb. warrants.

J. HASTINGS.

BOLSTER (something 'swollen,' cf. 'bolled') is now used of the longer and firmer cushion under the pillows, but was formerly often syn. with pillow. It occurs in AV of 1 S 19<sup>13, 16</sup> 26<sup>7</sup> II. 12. 16, where RV always 'head'; thus 1 S 19<sup>13</sup> 'Michal . . . put a pillow of goats' hair for his b.' (RV 'at the head thereof'). The same Heb. (רִמְסֵה) is tr'd 'pillows' Gn 23<sup>11, 18</sup> and in 1 K 19<sup>6</sup> [all] 'head,' marg. 'bolster'; RV always 'head.' (For the peculiar reading רִמְסֵה 1 S 26<sup>12</sup>, Budde gives רִמְסֵה in agreement with other passages and the LXX here.)

J. HASTINGS.

Bondmaid, a female slave, Lv 19<sup>20</sup> (מִקְדָּשׁ); 25<sup>44, 44</sup> (מִקְדָּשׁ, tr'd 'maid' in v. 44); Gal 4<sup>22</sup> (παῖς, tr. 'bondwoman' 4<sup>22, 30, 30, 31</sup>, all of Hagar, RV 'handmaid'; π. is used also of the maid who recognised Peter, Mt 26<sup>69</sup>, Mk 14<sup>66, 69</sup>, Lk 22<sup>56</sup>, Jn 18<sup>17</sup> [see DAMSEL], of Rhoda, Ac 12<sup>13</sup>, and of the Philippian fortune-teller, 16<sup>16</sup>). Bondman and Bondwoman = slave, are frequent. Bondservant occurs in AV only once, Lv 25<sup>39</sup>; but where the Gr. is δούλος, slave, RV often turns 'servant' of AV into 'bondservant' (in favour of 'slave' see Horwill, Contemp. Rev. May 1896, p. 707). Bondservice, 1 K 9<sup>21</sup> 'upon those did Solomon levy a tribute of b. (מִקְדָּשׁ, RV 'raise a levy of bondservants'). Bondslave, 1 Mac 2<sup>11</sup> (δούλος, not in NT, but freq. in LXX, RV 'bondwoman'). See SLAVERY.

J. HASTINGS.

BONNET is the rendering in AV of two Heb. words, קִנְיָה (Ex 28<sup>40</sup> 29<sup>9</sup>, Lv 8<sup>13</sup>) and כִּנְיָה (Is 3<sup>30</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>18</sup>). In Ex 39<sup>28</sup> the two are conjoined, קִנְיָה וְכִנְיָה. RV uniformly gives, instead of bonnets, head-tires, except Ezk 44<sup>18</sup> 'tires.'

Both terms apparently refer to the same part of the head-dress of the ordinary priests. Its distinctive importance, with regard to the priestly office and rank, is implied in Is 61<sup>10</sup> קִנְיָה וְכִנְיָה, 'as a bridegroom makes his head-ornament like a priest's,' which Dillm. and Del. understand of winding it up into a conical point (cf. Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 117).

In determining what the bonnet was: (1) we find it distinguished from the mignepheth or turban of the high priest, on the compactly folded front of which the gold plate lay fastened with a cord (לְבָשׁוֹת Ex 28<sup>36, 37</sup>), a less ornate form being worn on the Great Day of Atonement (Lv 16<sup>4</sup>). (2) It was highly ornamental 'for glory and beauty' (Ex 28<sup>40</sup>). (3) It was of fine linen (Ex 39<sup>28</sup>). (4) It was one of the items of elaborate female attire (Is 3<sup>30</sup>).

These allusions seem to converge towards an article of outdoor wear, needed where service exposed to the sun, and yet having a distinctly decorative purpose. These conditions are best met by the loose kerchief for head and neck, which is still a striking feature in Oriental dress; and in its protective usefulness and dignified elegance is an accommodation at once to the climate and the character.

While this bonnet or head-tire among the Bedawin is simply a square of black or blue cotton, and the day-labourer improvises anything to cover the back of the head and neck, that worn by the men of the towns and villages is a fabric about a yard square of the finest white silk, usually edged with bright stripes, and called a kūfiyyeh.

The corresponding art. of female dress is the graceful outdoor veil for the head and neck, called a turhah.

This would connect קִנְיָה with קִנְיָה, and the Arab. kubba'ah 'cowl.' According to this interpretation, a survival of the article in a modified form may be seen in the drapery that droops in light loose folds from the high turban of the Oriental priest; and, by its connexion with the monk's hood and the conventual veil, is still among the insignia of priestly dress. (See DRESS.) G. M. MACKIE.

TURBAN OF ORIENTAL (GREEK) PRIEST.

BOOTH.—At the season when the fruits of field and orchard are ripening, the Syrian peasant often finds it prudent to leave his home in the village and take up his abode for a time in 'the portion of the field' belonging to him, for the double purpose of guarding his produce against ill-disposed neighbours, and of more effectively carrying on the work of the grain and fruit harvests. To shelter him and his from the noonday heat and from the dews of night (cf. Is 48), a small hut is hastily constructed of leafy branches from the nearest trees. Such an erection is called in Heb. קִנֵּה, by AV variously rendered 'booth,' 'tabernacle,' 'pavilion,' etc. Jonah's b. was of this description (48), and so were those in which Jacob sheltered his cattle (whence the name Succoth, Gn 33<sup>17</sup>). The army in the field was similarly protected by booths, 2 S 11<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 20<sup>12, 16</sup> (EV 'pavilions').

In the East the custom still prevails, whereby the owners of small vineyards combine to secure the services of a watchman to protect the ripening grapes from robbers and wild beasts. For the more efficient discharge of duty by the watchman a booth is erected in the vineyard. Four stout posts are driven into the soil a few feet apart; to these uprights four cross pieces are firmly secured, some six or more feet from the ground. Boards resting on the cross-pieces form the floor, while the roof is made in a similar way of boughs of trees or matting. In this elevated watch-tower the watchman spends his nights, gun in hand, the open sides allowing an uninterrupted view of the area to be observed. This is the 'b. that the keeper maketh' to which Job refers (27<sup>18</sup>), and the 'cottage (RV booth) in a vineyard' to which Isaiah compares the desolate daughter of Zion. See illust. under CUCUMBER. For booths as used at the FEAST OF TABERNACLES, see that article.

BOOTY.—See WAR.

BORDER OF THE GARMENT.—See DRESS, FRINGE. Borderer, 2 Mac 9<sup>25</sup> 'the princes that are borderers and neighbours' (οἱ παρακείμενοι). The word is now almost restricted in Eng. to those who dwell on the Border between England and Scotland. Here it is an accurate tr<sup>n</sup>, in the sense of one whose country touches another's.

BORITH (2 Es 13).—One of the ancestors of Ezra, called in 1 Es 8<sup>2</sup> Boccas, and in 1 Ch 6<sup>25</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>4</sup> BUKKI (which see).

BORN, BORNE.—1. The Oxf. Eng. Dict. discovers 43 different senses in which the verb 'to bear' is used; the last being 'to give birth to,' spoken of female mammalia, and esp. women. The past ptp. of this verb is either 'borne' or 'born' (rarely 'bore'), and these forms were at first used indiscriminately for all the senses of the verb. About 1600 'borne' was generally abandoned, and 'born' retained in all senses. But about 1775 'borne' was re-established and used for all the senses of the verb but one, 'born' being restricted to 'brought into the world.' And 'born' is even in that restricted sense confined to the passive voice and a kind of neuter signification; it is not used when the mother is spoken of.

'Borne' was the invariable spelling of 1611, but later edd. and printers in 1611, wherever the meaning is 'brought forth.' RV has carefully restored 'borne' wherever the signification is active; thus Gn 21<sup>3</sup> 'his son that was born unto him,' AV and RV; but 21<sup>7</sup> 'I have born him a son in his old age,' RV 'borne'. See also HOMEBORN.

2. 'Born again' in 1 P 1<sup>3</sup> (RV 'having been begotten again,' as 13) is one word in the Gr. (ἀναγεννάω); in Jn 3<sup>7</sup> 'born again' (RV 'born anew') two words (γεννάω ἀνωθεν); but that the compound word in 1 P 1<sup>3</sup> is an exact equivalent of the two words in Jn 3<sup>7</sup>, and that therefore ἀνωθεν = 'anew' here, not 'from above,' has been proved, esp. by Ezra Abbot in The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (Boston, 1880, p. 34 f.; London, 1892, p. 30 ff.). See REGENERATION.

3. In 1 Co 15<sup>8</sup> 'one b. out of due time,' the Gr. is a single word, ἐκτρομα, an untimely birth, an abortion. J. HASTINGS.

BOSOM.—See ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.

BOSOR (Βοσόρ), 1 Mac 5<sup>26, 28</sup>.—A town in Gilead. The site is uncertain.

BOSORÄ (Βοσροῦ), 1 Mac 5<sup>26, 28</sup>.—Mentioned with Bosor. The great city of Bosrah—the Roman Bisra. E. of Bashan, which is not mentioned in the Bible. C. R. CONDER.

BOSS (Job 15<sup>28</sup>).—Bucklers and shields were made of successive skins stretched over a frame, a layer of metal being superimposed on the whole. To break the force of a blow, metal studs or bosses were affixed in addition. ἀσπίδες ὀμφαλόεσσαι were known to Homer (Il. iv. 448). The Heb. word גַּבְבִּים gabdim, 'bosses,' properly means things rounded, e.g. the back of an animal or the fellow of a wheel. Possibly in Job 15<sup>28</sup> the true meaning is simply the convex (back-like) side of a shield, or again it might be the metal rim ('fellow'), 'thick,' perhaps, because threefold, as in the shield of Achilles (Il. xviii. 479, περὶ δ' ἄντυγα βάλλε φαεινὴν τριπλακά). W. E. BARNES.

BOTANY.—See PLANTS.

BOTCH, a swelling (the same word orig. as 'boss'), but also used to disease, an eruption in the skin, Dt 28<sup>27</sup> 'the b. of Egypt,' and 35 'a sore b.' (חֲבַת, RV 'boil,' as elsewhere in AV Ex 9<sup>10, 11</sup>, Lv 13<sup>18, 19, 20, 23</sup> [1611 'bile'], 2 K 20<sup>7</sup>, Job 27, Is 38<sup>21</sup> [all]). See MEDICINE. J. HASTINGS.

BOTTLE (בֵּית, זֶבֶל, בֵּית, דֶּשֶׁב, dashab; RV skin, wine-skin).—The multiplicity of names is suggestive of its manifold use, serving as a receptacle at once for a tear (Ps 56<sup>8</sup>) and a thunderstorm (Job 38<sup>27</sup>). The mention of bottle in connexion with the Gibeonites, Hagar, David, etc., refers to both pastoral and agricultural life (Jos 9<sup>4</sup>, Gn 21<sup>14</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>18</sup>). The bottle was a leathern bag made from the skins of the young kid, goat, cow, or buffalo. The largest ones were roughly squared and sewn up. The smaller were drawn off entire, thus retaining the shape of the animal with the legs removed. Those for holding water, milk, butter, and cheese usually had the hair left on, but for wine and oil the tanning had to be more thoroughly done. This was by means of oak-bark and seasoning in smoke, a process that gave a pitchy astringency of flavour to the wine contained in them. The distension that the leather underwent once, and once only, during fermentation, gave the parable that each age must interpret for itself with regard to the new treatment of new truths (Mt 9<sup>17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>37</sup>).

The skin-bottle, being portable and unbreakable, was admirably suited for the deep stone-built well, the shepherd's troughs, and the encampment of the traveller in waterless districts. The carrying of water for sale for household purposes has often been an emblem of servitude, and is chiefly done by the aged and infirm. One of the characteristic figures in Oriental towns during summer is the man who sells from his dripping goat-skin the refreshing drink of iced-water flavoured with lemon, rose, or liquorice, temptingly clapping his brass cups, and crying 'Drink, drink, thirsty one' (cf. Is 55<sup>1</sup>). While the bottle is highly prized, and its water is a grateful necessity, the luxury of the East belongs to the spring itself, to the draught from the fountain of living waters. Hence the comparison at Jacob's well (Jn 4<sup>4</sup>), and the one blessed terminus of all the Shepherd's (Rev 7<sup>17</sup>).

BOTTOM.—1. Common enough for the deep of the sea, 'bottom' is used in Zec 2<sup>5</sup> for a deep place in the land, a valley: 'the myrtle trees that were in the b.' (RVm 'shady place,' Heb. TR מְלֶכֶת, Baer מְלֶכֶת; the pl. is used of the depths of the sea Jon 2<sup>6</sup>, of a river Zec 10<sup>11</sup>, and of miry places Ps 69<sup>2</sup>; see Wright on Zec 1<sup>8</sup>). Compare—

'West of this place, down in the neighbour bottom.'
Shaks. As You Like It, iv. ii. 72.

The word is still used locally in this sense. 2. The pl. 'bottoms' occurs Jon 2<sup>6</sup> 'I went down to the b. of the mountains' (מְלֶכֶת, lit. 'a cutting off,' as AVm); Wis 17<sup>14</sup> 'out of the bottoms of inevitable hell' (ἐξ ἀδυστότου ἔδου πυχῶν).

3. Bottomless Pit is the AV tr<sup>a</sup> of φρέαρ ῥῆς ἀβύσσου, Rev 9<sup>1,2</sup> (RV 'pit of the abyss'), and of ἀβύσσος alone, 9<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>1,3</sup> (RV 'abyss'). See ABYSS.

J. HASTINGS.

BOUGH.—Dt 24<sup>20</sup> AVm, 'when thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not bough it' (text 'thou shalt not go over the boughs again'). This is the only example of a verb 'b.' in this sense, and it has been missed by Oxf. Eng. Dict. It is formed directly from the noun in imitation of the Heb. (בֹּוּגָה from בֹּוּגָה a bough).

J. HASTINGS.

BOUGHT.—1 S 25<sup>20</sup> AVm 'in the midst of the b. of a sling.' The b. is the loop or 'bowed' part of the sling on which the stone was laid. Bow, as most modern versions of AV have it, was never used in this sense. 'Bout' is another spelling, as Milton, L'Allegro, 140—

'In notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out'

J. HASTINGS.

BOW.—1. In archery, see next article. 2. See RAINBOW. 3. Bow as a verb is of frequent occurrence, rendering many Heb. and Gr. words. Most usages are clear, but notice: 'Bow,' or 'bow the knee,' now obsolete or archaic, as Jg 5<sup>27</sup> 'At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay' (Moore, 'sank down, fell, lay still,' who explains that קָרַע is properly 'bend the knees,' kneel, קָרַע, i.e. קָרַע, i.e. קָרַע, said of a mortally wounded man whose knees fail under him, 2 K 9<sup>24</sup>); the same Heb. in Est 3<sup>2</sup> 'Mordecai b<sup>d</sup> not nor did him reverence,' i.e. neither b<sup>d</sup> the knee nor fell prostrate; and in Ps 22<sup>29</sup> 'All they that go down to the dust shall b. before him,' which Del. explains: 'all that for want are ready to die (the 'dust,' עָפָר, being the grave), go down upon their knees, because they are esteemed worthy of a place at this table; and Is 45<sup>23</sup> 'unto me every knee shall bow,' quoted in Ro 14<sup>11</sup>, Ph 2<sup>10</sup> (κλύνω). In Mt 27<sup>29</sup> 'they bowed the knee before him,' RV 'kneeled,' the Gr. is γονυπετεύ from γόνυ, knee, and πείνω, i.e. πείνω, fall. Of Gn 41<sup>42</sup> 'they cried before him, Bow the knee,' the Heb. מִצְרַיִם is separately discussed under ABRECH.

Besides 'bow the knee' we have bow the head, Is 58<sup>5</sup> 'to bow down his head as a rush,' Jn 19<sup>30</sup> 'he bowed his head and gave up the ghost'; bow the face, Lk 24<sup>5</sup> 'they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth'; bow the back, Ro 11<sup>10</sup>; bow the shoulder, Gn 49<sup>18</sup> 'he bowed his shoulder to bear'; bow the neck, Sir 33<sup>26</sup> 'A yoke and a collar do bow the neck'; bow the loins, Sir 47<sup>19</sup> 'thou didst bow thy loins unto women'; bow the ear, 2 K 19<sup>16</sup> 'LORD, bow down thine ear (RV 'incline thine ear'), and hear'; and bow the heart, 2 S 19<sup>14</sup> 'he bowed the heart of all the men of Judah'; 'Bow the heavens,' a strongly transitive use, is found 2 S 22<sup>10</sup>=Ps 18<sup>9</sup>, and 144<sup>5</sup> (the Heb. is the common verb נָתַתְּ, to bend, and the figure is that J<sup>c</sup> caused the clouds to descend with Him as He descended to judgment). See BOWING.

J. HASTINGS.

BOW.—'Battle-bows,' so named (Zec 9<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>4</sup>), were probably of bronze (נְחֹשֶׁת nēhosheth), a metal harder than copper, being composed of copper and tin, different from our brass, which is a mixture of copper and zinc. Such bows needed great strength to bend (Ps 134<sup>4</sup> RV, which, however, reads 'bow of brass.' Cf. 2 K 9<sup>24</sup>). Bows might also be made of two straight horns joined together (Homer, Il. iv. 105–111), or again of wood.

'A deceitful bow' is used (Ps 78<sup>57</sup>, Hos 7<sup>16</sup>) as a figure for a person who disappoints the expectations of him. A bow might be 'deceitful' through simply missing its mark, or through breaking, and so missing. Teucer's bow-string breaks (Homer, Il. xv. 463–465), and the arrow wanders from the mark. 'Deceitful' (רִמְיָה rēmīyah) might also be rendered 'slack,' so that possibly a badly-strung bow may be meant.

W. E. BARNES.

BOWELS.—1. Literally, as 2 Ch 21<sup>18</sup> 'the LORD smote him in his bowels (כִּסְיֵי) with an incurable disease'; Ac 1<sup>18</sup> 'he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels (σπλάγχνα) gushed out.' 2. Figuratively as the seat of deep-felt emotions: (a) with thrill, or thrill, of affection or sympathy, (b) 'yearning' (Jer 31<sup>20</sup>, Ca 5<sup>4</sup>); (c) 'Thy law is in the midst of my bowels,' i.e. the object of my innermost affections; (d) 'emotions, Job 30<sup>27</sup> (see Davidson, ad loc., lit. 'are in ferment'). See BODY and MEDICINE.

J. HASTINGS.

BOWING (נָתַתְּ), Ps 62<sup>9</sup>, meaning bulged, burst, overthrown.—The ref. is to the effect of a sudden and heavy fall of rain, the 'bow' of Ezk 13<sup>11</sup> 38<sup>22</sup>, which in arid converts a garden into a sheet of water. To obviate such pressure, garden walls in Syria are built with openings to let off the water. G. M. MACKIE.

BOWL.—i. A vessel of this sort, a hollow dish in which to receive the milk of the flock and present the simple family meal, is indispensable for even the lowest stage of nomad life. For these purposes the wandering tribes used bowls of wood instead of fragile earthenware. It was in such a dish, 'a b. fit for lords' (AV 'a lordly dish'), that Jael offered Sisera a draught of sour milk (Jg 5<sup>28</sup>). The same word (כֶּלֶךְ, LXX λεκάνη, (A, λανάη), see Moore, 'the b. into which Gideon's fleece (Jg 6<sup>38</sup>). From both these passages it may be inferred that the bowl was a dish of at least medium size; in Gideon's case it may have been of the porous earthenware (see POTTERY) which has been in use among the settled population of Canaan from the earliest times. Many specimens of this ware were found by the officers of the Pal. Expl. Fund, and more recently by Flinders Petrie and Bliss in the mound of Tell el-Hesi (see Petrie, Lachish, and Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, passim).

ii. The large silver bowls presented by 'the princes of the congregation' (Nu 7<sup>135</sup>) have been mentioned under BACON. The same word (כֶּלֶךְ) is applied by Am (6<sup>9</sup>) to the large and costly bowls

* Cf. 2 Mac 9<sup>5</sup> of Antiochus Epiphanes: 'But the Lord Almighty, the God of Israel, smote him with an incurable and invisible plague; for as soon as he had spoken these words, a pain of the bowels that was remediless came upon him, and sore torments of the inner parts; and that most justly, for he had tormented other men's bowels with many and strange torments.'

used by the nobles of Samaria for their debauches. Jer. mentions a still larger b. (יָבֵט, AV 'pot'—Gn 44<sup>22</sup> of Joseph's 'cup'), corresponding to the crater, from which the drinking cups (כִּסְיָה) were replenished (Jer 35<sup>5</sup>). The material was no doubt silver.

iii. In AV bowl is the rendering of יָבֵט as applied to the cup (RV) or calyx of beaten work used as an ornament on the stem and branches of the golden candlestick (see under TABERNACLE).

iv. יָבֵט Zec 4<sup>2</sup>, also in correct text of v.<sup>2</sup>, is the bowl or receptacle for oil in the candlestick of Zechariah's vision, and is used in the same sense with ref. to the 'lamp of life' (Ec 12<sup>6</sup>). It also denotes the bowl-shaped or spheroidal capitals of Jachin and Boaz (1 K 7<sup>11, 42</sup>, 2 Ch 4<sup>12, 13</sup>).

v. In Is 51<sup>17, 22</sup> for 'dregs of the cup,' etc., RV renders 'b. of the cup' (כִּסְיָה); the second word, however, is best regarded as a gloss to explain the . . . . . n Rev passim RV adopts φιάλη (AV 'vial'). For other changes of RV (including כִּסְיָה, AV 'bason,' RV 'bowl'), see BASON. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOX.—In 2 K 9<sup>1, 3</sup> AV, a box (יָבֵט) of oil is mentioned, RV vial. In 1 S 10<sup>1</sup> it is said that Samuel 'took the vial (יָבֵט) of oil,' in 16<sup>1</sup> God's command to Samuel is 'fill thy horn (יָבֵט) with oil.' It seems probable that horn is the true meaning, as, being closed at the tip, it could easily be sealed up at the other end and carried about. Perfume boxes (יָבֵטִים) are spoken of in Is 33<sup>20</sup> RV. In Van Dyck's Arab. tr. they are called . . . . . the common word for small pots of . . . . . for carrying ointments. In Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>8</sup>, Lk 7<sup>37</sup> 'alabaster box (RV cruse) of ointment' (ἀλάβαστρον) is mentioned. The word used in Arabic is ḥārūrāh, which may mean a small vase or jar of earthenware or other material. In Syria olive oil is often kept sealed up in small earthen jars. The word alabaster, though originally applied to vases made of that substance, seems to have been often used for a vessel containing an unguent without special regard to the material of which it was made. As the ointment referred to is said to have been very precious, it is probable that the vase may have been alabaster. The breaking refers, of course, to the seal, not to the vase. W. CARSLAW.

BOX TREE (יָבֵטִים tēashshūr, λεύκη, κέδρος, Aq. Th. θασσόρ, buzus, pinus).—The only species of box found in Bible lands is Buzus longifolia, Boiss., which is a shrub from 2 to 3 ft. high. It does not grow south of Mt. Cassius, and it is unlikely that it did in historical times. It is improbable that it was at all familiar to the Hebrews.

The other trees alluded to in the three passages in which the tēashshūr is mentioned (Is 41<sup>19, 20</sup>, 1 K 27<sup>6</sup>) were familiar. They are the cedar, shittah (RV acacia), myrtle, fir, oak, pine (?). It is unlikely that an unfruitful and in-jointly bush would be associated with these, which, with the exception of the myrtle, the emblem of greenness and triumph, were all loudly trees, and familiar to those who heard the prophecy. Its name signifies erectness or tallness, which indicates that it also was a stately tree. Unfortunately, philology gives us no help in solving the question, as the word tēashshūr has not been preserved in the Arabic. The old Arab. VS gives sherbtin, which is one name for the wild form of Cupressus semperverens, L., the cypress. This is a stately tree, and every way suitable. There are a number of other fine evergreens in Bible lands, as the Cilician spruce, Abies Cilicica, Boiss.; the alpine juniper, Juniperus excelsa, L. (Arab. lizzāb); the large-fruited juniper, J. macrocarpa, Sibth. et Sm.; the plum-fruited juniper, J. drupacea, Lab.; any one of which would do for tēashshūr. It is useless to come to the LXX for light, as it translates the word in one passage λεύκη, the white poplar, and in another κέδρος, the cedar. The positive determination of the tree is hopeless. It would be better to transliterate it, as in the case of the algum, and call it the tēashshūr.

BOY.—See CHILDREN.

BOZEZ (בֹּזֶז), 1 S 14<sup>4</sup>.—A steep cliff on one side of the Michmash gorge opposite Seneh. It seems to be the northern cliff, a remarkable bastion of rock E. of Michmash. The valley is and the S. cliff is in shade during most while the N. is exposed to the noonday sun.

C. R. CONDER.

BOZKATH (בֹּזְכָת).—A town of Judah, Jos 15<sup>39</sup>, 2 K 22<sup>1</sup>, in the plain near Lachish and Eglor. Unknown.

BOZRAH (בֹּזְרָה, 'a fortification').—There were several places of this name, and the effort to identify them has resulted in some confusion. In Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. 1893, the letterpress rules out Bozrah in Haurān; yet a picture of this city is given as an illustration of Bozrah. Bozrah of Edom was a city of great antiquity (Gn 36<sup>33</sup>=1 Ch 1<sup>44</sup>). Its fate is identified with that of Edom (Is 34<sup>6</sup>, Jer 49<sup>13</sup>, Am 1<sup>12</sup>). It is referred to again in Is 63<sup>1</sup>, and probably in Mic 2<sup>12</sup>. El-Buseirah, 7 miles S.W. of Tufileh, the ancient Tophel (Dt 1<sup>1</sup>), on the main road N. from Petra, suits the geographical conditions; but the ruins are . . . . . Another possible identification is Ḥuzar Bishār. These towers lie about 15 miles S.E. of Diban (Dhibān), and more . . . . . 'in the wilderness,' . . . . . (Is 43<sup>1</sup>), and the Bezer of the . . . . . however, BEZER.)

There remains the question of Bozrah in Moab (Jer 48<sup>24</sup>). Some (e.g. Dillmann on Deut.) identify this with Bezer; but the great city Bozrah esh-Shām in Haurān has also many advocates. This latter is certainly the Bosora of 1 Mac 5<sup>26, 28</sup>. The case for Bozrah rests chiefly on the identification of Umm el-Jemāl, 15 miles S., with Beth-gamāl, . . . . . 7 miles E., with Keriōth, named . . . . . passage. Beth-gamāl, however, may be identical with Jemāl, 8 miles E. of Diban, while Beth-meon is almost certainly Ma'in S.W. of Medeba. It is also contended that Bozrah being in the Mishōr, Bozrah is too far north. But Aphek is in the Mishōr; so probably was Bozrah, lying to the S.E. The cities of Moab, 'far and near,' are included in this judgment. Bozrah is just about the same distance from Nebo as el-Buseirah, viz. about 60 miles, and it may quite possibly have been in the hands of Moab at that time. W. EWING.

BRACELET (צַדִּיקָה, חֶסֶד, חֶסֶד, חֶסֶד).—The bracelet has always been a favourite ornament in the East. It is found of many designs: plain ring, flat band, of twisted wires, interlinked rings, and connected squares, solid or perforated, with or without pendants. Bracelets are made of gold, silver, copper, brass, glass, and even enamelled earthenware. While highly ornamental, they had, when in the possession of . . . . . the further recommendation of being . . . . . not to be taken by the husband, nor seized for his debts.

The bracelet of Gn 38<sup>18</sup> is in RV 'cord,' referring probably to the cord of softly-twisted wool for the shepherd's head-dress. The bracelets of Ex 35<sup>22</sup>, RV 'brooches' (unioriental), were most likely nose-rings.

The bracelet appears, together with the crown, as one of the royal insignia in 2 S 1<sup>10</sup>. It is probable that in 2 K 11<sup>12</sup> also we ought, with Wellhausen and W. R. Smith (OTJC<sup>2</sup>, 311 n.), to read 'bracelets' (הַמְּעִיטָה) for 'testimony' (הַמְּעִיטָה). G. M. MACKIE.

BRAG.—Jth 16<sup>5</sup> 'He bragged (ἐπρεν, RV 'he said') that he would burn up my borders'; Sir 11 (heading) 'Brag not of thy wealth'; 2 Mac 9<sup>7</sup> 'he nothing at all ceased from his bragging' (ἀγερῶνλα, RV 'rude insolence'); and 15<sup>32</sup> 'with proud brags' (ἐμεγαλαλῆχε, so RV). This is probably one of the undignified words in the Apocrypha of 1611, of which Scrivener complains. 'Even when their predecessor (the Bishops' Bible) sets them a better example, they resort to undignified, mean, almost vulgar words and phrases; and, on the whole, they convey to the reader's mind the painful impression of having disparaged the importance of their own work, or of having imperfectly realised the truth that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well'—Introd. to Comb. Paragraph Bible, p. lxxv. The word is still in use, and still somewhat undignified. J. HASTINGS.

BRAMBLE.—See THORNS AND THISTLES.

BRAN.—In Bar 6<sup>48</sup> 'The women . . . burn bran for perfume' (τὰ πύρρα). See PERFUME.

BRANCH is the tr. in OT of a variety of Heb. words, of which those that chiefly concern us are —1. נֶחֱלֶה (from נָחַל 'trim' or 'prune'), used of the branch of a grape-vine, Nu 13<sup>23</sup>, Ezk 15<sup>2</sup>, and figuratively of Israel in Nah 2<sup>8</sup>. It is this term that is employed in Ezk 8<sup>17</sup>, where the words, 'They put the branch to their nose,' apparently describe some ceremony connected with sun-worship. Little, however, is known with certainty regarding the custom referred to, even if the text is not corrupt. (See commentaries of Smend and of A. B. Davidson, ad loc.) The same word also occurs in the phrase נֶחֱלֶה וְנֶחֱלֶה of Is 17<sup>10</sup>. See ADONIS. 2. נֶחֱלֶה, lit. 'shoot', Job 14<sup>7</sup>, used of Israel under the figure of a cedar Ezk 17<sup>22</sup>, an olive Hos 14<sup>6</sup>, a vine Ps 80<sup>11</sup> (RV 'shoot'), of the wicked under the figure of a tree Job 8<sup>18</sup> (RV 'shoot') 15<sup>30</sup>. Vigorous, widely-spreading branches are a symbol of prosperity (cf. Ps 37<sup>35</sup>, where the wicked man is spoken of as 'spreading himself like a green tree in its native soil'). 3. נֶחֱלֶה Job 15<sup>32</sup>, properly 'palm-branch' as in RV of Is 9<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>12</sup>, where 'palm-branch' and 'rush' are parallel respectively to 'head' and 'tail,' the rulers and the rabble (cf. Del. ad loc.). 4. נֶחֱלֶה, lit. a little fresh green twig, as in Is 11<sup>1</sup> 60<sup>2</sup>, Dn 11<sup>7</sup>. The word is used in the ode on the king of Babylon, Is 14<sup>19</sup>, where the words 'an abominable branch' (נֶחֱלֶה וְנֶחֱלֶה) apparently designate a useless shoot cut off and left to rot (cf. Jn 15<sup>8</sup> ἐξῆλθεν ἔξω ὡς τὸ κλήμα καὶ ἐξηράνθη, 'he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered'). 5. נֶחֱלֶה. The chief interest of this term lies in its employment in Messianic prophecies. Instead of 'branch,' W. R. Smith and G. A. Smith prefer to render it 'spring.' RVm offers a choice amongst the renderings 'shoot,' 'sprout,' 'bud.' In the earliest passage where נֶחֱלֶה occurs with a Messianic reference, Is 4<sup>2</sup>, it has manifestly no personal sense. 'The spring of J', the God-given fruits of the earth, are the true glory of the remnant of Israel, the best of blessings, because they come straight from heaven, and are the true basis of a peaceful and God-fearing life' (W. R. Smith, Prophecies of Israel, 329). The language both of Is 4<sup>2</sup> and of 11<sup>1</sup> seems to underlie Jeremiah's reference to the Messianic king as the 'Righteous Branch' (נֶחֱלֶה וְנֶחֱלֶה) or 'Branch of Righteousness' (נֶחֱלֶה וְנֶחֱלֶה), Jer 23<sup>5</sup> 33<sup>15</sup>. נֶחֱלֶה reaches, finally, the rank of a personal name of the Messiah in Zec 3<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 'my Servant the Branch,' 'the man whose name is the Branch.'

6. נֶחֱלֶה is used repeatedly by P of the 'branches' of the golden candlestick in the tabernacle, Ex 25<sup>32</sup> 37<sup>18</sup> etc.

In NT four Gr. words are tr. 'branch.' 1. βῆλον, Jn 12<sup>13</sup> (cf. 1 Mac 13<sup>51</sup>). Palm Sunday is called in the Greek Church ἡ κυριακὴ τῶν βῆλων. 2. κλάδος, Mt 13<sup>32</sup> etc., used figuratively of descendants, e.g. of Israel as the 'natural branches,' Ro 11<sup>16</sup> 17. 18. 19. 21 (cf. Sir 23<sup>25</sup> 40<sup>15</sup>). 3. κλήμα, used especially of a vine-branch, Jn 15<sup>2-6</sup>, where Christ is the vine and His disciples are the branches. 4. στίβας, Mk 11<sup>8</sup>, a ἄρ' λει. It is remarkable that Matthew, Mark, and John, in describing Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerus., each use a different word for 'branch,' namely, κλάδος, στίβας, and βῆλον respectively. J. A. SELBIE.

BRAND.—1. Zec 3<sup>2</sup> 'a. b. plucked out of the fire' (אֶת הָאֵשׁ, perhaps orig. a bent stick used to stir the fire, Oxf. Heb. Lex.; tr<sup>d</sup> 'firebrand,' Is 7<sup>4</sup> 'these two tails [i.e. . . .] fire-brands'; and Am 4<sup>11</sup> . . . d., to keep up connexion with Zec] plucked out of the burning'). 2. Jg 15<sup>5</sup> 'when he had set the brands on fire' (אֶת הָאֵשׁ, tr<sup>d</sup> 'firebrand' 15<sup>4</sup>). Samson's 'fire-brand' was a stick of wood wrapped with some absorbent material and saturated with oil (Moore, Judges, p. 341). It is the same Heb. word that is used of the 'lamps' (RV 'torches'), which Gideon's men carried in their pitchers, Jg 7<sup>16</sup>. The name of Deborah's husband, Lappidoth (Jg 4<sup>4</sup>), is a plu. of the same word. See LAMP. For Branding, see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS. J. HASTINGS.

BRASS (נְחָשׁ, χαλκός).—Brass is an alloy of copper and zinc in the proportion of 200 to 100 or 1 of the latter. The word is of frequent use in the Bible, but it is uncertain whether in any instance it means the alloy just described, as brass is very rarely found amongst the remains of early cities; while, on the other hand, weapons and implements of copper and bronze are abundant, associated with those of stone and, less frequently, of iron. The expression in Dt 8<sup>9</sup> 'a land . . . out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass,' shows that the word was used for copper. That the latter was worked largely in Arabia Petræa is well known (see MINES, MINING). The abundance of bronze, which is an alloy of copper and tin, amongst the early nations both of Asia and Europe is the more remarkable as tin is of rare occurrence; but its value in giving hardness and other qualities to copper was discovered more than 2000 years B.C. Thus knives, hatchets, hammers, spears, and other articles, both of copper and of bronze, have been discovered amongst the ruins of Cretan and Egyptian civilisation. The use of copper, bronze, and other metals was known to the ancient Egyptians before the Exodus, and it is probable that they had understood the art both of making bronze and of making it flexible to a degree unknown to us.† The art of making bronze is clearly referred to by Homer in his description of the fashioning of the shield of Achilles by Vulcan (Il. xviii. 474, where copper and tin [χαλκοῖσι] are both melted in the furnace); and amongst the ruins of Troy, brought to light by the memorable labours of Schliemann, battle-axes, lances, knives, arrow-heads, and various ornaments both of copper and of bronze, were discovered, together with the moulds of mica-schist and sandstone in which some of these weapons were cast.‡ Copper and bronze celts have been discovered by di Cesnola

BIBLE REFERENCES.—In the Bible 'brass' (i.e. copper or bronze) is referred to both actually and symbolically; and it may be desirable to consider the word under these two heads—

(A) Actual.—1. In Gn 4<sup>22</sup> Tubal-cain is described as the 'forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron,' RVm 'copper and iron.' This is the earliest record of the use of these metals. Some doubt has been thrown by Evans on the word iron, and he suggests that it has been introduced at a later date, and that it does not occur in the original text, which Tubal-cain is said to have made.

BRAVERY.—Although b. is used in the modern sense of courage as early as in any other, it had two other meanings which have now been lost. 1. Connected probably with 'brag' (etymology), it expressed boasting, as 'No Man is an Avenger, however he pretend it, and serve the Company with his Braveries'—Donne (1631); and esp. a military display, as 'The whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a braverie) fled amaine'—Raleigh (1614), Hist. of War'd, iii. 43. 2. It expressed splendour, often passing into ostentation (so still locally), as 'The braverie of this world . . . likened is to floure of grasse'—Tusser (1573). This is the meaning of b. in Is 3<sup>18</sup> 'the b. of their tinkling ornaments' (תְּכֵנִיִּם Amer. RV 'beauty'). Cf. Shaks. Taming of Shrew, iv. iii. 57—

'With scarfs and fans and double change of bravery.'

Bravely occurs Jth 10<sup>4</sup> (Judith) decked herself bravely (ἐκαλλωπισατο σφόδρα) to allure the eyes of all men that should see her.' Cf. the general sense of 'finely,' 'handsomely.' Cf. Celia's jesting words in As You Like It, iii. iv. 43: 'O, that's a BRAWLER.—To brawl in its earliest use, and till the beg. of the 17th cent., was simply to quarrel or fight (without the 'noisily and indecently' of Johnson); and this seems to be the meaning in AV. Brawl as subst. occurs Sir 27<sup>14</sup> 'their brawls make one stop his ear' (RV 'strife'). Brawling as subst. Sir 31<sup>29</sup>; RV 'strife'. 25<sup>24</sup> 'a b. (RV 'contentious') woman' (אִשָּׁה קָרְיָה, trd 'contentious woman' 27<sup>15</sup>; cf. 'contentious man' 26<sup>21</sup>). Brawler occurs in AV 1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, Tit 3<sup>2</sup> (Gr. ἀμαχος, RV 'contentious'). RV gives 'brawler' for AV 'given to wine' 1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, Tit 1<sup>7</sup> (Gr. τράποιος, RVm 'quarrelsome over wine').

BRAY.—There are two distinct words, and both occur.

1. To make a harsh cry, once used of horses and other animals (cf. Job 30<sup>7</sup> 'Among the bushes they bray,' spoken of Job's mockers who are 'dogs of the flock,' and Ps 42<sup>1</sup> Geneva Bible, 'As the hart brayeth for the rivers of water,' retained in AVm), now used only of the ass: Job 6<sup>5</sup> 'Doth the wild ass b. when he hath grass?'

2. To beat small, to pound, still in use but freq. (if not always) with ref. to its (only) occurrence in AV, Pr 27<sup>22</sup>, which is Coverdale's trn (1535) 'Though thou shouldest bray a foole with a pestell in a mortar like otemeell, yet wil not his foolishnesse go from him.' Cf. Stubbes (1583), 'The word of God is not preached vnto them, and as it were braied, punned, interpreted, and expounded.'

BREAD (לֶחֶם lehem, ἄρτος).—i. A word used in the Bible in several senses—

1. As food in general, of animals, as Job 24<sup>5</sup> and Is 65<sup>25</sup>; or of man, as Gn 3<sup>19</sup>, where the word is first used. See also Gn 47<sup>12</sup>, Job 33<sup>20</sup> etc. In the sense of 'food' as opposed to drink, Ps 104<sup>15</sup>. In the sense of 'food' as opposed to drink, it is used in Is 33<sup>16</sup>, Ex 23<sup>25</sup>, and in the Lord's Prayer (C) See also 1 K 17<sup>13</sup>.

2. The kind of food which comes forth from the earth, vegetable food, as in Job 28<sup>5</sup>, Is 30<sup>25</sup>, and 65<sup>10</sup>, contrasted with lekar or 'drugs' in 1 K 17<sup>10</sup>.

3. Lehem is used as the name of the miraculous food whereby the Israelites were fed in the wilderness, Ex 16<sup>22</sup>, called interrogatively 'manna' (עֵלֶיךָ מַנָּה) at Ex 16<sup>16</sup>, in Ps 105<sup>40</sup>. In Nu 21<sup>5</sup> this bread is called lilek, 'mean or insignificant'.

4. The staple food of a nation is called the 'staff of b.' (Lv 26<sup>26</sup>, Ezk 4<sup>10</sup>), or the stay (support) of b. (Is 34). Hence famine is the breaking of the staff of b., and is typified by the selling of bread by weight, Lv 26<sup>26</sup>, Ezk 4<sup>10</sup>. Lands which are productive of b. are called lands of b., as Levpt (Gn 41<sup>54</sup>) and Babylon (Is 36<sup>7</sup>), whose fertility in producing corn is mentioned by Herodotus, i. 133. Abundance of food is called 'fulness of b.', so often a name to mankind, as it was to Sodom (Ezk 16<sup>49</sup>),

b. (Gn 49:20, 4, La 1:1, 44). Such poverty, in general (Job 27:14), but may be due to misfortune, not crime (Ec 9:11). The P and the children of the righteous are described as 'wandering for' from b. may be the token of a vow, as in the case of David (2S 3:35); and the asceticism of John the Baptist is expressed by Christ by the phrase 'neither eating b. nor drinking wine' (Lk 7:33).

5. The hastily prepared food in token of welcome and hospitality is called challah (Gn 43:14); and the witch of Endor thus entertained Saul (1S 28:24). For want of this hospitality, the Succothites were punished by Gideon (Jg 8:15), and the Ammonites and Moabites were excluded from the congreg. of Isr. (Dt 23:4, Neh 13:2). Such hospitality was customary among the Bedawin (Is 21:14), as all travellers have testified from Sinuhat (R.P. vi. 131) to Doughty (Arabia Deserta, 1888). Our Lord bade His apostles not to take bread with them, but to partake of hospitality on their missionary journeys (Lk 9:3). On such occasions the host breaks the b. for his guests; so Christ did for the multitude whom He fed by miracle (Mt 14:19 etc.), and for His disciples at the Last Supper (La 22:19 etc.). So St. Paul acted as host to his shipmates during the storm (Ac 27:35). Breaking of b. became the early name of the primitive Church (Ac 2:42, 46, 20:7, 1Co 10:16). It has special relevancy to the common form of the Jewish bread.

6. B. was the most convenient form in which to give food to the poor; hence giving (literally breaking) of bread is the dispensing of it. This was a crime in the judgment of the Egypt. Bk. of the Dead (cxxxv. 1, 35) as he said 'that he has given b. to the hungry'; and this claim is occasionally found in funeral inscriptions (R.P. ii. 14). In Ps 132:15 God promises to satisfy the poor of His people with bread.

7. B. made from corn, being dry and portable, was the best food for the traveller. It was called for her return (Jg 6:17) and for the lost asses (Jg 6:17) showing that their Nikkud signifies a point. LXX, however, renders it supernus, as also Theod. and Kimchi (Jos 9:5).

8. B. was used to aid in eating soft food, so Jacob gave Esau b. with his pottage (Gn 25:11), and Rebekah prepared b. for Isaac's savoury meat (Gn 27:17). The challah given by our Lord to Judas was probably a sop of bread.

ii. The materials of which bread was made were barley, wheat, spelt, millet, and lentiles. (See articles under these titles.)

The best bread was made of wheat, חטה (Gn 30:14), which when ground was called challah or meal (Jg 6:17, 1S 12:14, 1K 4:22, 17:12, 14). In Egypt wheat was called hi or ha; when growing it was called ketti, and when cut and winnowed khakha. Several kinds were grown, the common (Triticum vulgare) and the many-eared (T. compositum), which sometimes has seven ears on a stalk (Gn 41:5). Two kinds are distinguished by Jewish authors, the light-coloured and the dark (Peah 2:5-6; see also Tristram, Land of Israel, 584). The word for an ear of corn, shibboleth (Jg 12:6); in rabbinical writings shibboleth sho'al is used for Egilops or wild oats, and shiphon for another kind of oats, which are not mentioned in the Bible. When full but not quite ripe, these ears were often roasted or boiled, the 'parched corn' of the Bible (Lv 23:14, 1S 17:17, 2S 17:28), and called by the Arabs ferik (see also 2K 4:42), the best ears for the purpose being grown in highly cultivated garden-land (Lv 23:14, Targ. Ibn G'anach). The word hattah in the singular usually means the cereal as growing, and is used in the plural for the cut and winnowed grain. It was sown either broadcast (Mt 13:3) or in rows, שורות (Is 28:25), translated 'principal' in AV. The wheat harvest was usually in May, and the grain was reaped with a sickle, as in Egypt (Dt 16:9, Joel 3:13, Rev 14:14), and bound in sheaves, or cut off short by the ears in the Picenian mode (Job 24:24; see Varro, de re rustica, i. 50), or pulled up by the arm (Is 17:6, see also Peah, 4, 10, and Maundrell's Journey, p. 144). The sheaves, called עֲבָתִים from being bound (Gn 37:7, Ps 126:6), עֲבָתִים (Ru 2:16), עֲבָתִים (Lv 23:10, Dt 24:15, Ru 2:7, Job 24:10) from being collected in bundles, were piled in heaps (שָׂרִיף Ex 22:6, Jg 15:5), and were carted to the threshing-floor (Am 2:14; see AGRICULTURE), a flat, well-levelled surface in a high place, exposed to the wind, preferably the S. or S.E. wind from the wilderness, and therefore dry. Such floors were permanent landmarks (Gn 50:7, 18), on which the grain was trampled by oxen, or run over by a haruz (Is 28:27), morag, or sledge (Is 41:18, 2S 24:22, 1Ch 21:23), called mowre at the present day. Gideon, being afraid to go to a public threshing-floor, beat his grain with a flail in private (Jg 6:11). The corn, winnowed with a fork and shovel or fan, was collected and stored in a cache, or underground chamber, or dry well with clay walls (2S 17:17, Jer 41:5), or in an inner room. Thomson (Land and Book, i. 90) speaks of these underground caches as specially useful in protecting the grain from ants. It is remarkable that there is no reference to these grain cisterns in the Mishna. Barns or granaries were also used (Job 39:12, Mt 13:30, Lk 3:17, 12:18). The first sheaf cut was called omer as a wave sheaf before the Lord (Lv 23:10, 17), sometimes decorated with lilies and other flowers (Ca 7:2. See for similar ceremonies Frazer, Golden Bough, i. 334). There were several qualities of wheat; that of Minnith being esteemed the best (Ezk 27:17). Pannag, given as a place-name in AV, is rendered cassia in the LXX and millet in the Peshitta, but is left untranslated in RV. It was prob. some kind of aromatic or spice. Michmash and Zant'ah were also famous for wheat, as was Ephraim, where the straw grew so long that the proverb 'bringing straw to Ephraim' = 'bringing coals to Newcastle' (Menah. 85. a. 5). The meal used in the offerings is called challah, or finely ground (Ex 29:40, Lv 2:5, Nu 7:13 etc.), to distinguish it from the challah or ordinary meal. The best is called heleb kikkoth hittah, 'fat of kidneys of wheat' (Dt 32:14). This fine flour was the food of the wealthy (1K 4:22, 2K 7:1, Ezk 16:13, 19, Rev 18:13).

Another material used in making bread was emmer (Ezk 4:9), which is the Arab. dukkhan. This was a smaller grain, probably dhurah (Sorghum vulgare), which is extensively grown in Bible lands, and used as a food-stuff by the peasantry. It is the chief cereal of the East; Arabia; but dhurah bread is not eaten by Europeans.

Spelta (Emmer spelta) is another coarse grain, with coarse strong straw, and small heads, often sown on the borders of the fields to enclose them (Is 28:25). See Surenhusius (Mishnah, Kilaim Amst. i. 121). The grains of spelt do not easily separate from the husk when rubbed in the hands, as do those of wheat (Lk 6:1). It ripens later than barley, and so escaped the plague of hail (Ex 9:32). The word is tr. 'rye' in AV in this place, and 'fitches' in Ezk 4:9; but these are certainly incorrect. In LXX it is rendered δρυρα, which was in Greece used as food for horses (Homer, Il. v. 196). Aq. and Theod. tr. it ζέα, which is a different species of grain, Triticum zea (Dioscorides, ii. cxi.; Theophrastus, HP viii. 1. 3; S. Geschichte Botan. p. 36). Ibn G'anach tr. it ζέα was also a cattle food, see Odys. iv. 41. 604. LXX calls Elijah's cake (1K 19:6) olurites. Herodotus says that the Egypt. bread was made of olyra (ii. 36. 77); and in the Book of the Dead spelt (bot) is the grain represented as growing in the fields of the under-world (cix. 5); but the monuments show that wheat was also a common food-stuff (Ex 9:32). The genuine rye (Secale cereale) was probably not cultivated in Bible lands; it is called in German neshman by a paronomasia on Is 28:25.

Beans, bib, were used as an ingredient in bread (Ezk 4:9), and were also eaten roasted or parched (קָלִי); see 2S 17:28. Lentiles, qashim, were also made into bread (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>); the small red lentile or 'adas is still used for this purpose among the poorest classes in Egypt (Sonnini). Lentiles and beans were probably among the orizim or 'pulse' on which Daniel and his companions were fed (Dn 1<sup>16</sup>); but the word means vegetables in general. The flamen dialis among the Romans was forbidden to use beans as food (Aulus Gell. Noct. Attic. 10. xv. 12).

iii. Bread-corn of any sort is called  $\text{כֶּמֶן}$ , and this word is often associated with wine as descriptive of fertility (Gn 27<sup>28, 37</sup>, Dt 7<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>4</sup> 28<sup>51</sup> 33<sup>28</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>39</sup>, 2 Ch 31<sup>5</sup> 32<sup>28</sup>, Ps 47, Is 36<sup>17</sup>, La 2<sup>12</sup>, Hos 2<sup>8, 22</sup> 7<sup>14</sup>, Hag 1<sup>11</sup>, Zec 9<sup>17</sup>, Jl 1<sup>10, 17</sup>, Neh 5<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>39</sup>). Grain when winnowed and stored is called  $\text{רָבָא}$ , as Gn 41<sup>35</sup> 42<sup>25</sup>, Pr 11<sup>26</sup>, Am 8<sup>5</sup>. This word is rarely used of grain on the stalk (as Ps 65<sup>9</sup> 72<sup>16</sup>), and in Jer 23<sup>28</sup> is used of grain as contrasted with the husk or straw.  $\text{קָמָח}$  is also used in the Talmud to indicate the grain as distinguished from the straw (Sabb. 18<sup>1</sup>, Brn 6<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>). Standing corn was commonly distinguished as  $\text{קָמָח}$ .

Corn was prepared by bruising in a mortar or grinding in a mill; in the former case it is called רֵמֶשׂ, as in 2 S 17<sup>19</sup>, Pr 27<sup>22</sup>, where the point of the figure seems to be, that though the fool be associated with wise men he does not lose his characteristic folly. The mortar or maktesh and the pestle or eli were usually of stone.

The mills in common use were called מִלּוּחַ, the dual form referring to the two stones. They were in shape like the bradh or quern in use until comparatively recent times in the Hebrides and West of Ireland, and consisted of a nether millstone or sekeb, which was fixed, and convex on its upper surface, upon which the upper millstone or rekeb ('the chariot,' in Arabic the rakib, 'rider') rotated. In this was a central hole through which the grain was poured, while the stone was being rotated by means of a handle fixed in its upper surface, near its edge. The upper millstone is made of a porous unpolishing lava from the Hauran, while the nether (proverbially hard) is either of the same material, or else of compact sandstone, limestone, or basalt. The history and references to such mills are given at length in Goetz, de molis et pistrinis veterum; Hoheisel in Ugolini's Thesaurus, xxix.; and de molis veterum. The corn was . . . by women (Mt 24<sup>1</sup>), usually by a pair. . . (Ex 11<sup>5</sup>, Is 47<sup>7</sup>). Cf. Plautus, Mercat. ii. 3. 62; Odys. xx. 105<sup>1</sup>, who sat on the mill facing each other, and worked together. And as poor it was done by the wife (Shabbath vi. 2); hence the expression in Job 31<sup>10</sup> means to become another's concubine (cf. Ausonius, Epig. lxxi. 7, and the Horatian 'non alienas perimolere uxores,' Sat. i. 2. 34). Corn was thus employed in grinding (Jg 16<sup>21</sup>).

C. 1. The sound of the noise of the mills was a sign of desolation (Jer 25<sup>10</sup>, Rev 18<sup>22</sup>). The sound of the grinding in Ec 12<sup>4</sup> may be the chant of the women (Odys. xx. 105, 119; see also Aristoph. Thesmophor. 480). In later days mills became larger, and were moved by animal power, or wind or water, and grinding became a trade (Demai iii. 4). Asses are mentioned in rabbinical writings as used for this purpose, and an ass in a mill was a proverbial phrase (in Mischar hapenninim, quoted by Buxtorf, Florteg. Hebr. 309). The great millstone in Mt 18<sup>6</sup> is μῶλος οὐκός, either a millstone turned by an ass (RVm), or else a nether millstone (Ludolf, in loco; see Hobeisel, p. 57; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Luc. xvii.) called 'the ass,' because it bore the burden of the top stone.

The meal of flour, when ground, was next mixed with water, and kneaded into dough. In Egypt this was done by the feet (Herod. ii. 36) as represented on the tomb of Ramses III, but among the Jews usually in kneading-troughs (mushereth).

These were shallow wooden bowls (Ex 8<sup>3</sup>), which could easily be bound up in their clothes (Ex 12<sup>34</sup>). Harmer has conjectured that the word refers to a leathern bag or bread-wallet, often carried by the Arabs (iv. 366); but this is improbable. Bread-making was at first a family occupation, done by the wife (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>), the sister (2 S 13<sup>8</sup>), the female servants (1 S 8<sup>13</sup>) or other female member of the household (1 S 28<sup>24</sup>, Jer 7<sup>18</sup> 44<sup>19</sup>, Mt 13<sup>33</sup>). In later days baking became a trade (Hos 7<sup>4</sup>. 6); and in towns the breadsellers occupied a definite place in the bazaar, 'the bakers' street' (Jer 7<sup>21</sup>). This place may be referred to Neh 3<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>38</sup>, where the 'tower of the ovens' is mentioned, as tannur is used for a baker's oven in Lv 24<sup>13</sup> 26<sup>3</sup>, Hos 7<sup>4</sup>. Josephus speaks of the bakers in Jewish towns (Ant. xv. ix. 2).

In the family, bread was baked daily as wanted, as it became tough ar<sup>n</sup> . . . when stale (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>). It has been . . . this daily preparation is referred to in the Lord's Prayer; but the petition rather refers to . . . quality (for . . . ἐπιτοσίον . . .). Remission, 195; and art. LORD'S PRAYER). The amount of a daily baking was an ephah (=3 seahs or measures of meal=4½ pecks), as in Gn 18<sup>6</sup>; Mt 13<sup>33</sup>, Jg 6<sup>19</sup>, 1 S 1<sup>24</sup>. Probably this was proportional to the size of the oven, and the amount was smaller in time of famine (Lv 26<sup>26</sup>). Salt was mixed with the dough (Ezr 6<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>22</sup>), which was then ready for the rapid preparation of unleavened bread or for leavening. In the latter case a small portion of old fermented dough, חמץ, was mixed with the kneaded dough or פַּתָּה (as in Ex 12<sup>34</sup>, 39). This rapidly induced panary fermentation in the whole mass, and 'raised' the bread, then called חֶמֶז hamēz or soured bread (Ex 12<sup>39</sup>, Hos 7<sup>4</sup>), as opposed to מַצּוֹת mazzoth or unleavened bread, so called because in flat cakes. The dough was usually left in the kneading-trough to ferment; and this took some time, during which the baker could sleep (Hos 7<sup>4</sup>), when he had left a low unstirred fire to keep it warm . . . the process. Leaven was used as a . . . which is old (Schneider, Zeitsch. f. Theol. 1883, 333); and sometimes for that which is corrupt, the leaven of the Pharisees or of Herod (Mt 16<sup>8</sup>, Mk 8<sup>15</sup>, Lk 12<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>); or that which exercises a secretly . . . influence (Mt 13<sup>33</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>8</sup>, Gal 5<sup>9</sup>; see Petrus Chrysologus, Sermo xciv.). Leaven was prohibited in those offerings made by fire to the Lord (Lv 2<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>, Ex 20<sup>9</sup>, Nu 6<sup>15</sup>), as the sacrifice should consist of what is fresh and pure; but in such offerings as the peace-offering (Lv 7<sup>13</sup>) and the pentecostal loaves (Lv 23<sup>17</sup>) leavened bread might be used, for these were to be eaten by the priests. The use of leavened bread was prohibited during the Passover week; and all leaven was to be burnt before the 14th Nisan, as during the Theocracy the eating of leavened b. at this time was a capital offence, as was the burning of leavened b. in the daily sacrifice. Hence Amos sarcastically bids the Isr. increase their sin by offering leaven in the thanksgiving (4<sup>5</sup>). This idea of leaven being an emblem of corruption was known to the classics. Persius uses fermentum in this sense (1<sup>24</sup>); and A. Gellius (Noct. Attic. x. 15. 19) tells us that the flamen dialis was not allowed to touch flour mixed with leaven. Bread was sometimes fermented with wine-lees in place of leaven; see Pesachim iii. 1.

The first dough of the new harvest was made into a cake, and offered as a heave-offering (Nu 15<sup>20</sup>). This חלה was leavened; some have supposed it to be coarse meal, but the rabbinical authorities understand it as leavened dough (see Halla). This offering is referred to in Neh 10<sup>97</sup> and Ezk 44<sup>30</sup>, where it is stated to be for the use of the priest; for superstitious uses of this see Otho, Lexicon Talm. under the word Challa, p. 495.

The cakes or loaves were usually flat and circular, a span in diameter, and about an inch thick; these are called, from their shape, כֶּרֶס (Ex 29<sup>23</sup>, Jg 8<sup>5</sup>, 1 S 10<sup>8</sup>, Pr 6<sup>28</sup>). In Jg 7<sup>13</sup> the word is כֶּרֶס (Kethibh, for which Kereb has 5<sup>73</sup>); such cakes were like flat stones (Mt 7<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>11</sup>). Three such loaves were a meal for one person (Lk 11<sup>3</sup>), and one was prison fare (Jer 37<sup>21</sup>), or a charity dole (1 S 2<sup>38</sup>). At the average price of barley in NT times, as well as it can be estimated, 200 pennyworths of barley bread would have been about 700 loaves—a mouthful to each of the multitude (Jn 6<sup>7</sup>). Abigail's 200 loaves, the fill of the pannier baskets of an ass, would serve for a reasonable feast for David and his men (1 S 25<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 16<sup>2</sup>). Other kinds of bread were כֶּרֶס, Nu 15<sup>20</sup>, Lv 8<sup>2</sup>; probably also cylindrical or round cakes; possibly these may be, as has been suggested, pancakes, cakes, the punctures being on the surface by the smooth pebbles in the oven (cf. the κόλλες of the Greeks; LXX renders cake in 2 S 6<sup>19</sup> 13<sup>8</sup> by κόλλης); כֶּרֶס, folded or rolled-up cakes, something like pancakes, supposed by some to be heart-shaped (2 S 13<sup>6</sup>), possibly a cake with aromatic seeds added as a carminative. For these finer cakes the dough was twice kneaded. מֶנֶם were round cakes also (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>, 1 K 17<sup>13</sup>, Ezk 4<sup>12</sup>). כֶּרֶס, tr. cracknels (1 K 14<sup>3</sup> AV), were probably cracknels on the surface with aromatic seeds, cracknels the brack of the Irish (literally aran breac, spotted bread). The widow of Zarephath calls cakes by what was probably a provincial name, כֶּרֶס.

The methods of baking were various. The earliest mentioned is baking upon the hearth (Gn 18<sup>6</sup>), that is, on the heated stones of the hearth, the embers being drawn aside and around it. This was probably the Passover method (Ex 12<sup>30</sup>). Elijah's cake was baked on the hot embers (1 K 19<sup>6</sup>); so the bread in Jn 21<sup>6</sup>. B. thus baked was the ἐκρυφίλας ἄσπρος of Hippocrates, as in LXX. The common method of baking in later times was in ovens, of which there were several kinds. Fixed ovens were commonly hollows in the floor, often of the principal room, about 4' x 3', coated with clay, and heated by being filled with burning fuel. Such were possibly the כֶּרֶס of Lv 11<sup>35</sup>. Portable ovens, כֶּרֶס, were earthen or stone jars, about 3 ft. high, heated inwardly with wood (1 K 17<sup>13</sup>, Is 44<sup>16</sup>, Jer 7<sup>18</sup>) or dried grass and herbage, χόρτος (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>); in the absence of other fuel, dried camel dung or cow dung was used (Ezk 4<sup>12</sup>, 19). When the oven was fully heated the cakes were put in. Then dough was sometimes spread on the outside of the oven; and such a cake, like one baked on a hot hearthstone, requires to be turned, or else it remains raw on one side, while burnt on the other (Hos 7<sup>9</sup>). Ovens of both kinds are still in use in Bible lands. Sometimes cakes were baked in a pan or כֶּרֶס, which was a flat plate of metal or earthenware, like a 'girdle,' which could be made to stand on its edge (Ezk 4<sup>3</sup>). This was placed over the fire, with the cake laid upon it (Lv 6<sup>24</sup> 7<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ch 23<sup>20</sup>). Tamar's pan was כֶּרֶס, probably a deeper, concave one, out of which the cakes were poured in a heap (2 S 13<sup>8</sup>), like the τάγγων of Aristophanes (Eg. 929). The כֶּרֶס of Lv 27<sup>7</sup>, which is distinguished in the latter passage from the mahabath or flat pan, was probably some kind of shallow pot for boiling the meal for the offering, which is mingled with oil, and not a frying-pan, as in both RV and AV. A mess of food thus prepared is still known among some Bedawin tribes, and is called stita. This may be the meal offering 'which is soaked' of 1 Ch 23<sup>28</sup>.

Unleavened bread was, and still is, made into thin flat cakes, כֶּרֶס (Ex 29<sup>2</sup>, Lv 24<sup>5</sup>); hence they are called wafers. In Ex 29<sup>2</sup> the cakes made with oil (ἀδάνα) are contrasted with the wafers anointed with oil. These were both made in or upon an oven (Lv 24<sup>5</sup>); a third kind, the fritza of the Latin writers, were made in a mahabath (2<sup>7</sup>). Unleavened bread is called כֶּרֶס, as in Ex 12<sup>15</sup>, when contrasted with leavened bread irrespective of shape. All forms of bread were broken when being used,—not cut (Mt 14<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>26</sup>, Lk 24<sup>35</sup>, Ac 2<sup>42</sup>), the pieces being κλάσματα, broken pieces. It was smeared with olive oil (1 K 17<sup>12</sup>), as we now use butter; occasionally with honey, which was sometimes mixed in the dough (Ex 16<sup>31</sup>), as in the μελιτώματα of Dioscorides (4<sup>64</sup>), or the ceremonial πυραμοῦντες (Ephippus, Εφημ. 1<sup>3</sup>). Butter as well as honey was used with bread (2 S 17<sup>29</sup>, Is 7<sup>15</sup>); but honey, being a fermentable substance, was not in burnt-offerings (Lv 24<sup>5</sup>). In Egypt all kinds of bread were equally varied; and in the picture of the baker's workshop referred to there are conical loaves, flat cakes, rolled-up cakes, and cakes spotted with seeds. In the list of offerings in the great Harris papyrus and other lists there are enumerated kelushita (= halloth), mes, san or sannu, funeral cakes; kiki or pyramids, like the kikicarothe; hebner, or cakes for offering; baat, kemhu, hefa, and tetet cakes. The commonest form was the conical, of which clay models were commonly placed in tombs as symbols of funeral food. Egypt. bread is represented monumentally as carried in baskets on the head of the baker, as in the chief baker's dream (Gn 40<sup>17</sup>). The words there used, כֶּרֶס, rendered 'white baskets' in AV, and 'baskets of white b.' LXX, Aq. Syr. and RV, is possibly the Egypt. kheru, used of the food for a funeral offering. For mode of carrying see Herod. ii. 35.

iv. Breaking bread was part of the funeral feast among the Jews, as among other nations (Jer 16<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>, עֵלֶךְ 21<sup>17</sup>, Hos 9<sup>4</sup>). Thus the funeral feast for Abner was kept at Hebron (2 S 3<sup>38</sup>). The funeral feast is also mentioned in the apoc. Ep. of Jer (Bar 6<sup>21</sup>); and Tobit bids his son to 'pour out his b. on the burial of the just' (4<sup>17</sup>). For the Egypt. funeral feasts see Budge, The Mummy, p. 172; for other references see Garmannus, de Pane Lugentium, Ugolini, xxxiii. Sometimes coarse barley bread was used in these feasts, 'non pro deliciis apponitur sed tantum ut servilis fames relevetur' (Petrus Cellensis, Liber de Panibus, Migne, cclii. 917).

v. Bread formed part of certain offerings, as the pentecostal loaves, and the peace- and trespass-offerings, in which form it is called the b. of their God (Lv 21<sup>6</sup>). Most of this was eaten by the priests after being offered (Lv 21<sup>17</sup>, 21). The special b.-offering was the pile of shewbread (b. of the presence, כֶּרֶס, ἀρτοι τῆς προθέσεως, Ex 25<sup>30</sup> 35<sup>13</sup>, 1 S 21<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>48</sup>), which was placed on a pure table of acacia wood in the Holy Place of the tabernacle, with frankincense (cf. Jos. Ant. iii. x. 7; Schurer, HJP ii. i. 235 f.). Twelve of these cakes, each made of  $\frac{2}{3}$  of a peck of flour, were placed in two piles, six in each pile, every Sabbath morning, 'on behalf of the children of Israel'; the old cakes being eaten by the priests in a sacred place, when the new cakes were brought in; and the frankincense was burned when the cakes were changed (Lv 24<sup>5</sup>, 6). The duty of making these was laid on the sons of Kohath (1 Ch 9<sup>32</sup>). The table was covered with a blue cloth, and had on it certain dishes on which the cakes were set in order (Nu 4<sup>7</sup>). In the temple this table was overlaid with gold (1 K 7<sup>48</sup>). In 2 Ch 4<sup>19</sup> tables in the plural are mentioned. It was this holy b. which Alumelech gave to David, contrary to the law (1 S 21<sup>6</sup>, Mt 12<sup>4</sup>). Probably the allowances, afterwards so liberally provided for the priests in the Priestly Code, were, during the troubled times of Saul, scanty, erratic, and often omitted; contrast the liberal temple allowance by Ramses III. in the Harris papyrus, EP vi. When the shewbread was reconstituted by Neh., ἡ ποσὶς αὐτοῦ § shekel was laid on the Jews (Neh. ix.<sup>17</sup>, xiv. 17<sup>24</sup>). In the corrupt days of the kingdom the table had . . . and it and its vessels were cleans . . . Hezekiah (2 Ch 29<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>7</sup>); but in later days they were equally careless (Mal 1<sup>7</sup>). For further particulars and pictures see Abraham ben David, De Templo, l. c. c. i. The same, ix. p. 298, and the references; Orib. l. c. Index ad. sub voce, p. 496.

vi. The word Bread is used metaphorically: (a) As expressing the perquisites of an office (Neh 9<sup>15</sup>). (b) The legitimate spoil of conquest (Nu 14<sup>9</sup>). (c) Those who do not earn their livelihood are said to eat the bread of idleness (Pr 31<sup>27</sup>). (d) The profit of sinful courses is called the b. of wickedness (Pr 4<sup>17</sup>); and the short-lived gains gained by falsehood are called b. of deceit (Pr 20<sup>1</sup>). Secret sin is compared to 'b. eaten in secret' (Pr 9<sup>27</sup>). (e) Suffering and sorrow are called eating the b. of adversity (Is 30<sup>20</sup>), or of affliction (Dt 16<sup>3</sup>, 1 K 22<sup>27</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>26</sup>), or of tears (Ps 80<sup>5</sup>). Sorrow is also expressed as eating ashes as bread (Ps 102<sup>9</sup>).

BREASTPLATE.—1. ḥn hoshem, a plate worn as part of the high priest's dress (see next art.). 2. ḥn shiryān, ḥwpaē. Both the Heb. and Gr. words probably described a cuirass rather than a simple breastplate. Such a cuirass as worn by the Greeks protected the back as well as the breast and stomach. In addition, it often gave protection to the neck and to the hips. It was well suited to suggest the many-sidedness of 'righteousness' (Is 59<sup>7</sup> = Eph 6<sup>4</sup>). Another form of the word, shiryān, is usually rendered 'coat of mail.' The phrase 'coat of mail of righteousness' is awkward, but it is more accurate than 'breast-plate of righteousness' in both places cited above. In 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup> faith and love form the ἀσπίς, perhaps with a hint at the two parts, front and back, of which it was usually made. The Rom. lorica (= ḥwpaē) was of various kinds. It was sometimes (a) a simple jacket of leather reaching to the middle of the thighs with double thickness at the shoulders, or (b) an arrangement of iron or brass rings which could be worn over a leathern jacket, or (c) a vest made of small metal plates overlapping one another, or, lastly, (d) when called segmentata it consisted of two broad pieces for the back and breast respectively, of five or six bands fastened on to the cuirass and cuirass, and running round the body, or, lastly, of four such bands over each shoulder. The 'segments' are stated to have been of leather; and the fact that no broad plates of iron have been found among the many remains of Rom. armour which have been brought to light, is against the modern theory that the lorica segmentata was of iron. See also Polybius 'F' quoted under ARMOUR.

BREASTPLATE OF THE HIGH PRIEST.—The most important part of the distinctive dress of the high priest, according to the Priests' Code, was the pectoral or breastplate (צֶן, more fully צֶן־חֹשֶׁן) "ח, Targ. חֹשֶׁן (Arab. hūṣn ed-dīn, "excellency of judgment") LXX λήγιον (var. ληγιόν) τῆς κρήσεως or τ. κρήσεως (but once περι-σφθιον, Ex 28<sup>4</sup>), Vulg. rationale, r. juarcii). The orig. signification of the Heb. word has been lost. Of the various suggested רַחֲשֵׁי only two deserve mention. The one רַחֲשֵׁי (Antiq. of Isr. p. 294), that רַחֲשֵׁי is 'a dialectic form of רַחֲשֵׁי, i.e. pocket, etc. (from a root רַחֲשֵׁי to store up), hence רַחֲשֵׁי "would probably mean 'the pouch of the oracle.'* The other possible root is רַחֲשֵׁי, Arab. ḥasan, to be beautiful, 'hence possibly רַחֲשֵׁי, either as chief ornament of ephod, or as the most excellent precious article of high priest's attire' (Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

The directions for the construction of the b. are given in Ex 28<sup>13-30</sup>, with which the parallel section 39<sup>8-21</sup> may be compared. The material was the same as that of the ephod (see EPHOD), the richest and most artistic of the textile fabrics of P ('of gold, of blue, of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine twined linen,' 28<sup>15</sup> RV). A cubit's length of this material was required, the width being a span or half-cubit; when folded in two, it formed a square, measuring a span each way. Into one of the faces of this square—henceforth to be the outer side of the b.—were inserted by means of gold settings, probably of filigree work, four rows of jewels, three in a row. The identification of these twelve jewels must start from the renderings of the LXX, and is still in some cases little more than probable (see art. STONES, PRECIOUS, also the Comm. in loco, and the literature infra, esp. the learned work of Braun, pp. 627-745). On each jewel was engraved the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel. All that has been written as to the order in which the names were arranged is mere speculation. The whole, however, had a fine significance: for thus the high priest wore 'upon his heart the names of the children of Israel, for a memorial before J<sup>h</sup> continually' (28<sup>29</sup>).

The b. was kept in position by the foll. simple device. At the right and left top corners, respectively, of the outer jewelled square, was fixed a gold ring, through which was passed a gold chain, or rather cord (for it had no links) 'עֲנָבִים לְעֵלֶיךָ, יְהוָה.' These chains were then passed over, or through, or otherwise attached to, a couple of gold ornaments (AV 'ouches')—probably rosettes (LXX ἀσπίδες) of gold filigree—which had previously (v.<sup>18</sup>) been fixed to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod in front. Similarly, at the right and left bottom corners of the inner square were fixed two gold rings, through each of which was passed a ribbon or 'lace of blue' (RV). Corresponding to these two rings on the b. were two of the same material, attached, like the rosettes above mentioned, to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod. Their precise position, however, is difficult to determine, owing to the want of clearness in the existing description of the ephod (Ex 28<sup>8-12</sup>). They may, perhaps, be best thought of as sewed to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod at points lower than the rosettes by the length of the chains and square, so that, in short, the rings of the ephod and those of the b. were in immediate contact, and fastened together by the blue lace.† The latter, in this way, would be entirely hidden by the b., which would account for the inferior material of the lower fastening compared with that of the upper. By this means the b. was securely held in its place, so that it should rest just above the cunningly woven band of the ephod (v.<sup>28</sup>). The main purpose of the b., there can scarcely be any longer a doubt, was to provide a receptacle for the sacred lot, the mysterious URIM and THUMMIM (wh. see). It should be added

BREECHES (ἱματίον, περισκελῆ, feminalia: for illustr. of last, see Rich, Dict. of Antiq.).—This is the name given to the garment ordered by Ezk (44<sup>18</sup>), and the garment worn by the priests (Lv 6<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>5</sup>) to be worn on grounds of modesty (see above pass. is a euphemism, see under BATH) by the priests when engaged in the more solemn duties of their office. The b., more accurately drawers, were made of white linen, were very short, like our modern bathing drawers, reaching to below the loins and round the waist. The Egyp. priests are said to have worn a similar garment (Williamson in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 113). Jos. gives a description of it as worn in his time (Ant. III. vii. 1. Cf. BRETHREN OF THE LORD.—The phrase 'brother' or 'brethren' of the Lord is used several times in the NT of James and other persons. There has been much controversy as to the actual relationship implied, whether we are to understand 'brethren' literally as meaning sons of the mother and reputed father of Jesus (the Helvidian view), or sons of Joseph by a former marriage (the Eriphian view), or sons of Clopas or Alphæus, the husband of a sister of the mother of Jesus (the Hieronymian view).

I think that any one reading these passages, without any preconceived idea on the subject, would naturally draw the conclusion that Mary was the true wife of Joseph, and bore to him at least four sons (James, Josès, Judas, and Simon) and two daughters; that the sons were not included among the twelve apostles, but were, on the contrary, disbelievers in the Messiahship of Christ, and inclined at one time to entertain doubts as to His sanity, though after His death they threw in their lot with His disciples. Setting aside the apocryphal books of the NT, the earliest reference to this subject in the post-apostolic writers is found in Hegesippus (about A.D. 160). His testimony, preserved by Eusebius (HE iv. 22), is quite consistent with the conclusion to which we are led by the language of Scripture, while it is totally opposed to the Helvidian view. It is to the effect that 'after the martyrdom of James the Just on the same charge as the Lord, his paternal uncle's child, Symeon the son of Clopas, was next made Bishop of Jerus., being put forward by all as the second in succession, seeing that he was a cousin of the Lord.' Cf. this with HE iii. 22, where Symeon is said to have succeeded the brother of the Lord as bishop, and c. 20, where Jude also is called brother of the Lord.

Tertullian (d. A.D. 220) is, however, the first who distinctly asserts that the 'brethren' were uterine brothers of Jesus. Arguing against Marcion, who had made use of the text, 'Who is my mother, and who my brother?' to prove that Christ was not really man, he says: Nos contrario dicimus, primo, non potuisse illi annuntiare quod mater et fratres ejus foris starent. . . si nulla illi mater et fratres nulli fuissent. . . At vere mater et fratres ejus foris stabant. . . Tam proximam personam foris stare, extraneis intus deficiis ad sermones ejus. . . Transtulit sanguinis nomina. . . proceres pro fide judicaret. . . in semet ipso docens, qui patrem aut matrem aut fratres præponeret verbo Dei, non esse dignum discipulum (Adv. Marc. iv. 19). Similarly arguing from the same text against the Marcionite Apelles, he says 'the words are not inconsistent with the truth of His humanity. No one would have told Him that His mother and His brethren stood without, qui non certus esset habere illum matrem et fratres. . . Omnes nascimur, et tamen non omnes aut fratres habemus aut matrem. Adhuc potest et patrem magis habere quam matrem, et avunculos magis quam fratres. . . Fratres Domini non crediderunt in illum. . . Mater æque non demonstratur adhæsisse ei. . . Hoc denique in loco apparet incredulitas eorum' (De Carne Christi, 7). As Tertullian in these passages gives no hint that the brothers of Jesus stood to Him in any other relation than other men's brothers do to them, or that His relationship to them was not as real as that to His disciples, so in other treatises he takes it for granted that Mary ceased to be a virgin after the birth of Christ (De Monogamia, 8): Duc nobis antistites Christianæ sanctitatis occurrunt, monogamia et continentia. Et Christum quidem virgo enixa est, semel nuptura post partum ('being about to defer her marriage union till after the birth of her son,' lit. 'being about to marry first after her delivery') ut uterque titulus sanctitatis in Christi sensu dispungeretur per matrem et virginem et univirum; and in even plainer words (De Virg. Vel. 6), where he discusses the meaning of the salutation benedicta tu inter mulieres. 'Was she called mulier, and not virgo, because she was espoused? We need not, at any rate, suppose a prophetic reference to her future state as a married woman': non enim poterat posteriorem mulierem nominare, de qua Christus nasci non habebat, id est virum passam sed illa (illam?) quæ erat præsens, quæ erat virgo ('for the angel could not be referring to the wife that was to be, for Christ was not to be born of a wife, i.e. of one who had known a husband; but he referred to her who was before him, who was a virgin').

These words of Tertullian, himself strongly ascetic, which were written about the end of the 2nd cent., do not betray any consciousness that he is contradicting an established tradition in favour of the perpetual virginity. And Origen (d. 253 A.D.), though upholding the virginity, and using the phrase used above by Tertullian, eam nupsisse post partum, unde approbent non habent, Comm. in Luc. 7, does not claim any authority for his own view, but only argues that it is admissible.* For the statement that the 'brethren' were sons of Joseph by a predeceased wife, he refers to two apocryphal books, dating from about the middle of the 2nd cent., as the authority for his view that the 'brethren' were sons of Joseph by a predeceased wife. One of these books is the Gospel of Peter, which, as we learn from Eusebius (HE vi. 12), Serapion, bishop of Antioch at the end of the 2nd cent., forbade to be used in a Cilician church, on the ground that it favoured the heretical views of the Docetæ. The latter portion of this Gospel (of course not containing the passage referred to by Origen) was discovered in a fragmentary condition in Egypt a few years ago, the Edvto Princeps being published in 1892. The other book to which Origen refers is still extant, the Protevangelium Jacobi. It contains the story of Anna and Joachim, the parents of Mary, of her miraculous birth and betrothal to Joseph to be her guardian, he having been designated for this honour, against his will, out of all the widowers of Israel, by the dove which issued from his rod. The names of Joseph's sons are variously given in the MSS as Simon, Samuel, James.

I think that these facts prove that the belief in the Perpetual Virginity, which was growing up during the 2nd cent. and established itself in the 3rd cent., was founded, not upon historic evidence, but simply on sentimental grounds, which may have gained additional strength from opposition to the Ebionites, who denied the miraculous birth of the Lord (Orig. c. Cels. v. 61). Even Basil the Great, who died in A.D. 379, in discussing the meaning of Mt 1<sup>20</sup>, still holds the belief in the Virginity, not as a necessary article of faith, but merely as a pious opinion.* It is unnecessary to give the names of others who held that the 'brethren' were sons of Joseph by a former wife. The chief supporter of this view is Epiphanius, who wrote against the Antidicomarianites about the year A.D. 370. The view of Tertullian was reasserted by Helvidius, Bonosus, and Jovinianus, about the year A.D. 380.

B. Jerome's answer to Helvidius, which fastened on the Western Church the doctrine of the Perpetual Virginity and the interpretation of 'brethren' in the sense of 'cousins', was published about the year A.D. 383. He begins by saying that the Lord's brother with James is one of the Twelve. Otherwise, he says, there would be three disciples called James, but the distinctive epithet minor attached to one of them shows that there could be only two. He then says that James is an apostle in Gal 1<sup>19</sup> 'other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother.' Again, in Mk 6<sup>3</sup> we find a James and James' amongst the brethren of Jesus, and in Mk 15<sup>40</sup> we read that Mary, the mother of James and Joses, was present at the crucifixion; but in Jn 19<sup>25</sup> this Mary (whom, as mother of James, we know to be wife of Alphaeus) is called Mary of Clopas, sister of the Lord's mother. James is therefore the cousin of the Lord; the word brother being used for kinsman. Later writers carried the theory further by identifying Alphaeus and Clopas as double forms of the Aramaic Chalphai, and by identifying 'Judas of James,' who occurs in St. Luke's list of the apostles (Lk 6<sup>16</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), with the writer of the Epistle (who calls himself 'brother of James'), and also with the brother of Joses, James, and Simon, in Mk 6<sup>3</sup>. Simon is further identified with Simon Zelotes, who is joined with James and Judas in the list of the apostles; and some hold that Matthew, being identical with Levi, son of Alphaeus, must belong to the same family. Bp. Lightfoot calls attention to the fact that Jerome does not make no pretence to any support for this view, but that he is himself by no means consistent in holding it. Thus in his comment on the Galatians, written about A.D. 387, he says: 'James was called the Lord's brother on account of his high character, his incomparable faith, and his extraordinary wisdom; the other apostles are also called brothers (Jn 20<sup>17</sup>), but he pre-eminently so, to whom the Lord at His departure had committed the sons of His mother (i.e. the members of the Church at Jerusalem).' In a later work still, the Epistle to Hedibia, written about 406, he speaks of Mary of Cleophas (Clopas) the aunt of our Lord, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, as distinct persons, 'although some contend that the mother of James and Joses was His aunt.'

(1) In the above argument of Jerome it is assumed that the word 'brother' (ἀδελφός) may be used in the sense of cousin (ἀνεψιός, found in Col 4<sup>10</sup>). The supporters of this theory do not offer any parallel from the NT, but they appeal to classical use both in Greek and Latin, and to the OT. The examples cited from classical Greek are merely expressive of warm affection, or else metaphorical, as Plato, Crito, § 16, where the laws of Athens are made to speak of οἱ ἡμέτεροι ἀδελφοὶ οἱ ἐν Αἰδὼν νόμοι. There is no instance in classical Greek, as far as I know, of ἀδελφός being used to denote a cousin. In Latin frater may stand for frater patruelis, where there is no danger of being misunderstood (cf. Cic. ad Att. i. 5. 1). The Heb. word is used loosely to include cousin, as in Gn 14<sup>14-16</sup> (of Abraham and Lot), where the LXX has ἀδελφίδους; in Lv 10<sup>4</sup>, where the first cousins of Aaron are called brethren (ἀδελφοί) of his sons, Nadab and Abihu; in 1 Ch 23<sup>21-22</sup> ('The sons of Mahli, Eleazar and Kish. And Eleazar died, and had no sons, but daughters: and their brethren the sons of Kish took them') where also the LXX has ἀδελφοί. These passages seem to me to be hardly covered by the rule laid down by Bishop Lightfoot (p. 201): 'In an affectionate and earnest appeal intended to move the sympathies of the hearer, a speaker might not unnaturally address a relation or a friend or even a fellow-countryman as his "brother"; and even when such a relation or friend is such to a third person he might use the word of feeling and under certain aspects so designate him.' I think, however, the Bishop is entirely right when he goes on to say: 'It is scarcely conceivable that the cousins of any one should be commonly and indeed exclusively styled his "brothers" by indifferent persons; still less, that one cousin in particular should be singled out and described in this loose way, "James, the Lord's brother." If we remark, too, the care with which the NT uses the term ἀδελφός or St. James and St. Jude, of the Lord, while he keeps the term ἀνεψιός for Symeon, the cousin of the Lord and second bishop of Jerusalem, we shall feel that there is a strong probability against the use of ἀδελφοί in NT to denote anything but brothers.'

(2) Jerome's main argument is that James the Lord's brother was one of the Twelve, and therefore identical with James the son of Alphaeus. He grounds this assertion on a single passage in St. Paul, which I shall presently examine. Bishop Lightfoot and others have shown that it is not a necessary consequence of St. Paul's language, and that it is opposed to the distinction everywhere made in the NT between the brethren of the Lord and the Twelve. Thus in Ac 1<sup>14</sup>, after the list of the Twelve, James the son of Alphaeus, we read, οἱ πάντες συνέstantin instant in prayer ὁν γυναιξιν καὶ Μαρίᾳ τῇ μητρὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ καὶ τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς αὐτοῦ. Again, in Jn 2<sup>12</sup> we read that Jesus went down to Capernaum αὐτοῦ καὶ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ καὶ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐκεῖ ἔμειναν οὐ πολλὰς ἡμέρας; and in Mt 12<sup>46</sup> 'One said to him' Ἰδοὺ ἡ μήτηρ σου καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ σου ἔσθ' ἵνα στήκωσιν ζητοῦντές σοι λαλῆσαι . . . 'and stretching forth his hand to his disciples he saith' Ἰδοὺ ἡ μήτηρ μου καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ μου ὅστις γὰρ ἂν ποιῇ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Πατρὸς μου, τοῦ ἐν οὐρανοῖς, αὐτὸς μοι ἀδελφός καὶ ἀδελφὴ καὶ μήτηρ ἐστίν. In the last passage there is the same strong antithesis between natural earthly ties and His duty to His Father in heaven, which we observe in the words spoken by Him when found as a boy in the temple. Notice also that there is in this passage not only a distinction made between the brethren of Jesus and His disciples, * Hom. in Sanct. Christ. Gen. ii. p. 600, ed. Garn.

VOL. I.—21

but a certain opposition is implied, which is brought out more clearly in St. Mark's narrative of the same event (3<sup>21-35</sup>). From the latter it appears that the reason why they of His family (οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ) desired to speak with Him was because the rumour which had reached them of His incessant labours led them to believe that His mind was overstrained. As St. Mark goes on to say (v.<sup>22</sup>) that the scribes accused Jesus of casting out devils through Beelzebub, and as we further read in St. John (10<sup>20</sup> 8<sup>48</sup>) that many said, 'He hath a devil, and is mad,' it would seem, though it is not expressly stated, that these calumnious reports of His enemies had not been without effect on some members of His own family. At all events, they went out prepared κρατῆσαι αὐτόν, i.e. to put Him under some restraint. This narrative gives additional point to the words in Mk 6<sup>4</sup>, spoken with immediate reference to the unbelief of the people of Nazareth, οὐκ ἔστιν προφήτης ἄνθρωπος εἰ μὴ ἐν τῇ πατρίδι αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς συγγενεῶσιν αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ. If it were simply the disbelief of townspeople not immediately related to Him, there seems no need for the addition 'in his own kinsfolk and in his own house.' This inference, which we naturally draw from the words of St. Mark, is confirmed by the statement of St. John (7<sup>3-5</sup>), οὐδὲ γὰρ οἱ ἐπίστευον εἰς αὐτόν, and by our Lord's words addressed to them (v.<sup>7</sup>), οὐ δύναται ὁ κόσμος μισεῖν ὑμᾶς ἐμὲ δὲ μισεῖ, ὅτι ἐγὼ μαρτυρῶ περὶ αὐτοῦ ὅτι τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ ποιεῖ ἔστιν. Compare this with the words spoken shortly afterwards to the disciples (15<sup>19</sup>), εἰ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἦτε, ὁ κόσμος ἂν τὸ ὕδινον ἐφίλει, ὅτι δὲ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου οὐκ ἔστε, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ ἐξέλεξα ὑμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, διὰ τοῦτο μισεῖ ὑμᾶς ὁ κόσμος

The words on which Jerome lays stress are Gal 1<sup>18, 19</sup> ἀνῆλθον εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα ἰστορῆσαι Κηφᾶν καὶ ἐπέμεινα πρὸς αὐτὸν ἡμέρας δεκάπεντε ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων οὐκ εἶδον, εἰ μὴ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Κυρίου. But even if we give its usual force to εἰ μὴ, it will not follow that St. James was included in the Twelve, for there can be no doubt that in Gal 1<sup>19</sup> ἕτερον looks backward to Κηφᾶν, not forward to Ἰάκωβον. The sentence would have been complete at εἶδον, 'I saw Peter and none other of the apostles.' Then it strikes St. Paul, as an afterthought, that the position of James, as president of the Church at Jerusalem, was not inferior to that of the apostles, and he adds 'unless you reckon James among the apostles.' That the term 'apostle' was not strictly confined to the Twelve appears from another passage in which James is mentioned, 1 Co 15<sup>4-7</sup>. Here it is said that Jesus after His resurrection 'appeared to Cephas, then to the Twelve, then to above five hundred brethren at once, then to James, then to all the apostles,' where we should perhaps consider the term to include the Seventy, according to the view of Irenæus and other early writers. At any rate there can be no doubt as to St. Paul's apostleship. Barnabas also is called an apostle (Ac 14<sup>14</sup>), probably also Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>) and Silvanus (1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>).* The most natural interpretation of the two passages just dealt with is that which concedes the name 'apostle' in the wider sense to St. James, but makes a distinction between him and the Twelve.

(3) Scarcely less strong is the argument against the Hieronymian view drawn from what we read of the relation of the brethren of the Lord to His mother. Though, according to this view, their own mother Mary was living at the time of the crucifixion, and though there is nothing to show that their father was not also living, yet they are never found in the company of their parents or parent, but always with the Virgin. They move with her and her divine Son to form one household there (Jn 2<sup>1</sup> : . . . upon themselves to control and check the actions of Jesus; they go with Mary 'to take him,' when it is feared that His mind is becoming unhinged. They are referred to by the neighbours as members of His family in exactly the same terms as His mother and His reputed father. It is suggested indeed that the Virgin and her sister were both widows at this time, and had agreed to form one household; but this is . . . and is scarcely consistent with the . . . neighbours, who endeavour to satisfy themselves that Jesus was not entitled to speak as He had done, by calling to mind those nearest to Him in blood.

(4) That Mary of Clopas was the sister of Mary the mother of the Lord is not only most improbable in itself (for where do we find two sisters with the same name?), but is not the most natural interpretation of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> εἰστήκεισαν δὲ παρὰ τῷ σταυρῷ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ καὶ Μαρία ἡ Μαγδαληνῇ (translated in the Peshitta, 'His mother and his mother's sister, and Mary of Cleopha and Mary . . .'). If we compare this verse with Mk . . . 27<sup>16</sup>, we find that, of the three women named as present in addition to the mother of Jesus, Mary the mother of James and Joseph occurs in all three lists; 'Mary the mother of James and Joseph' of the two is generally identified with 'Mary of Clopas'; and we then have left in Matthew 'the mother of the sons of Zebedee,' in Mark 'Salome,' and in John 'his mother's sister.' Salome is generally identified with 'the mother of the sons of Zebedee,' and there seems good reason also for identifying her with 'his mother's sister' in the Peshitta Gospel. It does not seem likely that St. John would omit the name of his own mother; and the indirect way in which he describes her is very similar to the way in which he refers to himself as 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.' If we are right in this supposition, it is natural that the two sisters should be paired together, and then the two other Marys, just as we have the apostles arranged in pairs without a common particle in Mt 10<sup>1</sup>. If the sons of Zebedee were so nearly related to our Lord, it helps us to understand Salome's request that they might sit on His right hand and on His left hand in His glory, as well as the commendation by our Lord of His mother to one, who was not only His best-loved disciple, but her own nephew. If, however, this interpretation is correct, if the sister of the Lord's mother is not the mother of James and Joseph, but the mother of the sons of Zebedee, then the foundation-stone of the Hieronymian theory is removed, and the whole fabric topples to the ground.

(5) I take next two minor identifications, that of 'James the Less' with the 'brother of the Lord,' and that of Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, of Lk 6<sup>16</sup> and Ac 1<sup>13</sup>, with Jude the writer of the Epistle, who calls himself 'brother of James.' We have seen that Mary the mother of James τοῦ μικροῦ and of Joseph, in Mk 15<sup>40</sup>, is probably the same as Mary of Clopas, and that we have no reason for inferring from the Gospels that she was related to Jesus. If so, there is an end to the supposition that James the Less is James the brother of the Lord. But it is worth while to notice the mistranslation in which Jerome imagined that he found a further argument for the identification of our James with the son of Alphæus. The comparative minor, he says, suggests two persons, viz. the two apostles of this name. But the Greek has no comparative, simply τοῦ μικροῦ, 'the little,' which no more implies a comparison with only one person than any other descriptive epithet, such as ἐλεγκτής or φιλᾶδελφος. As to Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, no instance is cited for such an omission of the word ἀδελφός, and we must therefore translate 'Judas son of James' with the RV. Independently of this, if James, Judas, and Simon are all sons of Alphæus, what a strange way is this of introducing their names in the list of the apostles, 'James of Alphæus, Simon Zelotes, Judas of James'! Why not speak of all as 'sons of Alphæus,' or of the two latter as 'brothers of James'? Why not speak of all as 'brethren of the Lord'? It is especially strange that, if Judas were really known as such, he should have been . . . n (14<sup>25</sup>) merely by a negative, . . . and in the other . . . 'Lebbæus' or 'Thaddæus' . . .

C. We have still to examine two crucial passages which have to be set aside before we can accept either the Epiphagian or the Hieronymian theory: Mt 1<sup>24</sup> Ἰωσήφ . . . παρέλαβεν τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ καὶ οὐκ ἐγένωσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ ἔτεκεν υἱόν, and Lk 2<sup>7</sup> καὶ ἔτεκεν τὸν υἱόν αὐτῆς τὸν πρωτότοκον. Reading these in connexion with those other passages which speak of the brothers and sisters of Jesus, it is hard to believe that the evangelists meant us to understand, or indeed that it ever entered their heads that the words could be understood to mean, anything other than that these brothers were sons of the mother and the reputed father of the Lord. It has been attempted, however, to prove that we need not read the passages referred to in their ordinary and natural sense. Thus Pearson, treating of the phrase ἕως οὗ, tells us that 'the manner of the Scripture language produceth no such inference' as that, from a limit assigned to a negative, we may imply a subsequent affirmative; and he cites the following instances in proof 'When God said to Jacob, "I will not leave thee until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of" (Gn 28<sup>15</sup>), it followeth not that, when that was done, the God of Jacob left him. When the conclusion of Deuteronomy was written it was said of Moses, "No man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day" (Dt 34<sup>6</sup>), but it were a weak argument to infer from thence that the . . . Moses has been known ever since. . . had delivered a severe prediction unto Saul, he "came no more to see him unto the day of his death" (1 S 15<sup>35</sup>); but it were a strange collection to infer, that he therefore gave him a visit after he was dead. "Michal the daughter of Saul had no child unto the day of her death" (2 S 6<sup>23</sup>); and yet it were a ridiculous stupidity to dream of any midwifery in the grave. Christ promised His presence to the apostles "until the end of the world" (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>); who ever made so unhappy a construction, as to infer from thence that for ever after He would be absent from them?' (Creed, Art. III. Chap. iii. p. 174).

It is difficult to believe that a man of Pearson's ability can have been blind to the difference between two kinds of limit, the mention of one of which suggests, while the mention of the other negatives, the future occurrence of the action spoken of. If we read 'the debate was adjourned till the papers should be in the hands of the members,' it as certainly implies the intention to resume the debate at a subsequent period, as the phrase 'the debate was adjourned till that day six months,' or 'till the Gr. Kalends,' implies the contrary. So when it is said 'to the day of his death' 'to the end of the world,' this is only a more vivid way of saying in sæcula sæculorum. In like manner the phrase 'unto this day' implies that a certain state of things continued up to the very last moment known to the writer: the suggestion is, of course, that it will still continue. The remaining instance is that found in Gn 28<sup>15</sup>.

This is a promise of continued help on the part of God until a certain end is secured. When that end is secured God is no further bound by His promise, however much the patriarch might be justified in looking for further help from his general knowledge of the character and goodness of God. To take now a case similar to that in hand: supposing we read 'Michal had no child till she left David and became the wife of Phaltiel,' we should naturally assume that after that she did have a child. So in Mt 1<sup>24</sup> the limit is not one beyond which the action becomes naturally and . . . ; on the contrary, it is just that . . . under ordinary circumstances the action would become both possible and natural,* when, therefore, the reader, without warning to the contrary, might naturally be expected to assume that it did actually occur. Whether this assumption on the part of the reader, natural under ordinary circumstances, may become unnatural under the very extraordinary circumstances of the case, will be discussed further on. I confine myself here to the argument from language.†

The natural inference drawn from the use of the word πρωτότοκον in Lk 2<sup>7</sup> is that other brothers or sisters were born subsequently; otherwise why should not the word μονογενής have been used as in To 3<sup>18</sup> μονογενής εἰμι τῷ πατρὶ μου, Lk 7<sup>12</sup> 8<sup>42</sup> etc.? In Ro 8<sup>29</sup> the word is used metaphorically, but retains its natural connotation, πρωτότοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, and so in every instance of its occurrence in the NT. It occurs many times in its literal use in the LXX, e.g. Gn 27<sup>19</sup>. 22<sup>43</sup>, Dt 21<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 16<sup>34</sup>, 1 Ch 5<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>10</sup>, but, so far as I have observed, never of an only son. There are also circumstances connected with one remarkable episode in our Lord's childhood which are more easily explicable if we suppose Him not to have been His mother's only son. Is it likely that Mary and Joseph would have been so little solicitous about an only son, and that son the promised Messiah, as to begin their homeward journey after the feast of the Passover at Jerusalem, and to travel for a whole day, without taking the pains to ascertain whether He was in their company or not? If they had several younger children to attend to, we can understand that their first thoughts would have been given to the latter; otherwise is it conceivable that Mary, however complete her confidence in her eldest son, should first have lost Him from her side, and then have allowed so long a time to elapse without an effort to find Him?

D. There are, however, some difficulties which must be grappled with before we can accept the Helvidian theory as satisfactory. (1) If the mother of Jesus had had other sons, would He have commended her to the care of a disciple rather than to that of a brother? (2) Is not the behaviour of the brethren towards Jesus that of elders towards a younger? (3) The theory is opposed to the Church tradition. (4) It is abhorrent to Christian sentiment.

(1) Bishop Lightfoot regards the first objection as fatal to the theory. 'Is it conceivable,' he says, 'that our Lord would thus have snapped * Compare Plat. Qu. conv. viii. 1; Diog. L. iii. 2 (on the vision which appeared to Ariston warning him . . . ἕως οὗ γέννηται till the birth of her son Plato; Origen, . . . 1. 5, refers to this as an arg. ad hom.); Hygin. F. 29, quoted in Wetstein's note, in loco, Athenag. Apol. 33; ὡς γὰρ ὁ νεώτερος αὐτοῦ ἀλλὰ εἰς τὴν τὰ πατέρα αὐτοῦ αὐτὸν ποιεῖν, οὐκ ἐπιστήσαν, καὶ ἥντιν μίτρον ἐπιστήσαν, ἢ πατέρα αὐτοῦ; Const. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. p. 543) calls this a law of nature.

† Laurent remarks on the use of the imperfect ἐγένωσκεν implying abstinence from a habit (refrained from conjugal intercourse) as opposed to the far more usual ἐγένετο denoting a single act.

asunder the most sacred ties of natural affection?' (p. 272). The usual answer to this is that the disbelief of the Lord's brothers would naturally separate them from His mother. But as this disbelief was even then on the point of being changed into undoubting faith; and as the separation (if it ever existed, of which there is no evidence) was, at any rate, to be changed in a day or two into the closest union with all true followers of the Lord; and as the reason for this change must have been long in the eye of Jesus, it seems necessary to find another way of that Bp. Lightfoot goes a little too far when he speaks just below of this hypothesis requiring us to believe that the mother, though 'living in the same city' with her sons, 'and joining with them in a common worship (Ac 1st)', is consigned to the care of a stranger, of whose house she becomes henceforth the inmate. We have seen that there is reason for believing Salome to have been the sister of Mary, and John therefore her nephew; but however this may be, in any case, as her Son's dearest friend, he must have been well known to her. And if we try to picture to ourselves the circumstances of the case, it is not difficult to imagine contingencies which would make it a very natural arrangement. (from 1 Co 9th) that the usual age for marriage among the Jews was about eighteen: supposing them to have been born before the visit to the temple of the child Jesus, they would probably have married before His crucifixion. If, then, all her children were dispersed in their several homes, and if, as we naturally infer, her nephew John was unmarried, and living in a house of his own, is there anything unaccountable in the Lord's mother finding a home with the beloved disciple? Could this be regarded in any way as a slight by her other sons? Must they not have felt that the busy life of a family was not suited for the quiet pondering which now more than ever would characterise their mother? and, further, that this communion between the mother and the disciple was likely to be, not only a source of comfort to both, but also most profitable to the Church at large?

(2) It depends more upon the positive age than the relative age of brothers, whether the interference of a younger with an elder is probable or improbable. When all have reached manhood and have settled in their different spheres, a few years' difference in age does not count for much. It might, however, be thought that those who had grown up with one like Jesus must have felt such love and reverence for Him, that they could never dream of blaming or criticising what He thought best to do. Yet we know that His mother, to whom had been vouchsafed a much fuller revelation than was possible in their case as to the true nature of her Son, did nevertheless on more than one occasion draw upon herself His reproof for ventured interference. If we remember how little even those whom He chose out as His apostles were able to appreciate His aims and methods up to the very end of His life, how different was their idea of the kingdom of heaven and the office of the Messiah from His, we shall not wonder if His younger brothers, with all their admiration for His genius and goodness, were at times puzzled and bewildered at the words that fell from His lips; if they regarded Him as a self-forgetting idealist and enthusiast, wanting in knowledge of the world as it was, and needing the constant care of His more practical friends to provide Him with the ordinary comforts and necessities of life. Thus much, I think, is certain from the known facts of the case; and we need nothing more than this to explain their fear that His mind might be overstrained, and their attempt to dictate the measures He should adopt in going up to the Feast, just as His mother had attempted to dictate to Him at them arriage at Cana.

(3) We have seen that, so far as we can speak of a tradition on this subject, it was in favour of the Epiphanean theory from about the end of the second century till it was unceremoniously driven out of the field by Jerome in the year 383: we have seen, too, that Jerome himself abandoned his own theory in his later years. But it was so much in accordance with the views of the time, that it was adopted by Augustine and the Latin Fathers generally; while in the Eastern Church, Cyprian, who, in his earlier writings, favours the Epiphanean view, comes round to Jerome in the later, and Theodoret may be mentioned on the same side. The later Greek Fathers are, however, almost all on the side of Epiphanius; and the Greek, Syrian, and Coptic Calendars mark the distinction between James the brother of the Lord and James the son of Alphæus by assigning a separate day to each. This distinction is also maintained, apart from any statement as to the exact relationship implied by the term 'brother,' in the Clementine Homilies and the Apostolic Constitutions of the second cent., and the Apostolic Constitutions of the third.

Historical tradition, therefore, on this subject there was properly none when Jerome wrote, any more than there is now, but there was a growing feeling in favour of the perpetual virginity, which took definite shape in the title ἀειπαρθένος used of Mary by Athanasius; and the various traditions were eagerly embraced as a support for this belief.

We cannot doubt that those who were agitating for a stricter rule would make use of the example of the Virgin, insisting on the name as implying a permanent state, and would endeavour to give an artificial strength to their cause by the addition of imaginary circumstances to the simple narrative of the gospel. Thus it was not enough to suppose the brethren of the Lord to be sons of Joseph by a former wife; Joseph's age must be increased so as to make it impossible for him to have had children by his second wife, though this supposition contradicts what the upholders of this view maintain to be the very purpose of Mary's marriage, viz. to screen her from all injurious imputations. How could the marriage effect this, if the husband were above her age, as Epiphanius says, following the Gospels? Again, if this were the case, why should not the evangelist have stated it simply, instead of using the cautionary phrases τὸν ἡ ἀνελθὲν and οὐκ ἐγγινώσκον αὐτὴν ἡς οὐκ ἔτεκεν? But even this was not enough for the ascetic spirit. Further barriers must be raised between the contamination of matrimony and the virgin ideal. Joseph himself becomes a type of virginity: the 'brethren' are no longer his sons, but sons of Clopas, who was either his brother by one tradition, or his wife's sister's husband by another. Mary is made the child of promise and of miracle like Isaac, though not yet exalted to the honours of the Immaculate Conception; and we see Epiphanius already feeling his way to the doctrine of her Assumption, which was accepted by Gregory of Tours in the 6th cent. One other development may be noticed, as it is found in the Proterangelium, c. 20, though not mentioned by Epiphanius, viz. that not only the Conception but the Birth of our Lord was miraculous; in the words of Jeremy Taylor: 'He that came from His grave fast tied with a stone and signature, and into the college of the apostles, the doors being shut . . . came also (as the Church piously believes) into the world so without doing violence to the virginal and pure body of His mother, that He did also leave her virginity entire.* This miracle, superfluous as it is, and directly opposed to the words of St. Luke (2<sup>33</sup>), is yet accepted by Jerome and his followers, and the allegorical method of interpretation is pressed to the utmost in order to gain some support from the OT for the doctrine of the ἀειπαρθενία. Thus we find Pearson (Creed, p. 326) citing, as a proof of it, Ezk 44<sup>2</sup> 'This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut.' It would surely have been more to the point to cite the words of the Messianic psalm (69<sup>8</sup>): 'I have become a stranger to my brethren and an alien unto my mother's children'; this psalm being used to illustrate the earthly life of our Lord, both by St. John: 'The zeal of thy house has eaten me up; they gave me also gall for my meat, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink'; and by St. Luke: 'Let their inheritance be desolate.'

(4) We go on, however, to consider that which has been a real obstacle in the way of a literal interpretation of the Scripture narrative, viz. the objection on the ground of Christian sentiment. It is 'the tendency,' says Dr. Mill (l.c. p. 301), 'of the Christian mystery, God manifest in the flesh, when heartily received, to generate an unwillingness to believe that the womb thus divinely honoured should have given birth to other merely human progeny.' 'The sentiment of veneration for this august vessel of grace which has ever animated Christians . . . could not have been wanting to the holy family of Joseph.' 'On the inner side of the Christian sentiments . . . the truly Christian heart will have pleasure in reposing.' So Epiphanius, Jerome, and other ancient writers speak of this as a 'pious belief,' and the same is reiterated by Hammond and Jeremy Taylor cited by Mill (p. 309). In answer to this I would say: unless we are prepared to admit all the blunders of the medieval Church, we must beware of allowing too much authority to such opinions. Is there any example of such blindness which cannot plead a 'pious belief' in its favour? Of course it is right to be careful of the story, whether sacred or profane, to put ourselves in the position of the actors, to imagine how they must have felt and acted; but this is not quite the same thing as imagining how we ourselves should have felt and acted under their circumstances, until at least we have done our best to understand what differentiates the mind of one person from the mind of another. If we could arrive at the real feeling of Joseph in respect to his wife, and of Mary in respect to her Son before and after His birth, this would be a most important element of the highest importance for the settlement of the question before us; but to assume that they must have felt as a monk, or nun, or celibate priest of the Middle Ages; to assume even, with Dr. Mill, that they fully understood the mystery 'God manifest in the flesh,' is not merely to make an unauthorised assumption, it is to assume what is palpably contrary to fact. Mary and Joseph were religious Jews, espoused to one another, as it is natural to suppose, in the belief prevalent among the Jews that marriage was a duty, and that a special blessing attached to a prolific union. To both it is revealed from heaven that the Messiah should be born of Mary by a miraculous conception. Joseph is told that 'his name is to be called Jesus, because he shall save his people from their sins.'

Mary is told, in addition, that 'he shall be called the Son of the Highest, and that the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever.' There is surely no room for those words which would disclose the Christian mystery 'God manifest in the flesh.' They point to a greater Moses, or David, or Solomon, or Samuel. Mary's hymn of praise is founded on the recollection of Hannah's exultation at the fulfilment of prophecy in the birth of her son. Her mind would naturally turn to other miraculous births, to that of Isaac under the old dispensation, to that now in process in the case of her cousin Elisabeth. And as there was nothing in the announcement made to them which could enable them to realise the astounding truth that He who was to be born of Mary was Very God of Very God, so there is nothing in the subsequent life of Mary which would lead us to believe that she, any more than His apostles, had realised it before His resurrection. On the contrary, it is plain that such a belief fully realised would have made it impossible for her to fulfil, I do not say her duties towards her husband, but her duties towards the Lord Himself during His infancy and childhood. It is hard enough even now to hold together the ideas of the humanity and divinity of Christ without doing violence to either; but to those who knew Him in the flesh we may safely say it was impossible until the Comforter had come and revealed it unto them. As to what should be the relations between the husband and wife after the birth of the promised Child there is one thing we may be sure of, viz. that these would be determined, not by human considerations, but either by immediate revelation, or as the journey to Egypt and other events had been, or, in the absence of this, by the one desire to do what they believed to be best for the bringing up of the Child entrusted to them. We can imagine their feeling it to be a duty to abstain from bringing other children into the world, in order that they might devote themselves more exclusively to the nurture and training of Jesus. On the other hand, the greatest prophets and saints had not been brought up in solitude. Moses, Samuel, and David had had brothers and sisters. It might be God's will that the Messiah should experience in this, as in other things, the common lot of man. Whichever way the Divine guidance might lead them, we may be sure that the response of Mary would be still as before: 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word.' Even if the language of the Gospel had been entirely neutral on this matter, it would surely have been a piece of high presumption on our part to assume that God's providence must always follow the lines suggested by our notions of what is seemly; but when every conceivable barrier has been placed in the way of this interpretation by the frequent mention of brothers of the Lord, living with His mother and in constant attendance upon her; when He is called her firstborn son, and when St. Matthew goes into what we might have been inclined to think almost unnecessary detail in fixing a limit to the separation between husband and wife, — can we characterise it otherwise than as a contumacious setting up of an artificial tradition above the written Word, if we insist upon it that 'brother' must mean, not brother, but either cousin or one who is no blood-relation at all; that 'firstborn' does not imply other children subsequently born; that the limit fixed to separation does not imply subsequent union?

* Chrys. Hom. cxlii. (ap. Suicer, l.c. p. 306): ὁ Χριστὸς προῦλθεν ἐν μήτρῳ καὶ ἄλλους ἱκανοὺς ἐκείνην. This was affirmed in the 79th Canon of the Council of Chalcedon, the end of the 7th cent.

LITERATURE.—Fuller information may be found in Bishop Lightfoot's dissertation on the Brethren of the Lord, admirable alike for thoroughness, clearness, and fairness, which is contained in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, ed. 10, pp.

252-291. It is from him I have borrowed the terms Hieronymian, Epiphonian, Helvidian, to classify the main theories which have been put forward on the subject. He himself held the second theory. The first is advocated by Dr. Mill (Pantheistic Principles, pt. ii. pp. 220-316), and in a less extreme form by Dr. P. Schegg (Jakobus, der Bruder des Herrn. München, 1883). The argument for the third is given in Credner's Einführung, Lauren's Neuest. Studien, Farrar's Early Days of Christianity, ch. xix., the articles 'Maria' and 'Jakobus' in Herzog's Encycl. f. prot. Theol., and the introduction to my Commentary on the Epistle of St. James, from which the present article is chiefly taken.

BRIBERY.—See CRIMES.

BRICK (בִּרְכָּה).—The usual material for building throughout all Eastern countries is mud brick. In rainless Egypt this is a perfect substance for walls, and the great defences of towns and sanctuaries were immensely massive walls of dried mud, up to 80 ft. in thickness. The same was used for arches and domes and for pillars, as in the great hall of 700 pillars of Akhenaten. In Babylonia as wide a use of mud brick is found, walls, ramparts, and zikkurats being entirely made of it, from the earliest Bab. age downward. In Persia, India, China, and Mexico, mud brick is a universal material; it has sheltered far the greater part of the human race, and the use of red or burnt brick is quite an exception in history. In Pal. mud brick was largely used in Amorite times, thick fortifications being made of it. The form was more like the Babylonian, being a square tile, whereas the Egyptians used a brick of our present shape. Throughout the Jewish period, mud brick was generally used, faced with stone jambs and lintels at the doorways, and plastered white all over. Such was the Egyptian method. In Philistia, down to the present time, the villages are of mud-brick houses domed, and the rainfall is absorbed by a thick crop of grass which grows on the roof, and is the pasture ground of the goats.

In the OT there is allusion to burning bricks for the tower of Babel (Gn 11<sup>3</sup>); and such burnt bricks were largely used in Babylonia, owing to the wetness of the soil and climate. They were very rare in Egypt until Roman times, but became general in the age of Constantine.

The brick-making in Egypt was a common occupation for captives, and the celebrated picture at Thebes of the foreign brickmakers, guarded by an Egypt. overseer, is very well known. The black Nile soil of the country is first dug down into a hole already made at any convenient spot near the water; it is then mixed with sufficient sand, if a good quality is desired, and with chopped straw, which is cut up thus by the threshing rollers used at harvest. Water is poured over it, and it is trampled into a smooth paste. Baskets of this paste are then carried out to the moulding ground, a smooth clear space near at hand. The moulder places his wooden mould on the ground, lifts a double handful of the mud, and drops it in, presses it down, and wipes off the surplus; he then lifts the mould frame by its handle, and leaves the brick on the ground to dry; the frame is then placed close to it, and another is moulded, until the ground is covered with bricks in regular rows. These remain for a week or more to dry in the sun, and are then ready for building. From the 18th to 21st dynasties the bricks for government buildings often bear a stamp of the king's name, and sometimes a special stamp naming the particular building for which they were intended. The wooden stamps for this purpose have been found, as well as the moulding frames.

In the celebrated question of the straw (Ex 5<sup>7-19</sup>), which has passed into an English proverb, there is something to be said on the Egypt. side. Straw was not by any means universally used, often plain mud and sand, or mud and pebbles, were used; and it was far more important to get the tale of bricks done than to be too particular about the straw. Next, the chopped straw regularly kept in stock and supplied (the tibn of the present day) is a very valuable cattle food, and the main support of animals during the inundation, as it is more sweet and grassy than Eng. straw. Hence to restrict its use for brick-making, and to require waste material, such as stubble, to be found, was quite customary; and many more bricks are to be seen made with waste than those containing good food tibn. We may note that the taskmasters were the Egypt. overseers, while the officers were Hebrews, chiefs of the gangs, held responsible for the quantity delivered. Considering the well-known character of the Hebrews (Nu 11<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>), we must not take their grievances too seriously. They had at least in Egypt a good and full diet, by their own confession (Nu 11<sup>5</sup>), as good as, or better than, that of the Egypt. peasant of the present day.

BRIDE.—In patriarchal times the bride is commonly chosen, not by the bridegroom, but by his parents or friends, and they do not necessarily consult him. Abraham sends a confidential servant to find a bride for Isaac (Gn 24). Judah takes Tamar as a bride for his son Er (38<sup>5</sup>). Isaac instructs Jacob as to his choice (28<sup>3</sup>). And, in the absence of the father, Hagar takes a wife for Ishmael (21<sup>21</sup>). Where the bridegroom chooses, it is his father who makes the proposal, as in the cases of Shechem (34<sup>4-8</sup>) and Samson (Jg 14<sup>2-10</sup>). Whether the consent of the bride was usually asked, is not clear; Gn 24<sup>38</sup> is not evidence. Perhaps Rebekah was only asked whether she would go at once; it had been previously agreed that she was to go. And these patriarchal customs have not undergone much change in the East: a bride may know nothing of the bridegroom till the wedding.

The bride was commonly paid for; i.e. her father received money or service in return for his consent to part with her (Gn 31<sup>15</sup> 34<sup>12</sup>, 1 S 18<sup>25, 27</sup> etc.). The bride herself received no dowry; and To 7<sup>14</sup> is the earliest mention of a marriage contract, which perhaps was of the nature of a settlement.

Betrothal was much more serious than 'engagement' is with us. Unfaithfulness on the part of the bride during the interval between betrothal and marriage was regarded as adultery, and might be punished with death (Dt 22<sup>23, 24</sup>). She was to be stoned, not strangled; and this makes it probable that the 'woman taken in adultery' was betrothed and not yet married ([Jn] 8<sup>4, 5</sup>). Nothing of the kind is found in Greek or Roman law, according to which betrothal was a mere promise on the part of the bride to marry the bridegroom, and did not create any legal obligation. There was no penalty for breach of promise (Smith, Dict. of Ant. 3rd ed. ii. p. 140a).

The main feature in the marriage ceremony, which was a legal formality rather than a religious rite, was the fetching of the bride from the house of her father to the house of the bridegroom or his father. Among the Greeks the bride prepared herself for the wedding by a bath; and at Athens the water for λουτρὸν νυμφικόν was taken from the fountain Callirrhoe. There is reason for believing that Jewish brides did the like, and that there is allusion to this custom (Ru 3<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>40</sup>, Eph 5<sup>26,27</sup>). If the last reference is correct, the allusion is very striking. At the wedding the bride wore a veil, which entirely covered her, a sash, and a crown. 'Attire' in Jer 2<sup>32</sup> prob. means the bridal sash (cf. Is 3<sup>30</sup> RVm, 49<sup>18</sup>), and kalláh, the Heb. word for bride, is by some connected with the crown.* The bride remained veiled throughout: and thus Jacob did not detect the substitution of Leah for Rachel (Gn 29<sup>20-28</sup>). Embroidery, perfumes, and jewels were usual with those who could afford them (Ps 45<sup>13,14</sup>, Is 49<sup>18</sup> 61<sup>10</sup>, Rev 21<sup>3</sup>).

In mystical language 'the bride' in the OT is Israel, and the bridegroom or husband is J<sup>n</sup>. This image prevails throughout Ps 45, and is found in various passages in the Prophets (Is 54<sup>6</sup> 62<sup>5</sup>, Jer 3<sup>14</sup>, Hos 2<sup>19</sup>). Possibly the Song of Songs was mystically interpreted among the Jews even before it was admitted to the Canon. Hence idolatry on the part of Israel is 'playing the harlot' (Jer 3<sup>1-6,8</sup>), is 'whoredom' (Hos 4<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>), and worthy of death (Ps 73<sup>27</sup>).

In the NT 'the bride' is the Church, and the bridegroom is Christ (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>, Rev 19<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>2,9</sup>, Mt 9<sup>15</sup>, Jn 3<sup>29</sup>); and in the Apoc. the bride is usually the ideal Church, the heavenly Jerusalem. But in Rev 22<sup>17</sup> we have 'the bride' used of 'the Church militant here on earth,' praying to her Lord to return to her. Here again, also, an apostate Church is regarded as a harlot (17<sup>1-5</sup>).

BRIDEGROOM.—Much that might be said under this head has been anticipated in the article BRIDE. To this day in the East the bridegroom has, as a rule, little to do with the ceremony of the bride. Love matches are rare, and in many cases are impossible. In the OT we see that where the son chose his own bride independently of his parents, his relations with the latter were not happy (Gn 26<sup>34,35</sup> 27<sup>46</sup>). Jehoiada the priest chooses wives for the orphan king, Joash (2 Ch 24<sup>2</sup>, comp. 25<sup>18</sup>). The interval between betrothal and marriage might be of any duration, for the espousal of children to one another has always been common in the East; but a year for maidens and a month for widows seems to have been customary.

On the wedding day the bridegroom wore a garland (Ca 3<sup>11</sup>, comp. Is 61<sup>10</sup>), and as the bride, and was often profusely perfumed (Ca 3<sup>3</sup>). Weddings commonly too, were held in the evening; and at the proper time the bridegroom sets out, along with his 'companions' (Jg 14<sup>1</sup>), the 'sons of the bride-chamber' (Mt 22<sup>13</sup>, Lk 5<sup>34</sup>), with lights (2 Es 10<sup>1-2</sup>) and music (1 Mac 9<sup>38</sup>), to fetch the bride. She also is accompanied by companions, maidens, some of whom start with her from her father's house (Ps 45<sup>15</sup>), while others join the bridal party afterwards, all of them provided with lamps (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>). Thus they go to meet the bridegroom, who conducts the whole party to the wedding feast, which might last many days (Jg 14<sup>12</sup>, 2 To 8<sup>19</sup>). The details of the ceremony would vary, esp. as regards magnificence; but there was not of necessity any religious rite. The essential act was the bridegroom's fetching the bride from her home to his. Of the custom of providing wedding garments for guests nothing is known with certainty (Mt 22<sup>11,12</sup>), for Jg 14<sup>13</sup> is not in point; but rich clothing is in the East one of the commonest of presents. A bridegroom was exempt from military service between betrothal and marriage (Dt 20<sup>7</sup>), and for a year after marriage (Dt 24<sup>5</sup>, comp. Lk 14<sup>20</sup>). This points to the conclusion that in the case of adults the time of betrothal did not usually exceed a year.

For the relation of bridegroom to bride as typical of the spiritual relationship between J<sup>n</sup> and Israel, and between Christ and the Church, see the article BRIDE.

A. PLUMMER.

BRIDEGROOM'S FRIEND.—The Jewish custom of having a special 'friend of the bridegroom' (ὁ φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου) is alluded to only once in Scripture (Jn 3<sup>29</sup>), where John the Baptist is contrasted with his own position with that of Christ. Christ is the Bridegroom who is the possessor of the bride, while John is only the Bridegroom's friend, who prepares for the marriage, and has his reward in the joyous expression of the Bridegroom's satisfaction. The importance of the Bridegroom's friend comes to an end when the marriage is over, but that of the Bridegroom continues to increase.

This 'friend of the bridegroom' must not be confounded with 'the sons of the bride-chamber' (οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος), who were very numerous (Mt 9<sup>15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>19</sup>, Lk 5<sup>34</sup>). Indeed any wedding guest might be included in the expression, or even any one who took part in the bridal procession. The 'friend' was somewhat analogous to our 'best man,' but he had far more onerous and delicate duties. Sometimes he took the place of a parent in negotiating the marriage at the outset. He was the chief agency of communication between the betrothed parties in the interval between espousals and marriage. He made the preparations for the wedding, and in some cases presided at the marriage feast. He conducted the married pair to the bridal chamber.

The custom of having groomsmen of this kind seems to have prevailed in Judæa, but not in Galilee. In this, as in other things, the customs of Galilee were more modest and simple. And it is worth noting that at the marriage in Cana of Galilee there is no mention of any Shoshebbheyna or groom-man, a point which confirms the accuracy of the narrative. The 'ruler of the feast' is evidently not the 'friend of the bridegroom,' for he compliments the bridegroom upon the pleasing surprise of excellent wine towards the end of the feast. Had he been the 'friend of the bridegroom,' the arrangements would have been his own, and his remark would have been different. When the Baptist speaks of the 'friend of the Bridegroom,' he is not in Galilee, and being a Judæan his language is in accordance with Judæan customs (see Edersheim, Life and Times of the Messiah, i. pp. 354, 355, and notes 663, 664).

The Talmud frees the 'friends of the bridegroom' and all the 'sons of the bride-chamber' from the duty of dwelling in booths at the Feast of Tabernacles. Almost everything is to give way to the duty of making glad the bridal pair. They are not to be made to fast or mourn; and if in the wedding procession they meet a funeral, it is the funeral that must turn aside.

John the Baptist came to make overtures from the Bridegroom to His people (οἱ ἔθνοι), to prepare them for espousal with Him to present them to Him when any were ready, to point Him out to them (Jn 1<sup>29ff.</sup>). St. Paul claims to hold a similar office in reference to his converts. 'I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I espoused you to one Husband, that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ' (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>). The time until the Second Advent is the interval between betrothal and marriage; and, until the marriage of the Lamb takes place, the apostle feels that he is in a large measure responsible for the conduct of the bride.

BRIDGE.—The word is not found in OT or NT (although LXX of Is 37<sup>25</sup> has καὶ ἔθηκα γέφυραν), occurring only in 2 Mac 12<sup>13</sup> AV, in connexion with the siege of Caspis by Judas. The rarity of the bridge was due to the foll. circumstances: (1) Rivers often served as tribal boundaries and military barriers. (2) Most of the streams were torrents in winter that were apt to sweep away bridges, and in summer were easily forded. (3) The roads on each side were not usually meant for vehicles, but were bridle-paths for such baggage-animals as camels, mules, and donkeys. Recent excavations have proved that at Nippur, in Babylonia, the arch of burnt brick was in use as early as 4000 B.C. (See BABYLONIA, p. 219<sup>b</sup>).

BRIDLE.—See BIT. BRIERS.—See THORNS AND THISTLES.

BRIGANDINE (יִרְמָה širyôn, Jer 46<sup>4</sup> 51<sup>8</sup> AV).—A mail-shirt worn by a brigand, i.e. in its original sense, a light-armed soldier. RV has 'coat of mail.' See BREASTPLATE. W. E. BARNES.

BRIMSTONE (יִרְמָה, širyôn).—Sulphur is one of the most widely distributed of mineral substances. It occurs in combination with various metals, forming sulphurets and sulphates, and in combination with lime, producing gypsum; it is also found in all volcanic countries, often in a pure state and in large masses; as, for example, in Sicily, Italy, Volcano (one of the Lipari Islands), Teneriffe, Iceland, etc. The exhalations of volcanoes include, generally, sulphurous acid and sulphurated hydrogen, two gases which, if moist, readily decompose each other into water and sulphur. In Palestine sulphur is present in most, if not all, of the hot springs which break out along the valley of the Jordan and Dead Sea, while gypseous bands are abundant amongst the deposits which form the terraces of the valley, and were portions of the bed of the Jordan valley lake at a time when the waters of the Dead Sea stood at a level of several hundred feet above its present surface.* On the east side of the present lake there are several hot sulphur springs, the most important of which are the Zerk Ma'in (Callirrhoe) and Wady Ghuweir.† The former, described by Tristram as a maximum temperature of 143° F., to Canon Tristram. On the western side of the Dead Sea there are several sulphur springs, sometimes rising at the margin of the waters, such as those of Shukif, near 'Ain Jidi, and S. of Wady Khuderah, and at Wady Maharat; all these have a high temperature.‡ The Hammâmât near Tiberias are well known, and are still largely used for the cure of rheumatism and other disorders. The temperature as determined by Anderson reaches 143° F.; the waters are highly sulphurous.¶ Next to the above the most important sulphur springs near the Jordan valley are those of the Yarmuk, N. of Umm Keis (Gadara), described by Robinson; ** the temperature reaches 109° F., and the remains of the Roman baths are still standing. There can be no doubt that the high temperature of the springs in the valleys of the Jordan and the Yarmuk is due to the passage of the waters through volcanic late Tertiary periods which still original heat at various depths below the surface; and, as Lartet observes, most of the springs on the east side of the Jordan rise from the fault which ranges along the base of the table-land * (see ARABIA).

Brimstone is, besides in the narrative of Gn 19<sup>24</sup>, repeatedly referred to in connexion with denunciations of the wrath of God on the wicked, whether nations (Dt 29<sup>23</sup>, Is 34<sup>9</sup>) or individuals (Ps 11<sup>6</sup>). The extensive occurrence of sulphur in the depression of the Dead Sea indicates that this substance may have contributed towards the destruction of the Cities of the Plain.

BRING.—There are many obsolete or archaic uses of the verb 'to bring' in AV, of which the following deserve attention. 1. 'Bring on the way,' i.e. to escort, Gn 18<sup>15</sup> 'Abraham went with them, to b. them on the way' (נָשָׂא); Ac 21<sup>5</sup> 'they all brought us on our way . . . till we were out of the city' (προσέμωσα, so Ac 15<sup>3</sup>, Ro 15<sup>24</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>16</sup>). Or 'to bring on one's journey,' Tit 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup> 'that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go' (προσέμωσα, RV 'b. forward on my j.', as 3 Jn 6 AV, RV). Cf. Tournour (1611) 'The skie is dark; we'll bring you o'er the fields.' Similar is the phrase 'to bring by a way,' Is 42<sup>16</sup> 'I will bring the blind by a way that they know not'; and cf. 2 S 7<sup>18</sup> 'thou hast brought me hitherto.' 2. Bring about occurs only twice, and not in the mod. sense of 'cause to happen,' but 'cause to come round' (Heb. נָשָׂא), 1 S 5<sup>10</sup> 'they have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us'; 2 S 3<sup>12</sup> 'to b. about all Israel unto thee.' Cf. Shaks. 3 Henry IV. II. v. 27—

'How many hours bring about the day?'

3. Bring again, in the sense of 'bring back,' is frequent (Heb. mostly נָשָׂא). In Gn 14<sup>18</sup> 'b. back' and 'b. again' are used in turn, showing that the phrases were identical in meaning and different in use, 'And he brought back (נָשָׂא) all the goods, and also his brother Lot.' A favourite expression is 'b. again the captivity,' always of J' ('again' is used with the first person, Jer 30<sup>8</sup> 48<sup>47</sup> 49<sup>38</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>35</sup> 29<sup>14</sup> 39<sup>25</sup>, Jl 3<sup>1</sup>, Am 9<sup>14</sup>; 'back' with the 2nd and 3rd pers., Ps 147<sup>53</sup> 85<sup>7</sup>).† 'Back' is omitted in AV, but introduced by RV, in Ec 3<sup>22</sup> 'who shall b. him to see (RV 'b. him back to see') what shall be after him?' See AGAIN. 4. Bring forth is the tr<sup>a</sup> of a great variety of expressions, the shade of meaning ought not to be overlooked. Notice esp. Is 41<sup>21</sup> 'bring forth your strong reasons,' the only example of the obsol. meaning 'to adduce,' 'express'; cf. More (1532) 'T. . . of S. . . which Helvidius broughte forth for the contrarye.' 5. Bring up. Besides the use of this phrase literally, as 'to bring up out of Egypt,' Gn 46<sup>4</sup> 'I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again'; or 'up to Jerus.' in ref. to its height, 2 S 6<sup>15</sup> 'David . . . brought up the ark of the LORD with shouting,' Ezr 1<sup>11</sup> 'All these did Sheshbazzar bring up, when they of the captivity were brought up from Babylon unto Jerus.'; or to the temple in ref. to its elevated situation, Neh 10<sup>38</sup> 'the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God'; or 'up out of the earth,' 1 S 28<sup>8</sup> 'and he (Saul) said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me up whomsoever I

In the Epistle to the Romans (12<sup>10</sup>) St Paul bids Christians in their brotherly love be φιλάνθρωποι, i.e. love one another with the unforced natural affection of those who really are members of the same family. St. Peter in his first Epistle (1<sup>22</sup>) makes φιλadelphia ἀνδραγαγός, 'undissembled brotherly love,' the very end in view when believers sanctify their souls in obedience to the truth. To receive the divine message in the gospel is to consecrate the soul for a life ruled by love. The writer's own fervid spirit inspires his words when he adds, 'love one another from the heart ardently.' In the second Epistle (1<sup>7</sup>) φιλadelphia and ἀγάπη are combined to complete the garland of Christian virtues. φιλadelphia, the mutual love of Christians, is to be added to εὐσεβεία, since a religion which does not unite its devotees by bonds of reciprocal affection is fatally one-sided; and φιλad. is to be . . . by ἀγάπη, the love of the members . . . hold of faith for each other, by a larger love which excludes none. Wherever there is fellowship of life there must be fellowship of love as well. The tie is as real between man and man as between Christian and Christian, but in the nature of things it cannot be so close. Brotherly love will vary in its manifestations with the varying necessities of human life, but in He 13<sup>1-3</sup> ('Let φιλadelphia continue,' or 'abide') two modes of its manifestation are urged which were specially important in NT times. The first is hospitality. This was the more to be enforced on the Hebrews, because they might be tempted even by surviving . . . to shut their doors on those who . . . brethren in Christ though aliens . . . But its importance as an element in φιλadelphia is shown also by such passages as 1 P 4<sup>8</sup>, Ro 12<sup>13</sup>. The other is assistance to persons enduring persecution for the gospel. The Hebrews are praised (He 6<sup>10</sup> and 10<sup>32</sup>) for what they have already done in this way; and here the duty is finally commended to them by the consideration that they themselves are also 'in the (a) body,' and therefore liable to the same calamities, and possibly soon to need the same consideration. The mutual devotion of Christians to both these forms of brotherly love—hospitality and care of persons enduring persecution for the gospel. De Mor. Persecut. 12. 10. . . .

BROWN is used only in Gn 30<sup>32-33</sup> (J) to describe certain of Laban's sheep (צב, RV 'black'). See COLOURS.

BRUIT.—Jer 10<sup>22</sup> 'the noise of the bruit is come' (רעם RV 'rumour,' Amer. RV 'tidings'); and Nah 3<sup>19</sup> 'all that hear the bruit of thee' (so RV, Amer. RV 'report,' Heb. נשׁע. Both Heb. words from נשׁע to hear). B. occurs also 2 Mac 4<sup>39</sup> 'the b. thereof was spread abroad' (φήμη, RV as AV); 8<sup>7</sup> 'the b. of his manliness was spread everywhere' (λαλιά, RV 'his courage was loudly talked of everywhere'). In all these places b. (which is the fr. bruit from bruire to make a noise, roar) means simply report. The word is pronounced bruite, as indeed it was very often . . .

BRUTE, BRUTISH.—'Brute beasts' (2 P 2<sup>12</sup>, Jude v.<sup>10</sup>) is a more forcible tr. than the 'creatures without reason' of RV, and it is an exact rendering of the Gr. (ἀλογα ζῶα*); for 'brute' is from Lat. brutus heavy, dull, irrational. Cf. Lupton (1580), 'more senselesse than the senselest or brutest beast in the world.' In the Pref. to AV occurs 'Bruit†beasts led with sensuality.' In * Lit. 'senseless animals.' In Ac 25<sup>27</sup> (EV 'unreasonable') ἀλογος is taken by Thayer and others in the sense of 'contrary to reason.'

† 'Bruit' was the spelling of AV ed. 1611 in 2 P 2<sup>12</sup>, but 'brute' in Jude v.<sup>10</sup>

2 P 2<sup>12</sup> Wyclif and Rheims NT have 'unreasonable beasts,' Tindale, Cranmer, Geneva, and AV 'brute beasts'; but in Jude v.<sup>10</sup> while Wyclif and Rheims have 'dumb beasts,' Tindale, Cranmer, and Geneva give 'beasts which are without reason.'

BUCKET.—See under FOOD.

BUCKLE, or rather brooch (πρόπη, fibula), on the same principle as a modern safety-pin, by which the over-garment or wrap (χλαίνα, palla, sagum) was pinned at the shoulder. In the Rom. world presents often took the form of brooches (Plaut. Epud. v. i. 33; Mil. Glor. iv. i. 13), as presents of jewellery are made amongst us. The rewards for valour, distinguished service, etc., in the Rom. army, took sometimes the shape of brooches (Arch. Epigr. Mitth. iii. p. 51), which came to resemble modern epaulettes and served as military decorations. In the Western Provinces of the Rom. Empire golden brooches were common, and have survived to our day in great numbers. In the Oriental Provinces, however, as appears from 1 Mac 10<sup>39</sup> 11<sup>33</sup> 14<sup>44</sup>, only kings or . . . were allowed the use of gold. This . . . of the use of gold (as of purple) is probably a survival of one of the 'royal and priestly' taboos, found all over the world. But, when taken up into the political system of the Empire, it produced a sort of Order of the Buckle, which may be compared with our Order of the Garter, though no myth was invented to account for the origin of the former.

BUCKLER (זָמַח māḡēn).—The buckler was a round shield, small and easily carried, whereas the true shield, Heb. נָחַשׁ zinnah (= θυρεός in Eph 6<sup>16</sup>), was large and oblong, sometimes carried by a bearer (1 S 17<sup>7</sup>), sometimes used as a screen behind which an archer might shoot against the defenders of a wall (Ezk 26<sup>8</sup>, where the tr. should be 'shall set up shields'). Polybius describes the shield as having a double framework of wood fastened together with glue and with a covering on the outer surface, first of linen and then of calf's skin. It had also round the edge, above and below, an iron rim, so that it could meet sword-cuts from above, or again be fixed firmly against the ground without injury (Polyb. vi. 23. Cf. the rest of the passage (a) quoted under ARMOUR).

It was this true shield, just described, which was carried by the legionaries, and to which St. Paul alludes: Eph 6<sup>16</sup> 'the shield of faith.' Cf. Ps 91<sup>4</sup> 'His truth is a shield and a buckler' RV, where, however, 'buckler' should be 'enclosing-shield,' נָחַשׁ soherah, a synonym of zinnah. God's faithfulness meeting man's faith makes man's defence perfect.

BUFFET, a dim. from buff 'a blow' (still existent in blind man's buff), is (1) noun—a blow, as Jn 19<sup>3</sup> Wyc. 'thei gauen to hym buffattis,' and (2) verb=give blows, beat, as Pilgr. Perf. (1526) 259, 'When he was buffeted and beten for vs.' In AV the verb is given as κόλασις, and always as tr. of κολαφίζω (Mt 26<sup>67</sup>, Mk 14<sup>1</sup>, Lk 22<sup>64</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>20</sup>), which means to strike with the fist, a word found only in NT and later eccles. writers. RV gives 'buffet' as tr. also of ἐκπαίδω in 1 Co 9<sup>27</sup> 'I b. my body' (AV 'keep under,' RVm 'bruiſe'). The same word is tr. 'wear out' in Lk 18<sup>5</sup> 'Lest she wear me out by her continual coming' (AV 'weary me,' RVm 'bruiſe me'). It is an extremely forcible word, literally 'to give a blow beneath the eye' (ὤπιον and &ψ), then 'to beat black and blue.' (See Expos.

Times, vol. i. p. 243; and Plummer, Luke in loc.).

BUGEAN.—A descriptive epithet applied to Haman in Ad. Est 12<sup>b</sup> RV (AV has 'Agagite'). Not only in this passage, but in Est 3<sup>d</sup> 8<sup>d</sup> 9<sup>10</sup>, LXX reads βουγαιος for Heb. יג, but everywhere except in the Apocr. book RV retains the AV rendering Agagite. βουγαιος occurs in Homer (Il. xiii. 824, Od. xviii. 79) as a term of reproach='bully' or 'braggart.' Whether the Sept. intended it in this sense, or as a gentile adjective, is wholly uncertain. See AGAGITE, HAMAN. J. A. SELBIE.

BUKKI (בֻּכִּי).—1. Son of Jogli, a prince of the tribe of Dan, and one of the ten men entrusted with the task of dividing the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel (Nu 34<sup>22</sup>). 2. Son of Abishua and father of Uzzi, fifth in descent from Aaron in the line of the high priests through Phinehas (1 Ch 6<sup>5, 11</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>4</sup>). In 1 Es 8<sup>2</sup> he is called Boccas, for which Borith is substituted in 2 Es 1<sup>2</sup>. It is doubtful whether he ever filled the office of high priest, as the statements of Josephus on the point are contradictory (Ant. v. xi. 5, viii. i. 3).

BUKKIAH (בִּקְיָה, full form of Bukki).—A Levite of the sons of Heman, and leader of the sixth band or course in the temple service (1 Ch 25<sup>4, 13</sup>).

BULWARK.—1. (=bole-work, i.e. a defence made of the trunks of trees or of logs of wood) is the tr. of Heb. בִּלְהֵל, 'anjonat' T. 26<sup>1</sup>, בִּלְהֵל חֲמוֹת הַמִּדְבָּר hómōth wā-hēl, 'walls and bulwarks'; reixos kai pēpēreixos, LXX; murus et antemurale, Vulg.). Isaiah (l.c.) gives the biblical promise that God will appoint reixos to Jerusalem, i.e. bulwarks, defined by walls (cf. for this meaning reixos, Ges. Thes. s.v. רֵיכוֹ=Arab. wasā'a) to be Zion's walls and bulwarks (cf. vv. 2-4, open gates and trust in God commended).

The hél (1 K 21<sup>23</sup> 'rampart,' RV) with its ditch (בֹּר bôr, Jer 41<sup>9</sup>) was, as the VSS show, an outer defence for the wall. Jerusalem had such a hél (Ps 48<sup>13</sup>), but only, no doubt, on the side on which the walls, not being on the edge of a precipice, needed extra defence. At the present day there would be room for such a work only on the N. and W. The Psalmist (l.c.), calling it hél, seems to observe that not even the outer ditch of Zion had been touched during the invasion of which he speaks.

2. Bulwarks (Dt 20<sup>20</sup> מִצֻּר māzōr, and Ec 9<sup>14</sup> מִצֻּר māzōd(him)) are also the hasty defences raised by besiegers to protect themselves while attacking fortified places. Such defences were largely made of wood (Dt 12.c.), and so were called 'wooden' bulwarks. The 'bank' (Lk 19<sup>42</sup> מִצֻּר māzōr) 'ade' (RVm) served the double purpose of protecting in the besieged and of defending the besiegers.

BUNAH (בְּנָה, 'intelligence').—A man of Judah, a son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2<sup>25</sup>).

BUNCH is used of (1) a bundle of hyssop, Ex 12<sup>22</sup> (חֶבֶל—something tied together); (2) a cluster of raisins 2 S 16<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ch 12<sup>40</sup> (פֶּסֶח—something dried); and (3) a camel's hump Is 30<sup>6</sup> (נֶחֱשֶׁת, of uncertain origin). The last is the most original meaning of the Eng. word (which is also of uncertain origin): cf. Trevisa (1398), 'A camell of Arabia hath two bunches in the backe'; and—

'This pois'nous hunch-back'd toad.'

BUNNI (בֻּנִי, בֻּנִי), Neh 9<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>15</sup>, but in each case perhaps the text is corrupt; cf. Bertheau-Ryssel. See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

BURDEN.—1. In OT 'burden' is the term used (in AV and RV) to represent the Heb. massā' (fr. ṣāḡ), both in the sense of a load, and in that of an utterance or oracle. In the latter case the rendering is supported by the ancient VSS (except the LXX, which has λήμμα, θραμα, θρασις, etc.). It is determined by the fact that the proper name which it formed the title were mainly of a threatening character, the burden thus being the threats of punishment imposed upon the place or people concerned. But this translation is now abandoned. Some of the prophecies to which this word is applied are not comminatory. Thus, Zec 12 contains a promise of victory to Jerus. through the direct intervention of J<sup>h</sup> on behalf of His people. See also Zec 9<sup>1</sup>, Pr 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup>, the Eng. tr. in the two latter instances reversing their usual procedure, and rendering by prophecy (AV), oracle (RV, in text, and burden in m.). It is not surprising that the massā' should so seldom have been other than denunciatory, when we remember the chief occasions and objects of Heb. prophecy. Jer 23<sup>ss</sup> is intelligible only if we suppose that the prophets were accustomed to apply the word burden to their prophecies in the sense of oracle or utterance. There the scoffers are rebuked because they pervert the word and give it the sense of burden. Massā', therefore, simply means something taken up solemnly upon the lips (cf. Ex 23<sup>1</sup>, Ps 15<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>3</sup>, and the repeated 'took up his parable' used of Balaam in Nu 23), in particular, a divine utterance or oracle. Although used of false oracles (La 2<sup>4</sup>), it is not used of a merely human utterance except in Pr 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> (both doubtful); and even here, if the text is correct, a semi-divine precept is referred to.

2. In NT 'burden' denotes the woes and troubles of this earthly life (φορτίον, Mt 11<sup>30</sup>), the legal ordinances of the Pharisees (φορτία βαρέα, Mt 23<sup>4</sup>), the difficulties in which the Christian may be involved in consequence of his having yielded to temptation (βάρος, Gal 6-), and the load of personal responsibility, or, at all events, the difficulties and trials that are inseparable from the Christian life (φορτίον, Gal 6<sup>9</sup>). The only other passage we need compare with these is He 12<sup>1</sup>, where, instead of burden, we have in AV and RV weight (ὄγκος); the lit. meaning of the word is encumbrance, and connotes whatever prevents men from fully developing their spiritual nature. Various distinctions may be drawn between these words. Thus, βάρος and φορτίον in Gal 6<sup>2-5</sup> mean respectively a burden that may and ought to be got rid of, and one that must be borne (see Lightfoot). Again, ὄγκος suggests not so much weight as cumbrousness. But these distinctions are of no great importance.

J. MILLAR.

BURGLARY.—See CRIMES.

BURIAL in Bible lands followed speedily upon death. Among the Jews of the E. at the present day burial takes place, if possible, within twenty-four hours of death. Mohammedans bury their dead the same day, if death takes place in the morning; but if in the afternoon or at night, not till the following day. Immediate burial was rendered necessary among the Jews of Canaan by the rapidity of decomposition in that climate, requiring survivors, as in the case of Abraham on the death of Sarah, to bury their dead out of their sight (Gn 23<sup>1-4</sup>). The defilement to which contact with a dead body gave occasion (Nu 19<sup>11-14</sup>) was a further reason among the Jews for speedy burial. Lazarus was buried on the day of his death (Jn 11<sup>17, 39</sup>). It was expressly commanded (Dt 21<sup>22, 23</sup>) that the body of a man who had been hanged should not remain all night upon the tree, but should be buried that day; and it may have been a sense of the awfulness of the judgment which had overtaken Ananias and Sapphira that hurried on the undertakers in their case (Ac 5<sup>1-11</sup>). It was in accordance with this provision of the Jewish law (cf. Dt 21<sup>23</sup> with Gal 3<sup>13</sup>), as well as with the dictates of humanity, that Joseph of Arimathæa went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus for burial on the day of the crucifixion (Mt 27<sup>57a</sup>).

Immediately the last breath was drawn, it was the duty of the oldest son, or, failing him, of the nearest relative present, to close the eyes of the dead (Gn 46<sup>4</sup>). The mouth, too, was closed, and the cheekbones bound together (Jn 11<sup>44</sup>). The kiss imprinted upon the lifeless form of the patriarch Jacob by Joseph as he 'fell upon his father's face and wept upon him' (Gn 50<sup>13</sup>), may point to no uniform custom, but only to a natural impulse of affection. At the present day, when a Jew is drawing near his end, it is customary to bring in ten witnesses—an easy thing, as the house is usually full of friends waiting to raise the lamentations which tell that the sufferer has passed away. The death is announced, as it was of old, by a tumult of lamentation and the weeping and wailing of professional mourners (Mk 5<sup>38d</sup>). [See MOURNING.] When death occurs, those who are nearest to the dead take out of the house itself as well as out of the houses of the three nearest neighbours, the belief being that the Angel of Death wipes his sword in these two things. Offerings for the dead seem to have been forbidden under the Mosaic law (Dt 26<sup>14</sup>).

The preparations for burial could scarcely be, in the circumstances, of a very elaborate character. In the case of Ananias (Ac 5<sup>6</sup>), we read that 'the young men wrapped him round, and carried him out and buried him.' What they did was likely this: they unfastened his girdle, and then taking the loose undergarment and the wide cloak which was worn above it, used them as a winding-sheet to cover the corpse from head to foot. But there was usually more ceremony. Combining various allusions which we find in the Gospel and the Acts, we learn that the corpse was washed (Ac 9<sup>37</sup>), anointed with aromatic ointments (Jn 12<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>39</sup>, Mk 16<sup>1</sup>, Lk 24<sup>1</sup>), wound in linen clothes with spices (Jn 19<sup>40</sup>, Mt 27<sup>79</sup>, Mk 15<sup>46</sup>, Lk 23<sup>53</sup>; cf. also To 12<sup>13</sup>, Sir 38<sup>10</sup>), hands and feet being bound with graveclothes and the face bound about with a napkin (Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 20<sup>6, 7</sup>). It would appear that in later times at least there was a confraternity of young men whose duty it was to attend to these proprieties on behalf of the dead (Ac 5<sup>6, 7</sup>). But it was, perhaps, only in cases like those mentioned in the references that they were called upon to act. It was on the loving hands of relatives and friends, and ordinarily of female friends, as in the passages referred to above, that these ministries devolved, among the Jews as among the Greeks. In fact, the practice among the Greeks, both by similarity and by contrast, affords an interesting illustration. One not unfamiliar instance may be cited: Electra believing Orestes to be dead, and his ashes placed in a jar (Sophocles, Electra, 1136-1142).

'Woe is me! These loving hands have not washed or decked thy corpse, nor taken up, as was meet, their sad burden from the flaming pyre. At the hour of thy death, hapless one, thou hast had no one to come to us, a little dust in a narrow urn.' These last words show the point of contrast. Burning of the dead, which was the custom among the Greeks, was no part of Jewish practice. The Rom. historian Tacitus (Hist. v. 5) expressly notices that it was matter of course with the Jews 'to bury rather than to burn.'

The exceptions (if they be exceptions, for the Heb. text is in dispute) were cases of emergency, the burning of the bodies of Saul and his sons by the men of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 31<sup>11-12</sup>), when then they buried their bones under the terebinths at Jabesh, and David had them finally laid to rest in the sepulchre of Kish (2 S 21<sup>12-14</sup>); and the case supposed by the prophet (Am 6<sup>10</sup>) in the desolation which was to come upon Israel, when it may have been on account of pestilence and accompanying infection that burning was preferred. Burning was reserved for the living who had been found guilty of unnatural sins (Lv 20<sup>17</sup>); and Achan and his family after having been stoned to death were burned with fire, and all their belongings (Jos 7<sup>26</sup>). When St. Paul speaks of giving his body to be burned (1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>), he accommodates his language to the Greeks of Corinth, to whom it was familiar, and by whom such be understood. And as the burning practised by the Greeks was no part of ordinary Jewish custom, neither was it practised by the Egyptians, as Joseph (Gn 50<sup>2, 29</sup>) being obviously special. Among the Assyrians the corpse was arrayed for burial in the dress and ornaments and weapons that had been worn during life; and although the allusions are not clear, this may be referred to in certain passages of the Bible (Is 28<sup>14</sup>, Is 14<sup>11</sup>, Ezk 32<sup>7</sup>). Among the Jews and Mohammedans of the present day, the corpse is arrayed in the holiday apparel of former life.

It was a great indignity for a corpse to remain unburied and become food for the beasts of prey (2 S 21<sup>10, 11</sup>, 1 K 13<sup>22</sup> 14<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>24</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>10</sup>, Jer 7<sup>33</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 14<sup>18</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 29<sup>5</sup>, Ps 79<sup>3</sup>, Rev 11<sup>9</sup>), and uncovered blood cried for vengeance (Ezk 24<sup>6, 7</sup>; cf. also Ezk 39<sup>11-16</sup>),—the idea being the same as among other peoples, that the unburied dead would not only inflict trouble upon his family, but bring defilement and a curse upon the whole land. Even malefactors, as we have seen, were allowed the privilege of burial (Dt 21<sup>22, 23</sup>); and the denial of it to the sons of Manasse (2 S 21<sup>10, 11</sup>) the touching story of her self-denying care of the dead (2 S 21<sup>10, 11</sup>). It was an obligation binding upon all to bury the dead found by the way (To 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>8</sup>).

The dead body was carried to the grave upon a bier or litter—Heb. mittah, a bed (2 S 3<sup>31</sup>, cf. Lk 7<sup>14</sup> and 2 K 13<sup>21</sup>). The bier was a simple flat board borne on two or three staves by which the bearers carried it to the grave. Coffins were unknown among the Israelites, as they are among the E. Jews to this day; the coffin in which the embalmed remains of Joseph were preserved being the only one mentioned in Scripture (unless Asa's bed, 2 Ch 16<sup>14</sup>, be another), and being in conformity, not with Jewish but Egypt. usage (Gn 50<sup>26</sup>; cf. Lk 13<sup>30</sup>, Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). A procession of mourners, with professional mourning women leading the way, followed, who made the air resound with their lamentations (Ec 12<sup>5</sup>, Jer 9<sup>17</sup>, Am 5<sup>16</sup>). See MOURNING. A funeral procession among the Jews at the present day always moves swiftly along the road, because there are supposed to be innumerable Shédim, or evil spirits, hovering about, and desirous to attack the soul, which is considered to be in the body until interment takes place and the corpse is covered with earth. When the body is let down, the bier is withdrawn, and a heap of stones is piled over the shallow grave to preserve the dead from the depredations of hyenas and jackals. It was the belief of the Jews that the dead did not cease to be. There was a gathering place of the departed, commonly called Sheol among the Jews, and known also to the Greeks and Babylonians, where a kind of family life was preserved in the under-world. In accordance with that belief, the dead were buried in the sepulchres of their fathers when it was at all possible. Machpelah was the family burying-place of Abraham and Sarah and their descendants and connexions (Gn 25<sup>10</sup> 49<sup>31</sup> 50<sup>13</sup>), although there were notable exceptions—Rachel being buried where she died on the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem (Gn 35<sup>19</sup> R); and Joseph in Shechem, the parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor (Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). Among the Israelites, all who possessed any land, or who could afford it, had their family tombs hewn out of the rock in the hillside, each sepulchre containing many niches for the reception of bodies. Many generations of a family could thus be placed in the ancestral tomb, and countless numbers of such tombs are to be found all over the country. Of this Machpelah is the first example (Gn 23). Joshua was buried in the border of his inheritance at Timnath-serah (Jos 24<sup>30</sup>). Samuel was buried in his house at Ramah (1 S 25<sup>1</sup>). Joab was buried in his own house in the wilderness (1 K 2<sup>24</sup>). In the days of the kingdom special mention is made of the burial of kings. Manasseh, king of Judah, was buried in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza (2 K 21<sup>18</sup>); and of Amon, his son, it is said that he also was buried in his sepulchre in the garden of Uzza (2 K 21<sup>20</sup>). Josiah seems to have been buried in the same tomb as his father and grandfather (2 K 23<sup>30</sup>). At the burial of some of the kings (Asa is singled out by the Chronicler for special notice, 2 Ch 16<sup>14</sup>) there was burning of aromatic wood and fragrant spices (Jer 34<sup>5</sup>); but there were no such customs in the case of popular and wicked persons, from whom Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, is singled out (2 Ch 21<sup>19</sup>). Of Jehoiakim it was said that he should be none to lament (Jer 22<sup>19</sup>), his dead body simply drafted out of sight and left to decay where it lay.

The graves of the dead were variously made. They were sometimes simply dug in the earth, as in this country, and as, in fact, they are among the E. Jews at the present day. Sometimes natural caves or grottoes were used as graves. And often they were hewn out in the rock, and provided, as we have seen, with galleries and chambers. In times of oppression fugitives found shelter in these rocky tombs (Jg 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 13<sup>6</sup>, He 11<sup>38</sup>); and in the time of our Lord, the tombs possessed with demons took up their abode in them (Mk 5<sup>2-3</sup>). The hills and valleys around Jerus. were honeycombed with these rock-hewn sepulchres of the dead. To the mouth of the sepulchral cave a stone was rolled to protect the remains from within from the ravages of wild beasts (Jn 11<sup>44</sup>, Mt 23<sup>2</sup>). Tombs were sometimes very spacious. In Joseph's tomb, where Jesus was laid, there was room for several persons (Mk 16<sup>1-8</sup>). It is quite in accordance with this that we find in a famous passage of Ezk (ch. 32), Sheol represented as a vast burying-place, not of individuals, but of nations. The place of burial in NT times was outside the cities and villages (Lk 7<sup>12</sup>, Jn 11<sup>30</sup>), and the instinct that seeks a quiet grave and the shade of trees for the resting-place of our dead influenced the choice of a burying-place in the earliest times (Gn 23<sup>17</sup> 35<sup>5</sup>, 1 S 31<sup>13</sup>, Jn 19<sup>41</sup>). There was public provision made for the burial of strangers (Mt 27<sup>7</sup>); and there was at Jerus. in the closing days of the monarchy a public burying-ground (Jer 26<sup>38</sup>), probably where it is to this day, between the city wall and the Kidron Valley.

Besides the heaping of stones on ordinary graves for protection, stones and pillars were set up as memorials of the dead (Ezk 39<sup>15</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>17</sup>, where RV reads, 'What monument is that which I see?' and the reference is not to a title or inscription, but to a sepulchral pillar). Jacob set a stone over his grave (Gn 35<sup>20</sup>), and Rachel's tomb is a monument of her pathetic story to this day. On the road from Engedi to Petra, on the crest where the first view of Mount Hor is obtained, is a conspicuous cairn, which we are told marks the burying-place of Aaron. There is no express mention of the Pyramids of Egypt in Scripture, but it is possible that 'the desolate places' said by Job to have been built by kings and counsellors of the earth (Job 3<sup>4</sup>) refer to them. Absalom's grave in the wood of Ephraim had a heap of stones raised over it (2 S 18<sup>17</sup>); but this, as in the case of Achan (Jos 7<sup>26</sup>), was not for honour, but for contumely.

There is no religious service at funerals among the Jews of the E., and there is no indication that there was any in Bible times. There is little in their burial customs to indicate belief in a resurrection; but the belief of a resurrection, as well as of a future life, obtains widely among the Jews in every land. At this hour thousands of Jewish graves on the sides of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, where the Jews have come from all lands to be buried, bear witness to the belief that associates the coming of the Messiah with a blessed resurrection. They hold that Messiah will descend upon the Mt. of Olives, and will pass through these resting-places of the dead as He enters in glory the Holy City.

BURIER, a very old word for grave-digger, is found in Ezk 39<sup>15</sup> 'till the buriers have buried it in the Valley of Hamon-gog,' where it was introduced by the Wyclifite version of 1382. J. HASTINGS.

BURNING.—See BURIAL, CREMATION, CRIMES, SACRIFICE.

BURNING BUSH.—In the account of the call of Moses, given by the prophetic narrative of the Pent. (JE), the Angel of J<sup>n</sup> is represented as appearing to Moses 'in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush,' Ex 3<sup>2-4</sup>. The word for bush in the original (סִמְלָה) is used in this passage and in the reference thereto in Dt 33<sup>16</sup>. Its derivation is unknown, and we have no means of ascertaining what species of shrub is referred to. See BUSH.

The expression used by our Lord in the parallel passages Mk 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 20<sup>37</sup> ἐν τῷ (τῆς) βάτρῳ, illustrates the then current method of referring to passages of the Scriptures, the reference in this case being to the section of the Torah or Pent. in which the incident of the burning bush is related (cf. Ro 11<sup>2</sup> 'in Elias'). Hence the RV rendering: 'in the place concerning the bush.'

BURNT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

BURST, BURSTING.—1. Of the death of Judas it is said (Ac 1<sup>18</sup>) that 'falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst.' The verb τράβ. asunder' (ἀδύω) is always in classical Gr. (this is its only occurrence in NT or LXX) used of making a loud noise, 'to crack'; here it is bursting asunder with noise. 2. In Pr 3<sup>10</sup> 'thy presses shall b. out with new wine' (πῆ, RV 'overflow'), 'b. out' is used 'hyperbolically, as a strong expression for to be exuberantly full,' acc. to Oxf. Eng. Dict., which has found only another example (without 'out')—Homilies (1563) 'thy presses shall b. with new wine.' But cf. the common phrase 'ready to b.' and Sir 19<sup>10</sup> 'If thou hast heard a word, let it die with thee; and be bold, it will not b. thee.' 3. Bursting in Is 30<sup>14</sup>, 'there shall not be found in the b. of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth,' has the obsol. sense 'burst' into fragments' (Heb. ḥāḥāḥ 'up, up, up'; Vulg. de 'up, up'; RV 'among the pieces thereof'). Cf.—

'You will not pay for the glasses you have burst?'

J. HASTINGS.

BUSH (שֶׁנֶה sēneh, βάρος, rubus).—The etymology of this word sheds no light on the kind of bush in which J<sup>n</sup> appeared to Moses (Ex 3<sup>2.3.4</sup>, Dt 33<sup>16</sup>). It undoubtedly refers to a thorny shrub. Gesenius seems to imply that there is a connexion between it and senna. This is, however, not so, as the senna plant is not thorny, and is too insignificant a bush (not more than 2 to 3 ft. high) to have been chosen for the theophany. The translation βάρος, in the LXX, gives the opinion of the scholars of that time in favour of the bramble (Rubus, blackberry). Rubus discolor, W. et Nees, grows everywhere in Pal. and Syria. R. tomentosus, Borkh., grows in Syria and northward; its var. collinus, Boiss., grows along the coast of Pal. and Syria, and in the lower mountains. A bush of this has been planted by the monks of the convent of St. Catherine in Sinai, in the rear of the chapel of the Burning Bush, and testifies to their opinion that this was the bush in question. But Rubus has not been found wild in Sinai, which is south of its range, and climatically unsuited to it.

The following are among the thorny shrubs which grow in Sinai:—Capparis, L.; C. galeata, Fres.; Ochradenus, L.; C.; Zizyphus Spina-Christi, L.; Acacia Nilotica, Del.; A. tortilis, Hayne; A. Seyal, Del. Any one of these shrubs or small specimens of the trees, which often assume a bushlike form, would answer the etymological and other requirements of sēneh. The attempt to establish a connexion between sēneh and sant, the classical Arab. name for Acacia, is not a valid one. It is better to identify it with the Arabic ḥāḥāḥ, meaning a thorn bush, and not attempt to identify it. G. E. POST.

BUSHEL.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BUSYBODY.—To express an individual, 'body' was used early with a tinge of compassion, as Coverdale's tr. of Ps 14<sup>1</sup> 'The foolish bodyes saye in their hertes: Tush, there is no God.' This is the sense the word has in 'busybody,' of which the earliest example is Tindale's tr. (1526) of 1 P 4<sup>15</sup> 'a b. in other men's matters,' which Cranmer, Geneva, and AV retained, but RV has changed into 'meddler' (Gr. ἐπιμελεῖς, an overseer (bishop) of other men's matters: the word is found nowhere else). 'Busybody' is found also in 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup> (Gr. πεπλεγμένος, taken up with trifles; the neut. ῥὰ πεπλεγμένα is used in Ac 19<sup>19</sup>, AV and RV 'curious arts'; Page, 'things better left alone, not meddled with'); and in 2 Th 3<sup>21</sup> (περιεργάζομαι, the verb from πεπλεγμένος). J. HASTINGS.

BUT.—The archaic uses are few: 1. Lk 9<sup>13</sup> 'We have no more but five loaves' (RV 'than'). Cf. T. Beard (1597), 'It was no sooner said but done.' The same Gr. (οὐ πλείον ἢ) is tr'd by 'but' alone in Ac 24<sup>11</sup> 'there are yet but twelve days since I went up' (RV 'not more than'). 2. Nu 22<sup>35</sup> 'Go with the men; but only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak,' a stronger 'only' (עַל, tr simply 'but' in Nu 23<sup>18</sup> 'thou shalt see but the utmost part of them'). 3. Gn 21<sup>26</sup> 'neither yet heard I of it, but to-day.' The mod. expression would be 'until,' but the Heb. (עַד) means 'except.' J. HASTINGS.

BUTLER.—While the modern sense of this word is that of a superior servant in the houses of the wealthy, whose work is to superintend general domestic affairs, its derivation from the French word boutillier, and its original meaning, indicate the special office of offering wines and drinks at the meals of the rich, and during entertainments. It is in this latter sense that it is used in Gn 40<sup>1</sup> and 41<sup>9</sup>, and the Heb. word (מְשַׁכֵּם he who gives to drink) is thus tr. elsewhere cupbearer (Neh 1<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>6</sup>, and 2 Ch 9<sup>4</sup>). (See CUPBEARER.) J. WORTABET.

BUTTER.—See FOOD.

BUZ (בּוּז).—1. The second son of Nahor and Milcah, and nephew of Abraham (Gn 22<sup>21</sup>). Elihu, one of the friends of Job (Job 32<sup>2</sup>), is called a Buzite, and may have belonged to a tribe of that name against which ḥittites are denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 25<sup>20</sup>). Buz, being mentioned along with Dedan and Tema, seems to be located in Arabia Petrea, and it is possible that in early times it had migrated thither from Mesopotamia. 2. A man of the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5<sup>14</sup>).

R. M. BOYD.

BUZI (בּוּזִי).—The father of the prophet Ezekiel (ch. 1<sup>3</sup>), and consequently a member of the priestly house of Zadok. Of the man himself nothing is known. Jewish writers were led to identify him with Jeremiah, partly by a supposed connexion of the name with a verb meaning 'despise,' and partly by a theory that when the father of a prophet is named it is to be understood that he also was a prophet. This view is referred to with approval by David Kimchi: 'In the Jerus. ḥ. ḥ. s called Ezekiel the prophet, the son of Jeremiah the prophet; and Jeremiah is called Buzi, because [the people] despised him' (Comm. ad loc.). J. SKINNER.

BUZITE (בּוּזִי, LXX βουζιτης).—See BUZ.

BY was originally an adverb, meaning near, and became a prep. through a change in the order of words; thus, 'the folk him by stood' (by-stood), 'the folk stood him by,' 'the folk stood by him.'

1. In this orig. sense 'by' is of freq. occurrence; generally in OT as tr. of בְּ, as Neh 4<sup>8</sup> 'Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him'; Pr 8<sup>30</sup> 'When he appointed the foundations of the earth, then I was by him'; Ezk 1<sup>19</sup> 'When the living creatures went, the wheels went by them' (RV 'beside'); or of מִן, as Ezk 43<sup>8</sup> 'their threshold by (מִן) my thresholds, and their post by (מִן) RV 'beside') my posts'; or of עַל, as Gn 35<sup>4</sup> 'the oak which was by Shechem,' 1 K 1<sup>9</sup> 'Adonijah slew sheep... by (עַל) the stone of Zohaleth, which is by (עַל) RV 'beside') En-rogel'; or of עִמּוֹ (עִמּוֹ), as Dt 5<sup>31</sup> 'stand thou here by me.' In NT the Gr. is παρά, as Lk 9<sup>47</sup> 'Jesus... took a child, and set him by him' (παρ' αὐτοῦ, RV 'by his side'); or πρός, as Mk 11<sup>4</sup> 'found the colt tied by the door' (RV 'at'). In this sense 'by' is the frequent accompaniment of certain verbs, as ἔγω, 1st 12<sup>9</sup> 'they which go by'; stand, 1 K 13<sup>24</sup> 'the ass stood by it, the lion also stood by the carcass' (both בְּ); sit, Neh 2<sup>9</sup> 'the queen also sitting by him'; dwell, Neh 4<sup>12</sup> 'the Jews which dwelt by them'; set, Lk 9<sup>47</sup> as above (for 'set by' = esteem, see SET); lay, 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup> 'let every one of you lay by him' (παρ' αὐτοῦ). Evidently of the same meaning also is 'by' in the phrases 'by the sea side' Mt 13<sup>1</sup>; 'by a river side' Ac 16<sup>13</sup>; 'by the highway side' Mk 10<sup>46</sup>; and 'by the way side' Mt 13<sup>4</sup> (all παρά). Then the word 'side' gets dropped, and we have the phrase 'by the way,' very common in Eng. of the 17th cent. and earlier; as Dt 11<sup>30</sup> 'by the way where the sun goeth down' (אֶרֶץ הַמָּוֶל); Lk 10<sup>4</sup> 'salute no man by the way' (κατὰ τῆς ὁδοῦ, RV 'on the way'); Sir 8<sup>15</sup> 'Travel not by the way with a bold fellow' (ἐν ὁδῷ, RV 'in the way'); cf. 2 P 3<sup>1</sup> 'by way of remembrance' (ἐν ἀπομνήσει, RV 'by putting you in remembrance'); and Shaks. Jul. Cæs. II. i. 218—

'Now, good Metellus, go along by him,' where Pope, mistaking the phrase, 'by him' into 'to,' and was followed by other . . . . . In the same drama (III. i. 161) Shaks. puts a play upon the word into the mouth of Antony, who says to Cæsar's murderers—

'No place will please me so, no mean of death,
As here by Cæsar and by you cut off.'

2. In such a phrase as 'go by the way' (e.g. Job 21<sup>29</sup> 'Have ye not asked them that go by the way?') the way is in a sense the means, and this is believed to have led to the extensive use of 'by' as the prep. introducing the means, instrument, or origin. For this purpose 'by' is the tr. of many Heb. and Gr. expressions, and there is no part of the Eng. Bible where we are so liable to be led astray, either by an archaism (of which one notable example will be referred to), or by a mistranslation (of which many examples might be given). The danger is greatest in NT, because of the number and variety of the Gr. preps., and also because these Gr. preps. are often affected by the Hebrew. The Revisers have rendered an incalculable service by their watchful care in translating the preps.; and even when they have not been bold enough to disturb familiar but misleading renderings, they have nearly always indicated the correct tr. in the margin. Thus in Jn 1<sup>8.10</sup> 'All things were made by him,' 'The world was made by him' (AV, RV, but RVm through, Gr. δι' αὐτοῦ); while in He 6<sup>7</sup> 'herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed' (even AVm gives for whom, RV text 'for whose sake', Gr. δι' οὗς). The most important and treacherous archaism is the use of 'by,' which now denotes . . . . . to express the instrument, the agent, the cause, . . . by 'of.' Thus we read, Mt 4<sup>1</sup> 'Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit (ἐν τῷ πνεύματι) into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil' (ἐν τῷ διαβόλῳ); but in v. 4 'Man shall not live by bread alone' (ἐκ ἄρτου); again in 2<sup>22</sup> 'being warned of God in a dream'; but v. 23 'which was spoken by the prophets' (διὰ τῶν προφητῶν, the prophets being the channel of communication, RVm 'through the prophets'). Lightfoot (Fresh Revision of NT, pp. 132 ff.) emphasizes the importance of this distinction, pointing out that it affects the doctrines of Inspiration and the Person of Christ. 'Wherever the sacred writers have occasion to quote or to refer to OT, they invariably apply the prep. διὰ, as denoting instrumentality, to the lawgiver, or the prophet, or the psalmist, while they reserve ἐκ, as signifying the primary motive agency to God himself'; thus Mt 1<sup>22</sup> 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet' (ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, RV 'by the Lord through the prophet'). Again, 'the prep. which is especially applied to the office of the Divine Word is διὰ.' But here we have to deal with not only an archaic meaning of the prep. 'by,' but also with a common use of it in the AV. Thus Jn 1<sup>8.10</sup> 'All things were made by him,' 'The world was made by him' (both δι' αὐτοῦ); v. 7 'that all men through him might believe' (δι' αὐτοῦ), and v. 17 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ). The fact is that about 1611 the word 'by' was losing its special sense of instrumentality, and there are a few clear examples of its employment to express the primary source or agent, as

Mt 22<sup>31</sup> 'have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God?' (ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ) where all the previous versions have 'of God.' (See OF.)

3. 'Two by two,' 'three by three,' means two beside two, three beside three. But in older Eng. these phrases were frequently shortened; thus 1 Co 14<sup>27</sup> 'let it be by two (κατὰ δύο) or at most by three'; Lk 9<sup>14</sup> 'by fifties in a company' (RV 'in companies, about fifty each'); so 1 K 5<sup>14</sup> 'by courses,' 2 K 5<sup>3</sup> 'by companies.' And this idea of nearness is present in certain fig. expressions of time, as 1 S 25<sup>22</sup> 'if I leave of all that pertain to him by the morning light'; Ex 22<sup>30</sup> 'by that (=by the time that the sun goeth down); even in the phrase 'by the space of,' where the meaning is during, as Ac 13<sup>31</sup> 'by (RV 'for') the space of forty years.'

4. As nearness suggests comparison, such expressions as 'set by,' 'set light by' are easily understood. (See SET.) But from this, 'by' came to be used after verbs of thinking, knowing, etc. in the sense of 'about,' as Shaks. All's Well, v. iii. 237—

'By him, and by this woman here, what know you?'

Then this passed into the meaning of against, of which there is a probable* example in 1 Co 4<sup>4</sup> 'I know nothing by myself' (RV 'against myself'). Cf. Foxe, Book of Martyrs: 'Thou hast spoken evil words by the queen . . . 'No man living upon earth can prove any such things by me'; Sander-son, Works, ii. 37, 'Far be it from us to judge men's hearts, or to condemn men for that we know not by them.' J. HASTINGS.

BY AND BY.—In earlier versions 'by and by' is the usual tr. of ἐὸς or εὐθέως, as it then consistently meant immediately. Thus Latimer in one of his sermons says, 'the clapper brake, and we could not get it mended by and by; we must tarry till we can have it done. It shall be mended as shortly as may be.' But about 1611 this meaning was passing away. 'The inveterate pronunciation of men,' says Trench, 'had caused it to designate a remoter term; even as "presently" does not any longer mean "at this present," but "in a little while." So AV retains 'by and by' only in four places. Mt 13<sup>31</sup> (ἐὸς, RV 'straightway'), Lk 1<sup>7</sup> (εὐθέως, RV 'immediately'), 21<sup>9</sup> (εὐθέως, RV 'immediately'), Mk 1<sup>3</sup> (εὐθέως, RV 'forthwith'). J. HASTINGS.

BYWAY.—Only Jg 5<sup>8</sup> 'the travellers walked through byways' (בְּדִלְתֵּי הַדֶּשֶׁת, AVm and RVm 'crooked ways,' which is Coverdale's tr. Moore points out that both words are in Mishnic Heb. used tropically of tortuous conduct; but he believes that here the first word, בְּדִלְתֵּי, is erroneously repeated from the preceding line to the detriment of both the poetical expression and the rhythm; he translates 'those who travelled the roads went by roundabout paths'). In Eng. as in Heb. the word signifies, not a side road merely, but a secret path, a path to take in seeking to escape observation. Thus Spenser, F.Q. I. i. 28—

'That path he kept which beaten was most plaine, Ne ever would to any by-way bend.'

Hence the transition was easy to tortuous conduct, as Coverdale's tr. of Is 57<sup>17</sup> 'he turneth him self, and soloweth ye bywaye of his owne hert.'

RV introduces 'bypaths' in Jer 18<sup>15</sup> (נְתִיבוֹת, AV, 'paths'). J. HASTINGS.

* Probable, for this meaning of 'by,' though never common, is clearly made out; but the Gr. being ἐκ (Vulg. ex) one is not certain that Talmic, whom the others follow, did not miss the word as translated the word as an instrumental dative. The Gen. Bible have 'by and by' in many places in which AV has 'immediately.' Thus Mk 1<sup>31</sup> 'the fever forsoke hir by and by' (Wyc. 'anoon,' Rhem. 'incontinent,' but Cov. and the rest as AV); so 2<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>48</sup>, Jn 6<sup>21</sup>, etc.

C

C.—This symbol is used in critical notes on the Text of OT and NT to indicate the readings of the Codex Ephraemi Syri rescriptus in the National Library at Paris. The MS is assigned to the 5th cent. Tischendorf, on somewhat slender grounds, suggests Egypt as its birthplace. In the 6th cent. the NT was carefully revised by the first corrector (C<sup>1</sup>). In the same or in the succeeding century some changes were introduced in the OT (C<sup>2</sup>). Tischendorf hazards a conjecture that during this period of its history the MS was in Palestine. By the 9th cent., at any rate, it had found its way to the West, and there the NT came into the hands of the second corrector (C<sup>2</sup>) who revised the MS for liturgical use.

In the 12th cent. the MS must have been taken to the Vatican, where separate sheets of vellum sponged with ink were pasted over the original writing, and then a certain number of the sheets used again to receive a Greek translation of some works of Ephraim the Syrian. Hence its description as a codex rescriptus or palimpsest. After the fall of Constantinople in 1453 the MS was taken into Italy, and finally passed into the hands of Catherine de Medici. At her death it became the property of the French Royal Library. Its real value was not recognised at first. It was not till the end of the 16th cent. that the older writing attracted attention. In 1716 Bentley set Wetstein to work at a systematic collation. In 1834 the MS was chemically treated to intensify the ancient writing—on the whole with good effect. Still the task of deciphering the faded letters calls for extraordinary patience and skill; and Tischendorf deserves unstinted praise for the edition that he published (Leipzig 1843 and 1845) as the result of ten months' hard work in the Library at Paris.

The MS contains at present 209 leaves, written in single columns: 64 contain fragments of Job, Proverbs, Eccles., Wis. of Sol., Sirach, and Canticles; 145 contain large portions (not quite two-thirds of the whole) of NT, including fragments from every book except 2 Jn and 2 Th. The Ammonian sections are marked in the margin of the Gospels, and the list of chapters at the beginning of St. Luke and St. John are preserved. There are no indications of chapters in the other books of the NT. Hort has shown that there is reason to believe that Rev was transcribed from a separate exemplar, consisting of about 120 small leaves (Intr. p. 268).

CABBON (כבון), Jos 15<sup>40</sup>.—A town of Judah near Eglon. The name has not been recovered.

CABIN is used once in AV in the obsol. sense of a prison cell, Jer 37<sup>18</sup> 'When Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the cabins' (כבד [all], something vaulted, from כבד to bend; AVm, RV 'cells'). The word is rare in this sense, but in frequent use for a hermit's cell, as Caxton, Chron. Eng. ccliv. 329, 'They put hym in a Cabon and his chapelyne for to shryue hym.' J. HASTINGS.

CÆSAR (Καῖσαρ).—This name was adopted by Octavius, known as Augustus, after the death of Julius Cæsar, and passed on to his successors as the official designation of the Roman emperors, until the third century A.D., when it came to be used for the junior partners in the government, in distinction from the title Augustus, which was reserved for the supreme rulers. No name was ready at hand to describe the unique office of the real autocrat in a nominal republic. While the word 'king' was hated at Rome on account of its associations with the legendary history of the city, and despised by the victorious generals who were familiar with it as the title of the oriental rulers, the fame of Julius Cæsar suggested the use of his name by his heir.

The following Cæsars fall within NT times:—

|                  |                  |
|------------------|------------------|
| Augustus         | B.C. 31—A.D. 14. |
| Tiberius         | A.D. 14—37.      |
| Gaius (Caligula) | 37—41.           |
| Claudius         | 41—54.           |
| Nero             | 54—68.           |
| Galba            | 68—69.           |
| Otho             | 69.              |
| Vitellius        | 69.              |
| Vespasian        | 69—79.           |
| Titus            | 79—81.           |
| Domitian         | 81—96.           |

Four of these are referred to in NT, viz. Augustus (Lk 2<sup>1</sup>), Tiberius (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>), Claudius (Ac 11<sup>28</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>), Nero (Ph 4<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup> 17). Augustus was ruling when Jesus Christ was born, and continued to rule until He was about eighteen years of age; Tiberius was emperor for the remainder of His time of earthly existence, His death and resurrection. When our Lord accepted the title of king (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>), and admitted that He was the Messiah (Mk 8<sup>29</sup> 30, Jn 4<sup>25</sup> 26), He never came into conflict with the political claims of the ruling Cæsar. The Gospel record mentions only one occasion on which He touched on those claims, and on that occasion it was because they had been forced on His notice (Mk 12<sup>14</sup> 17). The coin for which He then called was a denarius with the image and legend of Tiberius upon it (see MONEY), and His judgment was to the effect that the acceptance of this coin by the Jews was a sign that they admitted the Roman rule over them, under which circumstances they were morally bound to render Cæsar his dues, not forgetting the dues of God. In the Fourth Gospel the Jews threaten Pilate with a charge of disloyalty to Cæsar (Tiberius), and describe the claims of Jesus to be a king as amounting to sedition against Cæsar; and the priests, who represent the ancient aristocratic rulers of Israel, expressly declare that they have no king but Cæsar (Jn 19<sup>12</sup>). Caligula is not referred to in the NT. His time coincides with the early ministry of St. Paul. Aquila and Priscilla are stated to have come from Italy to Corinth in consequence of a decree of Claudius (the fourth Cæsar) banishing all Jews from Rome (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>). See CLAUDIUS. Since Nero was in power when St. Paul was arrested at Jerusalem, it was to him that the apostle, as a Roman citizen (Ac 22<sup>27</sup> 28), appealed from the local tribunal at Cæsarea (Ac 25<sup>6</sup> 12). The right of appeal to Cæsar was allowed to citizens, but not to provincials (Pliny, Epis. x. 96 (al. 97); Schurer, HJP i. i. p. 59; Mommsen, Staatsrecht, 3rd ed. pp. 255-257). The Apoc appears to contain frequent obscure allusion to the Cæsars, and especially to Nero, one passage (Rev 17<sup>10</sup>) seeming to point to the first seven emperors, and in such a way as to suggest that the book must have been written under the sixth (Galba).

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD.—This phrase occurs with a mark of emphasis in the salutations sent from St. Paul's friends at Rome to the Church at Philippi, where we read, 'All the saints salute you, especially they that are of Cæsar's household' (μάλιστα δὲ οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας, Ph 4<sup>22</sup>). The domus or familia Cæsaris included the whole imperial household, and extended to the attendants of the emperor in the provinces as well as at Rome. Lightfoot gives a list of some of these, from which it is evident that the phrase contains no indication of the rank of the persons to whom it refers. They may have been courtiers of high position; the execution of Titus Flavius Clemens, a man of consular rank and cousin to the emperor, and the banishment of his wife Flavia Domitilla, the emperor's niece, and her daughter Pontia, by Domitian, for the vague crimes, contemptissimæ inertie (Suet. c. 15), atheism (ἀθεΐας), and inclination to Jewish customs (Dion. Cass. lxvii. 14), have suggested the probable opinion that these people were Christians. Still, more in the time of St. Paul the Christian householders of the imperial household were slaves, or freedmen of humble position. The apostle's association with the soldiers who guarded him may have led to the introduction of the gospel to the palace attendants, although the statement that the prisoners were put under the Prætorian guard (Ac 28<sup>16</sup> AV) is absent from the best MSS. The imperial household must have constituted so large a proportion of the population of Rome that there is nothing surprising in the fact that some of its members came into contact with Christian teachers. The interesting fact is that converts were won from so frightful a circle of dissoluteness as the court of Nero (Suetonius, Nero, 28, 29). The names of a number of the imperial attendants of this period having been recovered from sepulchral monuments among the columbaria in the neighbourhood of the Appian Way, Lightfoot pointed out the coincidence of some of these names with several that occur in the list of salutations in Ro 16, viz. Amplias, Urbanus, Stachys, Apelles, Narcissus, Tryphæna, Tryphosa, Patrobas (Patrobius), Philologus, Julia (Julius). The probability that the last chapter of Ro is really part of an Ep. to the Ephesians deprives these coincidences of their supposed value. Most of the names are not uncommon.

CÆSAREA (Καίσαρεια), Ac 10<sup>1, 24</sup> 21<sup>8</sup> 23<sup>23</sup>. 23.—The city N. of Jaffa, on the seashore, orig. called Strato's Tower, rebuilt by Herod the Great, the capital of Judæa under the Procurators, and where St. Paul was imprisoned. It was famous for its port, which Josephus compares with the Piræus, though the latter was very much larger (Ant. xv. ix. 6). The present ruins include the walls of the ancient city, and within them those of a much smaller town of the twelfth cent., with walls rebuilt in the thirteenth by St. Louis. The cathedral, of which only foundations remain, appears to stand on the site of the temple raised by Herod to Augustus (Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 6; Wars, i. xxi. 7). On the S., outside the mediæval town, are ruins apparently of a large theatre close to the shore. On the E. is a cursus, with a fine black granite, now overthrown. Two aqueducts brought the waters of the Zarka, or Crocodile River, to the city. They are Rom. work, with round arches, running over the swamps, and a tunnel through the cliffs, with rock-cut staircases descending in wells. A few Bosnian colonists have houses in the ruins. Cæsarea was a bishopric from the fourth to the thirteenth cent. A.D., of which the most celebrated bishop was Eusebius. In NT times it had a mixed population, and conflicts between the Jews and their fellow-citizens were frequent. On the outbreak of the great war, the Jewish population was massacred (Jos. Wars, ii. xviii. 1, vii. viii. 7; Schurer, HJP ii. i. 86 f.). It was also the scene of a Moslem massacre when taken by the Crusaders in A.D. 1101. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI (Καίσαρεια ἡ Φιλιππου, 'Cæsarea of Philip').—It was so named to distinguish it from Cæsarea Palestina on the seacoast. It possibly appears in the OT as Baal-gad, but its history for us begins with Herod the Great. (For suggested identification with Dan, see Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 480.)

No spot in Palestine can compare with this in romantic beauty. It stands on a triangular terrace 1150 ft. above sea-level, cut off from Hermon by Wady Khashabeh, and bounded on the S. by Wady Za'areh. Abundant water produces luxuriant vegetation, fertile fields stretch away to westward, while groves of stately poplars, great oaks, and lowlier evergreens surround the place with perennial charm. The fortress Kal'at es-Subeibeh, or Kal'at Banias, crowns the hill behind the village. A position of great antiquity and of enormous strength has always been essential to the eastern meadows. The old city was surrounded by a strong wall, flanked by massive towers, and protected by a ditch on the east. North of the village, in the face of a steep rock, is Magharet Ras en-Nebat, 'Cave of the fountainhead.' 'Very deep and full of still water' in the days of Josephus, the crumbling rock has filled the cavern. The waters rise all along the base of the gravel bank in front, and, gathering together, rush away in arrowy streaks between banks of evergreen, under the arch of an old Roman bridge; then, as becomes 'the descender' (ἡ κατήγ), plunge down a narrow ravine, and, taking the stream from Wady Za'areh, flow on 'to join the bimming river' from Tell el-Kāfi in the plain. West of the spring, on a projecting crag, is a small shrine of El-Khudr, that strange object of Oriental reverence identified with St. George and also with the prophet Elijah. Away to the N.E. rises the mighty bulk of Hermon, culminating in the snowy crest full 8000 ft. above the spring.

Baal-gad—the god of good fortune—gave place to the Grecian Pan. The scene of his worship at the fountain was called the Paneion (τὸ Πανείον, Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3), whence the whole district took the name of Paneas, ἡ Πανείας (Ant. ibid.). Zenodorus dying at Antioch, Augustus gave this region to Herod (B.C. 20), who built here a temple of white marble in honour of his benefactor. Philip, to whom it passed as part of the tetrarchy of Trachonitis, enlarged and beautified the town, and in compliment to the emperor called it Cæsarea, adding 'of Philip,' to distinguish it from his father's town, and also, no doubt, to secure the memory of his own name. Its great and abiding interest, however, is derived from the visit of our Lord, and "event witnessed by these silent hills (Mt 27:33). Agrippa II. called the city Neronias (Ant. xx. ix. 4); and, as is proved from the city's coins, this name, with Cæsarea, survived some time. Paneas, self with Cæsarea, and finally and Paneas takes permanent possession in the Arabic form of Baniās, for the Arabs have no p. Vespasian and his army found refreshment here before their descent on the Sea of Galilee (BJ III. ix. 7). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Titus Cæsar here 'exhibited all sorts of shows,' many of the captives being destroyed by wild beasts, and others forced to slay each other in gladiatorial displays (BJ VII. ii. 1). Later it became the seat of a bishopric in Antioch. Its bishops were present at the Council of Nicæa, A.D. 325; Chalcedon, A.D. 451, etc. In the stormy history of the crusades the town and castle played an important part. Eusebius (bk. vi. 18) mentions a Christian tradition that the woman healed of an issue of blood (Lk 8:43) was a native of Baniās, her house being shown, in the event.

The modern houses, built on the ruins of the old, occupied by Moslems. There are few antiquities. Fragments of broken columns and carved stones, a Roman aqueduct nearly buried in refuse, part of the old walls and castle, and several niches in the rock over the spring, are probably all that remain of the splendours of old Cæsarea Philippi.

CAGE (קָפֶה), Jer 5:27.—The houses of the rich, stuffed with craftily-obtained wealth and articles of luxury, are compared to a cage full of birds. The reference in the previous verse to bird-traps would at first suggest that 'cage' here continues the thought of fowling, but the stress laid on the fullness of the houses points perhaps to a wicker-cage or crate full of pigeons and fowls. This is a common market sight in the East: the crate being literally stuffed, and the birds craning their necks out at every opening to get breath and escape oppression. The meaning of 'cage' is supported by the καράλλος of Sir 11:30, which is the Arab. qaral, 'cage' of the present day.

'Cage' in Rev 18:2 (φύλακη) means 'hold,' i.e. 'prison' (RVm), or the word may have here an accent of mockery, representing the owls and bats as mounting guard over the traditions of the past. No one would think of putting in and hateful birds in a cage or crate unfit for food and too ill-omened for ornament.

G. M. MACKIE.

CAIAPHAS (Καϊάφας), more correctly 'Joseph C.' (cf. 'Joseph called Barsabbas,' Ac 1:23), appointed high priest of the Jews by the Rom. procurator Valerius Gratus (predecessor of Pontius Pilate), and removed by Vitellius A.D. 37 (Jos. Ant. xviii. ii. 2, iv. 3). C. was son-in-law to Annas (Ananus), high priest A.D. 7-14. Some confusion has arisen from Lk 3:2 'in the high priesthood of Annas and C.' and Ac 4:6 'Annas the high priest and C.' (cf. Mk 16:7), as well as Jn 18:19, 22 where 'the high priest' almost certainly designates Annas. (For explanation of this usage of terms see ANNAS, SANHEDRIN.) The chief priests were at this period mostly Sadducees (Ac 4:5-7, cf. Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 3), and in the final conflict with Jesus they played a more prominent part than the Pharisees, as they did also in the subsequent persecution of the apostles. When the popularity of Jesus had received a powerful impulse from the raising of Lazarus, C. was the leading spirit at the council which was held to devise measures to stem the popular current (Jn 11:47-53). His counsel was to put Jesus to death before a tumult of the people should bring down upon the nation the vengeance of the Romans. His action upon this occasion illustrates his characteristic disregard of justice and religion, and shows with what adroitness he could hide self-interest under the cloak of patriotism. But there was a deeper meaning in his words than he was conscious of; and the 'finds in them a prophecy of the atonement' (vv. 51, 52; cf. 1:29, 27:1)—with which may be compared similar unconscious testimonies in Mt 27:25, 37 and Mk 15:31. The policy which C. advocated at this meeting, he was largely instrumental in carrying out. It was in 'the court of the high priest who was called C.' that 'the chief priests and elders' resolved to take Jesus 'by subtlety'—with the help of Judas (Mt 26:3, 4, 14-16); and it was C. that took the leading part in the trial of Jesus at the nocturnal meeting held immediately after the private examination before Annas (Jn 18:24, Mt 26:57-66). The procedure under C.'s presidency was a travesty of justice, and while they 'sought false witness against him,' Jesus kept silence; even when challenged by C. to speak,—till the latter, despairing of establishing any relevant charge by means of witnesses, solemnly adjured Jesus to say whether He was 'the Christ, the Son of God.' At once the unfaltering answer came (although the speaker knew that He would have to seal His testimony with His blood), whereupon C., with an allusion of pious horror, rent his garments, saying, 'He hath spoken blasphemy'... What think ye?—to which 'they answered, He is worthy of death,'—a sentence that was ratified next morning at a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin (Mt 27:1-2; Jn 18:28). After this C. is only once mentioned by name in the NT (Ac 4:6), associated with 'as many as were of the kindred of the high priest' in the trial of Peter and John; but in all probability he is 'the high priest' of Ac 5:17, 21, 27, 7:9, who continues to persecute the Church.

J. A. MCCLYMONT.

CAIN (קַיִן), Firstborn of the first pair (Gn 4:1). As murderer C. marks a further stage in the downward course of the fallen race, while he also foreshadows its material progress. The name, which J derives from the mother's joyful exclamation at the 'acquisition' of a man-child (קָנָה procure), may also have suggested the secondary notion of the man of blood (קַיִן a spear). A tiller of the soil (4:2), C. offered a sacrifice of the produce of the earth (4:3), which, however, was not viewed by God with acceptance (4:5). The ground of the divine disapproval has commonly been sought in the meanness of the offering, or in its comparative worthlessness,—in the latter case, either because he withheld his best, or because of the insufficiency of a sacrifice without blood; but, while the spirit of C. may well be supposed to have expressed itself in delay and nigardiness, the text does not carry us beyond the prophetic idea that the offering, owing to the character and inward disposition of C., could not please God (cf. He 11:4). As to the manner in which God intimated His rejection of the sacrifice, the narrative is also silent, though the analogy of the primitive history suggests various forms of the revelation: the audible voice of God, or the refusal of the offering fire. Wrothful and dejected at the slighting of his gifts, C. is rebuked by God (4:6, 7), who teaches him that joy (forgiveness?) is the reward of well-doing, but the penalty of sin is the temptation to further sin.* The guilt of the sacrifice is aggravated by premeditation in LXX and other versions, where C. is represented as inviting Abel to go with him into the field (48). As the motive of the murder, jealousy is sufficient, without following Jewish scholastics in sup about religion or property. More Adam, C. would conceal his guilt, but is convicted by the voice of the shed blood which cries from the ground (49); and, agreeably to his deeper guilt, the curse which is upon the earth, by which it had been made an instrument of punishment, is further heightened (412). Adam is driven from Eden, Cain from the land of his birth. Afraid for his life, which he feels is in danger, C. is vouchsafed the protection of the threat of a sevenfold vengeance and of a special sign (415). By the sign has been understood a mark of God's approval in confirmation of the promise of a reiterated miracle which in time will deter or terrify an assailant, e.g. a lightning flash, or intermittent signs of leprosy; but the idea rather appears to be that a permanent brand was imprinted, which would be to his kind, to whom by report his crime, and the will of God concerning him, were sufficiently known. It is further related that C. went forth into the land of Nod or Wanderland (416), where, considering the OT social ideals, it is not likely that C. could have found a city, the first city is built by the first murderer (417).

* So substantially the received text and rendering. Many translations, however, translate: 'Is it not so that, whether thou bringest thy offering, or bringest them not, sin lies at the door?—but do violence to the key-word (καὶ) without any clear gain to the sense. LXX reads: οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ δόλος ἀπορρογῆς, ὁ δόλος δὲ καὶ διὰ τὴν ἑσθίαν; καὶ ἡμεῖς—variation got by slightly changing a word in the Heb ('at the door'), but this reading seems to miss the point by discovering the fault in ceremonial irregularity.

The NT allusions to C. (besides He 11<sup>4</sup>; 1 Jn 3<sup>12</sup>, Jude<sup>11</sup>) are very general, referring simply to the spirit of his life as the antithesis to Christian faith and brotherly love. The vindication of C. was undertaken by the Cainites (cf. Epiphanius adv. Hæreses, i. 3, 38), who represented him as possessed of a dignity, power, and enlightenment superior to Abel—a phenomenon which is not without its parallel in modern pleas for the emancipation of the negro from the self-satisfying ethics of Christianity. The many problems raised by the narrative were a fertile theme for the Jewish rabbis. The tradition that C. was slain by an arrow from the bow of Lamech, who mistook him for a wild beast, and thereafter killed his youthful son who had misled him, is a fanciful structure reared by the same hands on the foundation of Lamech's wild song.

The history of C. and Abel belongs in substance to the Jahwistic section of the Pentateuch (J. Dillmann's C), which may be concisely described as a body of tradition edited in the light of prophetic revelation. That the story was not found by the writer in its present setting, but was transferred by him from a later situation to the primeval period, is argued on various grounds—that its distinction of farmer and shepherd, and also of fruit-offerings and animal sacrifices, cannot have been primitive, much less the building of a city, and especially that it assumes the existence on the earth of a widely-distributed population. On the other hand, it must be said that none of the problems are absolutely insoluble, with the pre-suppositions of the history as it lies before us. Possibly, Assyriology may throw more light on the question by discovering fresh points of contact between the OT and the ancient Assyrian traditions. According to Budde, it is on the basis of hints in the genealogical and patriarchal narratives. What remains unexplained by antiquity is the prophetic inspiration manifested in the representation of God's holiness and long-suffering, in the analysis of the guilty heart, and in the knowledge of the rapid diffusion of the principle of sin, and its tendency to steadily increasing heinousness as manifested in outward act.

CALAH (נִינְוֶה).—The name of a city mentioned in Gn 10<sup>11</sup> as having been founded by Nimrod, or by Asshur; for the rendering of the RVm 'Out of that land went forth Asshur,' is by many scholars preferred to that of the RV text, 'Out of that land he (i.e. Nimrod) went forth into Assyria.' C. is here spoken of, together with Nineveh, Rehoboth-ir, and Resen, as having been built, according to Heb. tradition, in the history.

This city of C. was one of the great cities which together formed the huge city of Nineveh. Its ruins were discovered by Layard beneath the mounds which had gone by the name of Nimrod, lying some 20 miles S. of Nineveh-Kouyunjik, and occupying the S. portion of the V-shaped piece of country at the junction of the Tigris and the Greater Zab.

The impression produced by the passage in Genesis is that Nineveh and the adjacent towns were founded at an age long previous to the time of Abraham. But we gather from the cuneiform inscriptions that the real founder of Nineveh was Shalmaneser I. (B.C. 1300), and that he was the builder of C. (Kalhu), the southern suburb of the great Assyrian capital. C., after the death of its founder, seems to have been allowed to fall into neglect until the days of Assur-nazir-pal (c. B.C. 880), who practically rebuilt it. He surrounded it with a massive wall, on the N. side of which alone are the traces of 58 towers. He erected in it beautiful temples and palaces; by a canal he led the water of the Greater Zab into the midst of the city, and adorned its banks with lovely fruit-gardens and vineyards. But the principal building of all seems to have been his own palace (called the N.W. palace), the walls of which were covered with superb bas-reliefs, representing the king engaged in his duties as priest and warrior. The remains of these splendid works of art were carefully excavated under the superintendence of Layard, George Smith, and Rassam; and they present to the visitor of the British Museum the most striking extant memorial of the art and architecture of the ancient Assyrians. To the N.W. palace, the famous 'black obelisk,' containing the memorials of Shalmaneser, and the inscription beginning with the words that have been deciphered as 'tribute of Jehu son of Omri.' This was also the palace and residence of the Tiglath-pileser of whom we read in Scripture. But it was pulled down by Esar-haddon (B.C. 681), who used the materials to erect his own, the S.W. palace; and a fourth smaller building, on the S.E., was begun by Assur-til-ilani, the last but one of the Assyrian kings.

All these buildings were raised upon the huge platform of a gigantic terrace made of bricks and mud with stone, 40 feet above the river bed, at the S.W. angle of the city wall. The old river bed must have flowed close by the W. side of this vast structure, access to which, on the city side, was obtained by steps. The size of the terrace may be appreciated from the fact of the mound measuring 600 yards (N. and S.) by 400 (E. and W.), while the mound at its N.W. corner forms a hill 140 feet high.

After the fall of Nineveh, we hear nothing more of C. in history. The work of exploring its wonderful mounds, and of recovering its treasures, will always be associated with the name of the famous discoverer of the site, Sir H. Layard.

CALEB (כָּלֵב, Χαλβ) is one of the numerous words in OT which are used both as the name of an individual and the eponym of a family or clan. Acc. to the narrative of Nu 13. 14, C. was (alike in JE and P) one of the men sent by Moses to 'spy out' the land; in JE he is the only one of the spies who dissents from the opinion that the Canaanites were too strong to be conquered; and to him alone is exemption granted from the sentence of exclusion from the Promised Land (Nu 14<sup>24</sup>). In P, Joshua is also named as one of the spies; both are equally faithful, and both have praise and promises bestowed upon them (Nu 14<sup>30</sup>). JE's narrative, which is the older, is followed in Dt 1<sup>30-31</sup> and Jos 14<sup>6-14</sup> (where the words 'and concerning thee' [v. 6] seem to be an editorial addition). In the last-named passage, C. at the age of 25 claims from Joshua the fulfilment of the promise of Nu 14<sup>24</sup>, and, in answer to his application, has Hebron and the neighbouring hill-country assigned to him, 'because that he wholly followed the Lord the God of Israel.'

The chief interest of the name C. centres, however, in its use as the eponym of the great family of the Kalibbites (Calabites). The latter name is most probably to be explained as an instance of totemism. The Kalibbites were a dog-tribe (כלב = dog). While the K. became eventually one of the most important constituents of the tribe of Judah, C. is truly represented in 1 S 25<sup>3</sup> (Nabal of the house of C.) 30<sup>14</sup> (the Negeb of C.) as distinct from Judah. On the other hand, the Chronicler traces C.'s descent to the patriarch Judah (1 Ch 2<sup>9, 13ff.</sup> 42<sup>ff.</sup>), and makes Jerahmeel his elder brother. The difference between the original and the ultimate relation of C. to Judah explains these divergent accounts of C.'s descent, which are found in different documents belonging to different periods and dominated by different motives. While, as we have seen, the Chronicler makes him a descendant of Judah, he is called by JE, the Kenizzite (Nu 32<sup>12</sup>, Jos 14<sup>6, 14</sup>), or son of Kenaz, like Othniel his younger brother (Jos 15<sup>17</sup>, Jg 1<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>9, 11</sup>). This Kenaz appears in Gn 36<sup>40, 42</sup> among the tribes of Edom, and in v. 43 as the grandson of Esau. The probable relation of Caleb-ephraiah 1 Ch 2<sup>24</sup>, see GENEALOGY.

Taking all the data together, the course of events was probably something like this. The Kalibbites, separating from the main stock of the Kenizzites, who had their settlements on Mt. Seir, penetrated into the hill-country of S. Canaan as far as Hebron. Their relations with Judah were more or less friendly at the time of the conquest, and ultimately they coalesced with the latter, and came to be reckoned as one of its chief clans. The statements that C. alone spoke hopefully of the prospect of conquering Canaan (Nu 13<sup>30</sup>), and that he afterwards received Hebron as the reward of his faith (Jos 14<sup>14</sup>), may contain a reminiscence of the circumstance that the Kalibbites penetrated into Canaan directly from the S., and before the advent of the tribe of Judah. The name of C. may still survive in the Wady el-Kulab, 10 miles S. of Hebron.

CALF, GOLDEN CALF.—i. The use of the word 'calf' in EV to designate the images of Aaron and Jeroboam is somewhat misleading. The Heb. writers invariably (for Hos 10<sup>1</sup> see below) employ for this purpose the word עֵגֶל 'egel', which, however, like the fem. עֵגְלָה 'eglah', has a wider meaning, 'our calf'. Thus we read of an 'eglah' of three years old (Gn 15<sup>9</sup>), and of another giving milk (Is 7<sup>21</sup>, cf. Hos 10<sup>11</sup>, Jer 50<sup>11</sup> RV). A comparison of Jer 31<sup>18</sup> with Jg 14<sup>18</sup>, where the reference is to a young bull and a young cow respectively, of an age to be broken to the yoke, shows conclusively, apart from considerations drawn from the study of comparative religion, that 'egel' is the appropriate term for a young bull just arrived at maturity. It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose that the use of the word to denote the images in question is due either to contempt on the part of the sacred writers, or to the diminutive size of the images themselves (so most recently Bacon, Triple Trad. of the Exodus, p. 134, who would translate 'little bull'). The feeling of contempt which Hosea undoubtedly entertained towards the bull-worship of his countrymen has usually been detected in the unique fem. עֵגְלִית Hos 10<sup>5</sup> MT. But the MT is here certainly at fault; for not only do the LXX and Pesh. versions preserve the sing. masc. suffix in the rest of the verse עֵגֶל הָאֵלִים, but points to the usual עֵגֶל as the origin. In the LXX the rendering is uniformly μόσχος, except in the books of Kings where the fem. δαμάλις, a heifer, is adopted. The reason for this procedure may perhaps be found in the desire of the translator or translators of this part of the OT to avoid the use of μόσχος, as suggesting to Egyptian readers the sacred bulls of Memphis and Heliopolis. Herodotus and other Greek writers, as is well known, used the latter as μόσχοι, and in the LXX itself the word is applied to Apis (ὁ ἄπις . . . ὁ μόσχος σου Jer 26<sup>15</sup> [MT 46<sup>15</sup>]). The occurrence of the fem. in To 1<sup>5</sup> (τῇ βάαλ τῇ δαμάλει, Cod. B—but Cod. A τῷ μόσχῳ κτλ) is to be explained by the favourite substitution of נֶזֶק for עֵגֶל by Jewish doctors (see esp. Dillm. in Sitzungsber. d. Berl. Akad., June 1881, on 'Baal with a fem. article'—cf. Ro 11<sup>4</sup> and LXX passim).

ii. AARON'S GOLDEN BULL.—One of the most important incidents which Heb. tradition has preserved of the wanderings is that which now occupies the 32nd chap. of Exodus. A very cursory examination is sufficient to show that the narrative in its present form cannot be the product of a single pen. Thus (a) the author of vv. 9-14 cannot be the author of vv. 20-34; (b) v. 34 cannot have been written by the same hand as v. 34; (c) if the chapter is a unity, the evident surprise of Moses in vv. 18, 19 is inexplicable after the explanation in vv. 7-8. Without going further into the details of the analysis—which in this part of Exodus is exceedingly difficult—we may simply remark that the main strand of the narrative is almost certainly from the pen of the Ephraimite historian, E. Additions thereto have been drawn from the other prophetic source, J, not without some modifications from the pen of the redactor of the two narratives. The main point to note is that the historicity of the incident is attested by our oldest sources, and confirmed by the author of Deuteronomy who based his own narrative (Dt 9<sup>7-10</sup>) on these sources, frequently, indeed, using their ipsissima verba (see parallel columns in Driver's Deut. pp. 113, 114). This conclusion does not exclude the possibility that the narrative in receiving its final literary form may have absorbed some reflection of the religious sympathies of the writers (see below).

The following is a résumé of the leading features of the narrative as now presented:—Becoming impatient under the continued absence of their leader, the people prevail on Aaron to make a god (עֲשֵׂה לָנוּ) which should go before them. With the material furnished by the golden ornaments of the women and children 'a molten calf' is made (the details of the process are obscure), before which an altar is built, and to which, as a symbol of J<sup>n</sup>—see esp. v.<sup>5</sup> 'to-morrow is a feast to J<sup>n</sup>'—divine honours are paid. The rest of the chapter tells of J<sup>n</sup>'s anger, of Moses' intercession, of Aaron's truly Oriental attitude towards the destruction of the calf (here again the process is difficult to explain), and of 3000 of its worshippers. The uncertainty which prevails with regard to the reading and rendering of v.<sup>4</sup> (see the Comm. in loc.) renders it impossible to speak positively as to the construction of the image. A comparison of v.<sup>4</sup> with v.<sup>20</sup>, and of both with other passages where similar images and their manufacture are described, such as Dt 7<sup>25</sup>, Is 30<sup>22</sup> 40<sup>19</sup> 44<sup>10</sup> etc., seems to point to a wooden core overlaid with gold (cf. what is said below of the bulls of Jeroboam). If this supposition is correct, the image was no doubt life-size or over, as is suggested both by the amount of gold provided and by the fact that Aaron built an altar before it (v.<sup>6</sup>). Much ingenuity has been expended in endeavour to explain the 'dust' (cf. v.<sup>20</sup>) enumerated in v.<sup>20</sup>. The most probable explanation seems to be that after the core had been charred and burned, the casing of gold (Dt 7<sup>25</sup>, Is 30<sup>22</sup>) was reduced to minute fragments ('dust' Dt 9<sup>21</sup>) by a process of crushing similar to that employed at the present day by the poorer classes in the East in the preparation of cement from broken pottery* (cf. Dn 2<sup>34</sup> 35). As a supreme mark of contempt, the 'dust' thus obtained was cast 'upon the brook that descended out of the mount' (acc. to an interesting detail supplied by Dt 9<sup>21</sup>), and the children of Israel made to drink of it (cf. the analogous procedure, Nu 5<sup>23</sup> 24).

Deferring to a later stage the question as to the origin, Egyptian or other, of this so-called 'calf-worship,' we must, before passing from the incident of Ex 32, refer to the problem, raised by recent criticism, of the original connexion and historical purport of the narrative. The key to the simplest solution of the problem is that furnished by the account in Dt 10<sup>8</sup> of the separation of the tribe of Levi for the exclusive exercise of the priestly office. The introductory phrase 'at that time,' v.<sup>8</sup>, refers, we can hardly doubt, to the incidents recorded in ch. 9. Now, if we keep in mind the fact that the great prophetic history-book, as it lay before the author of Dt, contained much which the final redactor excised to make way for the divergent and ampler details of P, the suggestion seems most reasonable, that Ex 32 in its original connexion formed the introduction to J<sup>n</sup>'s account of the consecration of the tribe of Levi to the priesthood. The priestly, exclusive, in short, was represented in JE as the reward bestowed by J<sup>n</sup> on the sons of Levi for their fidelity to his cause at an all-important crisis in the history of the wanderings. The use of the standing expression for the priestly consecration (אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֹהִים) in Ex 32<sup>20</sup> leaves no doubt as to the nature of the 'blessing' (v.<sup>20</sup>) that was about to be bestowed upon the tribe (cf. also Dt 33<sup>8</sup> where we have probably another reference to the incidents of Ex 32).

While regarding the explanation just given of the main purport of the narrative in its original connexion as the most probable, we would not seek to deny that other motives may also have influenced the early narrators. No Ephraimite writer of the 8th cent. B.C., imbued with the spirit of the prophetic teaching, could have committed to writing the incident of the golden calf without penning, at the same time, an implicit condemnation of the recognised worship of Northern Israel. That the narratives of Ex 32 and 1 K 12<sup>26-28</sup> are not independent of each other is plain from the almost identical words with which the images are introduced (Ex 32<sup>2</sup>, 1 K 12<sup>26</sup>, cf. Neh 9<sup>18</sup>). Indeed it is more than probable that the author of Ex 32<sup>3</sup> deliberately chose the unusual plural construction (עֲשֵׂה לָנוּ) in order to make his covered polemic more pointed.*

iii. THE BULLS OF JEROBOAM I.—The cardinal passage, 1 K 12<sup>26-28</sup> (cf. 2 Ch 11<sup>14</sup> 15), is by every token to be assigned to the Deuteronomic compiler of the book of Kings, who flourished c. B.C. 600 (see Driver, LOT 183; Kittel, op. cit., Eng. tr. ii. 211-212). Whether the compiler is here building on an older written foundation or not, the passage bears the stamp of a genuine tradition. It is perfectly natural and probable that Jeroboam found that, despite the success of his revolution politically, the temple of Solomon, with its numerous priesthood and no doubt imposing ritual, still exercised an irresistible attraction for the worshippers from the Northern Kingdom. Jealously desiring a reaction in favour of the Levitical cult, if such of his pilgrimages were to be of any avail, he took the most effective measures to provide a counter-attraction in a sanctuary or sanctuaries that might retain the more devout of his subjects within his kingdom. While thus maintaining (against Stade, Geschichte, i. 352) the essential accuracy of the compiler's estimate of Jeroboam's principal motive, we would by no means exclude, as a factor in the case, the desire—on the part of the king—to pose as the protector of the ancient sanctuaries and the patron of their priests, to whom Jeroboam may have looked for political support. Indeed it is not improbable that many of the Northern priesthood had already begun to realise that the temple of Solomon must inevitably make for the centralisation of the cultus, and, like the priesthood of Babylonia in the case of Cyrus, they may have been among the first to welcome the new sovereign.

We can also understand the motives that led to the selection of Bethel and Dan as the chief seats of the rival worship. The former recommended itself as having been, from time immemorial (Gn 28<sup>19</sup> 35<sup>6</sup>, Hos 12<sup>4,5</sup>), one of the chief sanctuaries of the land, and it was besides conveniently situated for intercepting the pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem. During the whole period of the existence of the Northern Kingdom, the sanctuary of Bethel continued to be important (see esp. Am 7<sup>13</sup>), and even survived for a century, until finally destroyed during the reformation of Josiah (2 K 23<sup>15-16</sup>). The city of Dan had also from the generation of Joseph been commended as the religious centre of the tribes to the east and west of the sea of Galilee. The new sanctuary, however, did not survive 'the captivity of the land' (Jg 18<sup>90</sup>), at the hand of Tiglath-pileser, B.C. 734 (2 K 15<sup>29</sup>), although Joseph speaks of 'the temple of the golden calf' (שְׁבָטֵי הַבָּנִים), as if its ruins, at least, were still standing in his day (Wars, IV. i. 1).

* This suggestion holds good whether we translate אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֹהִים in the above passages by 'God' or by 'gods.' On the construction of אֵלֶּיךָ with a plur. vb., see Driver, Deut. p. 65; Strack's excursus in his Genesis, pp. 67-68; Baadissin, Stud. z. aram. F. d. bibl. Sprachsch., note pp. 55-57. If we must render 'gods' (as clearly the use of the phrase in 1 K is the older, for as he has pointed out, Hist. of the Heb., Eng. tr. ii. 212) it is only in the case of Jeroboam, and not in the case of Aaron, that the plural 'gods' has any meaning.

With regard to the size and construction of Jeroboam's bulls we have no precise information. As in the case of the image fashioned by Aaron, we may best think of them as consisting of a wooden core overlaid with gold. This view would be considerably strengthened if we could be sure that the obscure word קִבְיִים (Hos 8<sup>9</sup>) has the meaning here which it bears in the Talmud, viz., splinters or shavings of wood (see Wellhausen, Die kleinen Propheten, in loc.).* They were probably of considerable size, and represented a young but full-grown bull. There is no authority for supposing that they were winged, like the bulls of Assyria, or were copies of any 'cherubic emblem,' whether in Solomon's temple (so Farrar, Expositor, viii. [1893]: 'Was there a Golden Calf in Dan?') or elsewhere. We are further expressly informed that Jeroboam 'set the one in Bethel, and the other put he in Dan' (1 K 12<sup>29</sup>). The view recently put forward by Klostermann in his Komm. in loc. (1887), and repeated in his Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. (1896), and supported by Farrar (ut sup.), that both images were set up at Bethel, requires unwarrantable liberties with the text, and is contrary to all the available evidence (cf. Am 8<sup>4</sup>, To 1<sup>6</sup> τῶν μολύβδων . . . ἐν Δάν (8)). On the other hand, it is thought by many recent scholars that the bull symbolism was not confined to the two great sanctuaries already mentioned. Stade, indeed, goes so far as to say that there is evidence in Hosea for the presence of bull-images at all the more important sanctuaries (ZATW, 1883, p. 10). The strongest claim is perhaps for the capital, Samaria (Am 8<sup>4</sup> 'they that swear by the sin of S.'), although it is doubtful whether the city or the country is here intended. If the latter, the reference would be to the image at the chief sanctuary at Bethel. The same form of worship was also, in the opinion of many, practised at Beersheba and Gilgal (Am 4<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>14</sup>, Hos 11<sup>5</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>4</sup> [Heb. 12]).†

The ritual of these northern sanctuaries does not seem to have differed much from that of the great sanctuary of the South (see an exhaustive presentation of the evidence of Amos and Hosea on this point by Oettli in Greifswalder Studien, 'Der Kultus bei Amos u. Hosea,' 1895). The priests, however—derisively named קִבְיִים ('black-carvers') by Hosea (10<sup>6</sup>)—were recruited from all the tribes, not, as in the South, from the tribe of Levi exclusively, which thing was an offence to the historian, writing from the standpoint of the Deuteronomic law (1 K 12<sup>31</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>5</sup>, and cf. 2 Ch 11<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>). Mention is made of various kinds of sacrifice, although not of human sacrifice (as some would interpret Hos 13<sup>2</sup> וְכָרִים וְזָבָח, see the Commentaries). This passage further refers to the practice of kissing the bulls as an act of worship, either by throwing kisses to them (as in Job 31<sup>37</sup>) or by actually kissing the images, as the Moslems do the 'black stone' at Mecca (cf. 1 K 19<sup>18</sup>).

iv. THE ORIGIN OF THE BULL SYMBOLS.—We have deferred to this stage the inquiry as to the origin of this form of religious symbolism. It is needless to occupy space with proof of the absurdity of the opinion so long current in the Church, both Jewish and Christian, that we have here a species of avowed idolatry. Whatever abuses may have crept in at a later period, however gross may have become the conceptions of the people regarding the golden bulls, it is now universally acknowledged that they were originally a sincere attempt to symbolise the true covenant God of Israel. Whence, then, did the Hebrews derive this symbol? How came they to represent the Deity under the form of a young bull? The answer, almost uniformly given from the days of Philo and the early fathers to our own, has been: The Hebrews borrowed this symbolism from the Egyptians. Now, it is indeed a striking coincidence that both Aaron and Jeroboam had intimate relations with Egypt just before they fashioned their respective images. But it is a mistake to speak of Jeroboam as a protégé of Shishak or Sheshonk of Egypt, for this monarch claims to have captured cities from Central as well as from Southern Palestine in the course of the raid referred to in 1 K 14<sup>25ff</sup>. Some of the difficulties in the way of accepting the Egypt. origin of the so-called calf or bull worship are these: (a) The Egyptians worshipped only the living bulls Apis and Mnevis, as incarnations of Osiris and of the Sun-god respectively; (b) it would have been the height of absurdity to speak, as Aaron did, of the golden calf as representing the God that brought the Hebrews up out of Egypt, had the image been a reflection of any Egypt. deity; (c) the historical situation of 1 K 12<sup>28ff</sup> requires that the new symbolism by which Jeroboam hoped to consolidate his kingdom should not be an importation from without, but something genuinely national. For these and other reasons the majority of the more recent writers on this subject prefer to seek the origin of the bull-symbolism in the native religious tendencies of the Hebrews themselves—tendencies which they shared with the other Semitic peoples about them. Among an agricultural people there could be no more natural symbol of strength and vital energy than the young bull. The leaning to this symbolism was, so to say, in the blood, and it was only in the days when the ancestors of the Hebrews were still beyond the flood (Jos 24<sup>2</sup>). This view of the origin of the so-called bull-worship has been: (a) only by such men as Vatke (Bibl. Theol. p. 398), Kuenen (Relig. of Israel, i. passim), and Duhm (Theol. d. Propheten, p. 47), but by more conservative scholars, such as Dillmann (Exodus, 1880, p. 337; Handb. d. AT Theol. 1895, pp. 98-9), and Baudissin, in Germany, and hesitatingly, in our own country, by Robertson (Early Relig. pp. 215-220, where a full discussion of the problem will be found).

v. ATTITUDE OF THE PROPHETS AMOS AND HOSEA TO THE BULL-SYMBOLS.—We cannot bring this article to a close without a brief reference to this topic. However excellent Jeroboam's intentions may have been in the institution of the new form of the national cultus, and however little the contemporary representatives of Jahwism may have found amiss therein, we cannot escape the conclusion that he, unwittingly it may be, sanctioned a declension from the pure teaching of the great prophet and founder of Israel's religion, Jacob to Esau, who was a Bedawi. Both probably drank camel's milk, although this is not necessarily implied in the text. Even if Jacob's descendants applied the law to use camel's flesh to the milk also, Jacob was not under this law.

The skins of camels are used for sandals, and were probably always so used. Camel's hair was spun and woven into cloth (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). Elijah, the forerunner of John, may well have had a similar mantle (1 K 19<sup>13, 19</sup>). The 'rough garment,' AVm 'garment of hair,' RV 'hairy mantle' (Zec 13<sup>4</sup>), may have been of camel's hair or of goat's hair.

The camel is usually mounted, in the kneeling posture (נָחָה). The pack-saddle is usually of the cross-tree form. The load, on level ground, may be as heavy as 600 lbs. or more. In hilly districts, and over the load is lessened. In going up from Ain-Jidi to Jerus. there is a steep part of the road where the cameleers take off their loads and carry them up the rocks on their backs, and lead the camels up and reload them at the top. There are callosities under the camel's breast, his fore and hind knees, and on the sole of his foot. The 'stable for camels' (Ezk 25<sup>6</sup>) is a kneeling place. The signal to kneel is a tap with a stick on the camel's neck; and to rise, a jerk of his halter, with a monosyllabic khiikh. The foot is padded with a thick elastic mass of fibrous tissue, which makes the step noiseless, and protects from the angular flint chips and thorns, over which so much of his way lies. The breadth of the camel's foot prevents him from sinking into the sand. On the other hand, the broad and comparatively smooth surface of the sole makes it very slippery on rocks, or in clayey and muddy places. Camels often have disastrous falls on such roads.

The camel has a provision for storing water in a supplementary cavity in his stomach. This water can be absorbed, or passed into the alimentary canal as needed. Besides this, he has a supply of nourishment in his hump, which is a storehouse of fat, reserved for the long fasts or insufficient provender which are so often his lot. The Arabian camel has one hump, and the Bactrian two. Bactrian camels sometimes appear in N. Syria. Nothing in the way of pasture, however dry or succulent, comes amiss to the camel. He is also fed on cut straw, and kirsenneh, a sort of lentils, horse beans, and sometimes barley. If water is convenient, and he has no access to succulent forage, he will drink every day, or once in two days. The Arabs have a peculiar whoop, 'oowha,' by which they call camels to water. The latter often go a week or more without water. To keep the camel's body from vermin, the Arabs anoint it with tar, the smell of which, with the emanations from the skin, is certainly most unsavoury. They are ill-natured, quarrelsome animals, and in the rutting season often dangerous. The bite of a camel is often quite poisonous, producing death from septicemia. An enraged camel has been known to bite off the top of a man's skull.

(2) bikrê, pl. const. of bêker (Is 60<sup>6</sup>), is rendered in both AV and RV dromedaries. bikrâh (Jer 22<sup>3</sup>) is also rendered dromedary, with the pronoun her following, to indicate that a female is intended. The etymological signification of both, however, is young camel, (so RVm) the first male, and the second female. They correspond both in form and meaning with the Arab. bekr and bekrah. In both, the allusion is to the vigour and swiftness of youth. In the passage in Isaiah there is a climax, 'the multitudes of camels shall cover thee, the young camels (bikrê) of Midian.' It is similar to the climax in the case of Lamech, 'I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt.' Lane says, 'the term bekr=young camel, applied to a camel, corresponds to fata=young man, applied to a human being; and bekrah, a young female camel, to fai=woman. Bekr and fata are more than the general terms jamal=camel, and rayul=man; and bekrah and faiât are more specialised than naqah=female camel, and mar at=woman. And in both pairs of cases the specialised words refer to excellence.' There is nothing in the Heb. original in the above passages, nor in its Arab. equivalent, to indicate that it was the intention of the respective writers to refer to a blooded camel (dromedary), an animal for which the Heb. contains no word. The Arab. has such a word, hajîn, but bekr is not its equivalent, as above shown. Some have supposed that kirkarôth, which is rendered in AV and RV 'swift beasts' (Is 66<sup>20</sup>), means dromedaries (so RVm), deriving it from קר to leap, to the long trot of the dromedary. There may be an additional reason for not identifying bekr and bekrah with the dromedary. It is more probable, however, that we should regard קָרָר as a reduplicated form of קָר kar=leap (Is 31<sup>4</sup> the Arab. hawday). With the LXX rendering σάδζα, and the Vulg. carruca.

Twice the camel, on account of its being the largest animal familiar to all in Bible lands, is used to point a moral. Once, to rebuke the hypocrisy of the Pharisees and scribes, it is said (Mt 23<sup>24</sup> RV), 'Ye blind guides, which strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel.' Again it is said (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>), 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.' The hyperbole here is no more striking than that of the preceding passage. Some, claiming a knowledge of the E. from birth or long residence, have said that this latter custom of stripping the great gate of a city was closed for the night, so that it could no longer enter in the usual way—of its load, and pulling or pushing the small gate which is made in the larger one. They have alleged that the force of the comparison is to be sought in the fact that a rich man must be stripped of his wealth to enable him to squeeze through the narrow gate of heaven, as the camel is stripped of his load that he may be forced through the panel gate of the city. Some have even gone so far as to say that this small gate is known in the E. by the name of the 'needle's eye.' In reply, we would say—(1) That this small gate is known by the name khaukhah, but no one of the many whom we have asked ever heard the name needle's eye applied to it. We believe this to be a fabrication. (2) No camel could be forced through the khaukhah. It is a gate from 3 to 4 feet in height, and from 18 inches to 2 feet in breadth, and its bottom is from 1 to 2 feet above the ground, and by no possibility could a camel be forced through it. (3) Could we suppose a khaukhah so exceptionally large that a camel could be forced through it, the hyperbole would be quite lost.

CAMEL'S HAIR (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>).—The cloth made of camel's hair is of blanket-like texture, softer than the black sack-cloth of goat's hair. In colour it varies from cream to cinnamon and darker brown, so that by means of this variety a pattern is sometimes introduced to relieve slightly the general dinginess of tone. The large enveloping garment, with its plain belt of leather, which John the Baptist wore, was the common and inconspicuous dress of the desert: it was a sufficient covering by day and night, and doubtless he had come to prefer it. It was the harmonious vesture of the prophet when he delivered his message of protest and such simplicity of personal life is a constant accompaniment of any voice crying against social luxury and ecclesiastical pride. See CAMEL. G. M. MACKIE.

CAMP is the usual rendering of the Heb. מַחֲנֶה mahāneh, tr<sup>d</sup> in LXX παρεμβολή. In 2 K 6<sup>3</sup> it represents מַחֲנֶה tahānah, on which see Oxf. Heb. Lex.

A camp was a collection of tents (Jg 7<sup>13</sup>), or of huts or booths (1 K 20<sup>12</sup> RVm, Neh 8<sup>14</sup>). Camps, when large, were pitched in the convenience (Jg 6<sup>34</sup>); when small, on hills (Jg 4<sup>12</sup>).

In either case it was necessary to choose a spot within reach of water; thus the army of the Northern Confederacy pitched 'at the waters of Merom' (Jos 11<sup>5</sup>), Gideon encamped 'beside the spring of Harod' (Jg 7<sup>1</sup>), Jonathan the Maccabee 'by the water of the pool Asphar' (1 Mac 9<sup>34</sup>).

For defence a position of natural strength was generally chosen, e.g. the side of a ravine or valley (cp. 1 S 14<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>). A further defence was perhaps provided by the מַגָּל ma'gal (1 S 17<sup>20</sup> 26<sup>7</sup> 'barricade' RVm). The meaning of the word is, however, not certain (see CARRIAGE). Most authorities take it to mean a laager, i.e. a line of wagons arranged as a barricade, מַגָּל agālāh being 'a wagon.' In 1 S 17<sup>20</sup> the LXX (A) and Aquila give στρογγύλωσις, which probably means either a circular line of defence or a circular camp; * Syr. has ܡܥܠܐ 'circle,' while Targ. gives as equivalent a ܡܥܠܐ the Gr. word χαράκωμα, 'palisade.' In 1 S 26<sup>7</sup> LXX (AB) gives καμμένη, a 'covered chariot' or 'litter.'

As a precaution against surprise, a watch was set when danger threatened (Jg 7<sup>19</sup>; cp. Jg 8<sup>11</sup>); but camps were usually too strongly entrenched to be openly attacked (cf. 1 S 17<sup>1-2</sup> 18<sup>4</sup> forty days delay on both sides, and 1 K 20<sup>20</sup> seven days delay).

In Nu 2 (P) a detailed account is given of the arrangement of the camp of Israel in the wilderness, the principle being that each tribe was grouped round a standard which had a fixed position with regard to the Tabernacle at all halts.

In the NT the stationary Roman camp (ἡ παρεμβολή) at Jerusalem is mentioned several times as 'the castle' (Ac 21<sup>34</sup>, etc.). In He 13<sup>11, 12</sup> the name 'camp' is applied to the Jewish Church of the writer's own day by an easy adaptation of the language of the Hexateuch. In Rev 20<sup>9</sup>, by a further adaptation, the term 'camp of the saints' is fitly applied to the Christian Church, in that it suggests the three thoughts of organisation, warfare, and pilgrimage. W. E. BARNES.

CAMP as a verb (mod. 'encamp') is found Ex 19<sup>2</sup>, Is 29<sup>8</sup>, Jer 50<sup>29</sup>, Nah 3<sup>17</sup> (Heb. מָצַב, Amer. RV 'encamp'), and 1 Mac 10<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>13</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>, 2 Mac 13<sup>14</sup> 'he camped by Modin' (RV 'pitched his camp').

CAMPFIRE, עֵץ קִיפּוּר, κίπρος, cyprus (Ca 1<sup>4</sup>), and plur. לִפְתֵּי הַקִּיפּוּרִים (Ca 4<sup>13</sup>).—The henna plant, Lawsonia alba, L., is a shrub from 6 to 10 feet high, with opposite branches, often becoming spinescent, opposite, oblanceolate to obovate leaves, and panicles of cream-coloured flowers. The Orientals are extremely fond of the odour of the henna, which to most Occidentals is heavy, mawkish, and rather stifling. They frequently put a sprig of it into their nosegays, and the women often put it in their hair, to make themselves attractive. Sonnini says that they put it in their bosoms for a similar reason, which illustrates the comparison of Ca 1<sup>13, 14</sup>. For its fragrance it was cultivated with spikenard and frankincense and myrrh (Ca 4<sup>13, 14</sup>).

Henna is also extensively used in the east to stain the hands, feet, and hair. The hands and feet are stained in lines or diamonds or other figures, by passing strips of cotton cloth around them in such a way as to leave the lines or figures desired uncovered. A paste made of the powdered leaves of the henna and a little water is applied to the skin in the interstices of the bandage, and the hands tied up in a rag over night. When the paste is washed off, an ochreous red stain is left on the parts, while the white skin occupies the spaces which were covered by the bandages. If desired, this colour can be made a deep blackish-brown by applying a mixture of lime and hartshorn over the stain left by the henna paste. Often the nails are thus blackened, while the figures on the hands and feet are left red. Brides, especially among the Moslems, are elaborately adorned in this way, as also infants and young girls. Old women often dye the hair with henna. It is sometimes used to treat cases of inflammation, with an idea that the congestion.

CANA (Κανά τῆς Γαλιλαίας, 'Cana of Galilee').—This was the native place of the disciple Nathanae (Jn 21<sup>2</sup>), the scene of the first miracle (Jn 21<sup>21</sup>), where also the nobleman from Capernaum secured the healing of his son (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>). From these passages, where alone the place is mentioned in the Scriptures, we learn, regarding the site, only that it was in Galilee, on the north-west coast of Capernaum. Jesus went down to Cana of Galilee (Jn 21<sup>2</sup>). The nobleman besought Him to come down (καταβῆ). In attempting to identify the site, therefore, we have practically nothing to guide us but etymology and tradition. Josephus gives but little help, his references being evidently to other places, with perhaps one exception. He fixes his residence at Cana, a village of Galilee (Vita, 16), and afterwards (ib. 40) adds that it was in the plain of Asochis. The ancient name was probably Kanah (קָנָה), of which the Gr. (Κανά) is as nearly as possible a transliteration, and the name would be correctly represented in the Arab. (Kānā or Kanat for this spell both ways). Again, in Kānā el-Jellī the latter word is simply a transliteration of the Heb. Gāllī (גָּלִיל), and has nothing whatever to do with the Arab. jallī, 'great' or 'magnificent.' It is the Arab. name for the province of Galilee to-day. Kānā el-Jellī is therefore the exact Arab. equivalent of Κανά τῆς Γαλιλαίας. This name is found attached to a considerable ruin on a slope of the hills north of el-Battāuf, the ancient Asochis. There are many rock-hewn tombs. Several water cisterns have been found, but no spring. The Heb. name (קָנָה, 'the place of reeds') would be most appropriate, as overlooking the marshy plain, where reeds still are plentiful. It is commonly called Khīrbet Kānā; but one hears also, on the lips of the natives, the NT conditions, being in Galilee, higher than Capernaum, which could be reached by road N. of the Torān range, towards the Jordan Valley, without any circuit to the south.

The only serious rival to Khīrbet Kānā is Kefr Kennah, on the Tiberias road, 3½ miles from Nazareth. It occupies rising ground on the southern edge of Sahl Torān, the branch cut from el-Battāuf, by the Torān hills. The doubling of the medial nun is against the identification with the Gr. Κανά. Were other difficulties overcome so as to make Kennah represent the Heb. קָנָה, the name would have no appropriateness here, with neither marsh nor reeds for miles around. This line of inquiry leads very decidedly towards Khîrbet Kānā.

Tradition yields no clear result. It is often difficult to get any satisfaction out of the witnesses: they are far from exact, and frequently contradictory. A very early tradition must have located Christ's first miracle at Khîrbet Kānā. Eusebius (c. 270-340) and Jerome evidently identify Cana with Kānā in Asher, some 8 miles S.E. of Tyre. They could not mean Kefr Kennah, which was not in Asher. In favour of Khîrbet Kānā may also be mentioned Saewulf, 1102; Brocardius, 1183; Marinus Sanutus, 1321; Breydenbach, 1483; and Anselm, 1507. As against these, St. Paula, 383; St. Willibald, 720; Isaac Chelo, 1324; and Quaresimus, 1616. The last named mentions the tradition regarding Kānā only to dismiss it. His position has since been stoutly maintained by the monks of both Greek and Latin Churches. Both have considerable ecclesiastical property in Kefr Kennah, and in the Gr. church a jar is shown, said to have been used in the miracle. West of the village is a spring, whence, it is said, the water made wine was drawn. An old sarcophagus serves as a site. Conder (Tent Work in Pal.) has suggested another possible site at Ain Kana, on the highway from er-Beineh to Tabor.

CANAAN, CANAANITES (קנען, Xavdar, Xavdaros, Chanaan).—Canaan is the son of Ham, according to Gn 9<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>6</sup>, and the brother of Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt), and Put. In consequence of Ham's conduct towards Noah when drunken, Canaan was cursed, and it was said that he should be the servant of his sons, Shem and Japheth (Gn 9<sup>22-27</sup>). The passage, however, does not agree very well with the context, as the wrong to Noah had been committed by Ham, and not by Canaan, and it has therefore been suggested that it is taken from an ancient poem. The prophecy was fulfilled when the Canaanites were conquered first by the Israelites, the descendants of Shem, and afterwards by the Persians, Greeks, and Romans.

The tenth chapter of Genesis is geographical rather than ethnological, and the relationship between the nations and states mentioned in it denotes their geographical position, not their racial affinities. When it is said that Canaan was the brother of Cush and Mizraim, we are transported to the age of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Egypt. Dynasties, when Palestine was a province of Egypt. The statement is not applicable to a later period, and so indicates the age to which it belongs.

The name of Canaan is derived from a root signifying 'to bow down,' and (as St. Augustine noticed) means 'the lowlands' of Palestine. Primarily it was applied to the coast, secondarily to the valley of the Jordan (Nu 13<sup>29</sup>). But in time it came to be extended to the whole country, including the mountainous districts occupied by the Amorites. The name appears under two forms. The shorter form is found in the Gr. Xvā (Euseb. Prep. Evan. i. 10; Hekat. Frag. 254, ed. Klausen; Steph. Byz. p. 721), which was Hellenized into Agēnōr, 'the manly one.' Khna or Agēnōr was the older name of Phœnicia, and also the eponymous ancestor of the Can. and the father of Phoenix, or Phoenix himself (Euseb. l.c.). In the Tel el-Amarna tablets, as well as the lexical tablets of Nineveh, the name is sometimes written Kinakhkhi (with kh for the Can. 'Ayin), and represents the greater part of southern Pal. as far north as the frontiers of the Amorites. The longer form of the name, Canaan, is met with in the hieroglyphic texts; Seti I. destroyed the Shasu or Bedawin from the eastern rampart of Egypt 'to the land of Canaan,' and captured their fortress of 'Kana'an,' which Conder has identified with Khurbet Kan'an near Hebron. Among the geographical names enumerated by Ptolemy Auletes at Kom Ombo is that of 'Kan'an.' The name was preserved among the Phœnicians, the inhabitants of the sea-coast. Coins of the Orontes bear the inscription, 'Laodiceia, mother (or metropolis) in Canaan'; and St. Augustine states that in his time the Carthaginian peasantry in northern Africa were 'Chanani' (Rom. 13). In some of the Tel el-Amarna tablets, moreover, we find Kinakhna.

The Gr. Φοινίξ, 'Phœnician,' is the equivalent of 'Canaanite'; and Φοινίκη, Phœnicia, is the original Canaan on the sea-coast. In Latin the name appears as Pœnus, Punicus. Φοινίξ in the sense of 'purple-dye' and 'date-palm' seems to be derived from its use as a gentile, the one being 'the Phœnician dye,' the other 'the Phœnician tree'; the date-palm having been brought from Egypt to the Phœnician coast and there become naturalised. But phœnix, 'a palm,' may be the Egyptian benr, beni, just as the name of the fabulous bird phœnix is the Eyp. bennu. It is probable that we must seek the name 'Phœnician' in the Fenkhu of the monuments, a text of Tahutmes III. at Karnak to Canaan (Brugsch, Egyptologie, ii. p. 466). It thus corresponds exactly with the Kinakhkhi of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. We must suppose that the termination was imagined to be the same as that of Kilix 'Cilician' and similar words, and that the name was accordingly identified with φωνός and φωνός, and explained to signify 'red,' the Latin Pœnus being borrowed from φωνός.

In the bilingual Decree of Kanōpos the Gr. Phœnicia is replaced in the hieroglyphic text by Keft. W. Max Müller has tried to show that Keft was rather Cilicia, but unsuccessfully. The name appears in Greek as Kēpheus and Kēphēne. Kēphēne, rather of Andromeda, was said to have been a king of Joppa (Steph. Byz. s.v.), and the Chaldeans of Babylon were first called Kēphēnes, according to Hellanicus. Keft, in fact, seems to have denoted the whole sea-coast of Phœnicia, from the Gulf of Antioch to Jaffa.

Another name applied to Canaan and Syria by the Egyptians was Khal, which embraced the whole country from the frontiers of Egypt to Aup in northern Syria. It denoted more especially the northern part of the region, from which wine was imported into Egypt; while the southern part of Pal., particularly towards the sea-coast, was termed Zahi. The most general name was Rutennu or Lutennu, which corresponded to our 'Syria.'

The mercantile pursuits of the Phœnicians caused the word 'Canaanite' to become synonymous with 'merchant' (Is 23, Ezk 17, Hos 12, Zeph 1<sup>11</sup>, Job 41<sup>6</sup>, Pr 31<sup>24</sup>). In an Eyp. papyrus, on the other hand, mention is made of 'Canaanite slaves from Khal' (Anastasi, iv. 16. 2).

Isaiah (19<sup>18</sup>) calls Heb. the language of Canaan, and the decipherment of the Phœnician inscriptions, as well as the names of Can. persons and places mentioned in the OT, show that the designation was correct. Hebrew and Phœnician are distinguished only in a few unimportant particulars, such as the absence in Phœnician of a definite article. The Tel el-Amarna tablets prove that there was little or no difference between the language of Canaan in the cent. before the Exodus and that of the Phœnicians and of the OT in later times. In some of the letters written from Canaan the writer adds the Can. equivalent of the Bab. word he is using. Thus the king of Jerusalem uses anuki, 'I,' the Heb. anokhi, instead this and other terms to express the idea in question will be noticed. The process whereby the actual Canons of the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures were arrived at will be more fully traced under the heads OLD TESTAMENT CANON and NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

The conception of a C. virtually existed long before this precise term was employed. We have it wherever there is the notion of a collection of writings marked off as ; sacred and as having a special Divine . Writings of the past would be likely for the first time fully to acquire this position when an age had come in which the living voice of prophecy was no longer heard. This view of them would not preclude the possibility of an addition to the number of inspired books at a future epoch of revelation. It is also to be observed, though to some this may at first sight seem strange, that a belief in a distinct class of writings of this kind was not incompatible with some diversity of opinion as to its extent, and with doubts on this subject in the minds even of those who were fully persuaded of the main facts. And this is true even of the time after the word C. was introduced. The idea of a C. no doubt gained to some degree in definiteness through controversies as to the writings which were to be held to form part of it. But in essence it was presupposed in those controversies; and their chief result was simply to fix more clearly and firmly the limits of the Canon.

There was no exact equivalent for the word among the Jews in respect to OT, but we have the idea clearly implied in the expression 'the Scriptures' employed by Jews addressing Jews in NT (e.g. Mt 21<sup>11</sup>, Jn 5<sup>39</sup>, Ac 18<sup>15</sup>); and the word 'Scripture,' as used in the singular for a particular passage, also involves it, since each passage so named derived the binding force which is attributed to it from being contained in the body of sacred writings. So again, where Jos. (c. Ap. i. 8) makes a formal statement concerning these books and their number, the recognition of a C. is implied. And we have it also in the collective words used in the Talm. for the Divine Scriptures, such as קְרָאָה ('reading,' from their being read publicly in the synagogue) and קְרָאָה קְדָשָׁה ('the holy writings').

The Christian Church adopted the Scriptures of the Jews as her own. She also in process of time extended the idea of 'Scripture' to another body of writings, which in one or more groups were named along with those of OT. Pseudo-Clement of Rome's 2nd Ep. (c. A.D. 150) speaks of τὰ βιβλία καὶ οἱ ἀπόστολοι (i.e. the OT and the apostolic writings). Fresh names, also, were introduced, of the fact that the books were in two such groups, or such a collection in two parts. Melito, bp. of Sardis, circ. A.D. 170, speaks of τὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης βιβλία (ap. Euseb. HE iv. 26), 'the books of the Old Covenant' (or Testament). And we have evidence about the end of the same cent., in the writings of Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian, that the names παλαιὰ διαθήκη (vetus testamentum) and νέα διαθήκη (novum testamentum), the names that have become the most prominent of all, had been transferred to the groups of the two dispensations. Tertullian himself preferred (see c. Marc. iv. 1) the term Instrumentum (of legal associations = 'documentary record or proof'). He frequently employs it, applying it sometimes to particular books, and sometimes separately to OT or to NT, but also to the Scriptures as a whole. From διαθήκη the adj. ἐνδιάθετος was formed; it occurs repeatedly in the writings of Origen and Eusebius, in a sense closely corresponding to 'canonical' (e.g. Philocal., iii. and Euseb. HE iii. cc. 3, 9, 25, vi. c. 14).

Another description, γραφαί, 'writings which have been written,' used by Origen and others, needs somewhat fuller consideration. A certain reluctance attaches to it owing to the fact that the writings are contrasted with such as are 'apocryphal'; and while this word is common in the Fathers of the 2nd and 3rd cent., it does not seem ever to occur at this time with the precise connotation which it has since acquired. The original and fundamental signification of 'apocryphal' was that of

But there might be various reasons for different writings. There were some among the Jews, as there were also some Christians, esp. in the Church of Alexandria, who were inclined to value highly lore which they considered to be unfit to be communicated even to all the faithful, and suited only for the study of the wise. But this tendency was never strong enough either among Jews or Christians to lead to the establishment of a class of writings regarded as authoritative and yet not imparted to all; and the spirit of Christianity in particular was wholly opposed to such reservation. All writings regarded as inspired were naturally included among the 'public' writings, 'made the public property of the whole Church.' We have still, however, to ask what was meant by and implied in this 'publication,' and, as a further question, could really serve to mark off the writings which, in the full sense, authoritative from all others. The chief means of the publishing in question was the regular reading in the congregation. And no doubt this solemn reading served to impress upon the people generally the idea of the authority of the books which they heard in this way; while the need of a rule for directing it may have been one influence which promoted the formation of the C. of OT, as it was certainly of NT. But it seems too narrow a view of the words ἡ κοινὴ ἀναγνῶσις, or publicatio, to regard them (as Zahn does, Die bibl. d. Kanons, i. p. 134) as meaning little or nothing more than 'to be read in church.' If the publication connoted by these terms was closely associated with the public reading, it was so because that act was the chief symbol of the general reception and acknowledgment of the books by the Church, which had been informally arrived at, and which found expression in various habits of speech and practice. It must, however, further be observed that the fact of particular books being publicly read would seem to be often too inconsiderately taken as evidence that they were regarded as Scripture in the full sense of the term. It is not to be supposed that the public reading would necessarily be regarded as having the same significance, or that the rules for it would be conceived in the same spirit, everywhere and always. There might be, and in point of fact there were, varieties of custom acc. to differences of circumstances and of theological temper. At some times and places there would be comparative laxity, at others special strictness. The Muratorian C. (circ. A.D. 200, written at Rome or in the neighbourhood) reveals a disposition to exclude from public reading all works of secondary or doubtful authority. This might be due to the special character of the Church, or to a sense of the danger which the recent spread of Gnosticism and Montanism and the circulation of the writings of these sects had created. On the other hand, at the very same epoch, we find Serapion, bp. of Antioch, first allowing the public reading of the Gospel of Peter at a place within his diocese, though he knew very little of the work and held it in no particular esteem, and then afterwards forbidding it, when he became more fully acquainted with its contents, and found that it was doing harm (Euseb. HE vi. 12). Again, to pass to a later age. With Cyril of Jerus. in his catechetical lectures, delivered circa A.D. 340, the class of books 'openly read in the church' is coterminous with that of those 'acknowledged among all,' and is the opposite of 'apocryphal'; and he knows no third division (Catech. iv. cc. 33, 35). Athanasius, on the other hand, writing not long afterwards, but representing the usages of another Church, distinguishes between 'canonical books,' 'books that are read,' and 'apocryphal books' (Ep. Fest. 39, i. 768, ed. Bened.). And Rufinus at the end of the cent. distinguishes in the same way, and gives the name of 'Church books,' Ecclesiastici libri, to the second class (De Symb. cc. 37, 38).

We shall now be in a position to estimate rightly the amount of significance to be attached to the introduction of the words Canon, canonical, and canonised with reference to the books of Scripture; but we must first determine which of them was so used earliest, and when? Some have supposed that the employment of the adjective in this connexion preceded that of the substantive, and that it is to be traced back to Origen, on the ground that the epithets canonici and regulares are applied to the books of Scripture in portions of his works which we possess only in Rufinus' tr. No reliance can, however, be placed upon this argument, since these would be the most convenient renderings for such a word as ἐνδιάθηκoi, which, as we have seen, certainly belonged to Origen's terminology. Moreover, Rufinus so renders this very word in passages of Eusebius, where we have both the original and his translation. The earliest instance which can be adduced of the occurrence of either κανών or a derivative in the sense now under consideration is in the Festal Epistle of Athanasius above referred to, written in A.D. 367. The phrase ἐν τοῖς κανόσι is there used of the books of Holy Scripture. It seems, however, improbable that the verb κανονίζεν, or its parts, should have been so applied before the term κανών had been used of the books collectively. And a little later Amphilochius, the eminent bishop of Iconium, concludes a catalogue of them, which he gives in his Imbi ad Seleucum with the words οὗτος ἀψευδέστατος Κανὼν ἐν ἐπιγινώσκουσιν γραφῶν. The word, which originally meant a rod, and thence a measure, had been already applied in the sense of a rule or norm, and that variously, both in classical and ecclesiastical usage. It will suffice here to notice the phrase ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, for the Church's creed, which had long been familiar. It has been questioned whether, when the word κανών was first used in connexion with the Scriptures, the primary intention was to express the thought that they form the rule of faith and life for the Christian, or to denote the list whereby the contents of the Scriptures are correctly defined. The latter seems to be the true view. It is the simplest; and, moreover, it would be hard otherwise to explain the use of the verb κανονίζεν, which is applied both to particular books and to the books collectively. The other idea would, however, also be readily suggested to the mind by the associations of the word κανών. And accordingly we find Isidore of Pelusium, in the earlier half of the 5th cent., expressing himself thus: 'the Canon of the truth, I mean the Divine Scriptures' (Ep. 114).

It will be perceived, then, that no essentially new point of view was implied in the use of the term Canon and its derivatives in connexion with Holy Scripture. At the same time it is noteworthy that they began to be employed at a time when special efforts were being made in different quarters to remove ambiguities with respect to, and to codify, the contents of the Scriptures.

For further illustrations of some of the points here touched upon, and for the determination of particular books, or groups of books, the reader must consult the arts. APOCRYPHA, OLD TESTAMENT CANON, and NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

CANOPY (κωνοπέδιον, from κώνω (Mt 23<sup>34</sup>), gnat, mosquito). — Originally a mosquito-net. The canopy of the bed or Holofernes, 'which was of purple, and gold, and emerald, and . . . ones inwoven,' was taken by Judith 'from . . . as a trophy, and given by her 'for a gift' (ἀνάθημα) unto the Lord' (Jth 10<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>9</sup> 15 16<sup>18</sup>). 'Canopy' occurs also in RV at Is 4<sup>5</sup> 'Over all the glory shall be spread a canopy' (AV 'defence'). The Heb. is מגן, which here only has the sense of a canopy for protection; elsewhere it means a . . . Ps 19<sup>9</sup> or a bride's (Jl 2<sup>16</sup>) chamber.

CAPER-BERRY (קברב qabirbat, κάππαρις, Ec 12<sup>9</sup>). The authority of the LXX and of some of the Rabbis is in favour of the tr. 'caper-berry' RV, instead of 'desire' AV.—This is the fruit of Capparis spinosa, L., a perennial shrub, rooted in the clefts of rocks and walls, with straggling, more or less pendulous, branches, and orbicular to ovate leaves, 1 to 2 inches in length, and white flowers 2 to 3 inches broad. It grows in all the Mediterranean basin. The ripe berry is oblong to obovate-oblong, and 2 to 2½ inches long. The young berries have a pungent flavour, and are pickled as a condiment. The Arabs of the Sin. desert call it el-asáf, while the people of Pal. and Syria know it by the name kabar, which is manifestly a modification of κάππαρις. Like all pungent plants, it is stimulating to the erotic instinct. The idea of those who tr. 'caper-berry' is that even this stimulant . . . to excite desire. The principal Rabbi of Beirút assures me that the tr. of AV 'desire' is that of the majority of the Jewish commentators. In either case the object is the same, that is, to express the decadence of the bodily powers with the advance of years.

G. E. POST.

CAPERNAUM (TR Καπερναούμ, from which our English word is taken; but Καφαρναούμ, supported by B&DZ, etc., is undoubtedly correct, representing the original כפרנחום).—This city is mentioned only in the Gospels, and derives all its interest from association with the life of Christ. To it Matthew applies Is 9<sup>1</sup> (Mt 4<sup>35-36</sup>). After His rejection at Nazareth, Christ made His headquarters in C., and it is called 'his own city' (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>). Here only was it said of Him ὅτι ἐν οἴκῳ ἐστίν—that He was at home (Mk 2<sup>1</sup>). Peter and Andrew of Bethsaida (Jn 1<sup>44</sup>) had settled in C. (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>), and on the neighbouring beach they first heard and followed the Master (Mk 1<sup>16</sup>). Matthew (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>), or Levi (Mk 2<sup>14</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27</sup>), was here called from 'the place of toll.' Many miracles were wrought here (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>). The following are specially mentioned, viz. healing centurion's servant (Mt 8<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1</sup>); nobleman's son cured by a word from Cana (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>); Simon Peter's mother-in-law cured of fever (Mk 1<sup>31</sup>); paralytic healed (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>, Mk 2<sup>1</sup>, Lk 5<sup>18</sup>); unclean spirit cast out (Mk 1<sup>33</sup>, Lk 4<sup>33</sup>). Here the lesson of humility was taught from a little child set in the midst (Mt 18<sup>2</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33, 36</sup>). A famous discourse in the synagogue is reported in Jn 6. Over C., highly favoured but unrepentant, the heavy woe was pronounced, 'And thou Capernaum, shalt thou be exalted unto heaven?—thou shalt go down to Hades' (Mt 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 10<sup>15</sup> RV).

C., invariably called πόλις, 'a city,' was an important position, held by a body of Roman troops (Mt 8<sup>5</sup> etc.). It was also a customs-station (Mt 9<sup>9</sup> etc.). The commander of the soldiers thought it worth while to ingratiate himself with the people by building them a synagogue (Lk 7<sup>6</sup>). It was the residence of a 'synagogue' officer of the king (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>). But beyond the facts that it was on the seashore (Mt 4<sup>13</sup>), and was in or near the plain of Gennesaret (Jn 6<sup>17-21</sup>; see also Mk 6<sup>53</sup>, Mt 14<sup>34</sup>), there is nothing in the NT to indicate the site. Twice mentioned by Josephus (Vita, 72, BJ II. x. 8), neither passage is decisive. Tradition wavers between two sites, and a warm controversy has long raged over the question.

The claims of 'Ain em-Madonwerah, 'the round fountain,' a large spring on the N. edge of Gennesaret, may be dismissed. There is nothing near it to indicate the site of a great city; and it waters only a small portion of the plain.

The two serious rivals are Khân Minyeh, at the N.E. corner of the plain, and Tell Hâm, on the shore, fully 2 miles nearer Jordan. The case for Tell Hâm rests chiefly upon the name, the size of the ruins, their position on the eastward road, and the testimony of certain travellers. It is suggested that the Arab. Tell took the place of Caphar when the city became ruinous, na falling from Nahum. This is an 'most important' derivation. A Jewish Rabbi, lanikum, is said to be buried here. The derivation from his name is both easy and natural. An alternative derivation is suggested from the Heb. mar = 'brown' or 'fire-blackened,' of which Arab. Hâm is an exact translation. Then Tell Hâm = 'the black mound,' truly descriptive of the ruins, could only date from a time prior to the destruction of the city. Along the coast the eastern traffic would pass. The nomadic caravans never came this way. Jerome, Theodorus (532 A.D.), Antoninus Martyr (?), A.D. 600, and John of Wuitzburg (1100), may be taken as favouring Tell Hâm. Josephus, hurt on the Jordan, was carried to C.; but this was not necessarily the nearest town. He was evidently anxious to reach his head-quarters at Tarichea (Vita, 72). It is much against Tell Hâm that there is no fountain there; and nothing like that described by Josephus within about a couple of miles.

On the other hand, there are many considerations in favour of Khân Minyeh. Gennesaret was a well-defined district, generally allowed to correspond with el Ghazair, 'the little Ghôr,' lying along the N.W. shore of the sea (see Jos. BJ III. x. 8). The disciples started from the other side to go to C. (Jn 6<sup>17</sup>). The waters being stilled, they were straightway 'at the land whither they were going' (ib. v. 21). Matthew (14<sup>34</sup>) says 'they came to the land, unto Gennesaret.' (So also Mk 6<sup>53</sup>.) Those who sought Jesus in the morning found Him at C. (Jn 6<sup>24</sup>), and He addressed them in the synagogue. C. was thus either in or close to Gennesaret. This condition is met by Khân Minyeh; not at all by Tell Hâm. Remains of an ancient city are found in the plain between Khân Minyeh and the sea; also on the adjoining Tell 'Areimeh, where probably a large church once stood. Standing at the junction of the two great roads which must always have united behind Tell 'Areimeh, that to eastward along the shore, and that to the north by Khân Jubb Yusif, it occupied a position of first importance in the district. All the traffic from north, south, east, and west passed through the hands of its customs officers. The spring of which Josephus speaks (BJ II. x. 8) may not have been actually in the plain. Certainly it was not Ain et-Tineh. At el-Iabigha (Heptapegon?), on the edge of the valley beyond Tell 'Areimeh, rise several springs, one of great volume, the largest fountain in Galilee. An old aqueduct led the water across the vale, along the face of the cliff in a rock-cut channel, and into the plain at Minyeh sufficiently high to water a large area. Historical evidence is on the whole favourable to Khân Minyeh. Antoninus Martyr (600) is claimed on both sides; but the latter site is supported by Arculfus, end of 7th cent.; St. Willibald, middle of 8th cent.; Eusebius, middle of 12th cent.; Brocardius, end of 13th cent.; Quaresimus, 1620, who says that a ruin, called in Arab. Minieh, is the site of Capernaum.

The absence of any reminiscence of the ancient name is a difficulty with some. But from the Talm. we learn that C. was, for the Jews, associated with the Minim, the name by which they designated the Christians, who were numerous in the city. The Hattâ of the Talm., 'the sinners,' are the sons of Caphar Nahum, and again these are identified with the Minim. Among the Jews, C. was the city of Menai down to the 14th cent. The name given to the inhabitants is probably preserved in Khân Minyeh. The balance of evidence is at present greatly in favour of this site.

W. EWING.

CAPH or KAPH (כ).—Eleventh letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 11th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CAPHARSALAMA (Χαφαρσαλάμ), 1 Mac 7<sup>31</sup>.—Apparently near Jerus. Kefr Silwan, the village of Siloam, is possibly intended. SWP, vol. iii. sh. xvii.

CAPHIRA (Α Καφίρα, Β Πειρά), 1 Es 5<sup>18</sup>.—A town of Benj., inhabitants of which returned with Zerub. In Ezr 2<sup>25</sup> CHEPHIRAH (כִּפְרָיָה, Β Καφειρά, Α -ι-); cf. Neh 7<sup>28</sup>. See CHEPHIRAH.

CAPHTOR (כַּפְתּוֹר, כַּפְתּוֹרִים, Χαφθοριμ, Caphtorim).—The Caphtorim were connected with Egypt according to Gn 10<sup>13</sup>; and in Dt 2<sup>23</sup> we read: 'The Avvim, which dwelt in villages as far as Gaza, the Caphtorim, which came forth out of Caphtor, destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead.' Here the Caphtorim are identified with the Philistines, who are stated to have come from Caphtor in Am 9<sup>7</sup> and Jer 47<sup>4</sup> (where Caphtor is called an 'isle' or 'coastland'). Consequently in Gn 10<sup>14</sup> the words, 'whence went forth the Philistines,' must be out of place, and should follow Caphtorim instead of Casluhim. Caphtor has been identified with both Cyprus and Crete, but the names do not agree. Ebers (Ägypten und die Bucher Moses, 1868) proposed to see in Caphtor an Egypt. compound Ka t-ur, 'Great-er Kaft' or 'Phoenicia,' and made it the coast of the Delta, which was thickly covered with Phoenician colonies. But this theory has been overthrown by the excavation of the temple of Kom Ombo in Upper Egypt in 1892. On the wall of the south external corridor is a series of cartouches containing the names of the countries supposed to have been conquered by Ptolemy Auletes and collected from older monuments of various ages. Among the names are those of Kaptar (Caphtor) and Kasluhet (Casluhim), each with the determinative of 'country' attached to it. Kaptar ends the first line, and is immediately preceded by the names of Persia, Susa, Babylon, and Pontus, while Kasluhet (followed by Zoar) is the fifth name of the second line, which begins with the inhabitants of the Sinaitic peninsula and northern Syria. The names, however, have probably been registered at haphazard, so that no conclusion can be drawn from their order.

The Philistines seem to have entered Palestine in the course of the great invasion of Egypt by the northern nations in the eighth year of Ramses III the word might have been applicable without crediting Ezekiel with the brilliant metaphor, since 'caravan' was used from the beg. of the 17th to the middle of the 18th cent. for a fleet of ships, as Fuller, Com. on Ruth (1654): 'A caravan . . . sailing in the vast ocean.' J. HASTINGS.

CARBUNCLE.—See STONES, PRECIOUS.

CARCAS (כַּרְכַּס, Est 1<sup>10</sup>), one of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. An etymology suggested is the Persian kargas, 'vulture.' The LXX gives a different name.

CARCASE (the spelling has been indifferently carcase or carcass throughout, though dictionaries have given carcass alone, or by preference since Johnson) is used now only of the dead body of a beast, or contemptuously of a human being, but was formerly used freely of either. The Heb. words are various: (1) גֵּוֹתָיָהּ (gēvtyāh) (used of living body also) is so tr. only Jg 14<sup>8,9</sup> of the c. of Samson's lion (RV 'body'), which is also (14<sup>8</sup>) called (2) נִפְלִיתָהּ (niflityāh) (fr. נָפַל to fall, as πῶμα fr. πῆναι, cadere), which has this meaning only here; elsewhere 'fall' Pr 29<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>3, 12</sup> 31<sup>10</sup> 32<sup>10</sup>, or 'ruin' Ezk 27<sup>27</sup> 31<sup>12</sup> [all]. (3) פֶּגֶר peger; and (4) נֶבְחֵלָהּ (nēbhēlah) are often tr. 'carcase.' Both are also applied to the trunk of an idol, peger Lv 26<sup>30</sup> 'I will cast your carcases upon the carcases of your idols'; nēbhēlah Jer 16<sup>18</sup> 'they have filled mine inheritance with the carcases of their detestable idols.' Both words are used in Heb. of dead bodies, so that the tr. 'dead carcase' of Dt 14<sup>11</sup>, 15<sup>19</sup>, is as needless for the Heb. as in the Eng.; RV omits 'dead.'

In Bel<sup>22</sup> 'in the den there were seven lions, and they had given them every day two carcases and two sheep' (so RV, AVm 'slaves,' Gr. σῶματα, lit. 'bodies,' used of 'servants,' i.e. slaves, To 10<sup>10</sup>).

In NT 'carcase' occurs Mt 24<sup>28</sup> 'whosoever the c. is, there will the eagles be gathered together' (πῶμα, as in Wis 4<sup>18</sup>); and He 3<sup>17</sup> 'whose carcases fell in the wilderness' (κῶλον, lit. 'limbs,' the LXX tr. of נֶפֶשׁ in Nu 14<sup>29, 32</sup> where the language is nearly identical). J. HASTINGS.

CARCHEMISH (כַּרְכַּמִּישׁ; omitted in the LXX at 2 Ch 35<sup>20</sup>, but at Jer 26 [Heb 46<sup>2</sup>] Xapauets [Q, Καρχαμῆσι]; Vulg. Charcamis). There have been various conjectures as to the site of this city, which was finally correctly located by Messrs. Skene and Geo. Smith, by means of the Assyrian inscriptions. Carchemish is at present represented by the mounds of Jerablūs (Smith, Yarbuloos) or Hierapolis, on the western bank of the Tigris, described by Smith as a grand site, with vast walls and palace-mounds 8000 ft. round, and containing numerous sculptures and monoliths with inscriptions, many of which are now in the British Museum. Pococke says that the ruins are rectangular, and measure  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile long by  $\frac{1}{4}$  mile wide. The mounds lie between Birejik and the junction of the Sajur and the Euphrates. Carchemish, the chief city of the Hittites, was called Karkamis by the Babylonians, Gargamis and Kargamis by the Assyrians, and Karikamish or Karakamisha by the Egyptians, and the city was known—perhaps renowned—as a trading centre as early as the 3rd millennium B.C.\* Amen-em-hebe, one of the captains of Tahutmes III. (c. B.C. 1600), refers to his campaign against the people of Karikamish(?)sa, where he took prisoners;† and about B.C. 1200 Tiglath-pileser I. of Assyria plundered 'the land of the neighbourhood of Suhi as far as Carchemish (Kar-gamis) of the land of Hatti (Kheta or Hit) in a single day.' There is no record, however, that the fortress was taken on this occasion. The ruler of Carchemish about B.C. 880 was Sangara, who paid a large amount of tribute, chiefly in manufactured things, such as furniture and woven stuffs, also metal, to Aššur-nazir-pal, king of Assyria. Sangara afterwards came into conflict with Sargon II., son of Aššur-nazir-pal, about B.C. 858, and the Assyrian king says that he captured Sangara's cities, receiving from the latter, when he submitted, 2 talents of gold, 70 talents of silver, 30 talents of copper, 100 talents of iron, 20 talents of purple cloth, 500 weapons, his daughter with a dowry, 100 daughters of the great men of the place, 500 oxen, and 5000 sheep, and fixed as his (yearly) tribute 1 maneh of gold, 1 talent of silver, and 2 talents of purple cloth, one payment of which is duly recorded as having taken place. The large amount of the war indemnity and the tribute testify to the prosperity and commercial importance of the city. On the bronze gates found by H. Rassam at Balawat the reception of tribute by Shalmaneser II. is twice represented, and in each case a picture in relief of the fortress is given. The city was finally taken by Sargon of Assyria in B.C. 717, when Pisiri or Pisiris, its last king, was made prisoner. From this time it formed part of the Assyrian empire, and was administered by an Assyrian governor.\* Its importance as a centre continued under its new rulers, Carchemish being one of the standard weights in use at Nineveh. Later notices of the city occur in the Bible itself, when Pharaoh-Necho defeated Josiah in the battle in which the Jewish king lost his life (2 Ch 35<sup>20</sup>), and was himself defeated by Nebuchadrezzar, four years later (B.C. 605), under the walls of the city (Jer 46<sup>2</sup>), in the battle which decided the fate of Western Asia. The patron deity of the city was the Asiatic goddess worshipped under the name of Atargatis, whose worship, when the city fell into decay, was transferred to the city now represented by Membij, which became the new Hierapolis, and continued in existence after the old city of Carchemish was deserted. The meaning of the name is unknown.

CARE.—The proper meaning of this word, and of all its compounds (of which there occur in AV 'careful,' 'carefully,' 'carefulness,' 'careless,' 'carelessness') is trouble or sorrow. But from a very early period it was confounded with Lat. cura (with which it has no connexion, being a purely Teutonic word), and the meaning of cura, viz. attention to something or somebody, became attached to it. This affected even the original word, so that care in the sense of sorrow became anxiety, as if due to over-attention; while the compounds have now actually dropped the original meaning, and adopted that of cura wholly. But throughout the history of the word, and esp. in AV, we can trace the two senses side by side.

1. Care is both subst. and verb. As subst. (1) Anxiety (Gr. μεμνηνα): Mt 13<sup>22</sup>, 'the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word'; so Mk 4<sup>19</sup>, Lk 8<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>34</sup> 'cares of this life,' 2 Co 11<sup>28</sup> 'the care of all the churches' (RV 'anxiety for'), 1 P 5<sup>7</sup> 'Casting all your care upon him' (RV 'anxiety'), 1 Muc 6<sup>10</sup> 'my heart faileth for very care.' In OT, 1 S 10<sup>8</sup> 'thy father hath left the care of the asses (i.e. concern about, קָרָן, lit. "the matters of the asses"), and sorroweth for you,' Ezk 4<sup>18</sup> 'they shall eat bread by weight, and with care' (קָרָן, RV 'carefulness'). (2) Attention (esp. earnest attention, the original meaning of the word in turn affecting this borrowed meaning; Gr. σπουδή: 2 Co 7<sup>12</sup> 'our care for you in the sight of God' (RV 'earnest care,' as 8<sup>16</sup> AV, RV); Ph 4<sup>10</sup> 'your care for me' (τὸ φρονεῖν, RV 'thought for me') Wis 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>4</sup> (φροντίς). As verb (1) Anxiety or concern (Gr. μεριμνάω); 1 Co 7<sup>32</sup> 33. 34 'But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: but he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife' (RV 'is careful for'); 12<sup>25</sup>, Ph 2<sup>20</sup>. In OT, 2 S 18<sup>3</sup> 'if we flee away, they will not care for us, neither if half of us die, will they care for us' (Heb. לֹא יִשְׁמְרוּ). (2) Attention: Dt 11<sup>12</sup> 'a land which the Lord thy God careth for (שָׁמַר, RVm 'seeketh after'), the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it'; Ps 142<sup>4</sup> 'no man cared for my soul.' When the expression is care for, the distinction is not always obvious, since it is the person that is anxious about who will give attention to; but in the foll. passages (where the Gr. is μέλει) the meaning is always anxiety or concern: Mt 22<sup>16</sup>, Mk 12<sup>14</sup>, Jn 10<sup>13</sup> 'he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep,' 12<sup>4</sup> 'not that he cared for the poor,' Ac 18<sup>17</sup> 'Gallio cared for none of these things,' 1 Co 7<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>7</sup> 'He careth for you.' On the other hand, to take care of (ἐπιμελέομαι) must be 'to give attention to,' Lk 10<sup>34</sup> 'he brought him to an inn and took care of him,' 10<sup>38</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>5</sup> 'if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?' Hence 1 Co 9<sup>9</sup> AV, 'Doth God take care for oxen?' (μέλει) is a serious mistranslation. God does take care for oxen, as for all living creatures, but it is only for man that He may be said to have concern (RV 'Is it for the oxen that God careth?').

Careful.—1. Anxious, Lk 10<sup>41</sup> 'Martha, Martha, thou art c. and troubled about many things' (μεριμνᾷς RV 'thou art anxious'), Ph 4<sup>6</sup> 'Be careful for nothing' (μηδὲν μεριμνᾶτε, RV 'In nothing be anxious'). In OT, Jer 17<sup>8</sup> 'he shall be as a tree planted by the waters . . . and shall not be c. in the year of drought' (שָׁמַר); Dn 3<sup>16</sup> 'O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not c. to answer thee in this matter' (נִשְׁמַר, RV 'we have no need,' RVm as AV). Cf. Shaks. Tit. And. iv. iv. 84—

'Tis not to be c. thereby.'

In Apocr., Bar 3<sup>18</sup> 'They . . . were so c.' (μεριμνῶντες); to which RV adds 2 Es 2<sup>27</sup> 'Be not c. overmuch,' an expression which brings out the difference between careful=anxious, and careful=attentive or painstaking; in the latter sense, as we put it, 'you cannot be too careful.' 2. Attentive to one's interests, painstaking: Ph 4<sup>10</sup> 'Now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also c., but ye lacked opportunity' (ἐφρονεῖτε, RV 'ye did take thought'); Tit 3<sup>8</sup> 'that they which have believed in God might be c. to maintain good works' (φροντίζω); 2 K 4<sup>13</sup> 'thou hast been c. for us with all this care' (שָׁמַר, usually 'to tremble,' and so here 'to be anxiously careful,' its only occurrence in this sense).

Carefully.—In the sense of anxiously, c. occurs only Mic 1<sup>12</sup> 'the inhabitant of Maroth waited c. for good' (שָׁמַר, lit. 'has been in pain,' RV 'waiteth anxiously'). In the sense of attentively, there are in AV Dt 15<sup>8</sup> 'if thou c. hearken' (שָׁמַר, 'if . . . thou shalt hearken,' RV 'if thou . . . hearken,' as AV in 11<sup>28</sup> 28<sup>1</sup>, same Heb.); Wis 12<sup>22</sup> 'we should c. think of thy goodness' (μεριμνῶμεν, RV 'ponder'); Ph 2<sup>28</sup> 'I sent him the more c.' (σπουδαίοντος, RV 'the more diligently'); He 12<sup>17</sup> 'he sought it c. with tears' (ἐκζητέω, RV 'sought it diligently'). To these RV adds Mt 27<sup>18</sup> (ἀκριβῶς, AV 'diligently'), 28<sup>1</sup> (ἀκριβῶς AV 'diligently'), Ac 18<sup>25</sup> (ἀκριβῶς, AV 'diligently') 18<sup>26</sup> (ἀκριβῶς AV 'perfectly') and He 12<sup>15</sup> 'Looking c.' (ἐπισκοποῦντες, AV 'looking diligently').

Carefulness, in the sense of anxiety, is given in AV (as tr. of שָׁמַר) Ezk 12<sup>18</sup> 19; to which RV adds 4<sup>16</sup> (AV 'care'), Jos 22<sup>24</sup> (AV 'fear'). In the same sense is Sir 30<sup>24</sup> 'c. bringeth age before the time' (ἐλπίμνα, RV 'care'); and 1 Co 7<sup>32</sup> 'I would have you without c.' (ἀμέριμνος, RV 'free from cares'). Cf. Latimer, Ser. i. 413, 'Consider the remedy against carefulness, which is to trust in God.' But the sense of watchful and helpful interest is clear in 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> 'what c. it wrought in you' (σπουδή, RV 'earnest care'); for the same apostle commends c. in this passage, who had condemned it in the previous.

Careless and Carelessly have always the meaning of without trouble or anxiety, in security (the Heb. being always נָחַל 'to trust,' or נָחַל 'confidence'); 'careless' Jg 18<sup>1</sup>, Is 32<sup>9</sup> 10. 11, Ezk 30<sup>9</sup> (but RV adds Pr 19<sup>16</sup> Heb. נָחַל 'a despiser'); 'carelessly' Is 47<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 39<sup>6</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>15</sup>. Cf.—

'Raise up the organs of her fantasy;
Sleep she as sound as careless infancy.'

CARIA (Καρία) is actually mentioned only in 1 Mac 15<sup>20</sup> as one of the places to which the Rom. Senate sent a circular letter in B.C. 139–138 in favour of the Jews. The political entity which is here meant was probably the Chrysaorian confederacy, in which most of the cities (esp. the inland cities) of C. were united, meeting at the temple of Zeus Chrysaoreus at Stratonicea. C., most of which belonged to the Rhodians from 190 to 168, was then declared free by the Romans; and this confederacy was the responsible government until 129, when the country was incorporated in the province of Asia. The coast cities of C. were chiefly Greek, and did not belong to the confederacy: of these Miletus was Ionian; Cnidus, Cos, and Halicarnassus were Dorian; hence the Rom. Senate sent their letter about the Jews (see DELUS) to the Dorian cities, Cnidus, Halicarnassus, Cos, and also to Rhodes and Myndus (which seem to be nearly the complete list of Carian governments).

One of David's heroes was a Carmelite. Now the ruined town Kurmūl, on the hills about 10 miles S.E. of Hebron, chiefly remarkable for the remains of a large square tower, built in the 12th cent. In the list of places conquered by Tahutmes III. in Pal., No. 49 reads Kalimna, which Tomkins takes as Kalamon or Carmel; and No. 48, Rshkadsh, by which Maspero understands Rosh-Kodshu, 'the sacred headland' of Carmel. Mod. Arab Karmūl, but more usually Jebel Mār Elyas).—This long headland, which forms one of the great features of Pal., is of the same hard limestone as the cen tral range of the country, but from the latter by hills of softer rock, which are therefore more worn than itself, and now lie lower and are opened up by passes. The promontory of Carmel rises above a narrow sea-beach to a height of some 500 ft. at the monastery; thence the ridge, running S.E., ascends (PEF Large Map, sheets v. and viii.)  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles to Esfia (1742 ft.), and then sinks for  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles more to its end at El-Mahraka (1687 ft.); beyond which there is a sudden dip into the Wady el-Milh, a valley that separates Carmel from the lower hills aforesaid, the Belâd er-Ruhah. The ridge is well-defined, and in shape a wedge, with the thin end seaward, in breadth from plain to plain  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles, but at the thick or inland end it is  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles broad. The sides are very different. The S.W. sinks slowly by long slopes into the plain of Sharon; the N.E. is abrupt and steep above the plains of Haifa and Esdraelon. At the foot of the latter runs Kishon, for the most part parallel to the axis of the mountain. The limestone of C. abounds in flints, 'geodes' (known as 'Elijah's melons'), and fossils; and on the N.E. igneous rocks crop out from a basalt formation that extends to the Sea of Galilee (Ritter, Pal. 712, 713). There are very many caves.

C. is very conspicuous from most parts of central Pal.; its high skyline, with the line of Bashan and the great mass of Hermon, form the three grandest features of all views from Esdraelon, Galilee, and the mountains of Ephraim. Accordingly C., Gilead or Bashan, and Lebanon are frequently named together in OT (Is 33<sup>o</sup> 35<sup>o</sup>, Mic 7th etc.). Once C. is coupled with Tabor: "'Pharaoh is but a rumour?'" As I live, saith J', surely like Tabor among mountains, and like C. by the sea, shall he come! (Jer 46th). At opposite ends of Esdraelon (the very scene of Pharaoh's coming) the two hills stand out, symbols of that which shall certainly be established as fact, and make its presence felt. Sweeping seaward, in the face of the rains, C., as its name declares, is richly clothed with verdure. At present this is mostly wild—a thick growth of underwood, grass and flowers, coppices of oak, carob, and many evergreens, with here and there a grove of great trees. Van de Velde asserts that there was not a flower found by him in Galilee or in the maritime plain which he did not also meet on C., 'still the fragrant lovely mountain that it was of old' (i. 317, 318). But there are, too, frequent olive-groves, and other gardens, with prosperous villages; while the more numerous grooved floors and troughs that have been traced in the rock below the brushwood, prove that, in ancient times, there was an even greater cultivation, and chiefly of olive and vine. Accordingly, in OT Carmel is the very type of a luxuriant fertility (Is 35<sup>o</sup> etc.); her decay the prophets' most desperate figure of desolation (Am 1st, Is 33<sup>o</sup> etc.). The German colonists at Haifa have resumed the culture of the vine on the N. slopes of the promontory.

C. plays no part in the political or military history of Palestine. The great campaigns swept past her on either side: in military tactics the hill was only an obstacle to be avoided. By far the most armies, whether going north or south, crossed between Esdraelon and Sharon by the passes to the east of C. Some of the Syrian advances south, Rom. legions when passing from Ptolemais to Caesarea, Richard Lionheart and the Third Crusade, Napoleon on his retreat from Acre,—these followed the sea road under the promontory. May not this quality of being neither a goal in itself, nor on the road anywhere, be the origin of the curious Talmudic word למנוחה?

The aloofness of C. from the central range made its ridge but an uncertain appendage to the territory of Israel. According to Jos 19th it was assigned to the tribe of Asher; but their tenure must have been intermittent. The kings of N. Israel seem to have held it as they held Gilead; but even in the time of Amos (9th) 'the top of C.' is regarded as a hiding-place of fugitives from J'; and in later history it lay outside Samaria, and was sometimes allotted to Galilee, but frequently subject to Tyre (Jos. BJ III. iii. 1).

The causes, however, which disabled C. from political rank, contributed to enhance its fame as a sanctuary. 'In its separation from other hills, its position on the sea, its visibility from all quarters of the country, its uselessness for war and traffic, in its profusion of flowers, its high platforms and groves, with their glorious prospects of land and sea, C. must have been a place of retreat and of worship from the earliest times.' Maspero thinks to identify it in the lists of Tahutmes III. under the name of 'headland of holiness' (see above); and even before Elijah's day there seem to have been upon it altars both to Baal and J'. For here, as on ground which both of them held to be sacred, the representatives of the two religions met to appeal to their respective deities, and decided the argument between them (1 K 18th). Tradition and the agreement of many modern explorers (see esp. Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 353 f.) place the scene at the E. end of the ridge, at a place called El-Mahraka, or 'the burning,' where Druses have a sanctuary and are said still to perform a yearly sacrifice; there is a good spring just below (cf. Jos. Ant. VIII. xiii. 5). It is interesting that immediately below, on the banks of Kishon, a great mound is known as the Tell el-Qasis or Mound of the Priests. But the derivation of the modern name of Kishon, the Nahr el-Mukatta, as if it meant river of slaughter, is both improbable in itself and impossible to connect with the history of the priests. When it is said that Elijah 'went up to the head of C.' it is possible that 'headland' is meant, in which case the tradition is correct that places the site of his waiting for rain near the monastery; but the word may also mean 'top,' any spot on the long summit of the ridge, which almost everywhere is in sight of the sea. A point near the E. end and the altar of J' would better suit the context, and esp. the story of Elijah's subsequent race to Jezreel in front of Ahab's chariot. It is possible that the great prophet from Gilead chose as his subsequent residence the scene of the triumph of J', and evidently C. is meant by 'the mountain' on which, according to the extraordinary story (2 K 19th), he called down fire on the king of Israel's soldiers sent to arrest him for his interference with the ambassadors to Ekron. Elisha visited C. after the departure of Elijah (ib. 2nd); and when the Shunammite was in need of him, she went to seek and found him there (4th).

Probably for reasons already stated, C. does not again appear in OT as the scene of any sacred function; but in heathen hands the sanctity of the hill was preserved. Tacitus describes it as the site of an oracle, without an image 'tantum ara et reverentia' (Hist. II. 78); and Vespasian, having sacrificed here, is said to have received from the priests the prediction that he would be emperor (Suetonius, Vespas. 5). Jamblichus (Vit. Pyth. III. 15) describes C. as 'sacred above all mountains, and forbidden of access to the vulgar' (see W. R. Smith, ES 146). As we have seen, the probable site of Elijah's altar is still held sacred by the Druses. But it is Christianity which has chiefly perpetuated the ancient sanctity of C., and the mountain has given its name to the great order of Carmelite Friars, whose convent stands upon the promontory above the sea. (3) Jg 18<sup>21</sup> חֲבֵרֵי, LXX τὰ βάρος, but A (τὴν κτήσιν αὐτοῦ) τὴν ἑνδοξον=the heavy, or perhaps the precious goods, referring to the baggage of the Danites, or more probably to the images which had been stolen out of Micah's house. RV 'the goods.'

(4) Ac 21<sup>15</sup> 'We took up our carriages' is the translation of ἐπισκευασμένοι. The Greek word expresses the completion of the preparations necessary for the journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem; but others understand the term of the loading of the baggage animals. RV 'We took up our baggage,' RvM 'made ready.'

In the Ἀποκρίσις carriage, i.e. ἡ ἀποκρίσις, is sent ἀπαρτία (Jth 2<sup>27</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>) and ἀποσκευαί.

In the margin of the AV the phrases, 'the place of the carriage,' and 'in the midst of his carriages,' occur as alternative renderings to the word 'trench' found in the text of 1 S 17<sup>20</sup> 26<sup>2</sup>. The Heb. expression is לַחֲמֵץ (LXX 17<sup>20</sup> στρογγύλωσις; 26<sup>2</sup> λαμπήρη), and denotes the circular 'laager' or barricade formed by the baggage and round the place of encampment. RV 'the place of the wagons.' RvM 'barricade.' Even here 'carriage' is probably not to be understood in the modern sense of 'a vehicle.' See CAMP.

CART (כָּרֶת, karēth, plausivium in the AV the same word is also rendered wagon in Gn 45<sup>19</sup>. 21. 27 46<sup>2</sup>, Nu 7<sup>35</sup>).—Such vehicles, drawn usually by two oxen (Nu 7<sup>3</sup>. 7. 8, 1 S 6<sup>7</sup>. 10, cf. 2 S 6<sup>3</sup>), were used for the conveyance of persons (Gn l.c.), goods (Nu l.c., 1 and 2 S l.c., and Jth 15<sup>11</sup>), or produce (Am 2<sup>13</sup>). Artificial roads seem to have existed in Palestine from a very early period (Nu 20<sup>19</sup>, Jg 20<sup>31</sup>, 1 S 6<sup>12</sup>); and the Canaanites conquered by Joshua at the Waters of Merom possessed war chariots (Jos 11<sup>6</sup>, cf. 17<sup>16</sup>. 18). Nevertheless, the rough mountainous country of Judah and of central Pal. was not suitable for vehicles, and it is to be noticed that we first hear of wagons in connexion with the flat country of Egypt, or the level plain of Philistia. Carts for agricultural produce may well have been used from the earliest times (Am 2<sup>13</sup>, cf. Is 5<sup>18</sup>), and for these roads would not be required (see G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 667 ff.). The wagons mentioned in Nu 7<sup>3</sup> were probably covered vehicles (LXX λαμπηρικά, Aq. σκεπαστά); but the word ty is obscure, occurring again only in Is 66<sup>20</sup> in the sense of 'litters.' The ordinary carts probably resembled those still in use in the East, which have two wheels of solid wood; but on monuments from Nineveh and Egypt we find representations of vehicles with two and four wheels, the wheels being constructed with six or eight spokes (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 396; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii. 211, iii. 179).

In Is 28<sup>27</sup> (perhaps also in Am 2<sup>13</sup>) the 'cart' of EV is really a threshing wagon. Similar instruments are still to be seen in the East. They consist of three or four parallel rollers, ridged with iron, and fitted into a square wooden frame (see AGRICULTURE). Horses are employed to draw these threshing wagons in Syria at the present day (comp. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 613), and they were used for this purpose even in Isaiah's time, if the ordinary text of Is 28<sup>28</sup> is correct (see Duhm, ad loc.).

for NT. 2. Carving in relief-work (חֲבֵרֵי חֲבֵרֵי), as in the ornamental panelling in the holy place of the temple (1 K 6<sup>29</sup>, Ps 74<sup>6</sup>), the two words in the former passage i.e. חֲבֵרֵי, the raised effect (חֲבֵרֵי) and the hollowing חֲבֵרֵי, the gouge (חֲבֵרֵי). 3. 'Carved works,' RV 'striped' (חֲבֵרֵי), spoken of a bed-cover (Pr 7<sup>18</sup>).

Decorative art among the Hebrews was meagre and unoriginal, and generally debased what it imitated (see ART, ARCHITECTURE). It had little chief employment was in the and the true religion was the worship of the invisible. The Heb. mind differed from the Greek in obeying an ordinance because it was an ordinance, rather than because of the compulsion of its inward beauty. In the building of Solomon's temple the best art available was employed upon the richest materials, but the details are more about outlay than effect, and the point of view in the description is sacrifice rather than symmetry. The result of the finished glory is left to be imagined. Finally, the second commandment was interpreted as a specific prohibition. In the same way the Moslems abstain from the representation of life in ornament, and have developed the decorative treatment of geometrical form.

CASE (casus, anything that befalls one, hence any condition of one's affairs): Ps 144<sup>15</sup> 'Happy is the people that is in such a case' (חֲבֵרֵי; cf. Ac 25<sup>14</sup> RV); Jn 5<sup>6</sup> 'he had been now a long time in that case'; 2 Es 16<sup>21</sup> 'they shall think themselves to be in good case' (cf. Geneva Bible, Gn 40<sup>4</sup> 'When thou art in good case, show mercie unto me,' AV 'When it shall be well with thee'); Ex 5<sup>19</sup> 'they were in evil case'; cf. Jon 4<sup>6</sup> RV; Dt 19<sup>4</sup> 'this is the case of the slayer' (חֲבֵרֵי); and Mt 19<sup>10</sup> 'if the case of the man be so with his wife' (atρία). The phrase 'in any case' occurs in the obs. sense 'by any means' in Dt 22<sup>1</sup> 'thou shalt in any case bring them again' ('bringing thou shalt bring,' RV 'thou shalt surely bring'); and 24<sup>13</sup>. In Mt 5<sup>30</sup> 'Ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven,' the Gr. is the two negatives (οὐ μή), which, in the declining lang. of NT, are not always more emphatic than the single negative, but they seem to be so here (RV 'in no wise'). In Ro 3<sup>9</sup> RV gives 'are we in worse case than they?' for AV 'are we better than they?' (Gr. προεχόμεθα. See Field, Optim. Norm. iii. ad loc., and an excellent note in Sanday-Headlam's Romans).

CASIPHIA (כַּסִּיפְיָה, or, in full, כַּסִּיפְיָה כַּסִּיפְיָה 'the place Casiphia').—Judging from the two references to this city in Ezr 8<sup>17</sup>, it was situated on or near the river Ahava, on the way from Babylon to Jerusalem; but neither of these names is to be located with certainty. If C. be connected with the word kesepeh, 'silver,' as is implied by the LXX tr. (ἐν ἀργυρίῳ τοῦ τόπου), 'with the money of the place,' it may have been situated in the 'land of silver' (כַּסִּיפְיָה in Zirsu) mentioned in the well-known Babylonian tablet WAI ii. 51; but as the position of this place also is unknown, it does not help us to identify the site of Casiphia. The city seems to have been the home of the Nethinim or 'temple-servants' during the reign of Artaxerxes.

CASLUHIM (כַּסְלוּחִים, Kasluhim).—A name occurring in Gn 10<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>12</sup>, in connexion with the names of other peoples there spoken of as descended from Mizraim, esp. the Caphtorim and Philistines (which see).

* The cogn. Arab. ḥatibā means 'to be of a dark, dusky colour'; hence the reference may be to some dark-hued, or perhaps darkly-striped, stuff (Cf. Aram. ḥatibā, 'variegated,' in Syr. VS of 2 S 13<sup>10</sup>, and see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. ḥatib).

CASPHOR (Κασφώρα, 1 Mac 5<sup>26</sup>; Χασφών, Χασφώθ, 1 Mac 5<sup>30</sup>, AV Casphon; Κασπείν, 2 Mac 12<sup>13</sup>, Caspin).—Near a large lake in Gilead. The site is unknown.

CASSIA.—This word occurs in three places in OT, and is AV and RV rendering for two Heb. words. 1. קִידָה, kiddah, LXX Ex 30<sup>24</sup> ips, but Ezk 27<sup>19</sup> omits. 2. קַזְיָה kəzīyāh, kasla, casia, Ps 45<sup>8</sup>. It is highly probable that the reference in both these Heb. words is to the cassia lignea, the product of Cinnamomum Cassia, Blume. Two substances are believed to be obtained from this species. (a) Cassia bark, cortex cassiae, a kind of aromatic bark, with the smell and flavour of cinnamon, and resembling it in general appearance and properties. The root kiddah, in both Heb. and Arab., signifies a strip, and seems to refer to the strips of the bark of cassia lignea. The Arab. VS has salikhah for cassia, from a root also meaning to strip off or decorticate. The exact substance meant by salikhah is as uncertain as that intended by cassia. It is also called arfaj and ramth, and is probably the same as darsini. (b) Cassia buds, clavelli cinnamomi, the immature flowers of the above. Both are produced in China. Coarser varieties are produced in Malabar, Manilla, and Mauritius. It is probable that they were known to the Greeks and Romans, although the accounts of cassia given in the classical authors are indefinite and conflicting. The cassia of Scripture must not be confounded with the species of the genus cassia which yield the senna of commerce and medicine. Nor is it at all probable, notwithstanding the LXX ips, that it is orris.

G. E. POST.

CAST as a subst. occurs Lk 22<sup>41</sup> 'a stone's c.' (βολή); as an adj. Jer 38<sup>11,12</sup> 'old c. clouts' (קָטָן [all]). The verb is freq., and is used in some obsol. meanings. 1. In its simplest sense = 'throw', it is now archaic, having been displaced by 'throw' itself, but is often found in AV, as Jn 8<sup>7</sup> 'let him first c. a stone at her'; 1 Mac 6<sup>21</sup> 'engines and instruments to c. fire and stones, and pieces to c. darts, and slings'—in such a case the verb has gone out of use with the instrument. 2. The expression cast lots translates several Heb. words (see LOT); the practice is seen in Pr 16<sup>33</sup> 'The lot is c. into the lap.' 3. To 'c. (=sow) seed' is now mainly fig. Cf. Ec 11<sup>1</sup> 'c. thy bread upon the waters.' 4. C. was formerly used of animals, meaning to give birth to. A. Watson, ibid. (1653), i. 26, 'There be divers fishes that cast their spawn on flags and stones.' But it was specially used of an untimely birth, as Job 21<sup>10</sup> 'their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf,' and extended to fruit-trees, as Dt 28<sup>40</sup> 'thine olive shall c. his fruit'; Rev 6<sup>13</sup> 'as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken by a mighty wind.' 5. C. was extended to actions that involved some continuous effort, as Zec 5<sup>3</sup> 'he c. it (RV 'her') down into the midst of the ephah; and he c. the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof'; the erection of a pillar, Gn 31<sup>1</sup> 'Behold this heap and this pillar which I have c. betwixt me and thee' (RV 'set'); and esp. an earthwork, as 2 S 20<sup>15</sup> 'they c. up a bank against the city'; Jer 6<sup>8</sup> 'Hew ye down trees, and c. a mount against Jerusalem.'

The foll. phrases deserve attention: Cast about is used in two senses, Mk 14<sup>51</sup> 'having a linen cloth c. about his naked body' (περιβαλὼν); Jer 41<sup>14</sup> 'So all the people . . . cast about and returned' (סָבְאוּ; 'turned round'). Cf. Raleigh (1591), Last Fight Rev. 19 'Persuaded . . . to cut his maine saile, and cast about.' Cast away is both lit. and fig., as Mk 10<sup>50</sup> 'And he, casting away his garment, rose' (ἀποβάλλω); Ro 1<sup>1</sup> 'Iath God c. away his people?' (ἀπωθέω, RV 'cast off'); 11<sup>13</sup> 'if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world' (ἀποβολή); Lk 9<sup>25</sup> 'if he . . . lose himself, or be c. away' (ζημιώω, RV 'forfeit his own self'). Different is 1 Co 9<sup>27</sup> 'lest . . . I myself should be a castaway' (ἀδόκιμος, RV 'rejected'). The Gr. word occurs also Ro 13<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>8,7</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>16</sup>, where EV gives always 'reprobate,' and He 6<sup>8</sup> AV, RV 'rejected.' See Sanday-Headlam on Ro 13<sup>8</sup>: δοκιμάζω = 1. 'to test,' as 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>; 2. 'to approve after testing,' as Ro 12<sup>21</sup>; hence ἀδόκιμος = 'rejected after testing,' 'reprobate'. Cast down—(1) lit. Mt 27<sup>5</sup> 'he c. down the pieces of silver'; Sir 19<sup>7</sup> 'Casting down his countenance, and making as if he heard them not' (RV 'bowing down his face'); (2) fig. 'to defeat,' 'to humble,' 2 Co 10<sup>3</sup> 'Casting down in . . . and every high thing that exalteth . . . 12<sup>10</sup> 'the accuser of our brethren is c. down'; 2 Co 4<sup>9</sup> 'c. down, but not destroyed' (καταβάλλω, as Rev 12<sup>10</sup> RV 'smitten down'); Job 6<sup>21</sup> 'ye see my casting down, and are afraid' (κατὰ RV 'a terror'); Neh 6<sup>18</sup> 'they were much c. down in their own eyes'; (3) 'c. down' = 'dejected,' is rare, only Ps 42<sup>5,11</sup> 43<sup>5</sup> 'Why art thou c. down, O my soul?' (καταβέβηκα 'bowed down'). Cast forth is used in the obsol. and very rare sense of spreading roots, Hos 14<sup>8</sup> 'he shall grow as the hly, and c. forth his roots as Lebanon' (קָטַף 'strike'). Cast in—(1) = 'sow,' Is 28<sup>25</sup> 'c. in the principal wheat' (RV 'put in the wheat in row'); (2) in phrase 'c. in one's lot,' Pr 14<sup>1</sup> 'C. in thy lot among us' (Heb. lit. 'cause thy lot to fall among us'); (3) 'cast in one's teeth,' Mt 27<sup>44</sup> 'The thieves also, which were crucified with him, c. the same in his teeth' (Gr. ἀνελθόντων αὐτῷ [edd. αὐτῶν] = 'invited him,' RV 'c. upon him the same reproach'). It was Tindale that introduced 'cast in his teeth,' to which Cranmer added 'the same'; Wyclif has 'upbraiden Hym of the same thing'; (4) 'c. in one's mind' = 'ponder,' Lk 12<sup>2</sup> 'she . . . cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be' (διαλογίζομαι): cf. 2 Mac 11<sup>13</sup> 'casting with himself what loss he had had'; and Addison (1719), 'I have lately been casting in my thoughts the several unhappineses of life.' Cast out, in many obvious senses, also (1) = vomit, Is 26<sup>19</sup> 'the earth shall c. out the dead' (RV 'c. forth'); cf. Hollybush (1561), 'He that hath a drye cough and doth not caste out'; and Wyclif's tr. of 2 P 2<sup>22</sup> 'The hound turnede agen to his castyng'; (2) 'to excommunicate' or make an outcast, Jn 9<sup>35</sup> 'Jesus heard that they had c. him out'; (3) 'to expose' children, Ac 7<sup>1</sup> 'they c. out their young children' (ποιεῖν ἐκθετον). Cast upon: 'to make dependent on,' Ps 22<sup>10</sup> 'I was c. upon thee from the womb.'

CASTLE.—1. The word, קָרָה, rendered castle in the AV of Gn 25<sup>15</sup>, Nu 31<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>64</sup>, denotes originally a circular group of tents, the encampment of a nomad tribe—RV 'encampment'; LXX ἐκαστὸς; 1 Ch κάμη; Vulg. oppidum, castellum, castra, etc. In English translations of the Bible till the 16th cent., 'castle,' like the Latin castellum, is often used in the sense of 'village'; but the rendering of the AV seems to be due to the influence of Jewish tradition. Thus in the Targs. קָרָה is rendered by קָרָה, i.e. a large town, Onk. in Gn 25<sup>15</sup>; קָרָה = castra, T. Jer. ih.; קָרָה, i.e. a fortress, T. Jer. in Ezk 25<sup>4</sup>. Similarly, the word is rendered incorrectly 'castle,' P-39-4 AVm; Ca 8<sup>9</sup> AV.

It is supposed to have been the custom, from an early date, among the inhabitants of Pal., to erect in their towns a fortified tower or citadel, e.g. the 'tower' (מגדל) of Peniel (Jg 8<sup>9-17</sup>), or of Thebez (ib. 9<sup>54</sup>); the 'hold' (מגדל) and tower of Shechem (ib. 9<sup>54</sup>); the 'stronghold' of Zion at Jerusalem (2 S 5<sup>7-9</sup> = 1 Ch 11<sup>1-7</sup>, AV 'castle'). Citadels of a similar character were built in connexion with the royal palaces at Tirzah (1 K 16<sup>18</sup>) and at Samaria (2 K 15<sup>25</sup>); but the word here used, מִצְדָּה, which does not appear before the royal period, is applied not only to a castle or fortress (Pr 18<sup>12</sup>, cf. Ps 48<sup>13</sup>, La 2<sup>5</sup>), but generally to palaces or prominent buildings (cf. Hos 8<sup>14</sup>, Am 5<sup>32</sup>, Jer 9<sup>21</sup> 30<sup>18</sup> etc.). Many of the kings of Judah devoted their attention to strengthening their dominions by fortifying cities in strong positions, and building towers and castles to protect outlying districts (2 Ch 17<sup>12</sup> 27<sup>4</sup>, cf. 1 Ch 27<sup>25</sup>; on the word מִצְדָּה, see below). Such measures are ascribed especially to Jehoshaphat and Jotham.

In the time of Nehemiah we hear of a castle or citadel in Jerusalem, which is apparently connected with the temple (Neh 2<sup>8</sup> 7<sup>4</sup>). The term מִצְדָּה, which is found only in late Hebrew, is applied to the Temple of Solomon (1 Ch 29<sup>1-19</sup>), and to the Persian royal castle or palace at Susa (Neh 1<sup>1</sup>, Dn 8<sup>2</sup>, Est passim): it is probably of Persian origin (baru=fortress, castle), and a derivative from it, מִצְדָּה, also occurs (2 Ch 17<sup>12</sup> 27<sup>4</sup>). The citadel of Nehemiah stood probably on the site afterwards occupied by the castle of the Hasmonæan high priests and kings, to which Josephus gives the name of βάσις (Ant. xv. xi. 4, xviii. iv. 3; Wars, i. xxi. 1). When the temple was rebuilt, Herod also rebuilt and strengthened this fortress, calling it Antonia after his patron M. Antonius. It stood on the north side of the temple, with which it was connected by means of cloisters and stairs (καταβάσεις, Jos. Wars, v. v. 8; ἀναβάσεις, Ac 21<sup>35</sup>). Under Roman rule, the one cohort, which formed the cohortus of Jerusalem, was stationed in this fortress, for its position enabled the officer in command to keep watch over the temple and its courts. From the fort of Antonia the commander of the temple with his soldiers, who raised a riot again (Ac 21<sup>31-36</sup>), while in the barracks attached to the fort (παραμβολή, lit. camp, AV castle) the apostle was confined till he was sent under escort to Cæsarea (Ac 21<sup>37</sup> 22<sup>24</sup> 23<sup>35</sup>). The destruction of the communications between Antonia and the temple was one of the first acts of the Jews on the outbreak of the rebellion in A.D. 66 (Jos. Wars, ii. xv. 6).

In Maccabæan times we hear of another citadel in Jerusalem, in the city of David, which, both in 1 and 2 Mac and in Josephus, bears the name of 'Ακρά, also 'Ακρόπολις (2 Mac 4<sup>12-27</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>). Though not originally built by Antiochus Epiphanes (see 2 Mac 11<sup>c.</sup>), it was newly fortified by him, and occupied by a Syrian garrison (1 Mac 1<sup>33-36</sup>, Jos. Ant. xii. v. 4). The Jews, under the leadership of the Maccabees, made several ineffectual attempts to expel the Syrians (1 Mac 6<sup>19-32</sup> 10<sup>6-9</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>); but it was not till B.C. 142 that Simon forced the garrison to capitulate, and entered the citadel in triumph (1 Mac 13<sup>49-52</sup>). According to 1 Mac 14<sup>36</sup>, Simon strengthened and garrisoned the fort; but Josephus (Ant. xiii. vi. 7; Wars, v. iv. 1) relates that the fort was destroyed, and the hill on which it stood levelled after three years' continuous labour, in order that it might no longer overlook the temple. The site of Acra is much disputed; but the question whether it stood north (so most writers) or south of the temple (Schürer, HJP i. i. 207 f.; Benzing, Heb. Archæol. p. 47), cannot be discussed here.

CAT.—It seems strange that an animal so well known, and so long associated with man in Egypt, should not have been domesticated among the Greeks and Romans, or mentioned in the canonical books of Scripture. The word αἰλουροι is used once in the Apocr. (Ep. Jer v. 22 [Gr. 21]). Herodotus (ii. 66) uses the word for the domestic cat. This animal is now more common by far in Bible lands than in the West, yet Tristram and Houghton declare that no trace of its name is found in classical authors, except in connexion with Egypt. There are two species of wild cat in the Holy Land. Felis maniculata, Rüpp., the Abyssinian wild cat, which is supposed to be the wild original of the domestic cat, and is called by the Arabs kutt el-khald, is rare west of the Jordan, but common to the eastward. The body is 2 ft. long, and the tail 11 in. Felis chaus, Güld., the jungle cat, is known in Arab. as el-kutt el-barri. It is about as large as the domestic cat, and resembles a lynx.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES (ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαί).—

The title given to a group of seven Epistles of the NT, which bear the names of James, Peter, John, and Jude. From an early period in the history of the Church these Epistles were dealt with as a class by themselves. There were reasons for this, lying in their contents and in the authorship accepted authorship. They form a distinct and interesting section of the NT literature. They have some obvious points of affinity with each other. There are resemblances, e.g., between 1 P and Ja.; while Jude and 2 P have much matter in common. These seven Epistles have some remarkable coincidences both with other books of the NT and with non-canonical writings of ancient date. There are unmistakable similarities in thought and style, with certain marked differences, between the Johannine Epistles and the other writings ascribed to St. John. There are resemblances between 1 P and the Pauline Epistles, especially those to the Romans and the Ephesians. Jude quotes the Book of Enoch, and refers, as it seems, to the Book of Baruch; while in James we have the Book of Baruch.

These seven Epistles are not all of one piece. There are notable differences in style and contents between the several members of the group. While they are all letters, they differ considerably in epistolary form. Some of them (2 and 3 Jn) are simple, personal letters. One of them (James) is rather of the nature of a sententious Wisdom writing, like parts of the Hokkma literature of the OT and Judaism. Others, especially 1 Jn, have the appearance of Pastorals or Epistolary Manifestoes (Westcott's The Epistles of St. John, pp. xxix, xxx; Moulton's The Literary Study of the Bible, pp. 292, 442). As a class, however, they have a character which readily distinguishes them from the Epistles which bear Paul's name, and from the Epistle to the Hebrews. They make a contribution of essential value to the body of NT teaching. They have their own ideas, their own forms of expression, their own view of the truth taught in common by the first writers. They have had different degrees of acceptance in different parts of the Church in different ages. They have been, and continue to be, the subject of much debate with regard to their origin, date, authorship, and claims. For these questions see the articles on the several Epistles.

These seven Epistles are not given in the same order in ancient MSS, versions, and catalogues. Jerome notices a difference in this respect between the Greek and the Latin codices (Prolog. 7. Epist. Canon.). The order in which they stand in our English Bible (Ja. 1 and 2 P, 1, 2, 3 Jn, Jude) is the order in which they occur in most ancient documents. It is the order that is followed in Codex B, in the Canon of the gards the origin and use of the terms Catholic and Canonical in this connexion. Different views have been taken concerning the meaning and intention of the title, and fanciful speculations have also been indulged in. It has been supposed by some (Pareus, Prolog. in Jac.) that the name καθολικαί as applied to these Epp. was accidental, no definite purpose being attached to it. It has been supposed by others to be intended to express their doctrinal harmony; Augusti, e.g., taking it to designate them as 'in der Lehre übereinstimmende Schriften.' The main explanations proposed, however, are these.

1. That the term refers to the authorship of these writings and their position as a distinct group. This is the view of Hug, who regards the word as a 'technical expression for one class of biblical writings which possesses it exclusively and communicates it to no other; namely, for that class which comprised in itself the didactical compositions of the apostles collectively, with the exception of Paul, καθολικός, i.e. καθόλου καὶ συλλήβδην. When the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles constituted one peculiar division, the works of Paul also another, there still remained writings of different authors which might likewise form a collection by themselves, to which a name must be given. It might most aptly be called the common collection, καθολικὴν σύνταγμα, of the apostles, and the treatises contained in it, κοινὰ καὶ καθολικὰ, which are commonly used by the Greeks as synonymous.' He appeals in support of this to Clement of Alexandria, who, he says, 'calls the Epistle, which was dictated by the assembly of the apostles (Ac 15<sup>23</sup>), the Catholic Epistle, as that in which all the apostles had a share, τὴν ἐπιστολὴν καθολικὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων ἀπάντων.' Whence he concludes that 'the seven Epistles are Catholic, or Epistles of all the apostles, who are authors' (Introd. to Writings of NT, p. 537, etc., Wait's tr.). This explanation has been followed more or less completely by Schleiermacher and Pott, by Eichhorn so far, and some others. Otherwise it has met with little favour. It is not borne out by Clement's statement. It disregards the fact that the term Catholic is applied by early ecclesiastical writers to compositions like the Ep. of Barnabas, the Ep. of Dionysius, the Ep. of Themison. It makes ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαὶ equivalent to αἱ λοιπαὶ ἐπιστολαὶ καθόλου. But there is nothing to show that the term καθολικός was employed elsewhere to express any such idea as that of common apostolic authorship, one collection of writings written by all together.

2. Others, therefore, term to refer to the place of these Epistles in the Church, their ecclesiastical recognition, the fact that they were universally received as genuine, their canonicity. Michaelis (Introd. to NT, vi. p. 270, Michaelis's tr.) takes this view, holding that the word was used by Origen to distinguish 1 P and 1 Jn as undisputed Epp. from 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, and Jude, about which there was no such consent of opinion, and that it was given also to these five in course of time as they ceased to be doubted. This explanation, or one not materially different, is given also by Horne, Guericke, and others. It is supposed by some that there is an indication of the identification of the word Catholic with the word Canonical in the Muratorian Fragment, in the puzzling sentence 'Epistola sancti Jude et superscriptio Johannis duas in Catholica habentur.' Some refer in support of this view to the passage in which Eusebius, speaking of James who is 'said to have written the first of the Catholic Epistles,' and of Jude as also 'one of the seven Catholic Epistles,' adds that 'nevertheless we know that these, with the rest, are publicly used in most of the churches' (HE ii. 23). This is relevant, however, to the question of public use in the church, but not to more. For it speaks also of James as 'considered spurious' (ροβήεσθαι). Most found rather on the passage, also in Eusebius (HE iii. 3), in which mention is made of certain works ascribed to Peter, his Acts, the Gospel according to Peter, the Preaching, and the Revelation of Peter, and it is said of them 'we have seen them' (οὐδ' ὅλως ἐν καθολικοῖς ἴσμεν παραδεδομένα), for neither of the ancients nor of those of our own time has any ecclesiastical writer made use of testimonies from them.' Here, it is thought, the word in the phrase καθολικοῖς must have the sense of genuine, undisputed, universally received. Others, however, think the phrase may mean 'handed down among catholic Christians' (Charteris, Canonicity, p. 289), or publicly read in the churches, the question of genuineness not being in view (Kirchhoff, op. cit., p. 257). It is with the undisputed and undisputed books that Eusebius deals there. But what is referred to in his statement is not one class of the NT books, but these books as a whole; not the Catholic Epp. in particular, but the Catholic writings (γραφῶν) generally. Further, if the sense supposed were the true sense, the term would be no distinctive title of these seven Epistles, marking them off from the Pauline Epistles, which were no less canonical or generally received in the Church. Nor does this view cover the fact that the term catholic is used by Origen, as we have seen, of the Ep. of Barnabas, and by Eusebius of the Epp. of Dionysius of Corinth to the Lacedæmonians, the Athenians, the Nicomedi-ans, and other Churches (HE iv. 23), of none of which it could be said that they were canonical or universally received. Nor has it regard, again, to the fact that only some of the seven Epistles were universally received at the time when the term was applied to the group as a whole. Eusebius himself in his chapter on 'The Divine Scriptures acknowledged as genuine, and those that are not' (HE iii. 25), distinguishes 1 Jn and 1 P as ἐν ὁμολογούμενοις from the other five as of the ἀντιλεγόμενων γνηρίων δ' ὅν ὁμῶς τοῖς πολλοῖς. There is nothing in the facts to conflict with the idea that this came in course of time to be the sense. There is everything to rebut the assertion that it was the original and proper sense.

3. Others suppose that the term refers to the character of the contents of these Epp., the catholicity of their doctrine, their being received from others which were heretical or authoritative Epp.—Epp. whose teaching was in harmony with Christian truth, or the Church's faith. So Salmeron held it to define them as giving the one true catholic doctrine which the whole Church might profitably receive. Similar is the explanation of Cornelius à Lapide and others. This view, too, is supposed to be favoured by the passage in which Eusebius speaks of the Acts, the Gospel, and other alleged writings of Peter. But the supposition has as little to support it in this case as in (2). The term so interpreted would equally fail to serve as a distinctive title of the group; for in this sense Paul's Epp. were as catholic as these. Further, it overlooks the fact that the title is used of the heretical Epistle of Themison.

4. Consequently, it is held that the term refers to the destination of the Epp., as distinguished from the Pauline as Encyclical letters, differing from the Pauline Epp. as being addressed, not to individuals or to single Churches, but to the Church universal, to circles of Churches, or to readers scattered over wide territories. This is the explanation given by Oecumenius (See. x.) in the Preface to his Commentary on the Epistle of James: καθολικὰ λέγονται αὐταὶ ὥστε ἐγκύκλιοι. Οὐ γὰρ ἀφορισμένους ἔθνη ἐν ἡ express it. 3. צֹאן zōn. This word is translated AV 'cattle' in two places (Gn 30<sup>44</sup> 31<sup>43</sup>), in both of which RV has 'flocks,' i.e. both sheep and goats. 4. בָּקָר bāqār. This word, which means oxen, is rendered in one place AV translated cattle (Nu 20<sup>4</sup>, Ps 78<sup>48</sup>), RV adds Nu 20<sup>8</sup>. 5. רֶמֶשׂ remes. This word, which means one of a flock of sheep or goats (i.e. shāt), is once tr. AV 'lesser cattle,' RV 'sheep' (Is 7<sup>25</sup>), and once AV, RV 'small cattle' (Is 43<sup>23</sup>). See SHEEP.

The word 'cattle' occurs twice in NT, once (Jn 4<sup>13</sup>) as the tr. of θρέμματα, and once (Lk 17<sup>7</sup>) in the collocation 'feeding cattle' (ποιμαίνοντα, RV 'keeping sheep'). G. E. POST.

CAUDA (Καῦδα in B, confirmed by a few inferior authorities, by Καυδᾶ in Suidas, Καῦδος in Notitia Episcopatum, viii. 240; Gaudus in Pliny, Nat. Hist. iv. 12 (61), and Pomp. Mela, ii. 114. Καῦδα is the form in κ, supported by the α of other authorities, and by Καῦδος in Ptol. i. 15. 8; Hierocles, Synecd. 651, 2,* and Notitia Episcop. 9. 149; and Καῦδα in the Stadiasmus Maris Magni, § 328, AV Clauda) was an island off the S. coast of Crete. Amid the varying forms of the name, the preference must be given to the forms in which the letter L is omitted, as is proved beyond dispute by the mod. forms Gavdho in Greek and Gozzo in Italian. The Alex. ship laden with corn in which Paul sailed from Myra for Rome, after lying becalmed for a considerable time in Fair Havens, proceeded on its course favoured by a light northerly breeze; but shortly after rounding Cape Matala (about 4 miles on its course), while the vessel was standing towards W.N.W. across the mouth of the Gulf of Messara, it was caught by a sudden eddying blast from E.N.E., which struck down from the lofty mountains of the island, and it could do nothing except seek before the wind, until, after running about 23 miles, it was able to get under the lee of Cauda (Ac 27<sup>16</sup>), where in calmer water it became possible to attend to the condition of the ship. The perfect agreement of the description in Ac with the natural features and names on the coast (where, according to Captain Stewart, R.N., 'southerly winds almost invariably shift to a violent northerly wind') has been admirably brought out by James Smith in his Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, p. 96 ff. α to Suidas, wild asses of unusually large size on the island. There was a city on the island, which was the seat of a bishop in Byzantine times. It lay almost due S. of Phoenix, and is mentioned next to it in the Byzantine authorities.

W. M. RAMSAY.

CAUL (Fr. cale, a small cap or head-dress. Now obsol.).—1. (צֹאן) The fatty envelope of the liver, which, with the fat of the kidneys and other inward parts (Ex 29<sup>13, 22</sup>, Lv 3<sup>4</sup>, etc.), was to be burnt on the altar as an offering by fire unto the Lord. In Hos 13<sup>8</sup> the rending of the caul or enclosure (רֶמֶשׂ) of the heart is a term of uttermost destruction. See MEDICINE.

2. צִנְזִיף Is 3<sup>18</sup>, RV 'networks.' This was most probably the small head-veil, now of fine network or art muslin with floral designs, worn in the East over the brow and crown, and fastened loosely behind the neck under the hair. It is counted indelicate to go to the door or garden without it. Much art is often expended upon it. It is fringed with silk embroidery, and adorned with gold thread, tiny gilt discs, and other ornaments. The Heb. shabîš seems to have the same root-meaning as the Arab. mutashabbas, applied to the network or interlacing of tree-branches; and similarly, the Arab. term for fine damask of branch and foliage-like design is mu-shajjar, from shajarah, a tree. G. M. MACKIE.

* Constantine Porphyrog., de Them., is hardly an independent authority, but depends on Hierocles, whom he very often quotes

CAUSE.—The obsol. phrase 'for his c.' = 'for his sake' is used 2 Co 7<sup>12</sup>. 'I did it for his c. that had done the wrong' (ἐνεκεν). Cf. Ps 69<sup>6</sup> Pr. Bk. 'Let not them that trust in thee . . . be ashamed for my c.' (בִּי, AV 'for my sake,' RV 'through me'). Twice 'c.' is used in the vague sense of 'matter' (as if on the way to Ital. cosa, Fr. chose): 1 K 12<sup>15</sup> 'the c. was from the LORD' (כִּי, LXX μεταστροφή, RV 'it was a thing brought about of the LORD'); 2 Ch 10<sup>15</sup> 'the c. was of God' (בְּכִי, LXX as before, the only occurrences of the Gr. as of the Heb.; RV 'it was brought about of God'). Causeless is an adv. in 1 S 25<sup>31</sup> 'thou hast shed blood c.'; but not in Pr 26<sup>2</sup> 'the curse c. shall not come' (both כִּי, RV here 'that is c.' after Geneva). J. HASTINGS.

CAUSEWAY.—This is the spelling of mod. edd. of AV (except in Pr 15<sup>12m</sup>) for the 1611 spelling 'causey.' But the words are not the same. A causey is a mound or dam, made by treading (late Lat. calciāre), and a causeway is a way or road formed on such a mound. It occurs 1 Ch 26<sup>16, 18</sup>; Is 7<sup>3</sup> AVm (1611 כִּי . . . יָגֵן' for 'highway' in text; the Heb. (כִּי . . . יָגֵן) means a way 'cast up' or raised up. J. HASTINGS.

CAVE (סִפְלִיאוֹן, σπήλαιον, spelunca).—1. Palestine is a region . . . in caves; hence the frequent reference to caves in the Bible. Natural caves and caverns are to be found in most countries formed of limestone strata and considerably elevated above the sea level; such as Malta, Sicily, parts of Italy,* and Derbyshire in England. In such countries the underground acidulated waters dissolve channels for themselves out of the rock, and upon a change of level with reference to their outlet, they leave these channels for others; the old channels becoming caverns with dry floors, and roofs decorated with stalactites. The elevated character of Western Palestine and its calcareous structure have naturally resulted in the formation of caves which in OT times, and still later, have become interwoven with the historical events of that country; and, as Dean Stanley observes, when Christianity became degraded in the early centuries, caves, the real or supposed scenes in the history of our Lord, became the seats of worship and of the Eastern Christians. Thus the 'cave of the Holy Sepulchre' at Jerusalem and the 'cave of the Nativity' at Bethlehem, both discovered or identified according to Eusebius by the empress Helena, have remained shrines of semi-idolatrous devotion down to the present day.

2. Prehistoric caves have been found in Palestine, and it is not unlikely that the Horites of Mount Seir (Gn 14<sup>8</sup> 36<sup>20</sup>), who were cave dwellers as their name implies, were the representatives of early cave-dwelling races of other countries.† The Horites were expelled by the Edomites; and the vast caverns artificially hewn out of the sandstone rock of Petra, the Edomite capital, attest the extent to which these early inhabitants made use of such hollows both for habitations and as sepulchres for the dead.‡ See Driver on Dt 2<sup>12</sup>.

* 'Quatuor sunt montane gentes, Tarati, Soffinati, Balari, Aconites, in speluncis habitantes,' Strabo, v. 225.

† It may be observed that there is no authority in the account of the Nativity for connecting the event with a cave: see Mt 2<sup>11</sup>, Lk 2<sup>7, 12</sup>.

‡ Strabo, l. 42, xvi. 775, 776.

§ The caverns of Upper Egypt, hewn out of the same formation as the Arabian sandstone, were made use of by the ancient Egyptians for similar purposes.

3. Caves were largely made use of in the troublous times of Israelitish history as places of refuge: as such the following may be specially mentioned:—

(a) The cave in the hills above Zoar inhabited by Lot and his two daughters (Gn 19<sup>30</sup>).

(b) The cave of Makkedah at Beth-horon, in which the five kings of the Canaanites hid themselves (Jos 10<sup>16</sup>).

(c) Caves in which the Israelites hid themselves from the Midianites in the time of the Judges (Jg 6<sup>2</sup>), and from the Philistines in the time of Saul (1 S 13<sup>3</sup>). Both these references point to the conclusion that caves, both natural and artificial, were very numerous in these times; some of them may be now covered over and their entrances hidden from view.

(e) The cave of En-gedi, in the cliffs overlooking the Dead Sea, was another place of refuge for David, after he had been dislodged from the cave of Adullam (1 S 23<sup>29</sup> 24<sup>3</sup>). See ENGEDI.

(f) The cave in which Obadiah fed the prophets of the Lord in the days of Ahab (1 K 18<sup>4</sup>). This cave was probably situated on the flank of Mount Carmel.

The above instances explain the language of Is 24<sup>10</sup>, 19, 21 where 'men shall go into the caves of the rocks, and into the holes of the earth, from before the terror of the LORD, and from the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake mightily the earth.'

4. Caves, both natural and artificial, were used as places of sepulture: the cave of Machpelah, purchased of Ephron the Hittite, was the sepulchre of Sarah (Gn 23<sup>18</sup>), and afterwards of Abraham (Gn 25<sup>9</sup>), Isaac (35<sup>27-28</sup>), and Jacob (50<sup>13</sup>). There can be no doubt but that the mosque of Hebron covers the last resting-place of the patriarchs; it is a spot considered of the highest sanctity by the Arab tribes.†

E. HULL.

CEDAR (עֵץ 'erez, κέδρος, cedrus).—We cannot enter intelligently on the discussion of the cedar without premising that the Heb. word 'erez was probably used for three or more different trees. In this it resembles its English equivalent. Cedar, in English, is used for the cedar of Lebanon, for the Bermuda cedar, of which lead pencils are made, for Juniperus Virginiana, L., and for Cupressus thyoides, L., and other trees. The cedar wood, which (acc. to P) was used with scarlet and hyssop for purification (Lv 14<sup>4</sup>, Nu 19<sup>6</sup>), was not, in all probability, the cedar of Lebanon, but a plant obtainable in Sinai, and afterwards in Palestine. Such a tree is Juniperus Phœnicea, L., which is found on Mt. Hor, and on the brow of the Edomitic limestone cliffs overlooking the Arabah, and probably in the Sinaitic peninsula. If no longer there, there is nothing in the climate to hinder its having grown there formerly. Houghton erroneously calls it oxycedrus, which is a shrub or small tree of the mountains of Syria.

It is uncertain what tree is meant by 'arazim (Nu 24<sup>6</sup>). They are said to be trees growing by water. The cedar of Lebanon does not grow in moist places. On the contrary, it seeks the dry sloping mountain-side, where nothing but the moisture in the clefts of the rocks nourishes

it. Unless we suppose, as has been hinted in the article on ALOES, that the location of the 'arazim is poetic licence, we must suppose some water-loving tree to be intended in this passage, certainly not the Cedrus Libani, Barr., nor Juniperus oxycedrus, Lam., nor indeed any of the conifers of the Holy Land.

Avicenna defines 'arz, in Arab., as the well-known juniper berry. This is the product of Juniperus communis, L.

In most of the passages of Scripture not already cited, probably in all, there can be no doubt that the cedar of Lebanon is intended. Let us analyse them in detail. (1) It was abundant (1 K 6<sup>9-18</sup> 10<sup>27</sup>). There is every reason to believe that the cedar was exceedingly abundant in Solomon's day. The remains of the old forests exist above el-Me'asir, Bartk, 'Ain-Zehalta, el-Hadeth, Beshherri, Sir, and the Duniyeh. They probably covered all the sub-alpine peaks of Lebanon. It is also extremely probable that the cedar flourished in those days on Hermon and Antilebanon, both of which belong to the Lebanon system, and are suited climatically to the growth of these trees. Large forests of them exist in Amanus, and thence

A CEDAR FROM THE BESHERRI GROVE.

(It is not one of the largest, but exhibits the characteristic shape and horizontal ramification.)

they extend northward and westward to Akherdagh, and for a long distance into the Taurus. The cedar existed also in Cyprus; and large forests of it are found in the Atlas and the Himalayas. (2) It was a tall tree (Is 2<sup>13</sup>, Am 2<sup>9</sup>). Several of the trees in the Beshherri grove are 60 or 70 ft. high. In Amanus it often reaches 100 ft. It is quite likely that it reached or exceeded this height in Lebanon. (3) It was not only a tree 'of a high stature,' but one 'with fair (beautiful) branches, and with a shadowing shroud' (dense shade) (Ezk 31<sup>3</sup>). No quality of the cedar tree is more beautiful than its horizontal spray, with an upper surface flat, and presenting an even carpet of dark green, ornamented with its yellow staminate and purple pistillate cones. (4) It was suitable for the masts of ships (Ezk 27<sup>5</sup>). It has been objected that the cedar has a thick, gnarled trunk, too short for a mast. This is true of the old weather-beaten veterans in the open groves of Lebanon at the present day. But in Amanus, where the growth is close and forest-like, there are multitudes of tall straight trunks, every way suitable for masts. Indeed, many of the younger trees of the Beshherri grove would make excellent masts for ships of the size of those in Ezekiel's time. It has been proposed to consider the Pinus Halepensis, Mill., as the 'erez here intended. It is curious that this pine is still known in some parts of Lebanon by the name 'arz, and also in t<sup>r</sup> Aleppo. But it is not so well as the true cedar, and, although abundant throughout Lebanon, is also equally abundant in Pal., east and west of the Jordan. It is unlikely that Ezekiel would have spoken of the tree as the 'cedar from Lebanon,' if he had intended the Aleppo pine, which the Tyrians could have cut from the hill-country close to their city. (5) It was suitable for beams, pillars, and boards (1 K 6<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>). The cedars of Amanus, where the normal growth obtains, could furnish a board 60 to 80 ft. long, and 6 to 8 ft. wide at the bottom, and 2 or more at top. They could furnish pillars and beams of any required thickness. The timber is indestructible by dry rot or borers. It is close-grained, sound to the heart, fragrant, and of a pleasing colour. We have abundant testimony as to its durability. Pliny says that the cedar roof of the temple of Diana at Ephesus lasted 400 years. That of the temple of Apollo at Utica lasted 1170 years. (6) It was suitable for carved work, as images (Is 44<sup>14, 15</sup>). Cedar wood is better fitted for this purpose than almost any other wood in the land. It is hard, and takes a high polish. (7) It must be run or sap (Ps 92<sup>14</sup>). The balsamic juice of the cedar exudes from every pore. Large beads and nodules of the fragrant resin form on the uninjured branches. An incision into the bark is followed by a copious distillation of the same. Where two branches meet and interlock, they each pour out the life-giving sap, which cements them, so that they grow fast to one another. Numerous examples of this can be seen in the grove at Beshherri. (8) It was the king of trees. It is placed at the head of the vegetable kingdom by Solomon (1 K 4<sup>33</sup>). Abimelech concedes its superiority (Jg 9<sup>13</sup>). It is perhaps alluded to as 'the glory of Lebanon' (Is 35<sup>2</sup> 60<sup>13</sup>). The cedars are 'the trees of the Lord' (Ps 104<sup>16</sup>). The Arabs still know them by the name 'arz er-rubb, 'the cedars of the Lord.' When the cedar falls, the fir, itself a noble tree, howls, as a vassal for his lord (Zec 11<sup>2, 3</sup>). When Jehoash wished to express his contempt for Amaziah, he compared himself to a cedar and Amaziah to a thistle, and said, 'there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trode down the thistle' (2 K 14<sup>9</sup>). The highest boast of Sennacherib was that he would 'cut down the tall cedars' (Is 37<sup>24</sup>). (9) Of this tree much of the temple was built, also the palaces of David and Solomon, and many other grand buildings of Jerusalem. It was probably at that epoch that the denudation of Lebanon began.

The cedar is known by the natives of restricted localities in Lebanon by two other names. Thus the people in the neighbourhood of 'Ain-Zehalta, Bâruk, and el-Me'asir call their cedars ibhul. The people in the neighbourhood of Sîr call it tnûb.

CELLAR.—In AV only (1 Ch 27<sup>27, 28</sup>) for wine or for oil. The Heb. (קִמְרָא) is common for any store or storehouse. RV gives 'c.' for AV 'secret place' in Lk 11<sup>33</sup>, reading κρύπτη 'a vault,' 'crypt,' for κρυπτόν 'hidden.' The Greek word is used by Jos. BJ v. vii. 4, 'They set the tower on fire, and leapt into the c. beneath.' See HOUSE.

CENCHREÆ.—Cenchreæ or Kenchreæ (not, as AV, Cenchrea; usually spelt Κενχ., by T., WH Κενχ.), where St. Paul, before sailing for Syria, had his hair shorn in compliance with a vow (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>), and where Phoebe was a deaconess (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>). C. was the seaport of Corinth, on the eastern side of the isthmus (see CORINTH). It doubtless had its share in the bustle, luxury, and licence of the mother-city; but, under the influence of St. Paul, it early became the seat of a local church, whose deaconess had the honour of bearing the apostle's letter to the Roman Church.

CENDEBÆUS (Κενδεβαῖος), a general of Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who was given the command of the sea-coast, and sent with an army into Palestine in order to enforce the claims of Antiochus against Simon Maccabæus (comp. ATHENOBIOUS). Cendebæus occupied Jamnia, fortified Kidron, a place not otherwise known, and then began to make raids upon Judæa. Owing to his advanced age Simon did not go out to battle himself, but placed his two sons, Judas and John, in command. The battle took place in a plain not far from Modin; and the Jews, although obliged to cross a torrent-bed before commencing the attack, gained a complete victory over Cendebæus, and pursued the Syrians as far as Kidron and the neighbourhood of Ashdod (1 Mac 15<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>3</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3).

CENSER.—Two Heb. words are thus rendered in our Eng. version, קָטֹרֶת and קִמְרָא. The latter, from the same root as the word for incense, is rendered by the LXX in the two places where it occurs (2 Ch 26<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 8<sup>11</sup>) θυμιατήριον. For this reason χρυσοῦν θυμιατήριον of He 9<sup>4</sup> has been understood since Jerome's time to mean 'golden censer' (AV, RV). The best modern authorities, however, have decided in favour of the rendering 'golden altar of incense' (so RVm after Bleek, Del. etc.), a sense in which the word frequently occurs in Philo and Josephus (for ref. see Thayer, NT Lex. sub voc.).

Elsewhere in OT the vessel used to carry the charcoal on which the incense was burned is termed קָטֹרֶת. In AV and RV our translators have only in certain cases given the rendering 'censer,' preferring 'firepan' in those passages, apparently, where the קָטֹרֶת is mentioned among the utensils connected with the altar of burnt-offering, as in Ex 27<sup>3</sup>, Nu 4<sup>4</sup> RV* etc.

There is no reason for this distinction, one and the same utensil being intended throughout. The קָטֹרֶת was so constructed as to be capable not merely of lifting the glowing charcoal from the altar of burnt-offering,—so much is indicated by its etymology from קָטַף to take up 'live coals' from the hearth,—but also of containing a quantity sufficient to burn at least two handfuls of incense (Lv 16<sup>12</sup>). We may therefore think of it as a bowl-shaped implement furnished with a short handle,—in other words, as a species of ladle. The censers of the Pent. (only in P) are of the same material as the great altar, probably bronze (Ex 27<sup>3</sup>, cf. Nu 16<sup>33, 39</sup>). Those of Solomon's temple were of gold (1 K 7<sup>30</sup>,

* It is not correct to say, as in Smith's DB, 21 p. 552, that the vessels enumerated (Nu 4<sup>4</sup>) are those of 'the golden Altar, i.e. of incense.' These have been mentioned but not named in v. 10. Besides, 'the altar' (v. 15) is invariably in the Pent. the altar of burnt-offering.

2 K 25<sup>18</sup>). A censer of silver is mentioned in connexion with the daily offering in Tamid v. 4, 5, Yoma iv. 4. The favourite LXX renderings are πυρέτωρ (cf. Sir 50<sup>9</sup>) and θυτήκη (cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>22</sup>).

It is now impossible to say in what respect, if at all, the תנור differed from the תנור. Delitzsch is certainly mistaken in identifying (art. 'Raucherpfanne' in Riehm's HBA<sup>2</sup>) the latter with the vessel designated תנ (see Nu 7<sup>148</sup>), EV spoon, more probably a bowl with a handle, and therefore of similar shape to תנור (hence LXX θυτήκη), in any case a vessel in which the incense was kept (cf. the תנ with incense on the table of shewbread, Ex 25<sup>29</sup>). The context in which it occurs (see above) requires us, in each case, to see in the תנור a proper censer.

The censer (תנ?) appears in the imagery of the Apoc. (8<sup>3-5</sup>) as 'golden vials (φιάλας) full of odours' (RV more correctly 'the golden bowls full of incense') have been suggested by the תנ or incense-holders just mentioned. For the use of this vessel in Herod's temple see Tamid v. vi.

Among the implements of the golden candlestick were its תנור, EV snuff dishes. These were probably not trays for the snuffers as the LXX rendering in Ex 25<sup>38</sup> (ὀμβόεμα) would suggest, but rather a utensil of the same shape as the censer, in which to receive and carry away the burnt portions of the wicks.

Representations of the censers used by the ancient Egyptians are still extant. They consisted of a small pot or cup with a long handle (Kitto, Encycl. Bibl. Lit. 1862, p. 461) into which little pellets of incense were projected at intervals by the priest.

In early Christian times the use of censers is not mentioned; it appears to have commenced about the 4th cent. A.D., probably for antiseptic fumigation. In the 8th cent., however, their use was general, and directions for their adoption were given by local synods. But symbolical meanings became by degrees attached to the burning of incense. In many cathedrals on the Continent and in this country very valuable thuribles or censers of gold and silver (cf. Herod. iv. 162; Thucyd. vi. 46; Cic. Verr. iv. 21-24) are still to be found, some of them weighing as much as 16 lbs., and evidently not intended to be swung like the ordinary censer. In form modern censers vary considerably, being usually oval, but sometimes square. The ordinary form used by the Jews is of an octagonal shape. In Europe they are generally furnished with a foot and a handle, and are used to the lower portion of which is being attached to the lid, so that it can be raised when required. There is usually a small shallow pan enclosed in the censer to receive live charcoal. They are now usually made of brass, as used in the Roman and Anglican services. The incense used for the censer is generally carried by an acolyte in a boat-shaped brass box, containing a spoon for sprinkling it on the censer.

CENTURION (Latin, centurio; Gr. κεντυρίων in Mk; ἐκατοντάρχης, ἐκατονταρχος in Mt, Lk, and Ac;—see critical authorities in Grimm-Thayer for the two forms of this word).—An officer in the Roman army in command of a century (centuria), which corresponded to the civil curia, and consisted of a body of men numbering from 50 to 100, according to the size of the legion of which it was a subdivision. Though resembling a British captain in the size of the unit under his command, the centurion in social position was equal only to a British non-commissioned officer. He could not become more than a centurion, except through exceptional circumstances, but left the service when his time was up and settled in some small town, to live on the smaller or larger fortune he had acquired in the wars.

We meet with centurions in the NT on five occasions—two of these being connected with incidents in the life of our Lord, one with St. Peter, and two with St. Paul. 1. At Capernaum a centurion came to Jesus to seek healing for his servant (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>2-10</sup>). This man was a Gentile, but probably not a Roman, because the occurrence took place in the dominions of Herod Antipas (see Holtzmann, Handkom. in loc.). The Herods would be inclined to imitate their Roman patrons in the organisation of their armies. The centurion shows a warm sympathy for his slave, such as was rare among Romans. His reference to his being a man under authority, having soldiers under him, would be esp. appropriate on the lips of a subordinate officer to whom the duty of obeying his superiors was as familiar as that of commanding his men. The Capernaum centurion had probably resided for some time in the city, which would thus appear to have been guarded by a garrison. There he had been so attracted by the good qualities of Judaism as to have built a synagogue, from which it may be inferred that he was a believer in the God of Israel, though evidently he was not a proselyte. He evinced great kindness of heart, humility, and faith—the exceptional strength of his faith surprising and delighting our Lord. 2. A centurion was in charge of the execution of Jesus. This man must have been in the Roman army, as the crucifixion was carried out under the orders of Pontius Pilate, the Roman Procurator. The impression produced on him by the last scene in the life of our Lord is recorded to St. Matthew and St. Mark, he exclaimed, 'Truly this' (Mk 'this man') 'was the son (or a son) of God' (Mt 27<sup>54</sup>, Mk 15<sup>39</sup>); and according to St. Luke 'he glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man' (Lk 23<sup>47</sup>). Whichever phrase he used, it cannot be supposed that as a heathen he fully comprehended the divinity of Christ, but it is clear that he was impressed with our Lord's goodness and greatness. This centurion appears again a little later when Pilate inquires of him as to the fact and time of the death of Jesus (Mk 15<sup>46</sup>). 3. Cornelius, the first Gentile baptized and received into the Church (Ac 10), was a centurion of the Roman garrison at Caesarea, the headquarters of the Procurator, and belonged to the 'Italian band'—(which see). It is evident from the narrative, that Cornelius, like the idea of the people among whom he was serving; but it is also evident that he had not become a proselyte—or St. Peter's scruples would not have needed to be removed by the vision on the house-top, and it seems clear that he was not satisfied with the measure of light he perceived in Judaism. 4. Several centurions of the cohort at Jerusalem under the command of a chiliarch (called 'the chief captain' in Ac 21<sup>31</sup> AV and RV) appear during the riot at Jerusalem, and the subsequent rescue of St. Paul and his arrest (Ac 21<sup>32</sup> 22<sup>28</sup> 23<sup>27</sup> 23). There would be ten centurions to a cohort if the numbers were complete. 5. After his appeal to Caesar, St. Paul was conducted to Rome under the charge of a centurion named

CERTAIN.—1. The orig. meaning of c. is fixed or definite, not fluctuating. It is seen in Ex 16<sup>4</sup> 'gather a c. rate every day' (קָבַצוּ יוֹמִיּוֹת, RV 'a day's portion every day'); 2 Ch 8<sup>13</sup> 'after a c. rate every day' (קָבַצוּ יוֹמִיּוֹת, RV 'as the duty of every day required'); Neh 11<sup>23</sup> 'a c. portion . . . for the singers, due every day' (קָבַצוּ יוֹמִיּוֹת, RV 'a settled provision . . . as every day required'); 1 Co 4<sup>11</sup> 'we . . . have no c. dwelling-place' (ἀσφαλείαν). See also Dn 2<sup>45</sup> 'the dream is c.' (יָבִי: 'fixed,' cf. 2<sup>8</sup> 'I know of certainty,' same Heb.); Ac 25<sup>26</sup> 'of whom I have no c. thing to write' (ἀσφαλείας). Or c. after being ascertained, Dt 13<sup>14</sup> 'Then shalt thou inquire, and make search, and ask diligently; and, behold, if it be truth, and the thing c.' (וְיָבִי), and 17<sup>4</sup>. In this sense is the phrase 'for certain,' 1 K 2<sup>37</sup>, Jer 26<sup>15</sup>; and 'for a certain,' 1 K 2<sup>42</sup> 'know for a c.' (RV 'for c.'), where the a is redundant. See A.

2. When a person or thing is taken out of the fluctuating multitude and fixed in the mind, it need not be further specified, and so becomes indefinite, as in the common phrases 'a certain man,' etc. (Heb. אִישׁ, שָׂרָא, or מֶלֶךְ, Gr. τις mostly, also ἀνθρώπος, Mt 18<sup>23</sup> 21<sup>33</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>, and εἰς). Thus we have, Ac 8<sup>36</sup> 'a c. water'; 5<sup>2</sup> 'a c. part'; Lk 23<sup>19</sup> 'a c. sedition'; 2 Ch 18<sup>2</sup> 'after c. years'; Ezr 10<sup>16</sup> 'c. chiefs of the fathers' (RV 'c. heads of fathers' houses'); and Dn 8<sup>13</sup> 'I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that c. saint which spake,' where we see the word changing from its definite to its indefinite use. 'Certain' in this sense is freq. used alone, where we now use the vaguer 'some,' as Nu 16<sup>2</sup> 'c. of the children of Israel'; 1 Ch 19<sup>6</sup> 'there went c. and told David'; Lk 8<sup>30</sup> 'it was told him by c. which said'; 18<sup>9</sup> 'unto c. which trusted in themselves.'

Certainly, 1 S 20<sup>3</sup> 'Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes,' not 'it is certain that thy father knoweth,' but 'thy father knoweth for a certainty' (Heb. יָדָע, RV 'knoweth well'); so 20<sup>9</sup>, Gn 43<sup>7</sup>, Jer 13<sup>12</sup> 40<sup>14</sup> 42<sup>19</sup> 22. Same Heb. in Jos 23<sup>13</sup> 'know for a certainty'; 1 K 2<sup>37</sup> 'know for certain'; 2<sup>42</sup> 'know for a certain'; Jer 26<sup>15</sup> 'know ye for certain.'

Certainty is used in the obsol. sense of 'the fact,' or 'actual circumstances,' in Lk 1<sup>4</sup> 'that thou mightest know the c. of those things' (ἀσφάλεια); Ac 21<sup>34</sup> 22<sup>30</sup> (τὸ ἀσφαλές). Cf. Shaks. Ham. iv. v. 140—

'If you desire to know the certainty
Of your dear father's death.'

CERTIFY, in AV, means not 'to make certain' or 'assure,' but simply 'to make to know,' 'tell.' In OT it occurs (1) Ezr 4<sup>14</sup> 16 5<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>24</sup> (תִּקְרַע); (2) 2 S 15<sup>28</sup> (תִּקְרַע); (3) Est 2<sup>22</sup> (תִּקְרַע, RV 'tell'). In Apoc. Wis 18<sup>6</sup> (προγγινώσκω), Ep. Jer<sup>1</sup> (ἀναγγέλλω), Bel<sup>6</sup> (δεικνύω), 1 Mac 14<sup>21</sup> (παράγγελλω), 2 Mac 1<sup>18</sup> (διασαφένω), 2 Mac 11<sup>26</sup> (εἰδότες). In NT Gal 1<sup>11</sup> 'I certify you' (γινώσκω, RV 'I make known to you'). Cf. Ps 39<sup>6</sup> Pr. Bk. 'Lord, let me know mine end, and the number of my days, that I may be certified how long I have to live' (AV 'that I may know how frail I am,' RV 'Let me know how frail I am'); 19<sup>2</sup> Pr. Bk. 'One day telleth another, and one night certifieth another.'

CHABRIS (Χαβρῆς).—One of the three rulers of Bethulia, Jth 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>6</sup>.

CHADIASAI (B αὐτὸς Χαδίαςαι, A Χαδίαςαι, AV they of Chadias), 1 Es 5<sup>20</sup>.—They are mentioned with the Ammidonians returning, to the number of 422, with Zerub. There are no corresponding names in the lists of Ezra and Neh. Fritzsche (Exeg. Handb. in loc.) identifies them with the people of Kedesh in Judah (Jos 15<sup>24</sup>). H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

CHÆREAS (Χαίρεας, AV Chereas) was brother of Timotheus, the leader of the Ammonites, and held command at the fortress of Gazara, i.e. probably Jazer in the trans-Jordanic territory (see 1 Mac 5<sup>8-9</sup>). Chæreas was slain upon the capture of Gazara by Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 10<sup>32-38</sup>).

H. A. WHITE.

CHAFE.—To c. is to make warm (Lat. calefacere, late Lat. calefare, old Fr. chauffer); next to make warm by friction; then (as with 'friction' itself) to irritate. In 2 S 17<sup>8</sup> only (AV, RV) 'they be chafed in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field' (קָרַי קָרַי 'bitter of soul'). Cf.—

'Calmmesse is great advantage; he that lets

Another chafe, may warm him at his fire,

Mark all his . . .

G. Herbert, ibid. . . .

J. HASTINGS.

CHAFF.—The AV renders by this term four Heb. words. 1. שֵׁן hāshash. This word occurs but twice in OT, Is 5<sup>24</sup> 33<sup>11</sup>, where it is rendered AV 'chaff.' It would be better rendered 'cut grass' or 'dry grass' (as Is 5<sup>24</sup> RV). 2. קֶשֶׁת or קֶשֶׁת mōz. This is chaff separated from the grain by winnowing. It is usually tr. in LXX χυρός (Ps 1<sup>4</sup> 35<sup>5</sup>, Is 29<sup>8</sup>, Hos 13<sup>8</sup>), once χυρός ἀχρόν (Is 17<sup>18</sup>), and once κοινοπρός=dust (Job 21<sup>18</sup>). In the Oriental process of winnowing by tossing the cut straw, grain, and chaff into the air, the grain falls vertically back on the heap, the cut straw is carried a little distance away and deposited in another heap, the chaff, consisting of the husks and . . . of the straw, is carried to and beyond the borders of the threshing-floor. Hence the imagery of the passages cited. 3. תֵּבֶה tebhen, the same as the Arab. tibn=cut straw. This word is only once tr. 'chaff' (Jer 23<sup>28</sup> AV, where LXX renders ἐχυρὸν, and RV 'straw'). In all the other passages where it occurs, except Job 21<sup>18</sup>, where it is incorrectly rendered 'stubble,' it is tr. 'straw.' Cut straw is preferable. See STRAW. 4. עֵר ēr. This is an Aramaic word of somewhat uncertain signification. Some have derived it from the root עָר to be blind, and regard it as that which blinds, such as the minute particles called AV 'chaff of the summer threshing-floor' (Dn 2<sup>35</sup>). The LXX rendering καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τῇ περὶ τὴν ἀχρόν in this passage would make it the dust and not the chaff of the threshing-floor. This contains, however, many minute spicules of the straw, husks, and beards of the grain. G. E. POST.

CHAIN.—The Bible frequently refers to chains, and uses a great variety of words to describe the different articles and their uses. Chains were chiefly employed for (1) ornament, (2) restraint.

1. Ornament.—1. There was the more solid form of simple or twisted ring for the neck (רִבְדִּי from רָבַד; cf. Arab. rabat, 'to bind'). Such was Joseph's gold chain (Gn 41<sup>42</sup>), also Ezk 16<sup>11</sup>. The Maronite Christians of Lebanon regard it as a charm against evil spirits, or the evil eye (see AMULET). It is called a tauḥk, and in the mod. Arab. version of the Bible by Van Dyck the ouch of the high priest's dress is so translated. This chain may be of gold or silver, but the poorer classes, as the Bedawin, wear chains of copper or brass. 2. There was a more elaborate form, made of plaited wire, like (1), but with jewels inserted and pendants attached, or, instead of the metal twist, composed of separate parts in squares, balls, or links (corresp. to Arab. ḫiladat, ḫīḍ). It did not encircle the neck closely, like the tauik, but hung loosely from it. The chain of Dn 5<sup>7.16.29</sup> was probably of this order, and examples of it are found in Jg 8<sup>30</sup>, Ps 73<sup>8</sup>, Ca 4<sup>9</sup>, Pr 1<sup>9</sup>. It is customary in Syria to hang a crescent of silver, called the hiddl, by a hair rope or chain round the necks of valuable camels or horses (cf. Jg 8<sup>21.29</sup>). 3. The flexible chain (שָׁרָה, Arab. silsilah, 'link-chain') for hanging and fastening purposes (Ex 23<sup>14.22</sup> 30<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ch 3<sup>4.40</sup>). 4. In Nu 31<sup>50</sup> RV 'ankle-chain' (which see). 5. In Ca 1<sup>10</sup> (חֲרָז, Arab. haraz) RV 'strings of jewels' means a necklace of gems, beads, or shells strung on a thread. 6. In Is 3<sup>19</sup> (נִזְמָה, Arab. nutafah) RV 'ear-drops' means ear-drops, in design like a pearl or drop of water.

2. Restraint.—Named from the metal, copper (נִזְמָה), La 3<sup>7</sup>. In Jer 39<sup>52</sup> chain is transl. fetters (see FETTER); also in AV in Jg 16<sup>21</sup>, 2 S 3<sup>34</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 33<sup>1.36</sup>. Chain in Ps 68<sup>6</sup> is corrected in RV (נִזְמָה). In NT the references to chains present little difficulty. The chief terms are ἀλυσίς, Mk 5<sup>8</sup>, Ac 23<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>, Rev 20<sup>1</sup>; σφαῖρα in 2 P 2<sup>4</sup> 'chains of darkness'; δεσμός in Jude 6 'everlasting chains,' which becomes a fig. 'bond' in Lk 13<sup>10</sup>.

Modern brass was unknown in ancient times, but there was an alloy of copper and tin. The feet of prisoners were secured by a chain of copper (נִזְמָה, Arab. silsil nahās, πένδη) attached to copper rings encircling each ankle, which were widened to receive the ankle, and then closed by a few strokes of a hammer. For the sake of safe custody, as the soft copper rings might be opened, the prisoner's eyes were put out (2 K 25<sup>7</sup>). In NT mention is made of the Roman custom of securing a prisoner by a chain, one end being fastened to the prisoner's wrist and the other to that of the soldier who guarded him (Ac 12<sup>6</sup> 28<sup>20</sup>). W. CARSLAW.

CHALCEDONY.—See STONES, PRECIOUS.

i. THE LAND.—The land of the Chaldæans, in OT, usually covers what is included in the term Babylonia, not inclusive of Mesopotamia in its larger sense, but of the lower or between-rivers Babylonia. Delitzsch (Paradies, p. 128 f.) maintains that the Bab. name Kašdu, then Kaššā, is but the earlier designation of the 'territory of the Kaš' (da, meaning 'territory'), a people who held sway over middle Babylonia for some time before the 13th cent. B.C. (cf. also Del. Sprache der Kossäer). The land of the Kaldāi, for some centuries after B.C. 1000, was located S.E. of Babylon, reaching to Bit-Yakin and the head of the Pers. Gulf, and possibly winging round W. to the edge of the Arabian desert. In the inscr. of Ramman-nirari III. (Rawlinson, WAI i. 35, No. 1, line 22) Kaldi cover all Babylonia in the expression šarrāni ša māt Kaldi, 'kings of the land of C.' Sargon always speaks of the rebel Merodach-baladan at Babylon as šar māt Kaldi, 'king of the land of Kaldū,' or šar māt Bit-Yakin, 'king of the land of Bit-Yakin.' So the Persian Gulf is mentioned as tāmtum ša Bit-Yakin, interchangeably with tāmtum ša māt Kaldi, indicating that the Pers. Gulf was the sea of the Chaldæa of that day. Sennacherib (Rawlinson, WAI i. 37, line 37) draws a line between the Arabians and Aramæans on the one hand, and the amēlu Kaldū, 'the people of the Chaldæans,' on the other. In the time of the decline of Assyria and the rise of New Babylonia the term Kaldū included N. and S. Babylonia and the territory occupied by certain foreign tribes and peoples adjacent to them, who were later included in the name as used by the prophet-priest Ezekiel (23<sup>23</sup>). The later Chaldæa was about 400 miles long N.E. and S.W. by an average of 100 miles in width. The derivation of the word is somewhat doubtful, but it may be related to the name of a nephew of Achaia, Chesed (כֶּסֶד), of which it is a plural, in Gn 22<sup>22</sup>. It is also the same in root-form as the Assyrian kasādū, 'to conquer.'

ii. THE PEOPLE.—The origin of the Chaldæans is enveloped in the mists of antiquity. Whence and when they migrated into lower Babylonia is also an unsolved riddle. Winckler (Gesch. Bab. und Assyriens, p. 99 f.) finds the first hint of such a people in the 'dynasty of the coast-land' [meer-landes], in the person of Ea-mukin-šumi, king of Karduniaš, where the latter's territory is distinguished from the 'coast-land,' at about the middle of the 10th cent. B.C. It is also thought that the names of the kings of this dynasty are Kassite, thus sustaining a conjecture (cf. Del. as above) that the Kossæans, the Kasdū, were the pioneers of the Chaldæans in Babylonia. If these conjectures are true, then we find already in this period a mixed population in the lowlands, reaching as far as the Pers. Gulf. But the character of the Chaldæans, as we know them afterwards, is strongly Semitic. They pushed north from the Pers. Gulf against Babylon, and for centuries contended with Assyria for its possession. They were in early times nomads and agriculturists, despising city life. But their contact with the more advanced civilisation of lower Babylonia led them to respect and to foster centres for self-protection. Soon this industrious, thrifty people built and fortified cities, and extended their boundaries to the north against the older and more cultured capitals. In the second half of the 8th cent. B.C. we find north of Babylon the 'kingdom' of Bit-Dakkuri; and Sargon, as well as his successors on the throne of Assyria, had their hands full in holding at bay this vigorous people. The Chaldæan kings who forced their way to the throne of Babylon were probably heads of different cities, states, or tribes of that people. Merodach-baladan, son of Baladan, was king of Bit-Yakin, Ukin-zir of Bit-Amukkani, and Šuzub, a Chaldæan, from some other place or tribe.

iii. THE LANGUAGE.—The language of the Chaldæans was the Bab. cuneiform, almost identical phonetically and lexically with the Assyrian. The term 'Chaldæan' as applied to certain chapters of Dn and Ezr is incorrect, and should not be so employed. The correct term is Aramaic.

iv. THE WISE MEN.—In Dn (1<sup>4</sup> and often) the term 'Chaldæans' is generally used in the sense of astrologers, astronomers. The same sense is seen in classical writers (as Strabo, Diodorus). Schrader (COT ii. 125) says, 'The signification "wise men," that we meet with in the Bk of Dn, is foreign to Assyrio-Bab. usage, and did not arise till after the fall of the Bab. empire.' Delitzsch (Calver Bibellexicon, p. 127<sup>4</sup>) regards this usage as built upon the fact that Bab. Chaldæa had been the home and the chief seat of astrological and astronomical knowledge from early ages. The attempted identification of the peoples in the region of the Black Sea (mentioned by Xenophon as Chaldæans) with those in lower Mesopotamia has proved a failure. See BABYLONIA.

CHALK-STONES (חֲלָקִים).—This expression is used only once, Is 27<sup>9</sup>, where Israel's repentance evinces itself by the destruction of idolatrous altars, whose stones are to be as chalk (or limestone) broken in pieces, calcined and slaked for mortar (see Delitzsch, ad loc.). The expression is of much interest as showing that the practice of slaking limestone and slaking with water was known in Pal. in OT times. The limestone of Pal. consists largely of white granular carbonate of lime of the same geological age as the Chalk formation of England. E. HULL.

CHALLENGE.—In the sense of 'claim,' Ex 22<sup>9</sup> 'any manner of lost thing which another challengeth to be his' (כֹּזֵב, RV 'one saith'). Cf. More (1513), 'He began, not by warre, but by Law, to challenge the crown.' J. HASTINGS.

CHALPHI (AV Galphi)=Alphæus (Χαλφί, Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7, Χαφίας), the father of Judas, one of the two captains of Jonathan Maccabæus who stood firm in a battle fought against the Syrians at Hazor in N. Galilee (1 Mac 11<sup>70</sup>).

H. A. WHITE.

CHAMBER as a verb occurs Ro 13<sup>18</sup> 'Let us walk honestly, as in the day . . . not in chambering and wantonness' (κοίτη, 'a bed,' Lk 11<sup>7</sup>; 'the marriage bed,' He 13<sup>4</sup>; here 'illicit intercourse'; cf. Ro 9<sup>10</sup> κοίτην ἔχουσα, 'having conceived'). See HOUSE.

J. HASTINGS.

CHAMBERLAIN.—An officer in the houses of kings and nobles charged with the care of their apartments, dress, etc., though the office often implied other duties of trust. In OT the word occurs in 2 K 23<sup>24</sup> and repeatedly in Est, where the original is eunuch (עֲרֵם); but it is generally believed that this name is not to be taken always in a literal sense, and hence it is often rendered by the word officer. In Esther, however, the chamberlain evidently belongs to that class of persons who are entrusted with the watchful care of the harems of Oriental monarchs. In NT at Ac 12<sup>20</sup> it is said that the people of Tyre and Sidon sought the favour of Herod Agrippa through the mediation of Blastus 'the king's c.' (τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως), showing that the office was one of considerable influence. The word occurs again in AV in Ro 16<sup>23</sup>, but is rendered in RV more accurately 'treasurer (οἰκονόμος) of the city,' in connexion with the name of Erastus, a Christian of Corinth, from which place it is generally believed that St. Paul wrote his Ep. to the Romans, and where it is not likely there would be a chamberlain in the primary sense of the word. J. WORTABET.

CHAMELEON.—AV so renders כְּלָבִי, χαμαιλέων, chameleon, the second of the lizards mentioned in Lv 11<sup>30</sup>, which RV renders land-crocodile. On the other hand, RV renders by chameleon the last of the animals mentioned in this passage, תַּנְשֵׁמֶת tinshemeth, ἀσπίδα, talpa, which AV renders mole.

The Heb. klābī is used in many passages in its etymological sense of strength, but only in the present for an animal. Nothing in its etymology points to the chameleon. Among the lizards the land-monitor, which is the land-crocodile of the ancients, Psammosaurus scincus, Merrem, is next to the Nile-monitor, Monitor Niloticus, Geoffr., in size and strength. The Arabs call both waral (vulgo waran). They distinguish the first as waral el-ard=the land-waral, and the second as waral el-bahr=water-waral. But the first is also called dabb=זָב זָב, which is the name of the last animal in the previous verse, translated in AV tortoise, and in RV great lizard. It often attains a length of from 4 to 5 ft. It would therefore be better to render zāb, land-crocodile or land- monitor, and klābī, Nile-monitor or water-monitor. This would carry out the etymological idea of strength, as the water-monitor is a foot or two longer than its land relative, and Arabian stories are full of the records of its power in fighting, not only snakes, but the dabb itself. This would give to two of the lizard group appropriate specific names. Both are noted for devouring crocodile's eggs. The Nile-monitor was held in great reverence in ancient Egypt on this account.

As before said, RV gives chameleon for tinshemeth (Lv 11<sup>30</sup>). While it is perhaps probable that this animal is a lizard, as its name stands at the end of a list of lizards, it is by no means certain. It is also at the end of a list of things 'that creep upon the earth' (11<sup>29</sup>). In those days there was no scientific study of objects of Nature, and the collocation of the different clean and unclean animals was with reference to characteristics which are not recognized in any other system of classification (11<sup>1-7</sup>, 11<sup>21-23</sup>). It is quite possible, therefore, that tinshemeth is not a lizard, but the mole-rat of Syria, Spalax typhlus, which, although not a true mole, has all its habits and its general aspect. The LXX and Vulg. renderings strengthen this possibility. There is, however, one strong objection to rendering tinshemeth 'mole-rat.' It is that hōled (Lv 11<sup>30</sup>) is in both VSS (on the authority of the LXX γαλή, and Vulg. mustela), weasel, very probably refers to the mole-rat. See MOLE, WEASEL. It is inadmissible to suppose that the same animal is mentioned twice, by different names, so close together in the same list.

There seems to be no warrant for the adoption of chameleon for tinshemeth, excepting the derivation of the word from a root signifying to breathe, coupled with the ancient opinion that the chameleon lived on air. It must not be forgotten that, in the same chapter, tinshemeth is given as the name of an aquatic fowl (v. 18, cf. Dt 14<sup>18</sup>). See SWAN. On the whole, we think the question of the identity of both tinshemeths very unsatisfactory, and well-nigh insoluble. G. E. POST.

CHAMOIS (רִי זֶמֶר, καμηλοπάρδαλις, camelopardus).—This was one of the wild animals allowed to the Israelites as food (Dt 14<sup>5</sup>), and therefore presumably accessible to them. This would make impossible the renderings camelopard and chamois. Tristram establishes a very strong probability that it is the mountain-lion of Egypt and Arabia, called in N. Africa kebsch, and in Arabia kebsch, which signifies a ram. It is known to naturalists as Ovis tragelaphus, and lives in small flocks in the most rugged mountain districts from Barbary to Egypt. The kebsch of Sinai is probably identical with it, though as yet no naturalist has seen it. The Bedawin know it well. It may well be supposed that it was abundant in the Mosaic age, and, as it was allowed to the Israelites for food, they may have done much toward its extinction in those parts. It is more than 3 ft. in height, has no mane, but long hair down its throat and breast, and on the fore-legs, forming a sort of ruffles to the knee. It is very active, bounding from rock to rock. It has massive horns, 2 ft. in length, and curving gently backward. G. E. POST.

CHAMPAIGN means 'an open plain' (from Lat. campania, It. campagna, old Fr. champaigne). It occurs Dt 11<sup>30</sup> (in 1611 champion, a later form which was introduced in the beg. of 16th cent.) 'the Canaanites, which dwell in the c.' (עֲרָבָה, RV 'Arabah'); Ezk 37<sup>22</sup> (1611 champion, a still later form), and Jth 5<sup>1</sup> 'in the c. countries' (ἐν τοῖς πεδίοις, RV 'in the plains'). The word is pron. sham'pān. J. HASTINGS.

CHAMPION (from late Lat. campio, one who fights in the campus or open plain) is an accurate tr. of the Heb. in 1 S 17<sup>23</sup> (חַיִּיטָאִים, lit. 'the man of the space between,' that is, the space between the two armies, which is called in Gr. the metaxy-mos). But in 17<sup>21</sup> Goliath is simply called 'mighty one' (גִּבּוֹר), and the 'champion' of AV and RV is unhappy.

J. HASTINGS.

CHANCE.—The 'reign of law' is no discovery of the 19th century. It was an accepted, even an axiomatic, fact to the ancient Hebrew throughout the whole course of his history. And more than that, the law was the immediate cause of a personal will, not the fortuitous forces. 'Chance,' therefore, has scant place in OT or in NT. Neither συνηχία nor τύχη occurs in NT; and τύχη only twice, συνηχία not once, in LXX. The first occurrence of τύχη in LXX is Gn 30<sup>11</sup> καὶ εἶπεν Λεία Ἐν τύχῃ, 'and Leah said, With fortune!' following the kethibh בְּנֵי בְהֵמָה (in pause), which RV also follows, 'and Leah said, Fortunate!' The other occurrence of τύχη is Is 65<sup>11</sup> ἐτοιμάζοντες τῷ δαιμονίῳ τράπεζαν καὶ πληροῦντες τῇ τύχῃ κέραςμα, 'preparing for the demon a table, and filling up for fortune a mixed drink.' Here τύχη stands for Heb. מֶנֶס, which most scholars identify with Venus. But δαμόνιον stands for גַּד, an old Semitic name for the god of Fortune, found in inscriptions, proper names, and common in Syr. = τύχη. See GAD. Apart from the passages above, the nearest approach to a recognition of 'chance' is in 1 S 6<sup>9</sup>, where the Philistines devise a method of discovering whether the calamities they had suffered while the ark was in their midst were due to the presence of the ark, or whether 'it was a chance that happened to us' (בְּקֶדֶר, LXX σύνπτωσις); but here, as in the other places where the same Heb. is used (Dt 23<sup>10</sup> 'that which chanceth him,' Ru 2<sup>3</sup>, 1 S 20<sup>38</sup>, Ec 2<sup>14</sup>, 15 3<sup>19</sup> ter q<sup>2</sup> 3), the idea is independent of J<sup>n</sup>, but something more than man. The prevalent Hebrew mistranslation is expressed in the proverb (16<sup>33</sup>)—

'The lot is cast into the lap;
But the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord.'

The other places in which 'chance' occurs are these: Ec 9<sup>11</sup> 'time and c. happeneth to them all' (כָּל, elsewhere only in 1 K 5<sup>4</sup> and tr. 'occurent,' not 'chance,' but external incident or event; cf. 2 Es 10<sup>46</sup> 'these things which have chanced'); Lk 10<sup>31</sup> 'by c. there came down a certain priest that way' (συγκυρία, again not 'chance,' but 'concurrence' or 'coincidence,' see Plummer in loc.); and so 1 Co 15<sup>37</sup> 'it may c. of wheat, or of some other grain' (ἐἴ τί τοις; i.e. we cannot tell which; cf. 14<sup>10</sup> ἐἴ τί τοις, 'it may be'); while in Dt 22<sup>6</sup> 'If a bird's nest c. to be before thee in the way,' and 2 S 1<sup>6</sup> 'As I happened by c. upon Mount Gilboa,' the Heb. is simply 'come upon' or 'meet' (קָרָא).

For the verb 'c.' = turn out (1 Co 15<sup>37</sup>) cf. Coverdale's tr. of Ph 1<sup>19</sup> 'Ye same shal chaunce to my Saluacion.'

J. HASTINGS.

CHANCELLOR.—'Rehum the c.,' Ezr 4<sup>8</sup>, 9, 17 (חֲנַנְיָהּ, lit. 'the lord of judgment'). Dhēm in Assyrian is the technical word used of the official reports forwarded to the kings of Assyria and Babylonia by their correspondents abroad. With this Sayce identifies the Aram. ṭēēm, and translates bēl ṭēēm, 'lord of official intelligence' or 'postmaster.' 'Chancellor,' even in its old sense of royal notary or official secretary to the king, is thus unsuitable; while in mod. usage the word is restricted to special offices, all very different from this. See BEELTETHMUS, REHUM.

J. HASTINGS.

CHANGE.—1. See CHANGE OF RAIMENT; and notice that the sing. is used for the pl. in Jg 14<sup>12</sup>, 13, 19 'thirty change of garments' (RV 'changes'). The Heb. word (תְּלִישִׁים) there and elsewhere used in 'change' of raiment is found in three difficult passages: Job 10<sup>17</sup> 'changes and war are against me,' which may mean 'relays' of soldiers as in 1 K 5<sup>14</sup>, but see Davidson in loc. In Job 14<sup>14</sup> 'all the days of my appointed time will I wait till my c. come,' the meaning is clearly 'release' from the worry of life, as the soldier is released when his watch is over. But in Ps 55<sup>19</sup> 'who have no changes, and who fear not God,' this meaning, if possible, is not so easy. See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. 2. In Lv 27<sup>38</sup> 'if he c. it at all, then both it and the c. thereof shall be holy,' c. = exchange (תְּלִישִׁים, RV 'that for which it is changed'). Cf. Heywood (1562), 'Change is no robbery, but robbery maketh change.' 3. Wis 14<sup>28</sup> 'changing of kind' (γενέσεις ἐναλλαγῆς, RV 'confusion of sex'). 4. Changeable in Is 3<sup>22</sup> 'the c. suits of apparel,' means that may be changed; Cheyne, state dresses, named in Heb. from their being put off when the occasion for their use was over. 5. Changer. See MONEY.

J. HASTINGS.

CHANGE OF RAIMENT.—The expression occurs in Gn 45<sup>23</sup>, where Joseph gives to Benjamin five changes of raiment (תְּלִישִׁים שְׁלֹשִׁים); in Jg 14<sup>12</sup>, 19, where S. has thirty changes of garments (תְּלִישִׁים 'ח'); also in 2 K 5<sup>22</sup>, 23, as part of Naaman's gift. In Jg 17<sup>10</sup> part of Micah's wages was to be an outfit of clothing (תְּלִישִׁים). The separate mention (Jg 14<sup>12</sup>) of 'change of raiment' (תְּלִישִׁים שְׁלֹשִׁים) 'change of raiment' referred to outer articles of dress. These, under some difference of name, pattern, and material, acc. to life in desert, village, or city, were two: (1) the coat or tunic (תְּלִישִׁים, χιτών), in the form of a dressing-gown worn with girdle; and (2) the cloak or mantle (מָטָה, ἡμάτιον), of more ample and loose pattern. See COAT, CLOAK, DRESS.

G. M. MACKIE.

CHANT was formerly (and is still poetically) used as a simple synonym for 'sing.' So Am 6<sup>8</sup> 'that chant (Coverdale, 'syng') to the sound of the viol' (קָרָא [all], RV 'sing idle songs').

CHANUNEUS (Χανοναῖος, AV Channuneus), 1 Es 8<sup>48</sup> (LXX).—A Levite, answering to Merari, if to anything, in the parallel list in Ezr 8<sup>9</sup>.

CHAPEL.—The Frankish kings looked with special reverence on the capella or cloak of St. Martin, which was carried before them in battle and invoked in oaths. The name capella was then used for the sanctuary in which its capellani guarded this treasure. By steps which can readily be traced, the same designation came to be given to any sanctuary attached to a palace and containing holy relics, to any private sanctuary, to any room or building for worship, not being a church. Our AV employs its English equivalent chapel at Am 7<sup>13</sup>, but the RV has discarded this in favour of sanctuary. The latter comes nearer the meaning of the original, mikdash, which signifies a holy place. The former, however, aptly suggests that capella on the king which was one of the characteristics of the sanctuary at Bethel. As an English Chapel Royal is not a place of public worship, but a place of worship under the control and meant for the use of the sovereign, so were such buildings as that at Bethel intended primarily for the king. It was by his permission that the people found a place there. Even at Jerusalem, Solomon built temple and palace in close proximity to each other: cf. Ezk 43<sup>8</sup>. Chapel occurs also in 1 Mac 14<sup>7</sup> (RV 'shrine'), 2 Mac 10<sup>2</sup> (RV 'sacred in closure'), 11<sup>8</sup> (RV 'sacred place'). J. TAYLOR.

CHAPHENATHA (Χαφενάθ), 1 Mac 12<sup>37</sup>.—Close to Jerus. on the east. Unknown.

CHAPTER (from Lat. caput, through the French) is now displaced, in ordinary speech, by the Hebrew kapit 'capital,' which the American Rev. Society wish to substitute for the older form retained by the British Revisers. 1. CHAPTER, LXX ἐπίθεμα, the spherical capital, 5 cubits high, of each of the two great brazen pillars—JACHIN and BOAZ (wh. see)—of Solomon's temple. The passage recording the construction of these pillars, 1 K 7<sup>15a</sup>, (with which cf. 2 K 25<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ch 4<sup>12, 13</sup>, Jer 52<sup>22</sup>), is one of the worst preserved in the OT, and much uncertainty still prevails as to the precise form and ornamentation of the capitals. For details see art. TEMPLE, and compare the reconstruction of Stade in his Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, i. p. 332, and of Perrot and Chipiez in Hist. of Art in Sardinia and Judaea (Eng. tr.), i. plates 6 and 7. In 2 Ch 3<sup>15</sup> kapit is used for these capitals. 2. CHAPTER appears in MT of 1 K 7<sup>21</sup> as a part of the brazen lavers made by Hiram for the temple, but is almost certainly a corruption of kapit (Ewald, Stade, Klost.). See LAVER. 3. In Ex 36<sup>38</sup> we read that the upper portions or tops (kapit), EV 'their chapters' of the five pillars which supported the 'screen for the door of the tent' (RV) were to be overlaid with gold, while the corresponding parts of the pillars of the court were to be overlaid with silver (Ex 38<sup>17, 19, 28</sup>). Although all these pillars were of one piece, the parts thus treated would have the appearance of capitals (LXX κεφαλίδες).

CHAPMAN (Anglo-Sax. ceap 'trade,' and mann 'man') is used only once in AV, 2 Ch 9<sup>14</sup> 'Beside that which chapmen and merchants brought,' (שְׂכָנִים, RV 'the chapmen,' Amer. RV 'the traders'). For the same Heb., RV gives 'chapmen' (AV 'merchantmen') 1 K 10<sup>15</sup>, and it is an old meaning cf. Rogers (1642), 'It is not a meete thing that man should be both chapman and customer.'

J. HASTINGS.

CHAPT.—Jer 14<sup>4</sup> 'Because the ground is chapt, for there was no rain in the earth' (חָפַת, Amer. RV 'chapped,' RVm 'dismayed,' for the Heb. has both meanings). Bradley (1727) in his Farmer's Dict. speaks of 'claiy or stiff earth' . . . subject to chap during the heat of summer'; but the word, which means 'cracked,' is no longer used of land.

J. HASTINGS.

CHARAATHALAN (B Χαρααθαλάν, A Χαρά 'Aθαλάρ, AV Charaathalar), 1 Es 5<sup>36</sup>.—A name given to a leader of certain families who returned from Babylon under Zerub. But 'Charaathalan leading them and Allar' is due to some perversion of the original, which has 'Cherub, Addan, Immer,' three names of places in Bab., from which the return was made (Ezr 2<sup>59</sup> חֶרֶב, אֲדָן, חֶרֶב, A Χερούβ, Ἡδάν; cf. Neh 7<sup>61</sup>). The form in 1 Es may be partly accounted for by confusion between Θ and B, and between A and Δ. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

CHARAX (Χάρακας, els rón, 2 Mac 12<sup>17</sup>, RV 'to Charax,' AV 'to Characa').—East of Jordan, and apparently in the land of Tob. Unknown.

CHARGE, CHARGEABLE.—To charge (late Lat. caricare to load, from carrus a wagon, whence old Fr. charger) is 'to load,' and a charge is 'a load,' as we still speak of 'charging' a gun, and of its 'charge.' But in the Bible the word is used only figuratively. 1. To burden one, or be a burden on one, AV 'be chargeable,' Neh 5<sup>15</sup> 'the former governors, that had been before me, were c. unto the people' (חִבְּרִי, lit. 'made heavy on,' RVm 'laid burdens upon'); esp. in the matter of expense, 2 S 13<sup>25</sup> 'let us not all now go [to the sheep-shearing feast], lest we be c. unto thee' (יִכְבְּדוּ, RV 'be burdened'); 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup> 'because we would not be c. unto any of you' (ἐπιβαρύνω, 'be a weight upon,' RV 'that we might not burden'; so 2 Th 3<sup>8</sup>); and 2 Co 11<sup>9</sup> 'I was c. to no man' (καταναρκάω, only here and 12<sup>13, 14</sup>; ἰσορροπία LXX gives simple ναρκάω as tr. of ναρ 'to be c. unto,' 'torn away,' Gn 32<sup>25, 32</sup> das, Job 33<sup>13</sup>, Dn [LXX] 11<sup>6</sup>). The vb. κ. is to benumb, as a torpedo [νάρκη] might benumb, and so to paralyse one by laying another's maintenance on him). Cf. Geneva B. 'I was not slothful to the hinderance of anie man'; RV 'I was not a burden on any man.' 2. The burden of expense is also expressed by 'charge,' both verb and subst.: Neh 10<sup>32</sup> 'to c. ourselves yearly with the third part of a shekel for the service of the house of our God'; 1 Ti 5<sup>16</sup> 'let not the church be charged' (βαρύνεσθαι, RV 'be burdened' as in 2 Co 5<sup>4</sup> EV); 1 Co 9<sup>18</sup> 'that . . . I may make the gospel without c.' (ἀδάπανος); 9<sup>17</sup> 'who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges?' (ἰδίοις ὀφυσίν); Ac 21<sup>24</sup> 'be at charges with them' (RV 'for them,' δαπάνησον ἐν αὐτοῖς, 'spend upon them'). Cf. Shaks. Rich. III. i. ii. 256—

'I'll be at charges for a looking-glass.'

3. To lay a special duty upon one, as 2 Ch 36<sup>23</sup>=Ezr 1<sup>2</sup> 'he hath charged me to build him an house in Jerus.' (בָּנֵה). Then this duty or charge is expressed by the subst. 'charge,' Job 31<sup>3</sup> 'The Lord hath given him (God) a c. over the earth' (מִשְׁכָּל); Jth 7<sup>32</sup> 'he dispersed the people every one to their own c.' (παρεμβολή). Then the word is freely used (as tr. of מִשְׁכָּל), esp. in Nu (P) in a half-technical sense, quite foreign to any modern idiom. Thus the duty is the c. of the Lord, 4<sup>31</sup> 'the c. of this burden.' Since J imposes it, it is 'the c. of the Lord,' Lv 8<sup>25</sup>. It is also called 'the c. of the sons of Gershon' (Nu 3<sup>30</sup>), because on them the burden lies. And from its object or extent it is described as: 1<sup>53</sup> 'the c. of the tabernacle of the testimony'; 3<sup>31</sup> 'the c. of the ark'; 3<sup>38</sup> 'the c. of the children of Israel'; or 3<sup>38</sup> 'the c. of the sons of Gershon' for the c. of the children of Israel. 4. 'This me: . . . daily into care or custody' 2 K 7<sup>17</sup> 'to . . . of the gate' (מִשְׁכָּל); 1 Ch 9<sup>23</sup> (לְ); Ac 8<sup>27</sup> 'who had the c. of all her treasure' (ἐν); Nu 31<sup>49</sup> 'the men of war which are under our c.' (מִשְׁכָּל); cf. Ac 1<sup>20</sup> AVm 'office or charge' (ἐπισκοπή, AV 'bishoprick,' RV 'office,' RVm 'oversership'). 5. From 'give a c.' (Mt 4<sup>6</sup>, Lk 4<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>), or 'give in c.' (1 Ti 5<sup>7</sup> 'these things give in c.' παραγγέλλω, RV 'command'), there naturally arises the meaning of 'enjoin' or 'command,' of which the examples are numerous and obvious,* and the subst. c.=a command, as 2 S 18<sup>5</sup>, Ac 16<sup>23, 24</sup> ('charging the jailor to keep them safely; who, having received such a c.'). 1 Ti 1<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>. 6. The last and heaviest weight to lay on one is to 'lay blame,' found chiefly in the phrase 'lay to the c. of,' Dt 21<sup>8</sup>, Ps 35<sup>11</sup>, Ac 7<sup>60</sup> 23<sup>29</sup>, Ro 8<sup>23</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>16</sup>. But the simple verb is also used in this sense, 2 S 3<sup>8</sup> 'thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman'; Job 1<sup>22</sup> 'nor charged God foolishly' (RV 'with foolishness'), 4<sup>18</sup> 'his angels he chargeth with folly.' CHARIOT (רֶכֶב, רֶכֶבִּי Ps 104<sup>3</sup>, קָרָה, קָרָה Ps 46<sup>9</sup>, currus). — In ancient times war chariots formed an important part of the military strength of a nation. We learn from Egyptian monuments that they were largely used by the armies of the Hittite and Egyptian kings, and thence they were introduced into Egypt about the 17th cent. B.C. (Brugsch, Hist. of Egypt, i. 295). An Egypt. poem mentions that the Pharaoh had 2500 chariots against Ramses II. (B.C. 1300); and when the Egyptians defeated the allied forces of the Syrians at Megiddo in the 14th cent. B.C., they captured 2041 horses and 924 chariots. A papyrus relating to the same period described the adventures of an Egyptian mohar or official, who drove through Pal. in a chariot, and his servant. In the OT we read of the chariots and horsemen of Pharaoh at the time of the Exodus (Ex 14<sup>6, 15</sup>). In Pal. the Israelites must have become familiar with the use of chariots in war long before they adopted them. Thus they were used by the Can. kings defeated at the Waters of Merom (Jos 11<sup>4-9</sup>), by Jabin and Sisera, who had 900 chariots of iron (Jg 4<sup>3, 13</sup> 5<sup>28</sup>); and it was through their iron chariots that the Canaanites of the valleys were able to maintain themselves against the conquering Israelites (Jg 1<sup>9</sup>, cf. Jos 17<sup>16, 18</sup>). These chariots were doubtless built of wood (cf. Jos 11<sup>9</sup> 'burnt their chariots') and plated or strengthened with iron. The translation of Vulg. currus falcati (Jg 1<sup>9</sup> 4<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>28</sup>) seems to involve an anachronism; for the use of scythes attached to the axles of war chariots was probably introduced from Persia. Certainly, chariots of this kind are never represented on the monuments of Egypt or Assyria. Xenophon attributes the invention to the Persians (vi. i. 27). In the time of Saul the Philistines invaded the country of Israel with 3000 chariots (1 S 13<sup>5</sup> LXX [Luc.]; see Driver, Text of Sam.). David, during his Syrian wars, captured 1000 chariots (1 Ch 18<sup>4</sup>), and on another occasion 700 (2 S 10<sup>18</sup>); but, following the example of Joshua (Jos 11<sup>9</sup>), he maimed the horses, reserving only sufficient for 100 chariots (2 S 8<sup>4</sup>). The introduction of chariots into the Israelite army dates from the time of Solomon, who maintained an establishment of 1400 chariots (1 K 10<sup>28</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>34</sup>) and 4000 horses (2 Ch 9<sup>25</sup>, in 1 K 1<sup>26</sup> [Heb. 5<sup>27</sup> wrongly 40,000]). These were stationed partly in Jerusalem and partly in more suitable cities selected for the purpose (1 K 9<sup>19</sup> 10<sup>26</sup>). Both chariots and horses were mainly imported from Egypt, and a profitable trade in them was carried on with the Hittite and Syrian kings. We are told that a chariot was brought from Egypt for 600 shekels of silver, and a horse for 150 shekels (1 K 10<sup>28</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>34</sup>). From this time onwards chariots form a regular part of the army both in the northern and southern kingdoms (1 K 16<sup>9</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>16</sup> 21 10<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>7</sup> 14 8<sup>21</sup>, Is 27, Mic 5<sup>10</sup> etc.). In particular, the king seems regularly to have gone to battle in his chariot (1 K 22<sup>34</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>30</sup>, cf. 1 K 12<sup>18</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>21</sup>). Zimri held the important office of captain of half the chariots (1 K 16<sup>9</sup>). There seem, however, to have often been difficulties in securing a sufficient supply of horses (2 K 7<sup>13</sup> 18<sup>23</sup>); hence in the time of Isaiah there was a strong party in Judah which favoured a close alliance with Egypt (Is 30<sup>2, 15</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>9</sup>). But the consciousness still survived that the use of chariots had been introduced from heathen countries. Hence, while the historian looks upon them as a mark of regal despotism (1 S 8<sup>11</sup>), and the Deuteronomic law forbids the king to multiply horses (Dt 17<sup>16</sup>), the prophets regard horses and chariots as a sign of dependence on human aid instead of on divine protection (Hos 17 14<sup>2</sup> [Heb. 4], Is 27 30<sup>16</sup> 31<sup>1</sup>), and the prophets look forward to their destruction in the Messianic future (Is 27 30<sup>16</sup> 31<sup>1</sup>, Zec 9<sup>10</sup>).

The chariot was employed also in times of peace (Gn 50<sup>9</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>44</sup>, 2 K 5<sup>2, 21</sup> 10<sup>45</sup>, Is 66<sup>20</sup>), and was regarded as a mark of high rank. Thus Pharaoh assigned to Joseph his 'second chariot' (Gn 41<sup>43</sup>); and horses and chariots were used by the nobles (Is 22<sup>18</sup>, Jer 17<sup>25</sup> 22<sup>4</sup>). In the NT the only chariot mentioned, except in Rev 9<sup>9</sup>, cf. 18<sup>13</sup>, is that of the treasurer of Candace (Ac 8<sup>28</sup>). The practice of dedicating horses and chariots to the sun, introduced by some of the later kings of Judah, was abolished by Josiah (2 K 23<sup>11</sup>).

The chariots of the Hebrews doubtless resembled those used by the surrounding nations, and represented on Egypt. and Assyrian monuments. They were two-wheeled vehicles, open behind, drawn by two horses, and containing two (1 K 22<sup>34</sup>) or perhaps three persons (2 K 9<sup>25</sup>). The latter view is supported by the special Heb. term for an officer, shalish (שָׁלִישׁ), lit. third man; see Ex 14<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>4</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>25</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> 15<sup>25</sup> etc. The Egypt. chariots were of light and simple construction, the material employed being wood, as is proved by sculptures representing the manufacture of chariots. The axle was set far back, and the bottom of the car, which rested on this and on the pole, was sometimes formed of a frame interlaced with a network of thongs or ropes. The chariot was entirely open behind, and for the greater part of the sides, which were formed by a curved rail rising from each side of the back of the base, and resting on a wooden upright above the pole in front. From this rail, which was strengthened by a bow case of leather, often richly decorated, on the right-hand side, the reins passed forwards; while the quiver and spear were carried in the opposite direction. The wheels, which were fastened on the axle by a linch-pin secured with a short thong, had six spokes in the case of war chariots, but in private vehicles sometimes only four. The pole sloped upwards, and to the end of it a curved yoke was attached. A small saddle at each end of the yoke rested on the withers of the horses, and was secured in its place by breast-band and girth. No traces are to be seen. The bridle was often ornamented; a bearing-rein was fastened to the saddle, and the other reins passed through a ring at the side of this. The number of horses to a chariot seems always to have been two; and in the car, which contained no seat, only rarely are more than two persons depicted, except in triumphal processions.

Assyrian chariots did not differ in any essential points from the Egyptian. They were, however, completely panelled at the sides, and a shield was sometimes hung at the back. The wheels had six, or, at a later period, eight spokes; the felloes were broad, and seem to have been formed of three distinct circles of wood, sometimes surrounded by a metal tire. While only two horses were attached to the yoke, in the older monuments a third horse is generally to be seen, which was probably used as a reserve. The later chariots are square in front, not rounded; the car itself is larger and higher; the cases for weapons are placed in front, not at the side; and only two horses are used. The harness differs somewhat from the Egyptian. A broad collar passes round the neck, from which hangs a breast ornament, the whole being secured by a triple strap under the belly of the horse. As in Egypt, there are no traces visible; two driving-reins are attached to each horse, but the bearing-rein seems to be unknown. In addition to the warrior and the charioteer, we often see a third man, who bears a shield; and a fourth occupant of the chariot sometimes appears.

The Hittite chariots, as represented on Egypt. monuments, regularly contain three warriors. In construction they are plainer and more solid than the Egyptian, and the sides are not open. The chariots on Persian sculptures closely resemble the Assyrian.

In Sir 49<sup>8</sup> the first vision of Ezekiel is alluded to as 'the chariot of the cherubim,' and that chapter (Ezk 1), under the title of 'the chariot,' figures largely in later Jewish mystical speculation. Cf. Schürer, HJP ii. i. 347.

CHARITY.—From 1 Co 8<sup>1</sup> onwards 'charity' is frequently employed in AV as the tr. of ἀγάπη; in RV it does not occur.

The Gr. word ἀγάπη is supposed to have been coined by the LXX. It is found in 1 Co 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

was a stronger word than either ἀγάπη or φιλία, with which they elsewhere translate ἀγάπη. Thus in 2 S 13<sup>15</sup>, Ec 9<sup>16</sup> it is used in emphatic contrast to 'hate'.

When Christianity came, a new revelation of the love of God, a word as yet unspoken by common use, and adopted by the LXX. made it the more easily adopted, for this was now also a leading thought, as in 1 Jn 4<sup>16</sup> 'God is love,' and 4<sup>19</sup> 'Herein is love, not that we loved God,' etc.

The word is used 117 times in NT (including ἀγάπη, 'love-feasts,' Jude 12 [and 2 P 2<sup>13</sup> L Tr W], a way of love with which God has something to do. Its distribution, accord. to Milligan and G. in NT Concord, is as follows: Synop. 2 (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>, Lk 1<sup>2</sup>, Jn 7, Ro 9, 1 Co 11, 2 Co 9, 13, Phil 4, Ph 4, Col 3, 1 Th 5, 2 Th 4, 1 Ti 5, 2 Ti 1, 1 P 4, 1 P 8, 2 P 2, 1 Jn 18, 2 Jn 2, 3 Jn 1, Jude 3, Rev 2, 1 Th 5, Synop. 2, Jn (including Rev) 10, Paul 75, He 2, P 5, Jude 3. It is not used in Mk, Ac, Ja.

Some have expounded the difference which has been attributed to the LXX. There was no difference in Latin for ἀγάπη. Amor was used for love, sometimes denoting as well as affection. He sometimes used amor, as in 1 Co 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

Wyclif translated the AV 'love' as 'love' for dilectio and 'charity' for caritas. In Col 3<sup>13</sup> where he translated 'love' as 'charity' in 1 Co 13<sup>4</sup> where he translated 'love' as 'charity'.

Tindale systematically avoided ecclesiastical words, and so discarded 'charity' entirely, using 'love' everywhere, except Ro 14<sup>15</sup> 'charitably' (κατὰ ἀγάπην), and Col 3<sup>13</sup> 'His dear Son' for 'the Son of his love.' Tindale was followed by Coverdale, the Great Bible, and the Geneva Bible, except that the Geneva has 'charity' in Rev 24<sup>19</sup>.

The Bishops restored 'charity' into the foll. places: Ro 13<sup>10</sup> bis, 1 Co 8<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>13</sup> bis 14<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>, Col 3<sup>14</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, 2 Th 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 15<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>, Tit 2<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>8</sup> bis 5<sup>14</sup>, 2 P 17, 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>, 3 Jn 6, Jude 4<sup>12</sup>, Rev 2<sup>19</sup>; while they accepted Tindale's 'charitably' in Ro 14<sup>15</sup>, and his 'dear Son' in Col 13<sup>13</sup>.

The Rhemish Bible, being tr. from the Vulg., returned to the use of 'charity' and 'love,' following the Vulg. precisely, except that (as with Wyclif) the word 'charity' is omitted in 1 Co 13<sup>4</sup>.

The translators of AV followed the Bishops, except in Ro

13<sup>10</sup> bis, 1 Th 3<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>, and Jude 2<sup>1</sup>, where they capriciously prefer 'love' to 'charity.'

The RV gives 'love' wherever the Revisers found ἀγάπη in the text they adopted; for they reckoned ἀγάπη to translate the same Gr. word by the same Eng. word, that could possibly be done. No other Eng. version is so consistent. 'Charity' never occurs.

The word 'charity' entered the language at two different times. First in the 10th cent. (from Fr. chiereté, cherté) and with the ordinary meaning of the Lat. caritas, 'dearness,' both in reference to price and affection. Next in the forms caritat, caritet, charitet, charité, from the popular use of the caritas (caritatem) of the Vulg. in the Church to indicate Christian 'love.' The two words were too close to be kept distinct, and in the 17th cent. cherte was discontinued.

After the Vulg., charity was used of the love of God, as 1 Jn 4<sup>16</sup> 'God is charity'

CHASTENING, CHASTISEMENT, TRIBULATION.—The idea represented by the words chastening or chastisement fills a considerable space both in OT and NT. In Heb. it is usually expressed by the verb יָסַר, יָסַר, and the substantive יָסוּר, with which וּמִיָּסוּר and וּמִיָּסוּר are frequently combined; and in Gr. by the corresponding verb and subst. παιδεύω and παιδεία. The etymological connexion of these last words with παις suggests that education, in the widest sense of the word, including reference to the means as well as the end of the process, is the main idea involved. And on the whole this is true. In one of the 64 fathers are charged to bring up . . . in the παιδεία καὶ νοῦθεσίᾳ κυρίου, where παιδεία is the Christian discipline of character, as it ought to be enforced in the Christian family. The same idea is presented in He 12<sup>9</sup>, where fathers are regarded in the character of παιδευταί—as those who exercise discipline over their children, and esp. over their faults, for their good. This same conception is applied without reserve to God. One of the most striking passages is Pr 3<sup>11</sup> 'My son, despise not the chastening (παιδεία) of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked (ἐλεγχόμενος) by him; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth (παιδεύει), and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' This is quoted and enforced in He 12<sup>4-11</sup> and Rev 3<sup>19</sup>. The idea insisted upon is that the troubles which befall the people of God are not to be read as signs of His hostility, but of His paternal care. 'What son is he whom the father chasteneth not?' In a larger sense, perhaps, than this, the grace of God is spoken of as having appeared in saving power, teaching us (παιδεύουσα) that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts we should live soberly, righteously, and godly. 'Teaching' here suggests too little, and probably 'disciplining' or 'chastening' is too narrow; but the conception of the life offered in this passage is that of education under a power which is at once gracious and severe. The χάρις which brings salvation to men employs resources of all kinds to put them in complete possession of it. Often the idea of painful correction is prominent, and in one place the severe word 'judgment' appears in the context. The abuses connected with the Lord's Supper at Corinth had produced much sickness and not a few deaths in the Church (1 Co 11<sup>30</sup>). Men had been eating and drinking 'judgment' to themselves. Yet even under such ἐλεγχόμενοι (καταβήμενοι), the apostle teaches, Christians are not objects of God's hostility: He is seeking their good; 'we are being chastened by the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world.' Even in those peculiar cases of chastisement seen in the world, not God, is made the instrument of it, this holds good. The sinner in 1 Co 5 is delivered to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh indeed (by death?), but that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. So in 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup> Hymenæus and Alexander are handed over to the Adversary, that they may be taught under his hands (παιδευθῶσι) not to blaspheme. Compare also St. Paul's own case: the thorn in the flesh is called an angel of Satan, yet it disciplines him in the Christian grace of humility. The human mind, so long as it dwells in the human body, will not be able to avoid calling such things 'evils'; no chastening for the present seems matter of joy: it is all grief and pain, and it is only afterward, when the fruit of righteousness appears, that we can see it is something to thank God for, a real indication of His love for His children. The large use made in the Apocrypha of the idea of 'chastisement' for the moral interpretation of experience is very striking. One of the chief passages is Wis 3<sup>4-7</sup>.

There we find the conception that suffering is a trial, which, when one stands it successfully, brings a sure reward: a reward too, as in 2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>, out of proportion to the suffering, ὅλγα παιδευθέντες μεγάλα ἐνεργηθήσονται. The idea is also, as well as that of testing, is compared in Wis 3<sup>9</sup> ὡς χρυσὸν ἐν χυμηνήριω ἐδοκίμασεν αὐτοῦς. The paternal aspects of chastisement are . . . in Wis 11<sup>10</sup>: the people of God are chastened in mercy, the wicked are judged and tormented in wrath; His own He puts to the proof ὡς πατὴρ νοθεύων, the others He condemns ὡς ἀπόστομος βασιλεὺς. So again, in 2 Mac 3<sup>2</sup>, 'God 'chastens with calamity,' He never . . . people. This is the main thought of the NT passages also: suffering is the rod in a Father's hand, and the sole instrument by which the purposes of the Father's love can be effected.

The word tribulation has come into our language from the Vulg. rendering, not of παιδεύω, but of θλίβω, θλίψις. In NT none of which these words are used suggest 'tribulation' is disciplinary. It is said, indeed, that we must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of God (Ac 14<sup>22</sup>), but they are rather barriers to be forced, dangers to be disregarded, than disciplines to be welcomed. In 2 Co 1<sup>6</sup> the idea occurs that one man may have to suffer in order to acquire the gift of administering consolation to others. Once in OT (Is 26<sup>19</sup>) the ideas of 'tribulation' and 'chastening' are expressly combined: ἐν θλίψει μικρᾷ ἡ παιδεία σου ἡμῶν; but as a rule θλίψις (affliction or tribulation) is used in a more purely objective way. It may be, in point of fact, an instrument of παιδεία, but that is not the point of view to which of itself it leads.

CHEBAR (כְּבַר, Soḇār, Ezk 1<sup>1</sup> 3 315. 23 1015. 20. 23 433).—A river in 'the land of the Chaldeans,' by the side of which Ezekiel saw his first vision of the Cherubim. Near the banks of this stream was Tel-abib, the home of a colony of Jewish exiles, among whom Ezekiel lived and prophesied (Ezk 3<sup>1</sup>). The Chebar has commonly been identified, in accordance with a Syrian Christian tradition, with the Habor (כְּבַר, Aḥḥāras), the modern Chabour, which runs into the Euphrates not far from the site of Circesium. But the two names are very different, and Babylonia, whither the Jews were deported (2 K 24<sup>18</sup>, Jer 29<sup>4, 20</sup>), can hardly be considered to include Northern Mesopotamia. It is therefore more probable that the Chebar was one of the numerous canals in the neighbourhood of Babylon to which the name of 'river' was often given (cf. Noldeke in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon). The name, however, has not yet been discovered in any of the numerous lists of rivers and canals which are to be found in Assyrian and Babylonian literature. The word is probably connected with the Semitic root כָּבַר to be great; hence it has been suggested that Chebar was another name of the Nahar Malcha, or Royal Canal of Nebuchadrezzar.

CHECK in the obsol. sense of 'rebuke' or 'reproof' occurs Job 20<sup>3</sup> 'I have heard the c. of my reproach' (RV 'reproof which putteth me to shame'). Cf. Pepys, Diary, 26th Sept., 'I was very angry, and . . . did give him a very great check for it, and so to bed'; and Shaks., Henry IV. iv. iii. 34, 'I never knew yet but rebuke and check was the reward of valour.' RV gives the verb in 1 S 24<sup>7</sup> in the mod. sense of 'restrain,' 'so David checked his men with these words' (AV 'stayed').

CHECKER WORK (now generally spelt chequer work) is work arranged after the pattern of a chess-board (which was orig. called 'a checker or chequer'). 1 K 7<sup>17</sup> 'nets of checker work' (שְׁכָרִים, שֶׁכָּרָה),—trellis work of some material used to ornament the 'chapiters' (שְׁכָרִים) of the temple. In 2 K 1<sup>2</sup> the 'upper chamber through which Ahaziah fell. In Job 18<sup>8</sup> it is a net for snaring. J. HASTINGS.

CHEDOR-LAOMER (חֲדֹר־לָאֹמֶר, Χοδολλογομῶρ, Chedorlahomor).—Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, commanded the vassal-kings Amraphel of Shinar, Arioch of Ellasar (which see), and Tidal, king of Goiim, in the war against the Canaanite princes of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar (Gn 14<sup>1-16</sup>). After twelve years of servitude the latter had rebelled against Chedorlaomer, who, with his allies, thereupon marched into the west, on the eastern side of the Jordan, smiting the Rephaim in Bashan, the Zuzim or Zamzummin in Ammon, the Emim in Moab, and the Horites in Mount Seir. He then turned northward through Kadesh-barnea (now 'Ain Qadis), and 'smote all the country of the Amalekites (or Bedawin), and also the Amorites that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar' or 'the western shore of the Dead Sea'. A battle with the Canaanite princes in the vale of Siddim, which resulted in the defeat of the Canaanites, the death (?) of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the capture of their cities. 'Abram the Hebrew,' however, armed 318 of his men and fell upon the conquerors by night near Dan in the extreme north, pursuing them to Hobah, west of Damascus, and recovering the spoil of Sodom, as well as his nephew Lot.

Chedorlaomer is the Elamite name Kudur-Lagamar, 'servant of Lagamar,' one of the principal Elamite gods. Similar names are Kudur-Nankhundi, 'servant of the god Nankhundi,' and Kudur-Mabug, the father of Eri-aku (Arioch). In the time of Eri-aku, Babylon was under the suzerainty of Elam; and while Eri-aku reigned at Larsa and Ur, and claimed sovereignty over the whole of Chaldaea, an independent dynasty was ruling at Babylon 'in the land of Shinar.' Kudur-Mabug is called by his son 'the father of the land of the Amorites,' or Syria and Palestine, which implies some kind of authority there, but he never has the title of king. He was also 'the father of Lamutal,' a frontier district of Elam. The 'land of the Amorites' had been subdued by the Bab. conqueror Sargon of Accad many centuries before (in B.C. 3800). Four times he marched into Syria, and, after assuming the image of himself by the shore of the Mediterranean and crossing the countries 'of the sea of the setting sun,' he united his conquests into a 'single' empire. His son Naram-Sin made his way into the Iberian Peninsula, and must therefore have followed the same road as Chedorlaomer. A later king of Babylonia, Ammi-satana (B.C. 2230), still calls himself 'king of the land of the Amorites'; and the deep and permanent influence of Babylonia in Canaan, evidenced by the Tel el-Amarna tablets, proves that Bab. domination must have long continued there. Ammi-satana was the great-grandson of Khammurabi, the king of Babylon who overthrew Eri-aku and his Elamite allies, and united all Babylonia under one monarch. Khammurabi died sixty years before the accession of Ammi-satana, so that, as he reigned fifty-five years, we may place the expedition of Chedorlaomer about B.C. 2330. A. H. SAYCE.

CHEEK, CHEEK-BONE (חֹךְ, Arab. lahi, 'jaw-bone'; lāhyah, 'beard'; σαγών).—1. The cheek, with its ruddy token of health, is a feature of beauty (1 S 16<sup>12</sup>, Ca 1<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>). In the Lebanon vineyards a species of tinted grape is called 'maidens' cheeks.' On the other hand, as of something that ought not to be, it is said of Jerusalem in her desolation, 'her tears are on her cheeks' (La 1<sup>2</sup>).

* The name Ku-dur-la-ikh-ga-mar has now been read by P. Scheil on a tablet of Khammurabi (see Rev. Bib. Internat. 1896, p. 600, and Rev. de Théol. 1897, p. 83 ff.).

2. It is connected with manliness and pride. To be smitten on the cheek, as described in 1 K 22<sup>24</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>23</sup>, Job 16<sup>10</sup>, Ps 3<sup>7</sup>, Is 50<sup>6</sup>, meant the greatest possible affront, and implied that there was no further power to resist. This gives emphasis to Mt 5<sup>39</sup>, Lk 6<sup>29</sup>, where the want is not of power, but of will, to resist. G. M. MACKIE.

CHEEK TEETH.—Jl 1<sup>6</sup> 'he hath the cheek teeth of a great lion' (מַלְכֵי, RV 'jaw teeth,' as in Pr 30<sup>14</sup> 'their jaw teeth as knives' AV, RV; but in Job 29<sup>17</sup> [all] 'jaws,' RVm 'great teeth'). Cheek teeth=molar teeth, is found in Caxton, Chron. Eng. (1480), 'Al that ever were borne after that pestilence hadden ij cheketh in hir hede lesse than they had afore. J. HASTINGS.

CHEER.—The 'cheer' is orig. the face (Fr. chère, late Lat. cara), as Caxton, Golden Legend, 'the swete of thy chere thou shalt etc.'; 'the expression of the face; and so, any state of mind, or mood, as Shaks., Sonnets, xcvi. 13, 'so dull a cheer'; but generally with adj. 'good.' So always in AV (except 1 Es 9<sup>24</sup> 'Then went they their way to make great c.'), as in the phrase 'Be of good cheer,' Mt 9<sup>2</sup> 14<sup>27</sup>, Mk 6<sup>50</sup>, Jn 16<sup>33</sup>, Ac 23<sup>11</sup> (all θαρά); Ac 27<sup>22, 25, 36</sup> (εὐθυμέω or εὐθυμος); and in RV Job 9<sup>27</sup> (חֲזֵק, AV 'comfort myself,' RVm 'brighten up'). Finally, the word came to signify 'good spirits,' whence the verb 'to cheer,' Jg 9<sup>13</sup>, or 'cheer up,' Dt 24<sup>5</sup> (RV 'cheer'). J. HASTINGS.

CHEESE.—See FOOD.

CHELAL (חֵלָל 'perfection').—One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>30</sup>).

CHELLIANS.—Probably the inhabitants of the town CHELLUS (which see). Cf. Jth 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>23</sup>.

CHELLUS (Χελούς or Χελοῦς).—From the text (Jth 1<sup>9</sup>) this place is supposed to have been situated S.W. of Jerus. near Betane, and N. of Kadesh and the river (var. 'torrent') of Egypt, identified with the Wady el-Arish. Reland thinks it may be Haluzah (חֶלְזָה), the site well known to the Gr. and Rom. geographers under the altered form of Elusa, situated near the source of the Wady es-Sani stream. The mention of a land of the Chellians by the wilderness, to the south of which were the children of Ishmael (Jth 2<sup>23</sup>), is looked upon as supporting this view of the position of C. Doubt must, however, be regarded as accompanying the identification of C. with Haluzah or Elusa if the Syr. name is K. (with K for Ch) be correct. C. is a mistake for Chelul = Halhul, Jos 15<sup>33</sup>. I. A. PINCHES.

CHELOD (Β Χελοῦλ, * Χεσλαιουδά, Α Χελοῦδ, Old Lat. Chelleuth, Vulg. omits, Syr. Chaldaeans).—Jth 1<sup>9b</sup> reads, not as AV and RV 'many nations of the sons of Chelod assembled themselves to battle,' but 'there came together many nations unto the array (or ranks) of the sons of Chelul'; less naturally 'to battle with (against) the sons of Ch.' (εἰς παράταξιν υἱῶν Χ.). Syriac 'to fight against the Chaldaeans,' is improbable. It is not certain whether the 'many nations' are allies of Nebuchadrezzar or of the Chaldaeans, nor whether they come to help or to fight the 'sons of Ch.' Probably v.<sup>6b</sup> summarises v.<sup>3a</sup>; hence 'sons of Ch.' should be Nebuchadrezzar's army. But he is, in Jth, king of Assyrians, not Chaldeans. No probable conjecture as to Aram. original has been made.

CHELUB (כְּלֻב).—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4<sup>11</sup>). 2. The father of Ezri, one of David's superintendents (1 Ch 27<sup>29</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

CHELUBAI (כְּלֻבַי), 1 Ch 2<sup>9</sup>, another form of Caleb. Cf. 1 Ch 2<sup>18, 42</sup>, and see CALEB.

CHELUHI (כְּלֻחִי Kethibh, כְּלֻחִי Kerē, Cheluhu RVm, Chelluh AV).—One of the Benē-Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>35</sup>).

CHEMARIM.—In EV this word is found only in Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>; but the original כְּמָרִים, of which it is the transliteration, is used also at 2 K 23<sup>5</sup> and Hos 10<sup>5</sup>, and in both instances Chēmārim is placed in the margin of AV and RV 'idoltrous priests,' and 'priests' holding the post of honour in the text. It is a little curious that at Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>, the one case where our versions have it, it is probably an interpolation: the LXX omits it, and the parallelism is spoilt by its presence. Wellhausen wished to assert its claim to a place in Hos 4<sup>4</sup>, but other critics have rightly denied this. Chōmer, of which Chēmārim is the plural, is of Aram. origin,* and when used in Syr. carries no unfavourable connotation. In the Peshittā Version of the OT it is employed at Jg 17<sup>5, 12</sup> of Micah's idoltrous priests, but at Is 61<sup>6</sup> of the true priests promised to the restored Israel. In the Pesh. Vers. of the NT, Ac 19<sup>35</sup> has it as the rendering of νεωκόρος, thus neokoros of the Latin ceditui (=temple-attendant). In 10<sup>5</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>; and the Epistle to the Hebrews, passim, כְּמָרִים of the Levitical priests and of our Lord (Mt 23<sup>35, 10</sup>, and many other places). In the Heb. of the OT, however, Chēmārim always has a bad sense: it is applied to the priests who conducted the worship of the calves (2 K 23<sup>5</sup>, Hos 10<sup>5</sup>), and to those who served the Baalim (Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>). Kimchi believed the original significance of the verbal form was 'to be black,' and explained the use of the noun by the assertion that the idoltrous priests wore black garments. Amongst recent lexicographers Brockelmann accepts this derivation. Others take the root to mean, 'to be sad,' the chūmrā being a sad, ascetic person, a monk or priest. The two ideas run into each other, as is well exemplified at Ezk 31<sup>18</sup>, where Pesh. has chēmīrā, LXX ἐσκράσει, Vulg. contristatus est, EV caused to mourn.

CHEMOSH (כְּמוֹשׁ Kēmōsh, Χημός).—The national deity of the Moabites, as J<sup>u</sup> was the national deity of the Israelites. He is frequently referred to as the god of Moab both in the OT and on the Moabite Stone, and the Moabites are referred to as the people of Chemosh (cf. Nu 21<sup>29</sup>, Jer 48<sup>46</sup>). On the Moabite Stone we have a king Chemosh-melek. We also read of a deity Ashtor-Chemosh, not to be identified with C., but distinct. In the inscription, Mesha, the king of Moab, the subjection of Moab to Israel as a result of the anger of C. was angry with his land. At length the anger of C. was appeased, and he bade Mesha go and take Nebo from Israel. C. drove Israel out from before him, and restored to Moab the land taken by Israel. The slaughter of the people of A<sup>u</sup> as a gazings-stock to C. Mesha high place for C., because he had saved him and made him victorious over his foes. That upon occasion he might be worshipped with human sacrifices is probable from 2 K 3<sup>27</sup>, where the king of Moab offered his eldest son as a burnt-offering, and thus forced the Israelites to raise *Solomon built a high-place for C. 'the of Moab' (1 K 11<sup>7</sup>), which lasted till the time of Josiah's reformation, when it was destroyed (2 K 23<sup>13</sup>). According to Jg 11<sup>24</sup> C. was also the national deity of the Ammonites; but this can hardly be correct, since Milcom was their special god. It has been suggested that the text should be corrected, and Milcom read here; but perhaps, as Moore says, the error runs through the whole learned argument (Judges, p. 295).*

CHENANANAH (חֲנָנָה).—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 7<sup>10</sup>). 2. The father of Zedekiah the false prophet in the reign of Ahab (1 K 22<sup>24</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>20</sup>).

CHENANI (חֲנָנִי, prob. for חֲנָנִי).—A Levite (Neh 9<sup>4</sup>).

CHENANIAH (חֲנַנְיָה or חֲנָנִי).—Chief of the Levites at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15<sup>22, 27</sup>), named among the officers and judges over Israel (1 Ch 26<sup>29</sup>).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI (כְּפָר עַמּוֹנִי), 'village of the Ammonites,' Jos 18<sup>24</sup>.—A town of Benjamin. Probably the ruin Kefr 'Ana near Bethel. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv. C. R. CONDER.

CHEPHIRAH (כְּפִירָה), 'village,' Jos 9<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>26</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>25</sup>, Neh 7<sup>29</sup>.—One of the four Hivite cities which made peace with the Hebrews, re-peopled after the Captivity, having belonged to Benjamin. Now Kefireh S.W. of Gibeon, in a position which aids to determine the W. border of Benjamin. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. C. R. CONDER.

CHERAN (כֶּרֶן).—One of the children of Dishon, the son of Seir, the Horite (Gn 36<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>41</sup>). The Sept. transliteration, acc. to Dillm., is possibly based on a supposed connexion of the word with כֶּרֶן = a lamb. H. E. RYLE.

CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES (חֲרָתִּים וּפְלִתִּים).—A designation repeatedly applied to a body of troops in the service of David, which seem to have formed the king's bodyguard. As to the derivation of the words, opinions have differed. Gesenius explained them as = executioners and runners (from the verbs חָרַת and פָּלַת), their duty being to inflict capital punishment, and also to convey the king's mandates as quickly as possible to those who held places of government. Linguistic and other objections seem to be fatal to this theory, as well as to another which makes חָרַת to be so called from חָרַת = to be expelled from one's country (Zec 14<sup>2</sup>),—an explanation which would identify it with the Sept. ἡλιδόφυλοι of ἡλιδόφυλοι (Philistine) by ἡλιδόφυλοι.

It seems to be unquestionable that Cherethite and Pelethite are not common but proper names. The Cherethites, as a tribe inhabiting the southern border of Canaan, are thrice mentioned in the OT (1 S 30<sup>14</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>5</sup>, Ezk 25<sup>16</sup>), and in all these passages they are associated so closely with the Philistines as to be practically identified with them. Now we know from Am 9<sup>7</sup>, Dt 2<sup>23</sup>, and Jer 47<sup>4</sup> that the Philistines were believed to have come to Canaan from Caphtor, which is generally identified with Crete. May Cherethites not be another form of Cretans? Instead of Cherethites, the Kethibh of 2 S 20<sup>23</sup> offers the reading Carites. So in 2 K 11<sup>4, 18</sup> the true reading as restored in RV is Carites, where AV reads Captains. The terms Cretans and Carites may both be represented readily enough by חֲרָתִּים. That פְּלִתִּים is simply a variation of חֲרָתִּים (Philistine) was Ewald's opinion, and has since been generally accepted.

The Cherethites and Pelethites were thus a Philistine bodyguard, originally introduced by David, whose action is explained by his relations with the Philistines prior to his accession to the throne. This conclusion finds further support in the fact that in 2 S 15<sup>18</sup> the Gittites, who were certainly Philistines, are coupled with the Cherethites and Pelethites. These men were chosen on the same principle as the Swiss Guards at European courts and the Oriental Janissaries, whose fidelity is in proportion to their freedom from local ties and interests. His Philistine mercenaries proved themselves worthy of David's confidence by standing by him amidst the troubles occasioned by Absalom, Sheba, and Adonijah (2 S 15<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>33</sup>). While some have confined the existence of this bodyguard to the reign of David, others have found traces of it down to the close of the Judæan kingdom. The mention of the Carites in 2 K 11 is in favour of the latter view. It was the officers of the Carians and the foot-guards that enabled Jehoiada to accomplish the overthrow of Athaliah, and the installation of Jehoash as king. So in 1 K 14<sup>28</sup> we read of guards who accompanied the king when he visited the sanctuary, and from 2 K 11<sup>48</sup> it is evident that the royal bodyguard formed also the guard of the temple. Is there any reason to conclude that these guards were foreign mercenaries? W. R. Smith adduces two reasons. (1) In OT to prove their identity with the Cherethites and Pelethites. Zeph 1<sup>5</sup> speaks of men connected with the court who were clad in foreign garb, and who leaped over the threshold, and filled their masters' house with violence and deceit. Smith finds here an allusion to the Philistine custom of leaping over the threshold of the sanctuary (1 S 5<sup>5</sup>); but others deny the validity of his argument, and make 'leaping over the threshold' simply a name for house-breaking,* where those who are clothed in foreign garb are Israelites who ape foreign customs. Be this as it may, Smith's other OT reference seems to be conclusive. In Ezk 44<sup>6ff</sup> there is a bitter complaint that uncircumcised foreigners were permitted to keep guard in the sanctuary, and to discharge functions which the prophet would henceforth confine to the Levites. Who can these be except the guards referred to in 2 K 11? This conclusion is strengthened if Smith is right in his conjecture that prior to the time of Ezekiel the king's guards slaughtered the animals provided by the king for the temple, or intended for the royal table. As he points out, the Heb. designation for captain of the guard is קַרְיָהּ = chief of the slaughterers (of cattle). 'The bodyguard were also the royal butchers, an occupation not deemed unworthy of warriors in early times' (W. R. Smith, OTJC p. 262, n.; cf. Kittel, Hist. of Heb. ii. 153 n., 164; Driver, Text of Sam. 172, 267).

CHERITH (כְּרִית).—The brook by which Elijah lived (1 K 17<sup>3,5</sup>) was 'before Jordan,' i.e., according to familiar usage, on the E. of Jordan. Elijah 'was of the inhabitants' (or 'was of the land' לְאֶרֶץ) of Gilead, or according to the LXX 'of the land of Gilead,' and would be well acquainted with the hiding-places of that country. If the 'Ravens' (עֲרָבִים) were an Arab tribe, as many believe (see OREB), it must have been well to the E. where they pastured their flocks. The popular identification of the brook Cherith with the Wady Kelt between Jerus. and Jericho is unwarranted.

A. HENDERSON.

CHERUB.—A proper name (Ezr 2<sup>29</sup>, Neh 7<sup>61</sup>); one of the places from which certain families, on the return from Babylon, failed to prove their register as genuine branches of the Israelite people. The name has been identified with the Chiripa of Ptolemy. See CHARAATHALAN. H. E. RYLE.

* In view of the Oriental reverence for the threshold, this seems an unlikely explanation. (See Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, p. 259 f.; and for the Philistine custom, p. 116 f.)

CHERUBIM (כְּרֻבִים or כְּרֻבִים, χερουβίμ; sing. כְּרֻב, χερούβ).—By this name are denoted the winged creatures which, in the religious symbolism of OT, are not infrequently mentioned as attending upon the Most High, and as possessed of sacred duties in the court of the heavenly beings that surround the throne of God.

What the Heb. conception of a 'cherub' was, does not appear at all certain. And if, as seems most probable, both name and thing were derived from a primitive stage of religious thought in W. Asia, this uncertainty in the Biblical writings admits of a natural explanation. For writers who were under the influence of the worship of J<sup>h</sup> would shrink from giving a description that might lend itself to obvious comparison with the idolatrous symbolism of other religions.

i. In OT we find references to the cherubim (1) in the Israelite version of primitive myth; (2) in early Heb. poetry; (3) in the description; and (4) in the descriptions of the ark, the tabernacle, and the temple.

1. Gn 3<sup>24</sup> 'And he placed at the east of the garden of Eden the cherubim, and the flame of a sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.' The function of the cherubim here is to guard the approach to the sacred tree. The number of the cherubim appointed for this duty is not mentioned; nor is it stated, as is usually supposed, that each of the cherubim bore in his hand a flaming sword. We are only told that a sword with darting flames was entrusted to them for the purpose of keeping the way.

It has been natural to compare with these guardian, or sentinel, 'cherubim' the monster winged bulls with human heads which stood at the entrance of Assyrian palaces and temples. M. Lenormant having suggested, on the authority of a talismanic tablet, that kirubu was an Assyrian name in use, the temptation to connect the cherubim of Gn 3 with the Assyrian figures was almost irresistible. But this use of kirubu is questionable; the cherubim in our passage are not limited to two; there is no mention of a gate of Paradise; and the function of the cherubim is evidently primarily connected with the sword, which, to judge from the description, is probably intended to denote lightning.

2. Ps 18<sup>10</sup> (= 2 S 22<sup>11</sup>) 'And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly.' In the context of this poetical description, the Psalmist describes the power of J<sup>h</sup> as manifested in the thunderstorm. J<sup>h</sup> is represented in flight through mid-air, borne up upon the wings of a cherub, while the lightning-flash before Him ('at the brightness before him,' v. 12). The cherub appears to be the mighty winged spirit of the storm,—on whose back J<sup>h</sup> Himself is seated. He is the personification of the swift storm-cloud that sweeps down as upon eagles' wings. J<sup>h</sup> is carried by the cherub, as the Indian god Vishnu by Garuda, and as Oceanus by the griffin (Tch. Phœnix).

3. In the prophetic writings of Ezekiel we have well-known references. (1) In Ezk 28<sup>14</sup> 'Thou wast the anointed cherub that covereth; and I set thee so that thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire.' Here the prophet compares 'the Prince of Tyre' to one of the chosen attendants upon God, a cherub whose wings, as in the Holy of Holies, shaded the mercy-seat, one whose abode was in the holy mountain, and one who there walked among the flashing lightnings that surrounded the Divine Presence. A 'cherub,' according to this account, abides in the sacred precincts of the Most High, and round about him play the thunderbolts. The idea of the thundercloud is combined with that of heavenly fire.

The imagery employed by the same prophet in the Vision of the Cherubim (Ezk 10) is very obscure, and introduces a much more complex idea. The prophet recognises them as identical with 'the living creatures that I saw under the God of Israel by the river Chebar' (1<sup>20</sup>), referring to the vision of 'the chariot' in ch. 1. These were four in number (10<sup>10</sup>); they had each four faces, 'the face of a cherub, a man, a lion, and an eagle' (14), and 'four wings' (21). As one of their faces was that of 'a cherub,' and the prophet on seeing them 'knew that they were cherubim' (20), the shape of a 'cherub' as of a fabulous creature must have been well known to him. Popular representations (cf. 1 K 7<sup>29</sup>), however, the prophet's description throws no further light upon their shape. But presumably it must have resembled that of an ox (cf. Ezk 1<sup>10</sup>). He tells us that the 'glory of the LORD' rested above 'the cherubim' (10<sup>15</sup>); that their progress was straight forward (22); while they moved not with wings only, but with whirling wheels, and burning fire was between them (8, 7). We have the thought of the thunderstorm connected with their appearance in Ezk 14; the noise of their wings (124) suggests the thunder; fire and lightning attend them (113).

Altogether, this description, though much more complex and involved than any that has been suggested by the previous passages, presents no difficulty to them. In all probability it represents an elaboration, in accordance with the general style and characteristics of Ezekiel's literary work, of the older and simpler conception. The 'cherub,' as one of the powers of heaven, in poetry impersonated the storm-clouds that do J<sup>h</sup>'s bidding; in Ezekiel's vision there are four such 'cherubim,' corresponding to the four directions of the sky. In poetry, J<sup>h</sup> had ridden on them; in the vision the cherubim not only flew, but moved on wheels, supporting the glory of J<sup>h</sup>. In poetry the lightnings flashed before the cherub; in the vision there is fire between the cherubim, and 'the living creatures' ran and returned as the appearance of a storm.

4. The 'cherubim' occupied an important place in Heb. sacred art. (1) The figures of two 'cherubim' were placed on either side of the mercy-seat of the ark (Ex 25<sup>18-21</sup>). No minute account is given of their appearance. We are only told that their wings lifted upwards, and were outspread so as to cover the ark, and that they were presented in a posture facing one another, but looking down upon the ark—an attitude to which we may suppose the apostle makes reference in 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>. They were composed of 'wrought gold,' i.e. of hammered solid gold as opposed to cast gold. As the mercy-seat covered by their wings was only 3 ft. 9 in. (2½ cubits) long, the figures of the cherubim were quite small.

(2) Figures of cherubim were introduced into the veil or hanging screen which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (1 K 20<sup>1</sup>). It has commonly been considered that, as the way into the Holiest was through this curtain, the thought intended by these representations of cherubim may have been similar to that expressed by the guardian cherubim who guarded 'the way of the tree of life' in Gn 3.

(3) Solomon's temple contained in its Holy of Holies two colossal cherubim, 10 cubits (or 15 ft.) high, made of olive wood and overlaid with gold. The wings of the cherubim were spread out, and measured 10 cubits from the extremity of one wing to the extremity of the other. The Holy of Holies was a cube of 20 cubits or 30 ft.; and the two cherubim touched with their outer wings the wall on either side, while they touched one another with their outstretched inner wings. The whole span of their four wings was 20 cubits, equal to the width of the sanctuary. They each therefore stood at the same distance from one another as they did from the wall on either side (1 K 6<sup>28-29</sup>). From this description we should certainly infer that they had each only two wings. In 2 Ch 31<sup>17</sup> the same general account is given of the 'cherubim' of 'image-work' in Solomon's temple; but it is added that 'they stood on their feet, and their faces were toward the house,' by which is probably meant, facing the entrance. It has been disputed whether the smaller cherubim which protected the mercy-seat of the ark were retained in Solomon's temple. And it may be granted that the height of the Solomonic cherubim made it perfectly possible, but scarcely probable.

(4) 'Cherubim' were introduced, along with 'palm-trees and open flowers,' into the carved woodwork with which the walls and doors of the exterior and interior of the temple were adorned (1 K 6<sup>29, 32, 35</sup>). In the description of the 'brazen sea' it is recorded that in the ornamentation there were figures of 'lions, oxen, and cherubim' (1 K 7<sup>29</sup>).

From these OT passages we can gather no precise conclusion as to the shape and general figure of the cherub, according to Hebrew treatment in poetry and art. It had wings; it stood on feet (2 Ch); its face was not that of a man, a lion, or an eagle (Ezk 10<sup>14</sup>). It may have resembled an ox. But we are driven rather to suppose that its figure was an imaginary one, like that of a griffin or a dragon.

Whether its name is of Sem. origin or not, is a disputed point (see below). There is not sufficient reason to doubt that the original idea belongs to the early childhood of Israel's religion, and is thus related to similar conceptions in other races.

The prominence given to the cherubim in the passages we have passed in review makes it very unlikely that they had been borrowed from other countries or foreign religions. For we can hardly imagine the one representation of a living creature, which was permitted in the construction of the ark, the tabernacle, and the temple, to have been derived from an alien source. The fact that the designing of the cherubim is mentioned without any consciousness of the violation of the second commandment, is in itself an indication that the idea of these creatures belongs to an original Hebrew idea—the superstitious element of which was destined to be removed by the teaching of J<sup>h</sup> worship. Thus the 'cherub' survived as one of the traces of a Heb. mythology, which was retained by the prophets because it represented pictorially the attributes of the majesty of the God of Israel, and was employed to express more vividly the means by which His glory is revealed to man.

Besides the winged bulls familiar to us from the Assyrian remains, we come across many representations of winged monsters and chimæras in the countries adjoining Palestine. Egypt. religious art is said to have borrowed from Syria the figure of the Sefer, or Seref (cf. the Heb. 'seraph'). Phœn. monuments contain representations of winged griffins guarding the sacred tree (cf. a white marble relief from Arados in the Museum of the Louvre). The famous monster represented on the tomb of Smerkes, an Egypt. king (c. B.C. 2100), gives us a figure from whose back issues a human head, with wings on either side of the neck. All these are attempts apparently to combine the attributes of strength and swiftness in animals with the intellect of man, in representation of the LITERATURE.—The subject is extensively discussed in the standard works on the Theology of the OT, by Oehler, Smend, Schultz, Dillmann; and on the Archæology, by Nowack and Ben-Zvi, etc. See also Cheyne's 'Excursus' in vol. ii. of his Isaiah, and his Notes on the word in Com. on Psalms.

CHESALON (כֶּסְלוֹן).—Near Kiriath-jearim on the border of Judah, Jos 15<sup>10</sup>. Now the village Kesla on the hill N. of Kiriath-jearim. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xvii. It is noticed in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Chasalon) as a large village in the Jerus. district.

CHESED (חֶסֶד).—One of the sons of Nahor and Milcah (Gn 22<sup>22</sup> J). He is obviously here introduced into the genealogy of the Terahites as the presumptive forefather of the Casdim (כַּסְדִּים) or Chaldeans. This probably represents a different tradition from that in P, where Ur of the Chaldees (i.e. Casdim) is spoken of as the dwelling-place of Terah (Gn 11), Nahor's father.

It is noticeable that the eldest of the brothers of Chesed is Uz, and that in Job 1 the Casdim (translated Chaldeans) are found invading the territory of Uz. Gn 22<sup>21, 22</sup> probably represent, in the terms of genealogy, the supposed kinship of allied clans who dwelt in Mesopotamia. The Heb. tradition gives the names of tribes identified with various localities on the borders of the plain of Mesopotamia.

H. E. RYLE.

CHESIL (כֶּסֶל), Jos 15<sup>50</sup>.—The LXX reads Bethel, probably for Bethul, as in the parallel passage, Jos 19<sup>4</sup>, and כֶּסֶל of MT is prob. a textual error. (See Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade.)

CHEST.—1. In order to defray the cost of certain repairs of the temple, the priest Jehoiada placed in the court (our authorities are not agreed as to the exact location; cf. 2 K 12<sup>9</sup> , 2 י' 21<sup>18</sup>, with LXX in each case) a chest (כֶּסֶת), in the lid (Heb. door) of which a hole had been bored, for the reception of the offerings of the worshippers, as recorded 2 K 12<sup>10</sup>. (Heb. שַׁר) (LXX κιβωτός, Vulg. gazophylacium), and, with variations, 2 Ch 24<sup>8</sup>. (γλωσσόκομον, arca). The ark (of the covenant) is also invariably denoted by כֶּסֶת, either alone or with qualifications (see ARK 1.). So, too, the coffin in which Joseph's mummy was placed (Gn 50<sup>26</sup>). The feature common to all three is shape; the first two certainly, . . . probably, were of wood. Γλωσσόκομον, used by the LXX translator of Chron. as a synonym of κιβωτός, is freq. employed by the later Gr. translators as the rendering of כֶּסֶת in all the three . . . given above, as by Aquila in Gn 50<sup>26</sup>, and in the so-called Targ. of Jonathan also renders אֲרוֹן Jos. further uses it (Ant. vi. i. 2) to denote the 'coffer' (EV, πύξ 1 S 6<sup>32</sup>) or small chest in which the Phil. prin. . . the golden mice, while in NT it is . . . the cash-box of which Judas Iscariot had charge (Jn 12<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>29</sup>). In the temple of Herod, 13 chests stood in the court of the women, to receive the various kinds of money gifts, in shape resembling a trumpet (if the treatise Shekalim vi. 5 may be trusted), wide at the bottom but gradually narrowing towards the top, hence called קַרְנֵי. It was into one of these chests that the widow cast her slender offering (Mk 12<sup>41</sup>, Lk 21<sup>4</sup>).

2. In AV and RV we find in Ezekiel's inventory (27<sup>24</sup>) of the merchandise of Tyre 'chests (כֶּסֶת) of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar.' But the sense 'chests' for this word is without sufficient support (see comm. of Cornill, Davidson, Smend), and the word rendered 'made of cedar' must mean 'strong, durable,' so that we should probably render 'cloths of cords twined and durable.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CHESTNUT TREE (כַּרְמֶל 'armôn, πλάτανος platanus).—'Armôn is mentioned twice in OT; once as one of the trees in which Jacob 'piled white stakes' (Gn 30<sup>37</sup>), and set them before the flocks at the watering troughs, and again as one of the trees with which the cedar of Lebanon, symbolical of Assyria, is compared (Ezk 31<sup>8</sup>). The chestnut tree, which is the rendering of the Rabbis and of AV, is not indigenous in any part of Syria and Pal., and does not succeed in cultivation. It has probably never grown there except as an exotic. The plane tree of LXX, Vulg., and RV, Platanus Orientalis, L., on the contrary, grows everywhere by, and in, watercourses, and is one of the finest trees of the country. It has a trunk which is often 6 to 10 ft. in diameter, and 50 to 100 ft. high, spreading branches, and large palmate-lobed leaves. The monœcious flowers are in pendulous, spherical heads, the fertile becoming as large as a small walnut. The name 'armôn' signifies naked, and probably refers to the fact that the outer layers of bark scale off as in the Eucalyptus globulus, leaving a smooth surface. When peeled, it would leave a white streak. Plane trees grow in Mesopotamia. Chestnut trees do not. There can be no reasonable doubt that the 'armôn' is the plane tree. It is called in Arab. alīb. In Sir 24<sup>14</sup> wisdom is compared to a plane tree by the water.

CHESULLOTH (כֶּסֶלֹת), Jos 19<sup>18</sup>.—The same as Chisloth-tabor, Jos 19<sup>12</sup>. A place on the border of Zebulun. Now the ruin of Iksdl at the foot of the Nazareth hills, in the fertile plain W. of Tabor. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Chasalath) the site was known as near Tabor, but it was also wrongly identified with Achshaph (see Onomasticon, s.v. Acsaph and Achaseloth). The ruin is chiefly remarkable for a cemetery of tombs apparently mediæval. See SWP vol. i. sheet v.

C. R. CONDER.

CHETH or HETH (ה).—Eighth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 8th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CHEZIB, Gn 38<sup>5</sup>.—See ACHZIB.

CHIDE.—To chide (past 'chode') is to wrangle; then to scold or sharply rebuke; so Ps 103<sup>9</sup> 'He will not always c.' (רָבָה). Cf. Ps 18<sup>15</sup>, Pr. Bk. To chide with is to wrangle with one, have an altercation with one; so Gn 31<sup>36</sup> 'Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban,' Ex 17<sup>24</sup> (RV 'strive'), Nu 20<sup>4</sup>, Jg 8<sup>1</sup> (all רָבָה). Chiding as subst. occurs Ex 17<sup>7</sup> 'because of the c. of the children of Israel' (רָבָה, RV 'striving').

J. HASTINGS.

CHIDON (כִּידֹן).—The name acc. 'to 1 Ch 13<sup>9</sup> of the threshing-floor where Uzzah was struck dead for rashly touching the ark (see UZZAH). In 2 S 6<sup>6</sup> the name is given as Nacon, which Budde considers to be a less probable reading. No locality has ever been identified with either name. The view has been advanced that C. is the name, not of a place, but of the proprietor of the threshing-floor, and attempts have been made to identify him with Araunah or Ornan the Jebusite. (See further Driver and Wellh. on 2 S 6<sup>6</sup>.)

R. M. BOYD.

CHIEF.—i. In old Eng. as in modern, 'chief' was both a subst. and an adj.; but in AV (though it is the tr. of some twenty Heb. words, all substs.) it is seldom if ever a substantive. The Oxf. Eng. Dict. quotes as a subst. the occurrence of 'c.' in Nu 3<sup>30</sup> and Ps 105<sup>28</sup>; but even these are not certain instances. If 'c.' were a subst. in Nu 3<sup>30</sup>, then in 3<sup>32</sup> 'Eleazar shall be chief over the chief of the Levites,' the plu. would be used, 'over the chiefs' (נָשִׂים, RV 'princes'), there being no example of the sing. used for the plural. It is prob. that 'c.' is an adj. with 'men' understood. In Ps 105<sup>38</sup> 'He smote also all the firstborn in the land, the c. of all their strength,' the Heb. (נָשִׂים, lit. 'beginning,' the common word for 'first-fruits') is the same as in Am 6<sup>1</sup> 'c. of the nations' and 6<sup>6</sup> 'the c. ointments,' where the word is clearly an adj. in the one case, and probably in the other. Cf. Lk 11<sup>15</sup> 'the c. of the devils' (ἀρχῶν, RV 'prince'), with 14<sup>1</sup> 'one of the c. Pharisees' (ἀρχῶν, RV 'one of the rulers of the P.'). Hence when RV gives 'chiefs' for AV 'chief,' as 'the chiefs of the Levites' 2 Ch 35<sup>9</sup>, 'the chiefs of the priests' 36<sup>14</sup>, Ezr 8<sup>24, 29a</sup> 10<sup>5</sup>, it introduces a plu. not found in AV, and a word of doubtful application.

ii. 'Chief' is given as tr. of 1. ro'sh, 'head,' esp. in the phrase 'c. of the fathers' (RV 'heads of the fathers' houses'), on which see Ryle on Ezr 1<sup>5</sup> and art. FAMILY. In Ezk 38<sup>2, 3</sup> 39<sup>1</sup> ro'sh is taken by RV as a proper name, Rosh (wh. see). 2. Kōhēn, 'priest,' referring to David's sons (2 S 8<sup>18</sup>) and to Ira the Jannite (29<sup>9</sup>), is mistranslated 'c. ruler' (RV 'priest'), after the gloss of the Chronicler (1 Ch 18<sup>17</sup>). See Driver, Notes on Samuel, on 2 S 8<sup>18</sup> and art. PRIESTS. 3. In Pr 16<sup>28</sup> 'allāph' (אֵלֶּפֶס, fr. [אָלָף] cleave to) is tr. 'chief friends,' evidently from a recollection that 'allāph' also means 'duke' of Edom throughout Gn 36, and in Ex 15<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ch 15<sup>1, 52, 53, 54</sup>; and in Zec 12<sup>5, 6</sup> 'governor' (RV 'chieftain'). But in the latter sense 'allāph' is best taken from 'eleph' (אֵלֶּפֶס), 'a thousand,' that is, 'leader of a thousand,' 'chilarch.' Dr. Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict.) thinks this passage in Pr (16<sup>28</sup>) 'a whisperer among the c. friends' has suggested the Scot. 'chief intimate,' as 'They're very c. wi' ane anither.' 4. In Is 14<sup>9</sup> '[Hell] stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the c. ones of the earth,' the Heb. for 'c. ones' is 'attidim' (אֲתִידִים, lit. 'he-goats,' here as the leaders of the flock; Cheyne (after Kay), 'bell-wethers.' See Cheyne in loc., and cf. Zec 10<sup>4</sup>.

iv. When c. lost its obsol. sense of supreme, and was weakened into 'leading' (cf. Am 6<sup>5</sup> 'anoint themselves with the chief ointments'=choice), comparison became possible. 'Chieftest' is not found in AV, but 'chieftest' occurs 1 S 23<sup>9, 22</sup> 21<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 32<sup>23</sup>, Ca 5<sup>10</sup>, Mat 13<sup>15</sup>, Mk 10<sup>44</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>11</sup> (both 'very chieftest,' Gr. ὑπερλίαν), 1 Ti subscr.

CHILD, CHILDREN (יָלֵד, יָלֵדָה).—The Heb. language has a rich variety of words adapted to the different stages by which infancy passes into manhood and womanhood. This wealth of description indicates the importance of what is described. No word in the Bible contains so much of God's goodness and human happiness as is found wrapped up in the word 'child.' Most of these associations are common to the human family everywhere and in all ages; some are Oriental, a few are special to Israel. (See BIRTHRIGHT, CIRCUMCISION, REDEMPTION.)

1. Children as gifts of God and tokens of divine

favour.—The desire to possess children has always been a marked feature of Oriental life. Rachel spoke as the mother of her people when she cried, 'Give me children, or else I die' (Gn 30<sup>1</sup>). This desire gives their chief value to the tombs of saints and shrines of modern Syria. The . . . carries with it a vow to do or give something in honour of the saint appealed to. In the same way, but with a wiser devotion, Hannah went to the tabernacle of God, and afterwards named her child Samuel ('God hath heard'), and surrendered him to the Lord's service (1 S 1<sup>11, 20</sup>). To this devout recognition is due the fact that while many names, such as Isaac, Manasseh, Moses, Ichabod, were suggested by some incident or anxiety of the hour, and names of females were often taken from objects of beauty in nature, such as Deborah, Esther, Rhoda, many others contained the name of God, or an attribute of God, as Elimelech, Athaliah, . . . Arabs we have Shikri ('my . . .'), 'Abd-ul-Hamid ('servant of the . . . at-Ullah ('grace of God'). For the same reason, Oriental feeling is rather against the observance of birthdays, as it seems to turn the sense of favour into an . . . In a life so full of uncertain seemed safer to be humbly than . . . to appear elated by a possession. Nothing is more dreaded or disliked by an Oriental parent than to have a child's healthy or . . . commented upon without t . . . ed to God in the same breath. The mention of the divine name is understood to avert the curse of the evil eye. Children are 'the heritage of the Lord' (Ps 127<sup>3</sup>), and in Arabic . . . they are called to as 'the guarded ones.'

2. Parental and filial affection.—Child-life has always been the great emblem of what appeals to human affection and responds to it. With the young, love, that in the ordinary lives of men is often the hireling of selfish interests, is always a free and independent instinct. The child's natural assurance that it must be so with all, appears amid sordid commonplaces and surrendered ideals as a remembrance of Eden, and a type of what the kingdom of God is meant to be (Mt 18<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>). The Bible is throughout a book for the families of men, and finds the fulfilment of all its teaching in the life of the Sinless Man. Its references, especially to child-life, are so simple and realistic that in reading them one forgets the antiquity of the narrative. The Land is here in very close affinity with the Book, for the strength of the family affections is the brightest feature of Oriental life. The infant in the ark of bulrushes cries like a child of to-day on beholding the strange face of his deliverer (Ex 2<sup>6</sup>). Again, in 2 K 4<sup>19</sup> we have a child's repeated cry of pain, the instinctive appeal to the father, and the resource of a mother's comforting and care. Isaiah takes note of the first words a child learns to lisp (Is 8<sup>4</sup>), and Naaman's flesh becomes 'like the flesh of a little child' (2 K 5<sup>14</sup>). Solomon reveals his own wisdom in revealing the strain that could be put upon the love even of a degraded mother. David cries over his rebellious yet still beloved son, 'Would God that I had died for thee!' (2 S 18<sup>33</sup>). The cruelty to their infants was one of the experiences that made it impossible for the captives to forget Jerusalem (Ps 137<sup>9</sup>). Such an experience was in its turn the worst thing that could happen to the oppressors of Israel (Nah 3<sup>10</sup>). The transmission of suffering to the innocent of the third and fourth generations was one of the mightiest intimidations of the moral law (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>). Hagar could not bear to sit alone and watch the last unconscious movements of her dying child (Gn 21<sup>16</sup>). 'When my children were about me' (Job 29<sup>6</sup>), was a touching summary of vanished happiness. Amos, seeking to picture the day of ruin that Israel was precipitating by wholesale corruption, could find nothing more expressive of all that was bleak and bitter and unbearable than 'the mourning of an only son' (Am 8<sup>10</sup>).

It was in such a prepared cradle of family experience, with its tenderest ties of affection, and folds of life's sweetness and sorrow, that the gospel of the unexpected and unspeakable gift was laid. 'He gave his only-begotten Son' (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>); 'He spared not his own Son' (Ro 8<sup>32</sup>).

3. The importance of the parental position.—Mingled with the natural affection of parents towards their children, was the fact that their possession meant increase of dignity, influence, and wealth. This is shown in the preference for male children. In the home-circle, daughters might be as affectionate and as much beloved as sons, but in the expansion and continuance of the family name, in the holding of 'acquisition of wealth, and generally to worldly prosperity, sons and not daughters were the precious gifts of God. The former especially were the olive-shoots which sprang up from the roots of the parent stem (Ps 128), hence the forfeiture and reproach connected with childlessness, and the rejoicing over a man-child born into the world. In Syria the paternal position is so important that the father usually ceases to be called by his own name, and receives that of his firstborn son, as Abu-Yuseph ('father of Joseph'). If a middle-aged man has no son, courtesy often gives him a fictitious paternity, and styles him Abu-Abdullah ('father of Abdullah'). The son might also be known by the father's name as a sort of surname. Thus David's full name was David Jesse, or ben-Jesse ('son of Jesse'). It was quite unusual for the son to receive in circumcision the name of the father until late in Israel's history (see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 2 ff.). The father was still alive, and needed as yet no memorial, but a son often received the name of a grand-parent, to keep alive the name of the departed, and with the name to inherit his gifts and graces of character. The later custom appears in Lk 1<sup>59</sup> 'They would have called him Zacharias, after the name of his father.' The authority of the parents over their children, and over all things for their welfare, was complete and absolute. One of the commandments was devoted to this relationship, and one of the death-penalties of the law of Moses was to meet the case of filial disobedience (Dt 21<sup>20</sup>). Hence the solemnity of the charge against Israel (Is 1<sup>2</sup>), and the deep meaning of the confession, 'I am no more worthy to be called thy son' (Lk 15<sup>18</sup>).

4. The child.—Given a life with little change in its outward conditions, and with a law that controlled every detail of life, it followed that time would be an intensifier of the parental features. Among the Arabs the epithet 'dog' has for its climax 'son of a dog.' As one of their proverbs states the problem, 'If the father be onion and the mother garlic, how can there be sweet perfume?' When Saul asked the young slayer of Goliath, 'Whose son art thou, young man?' (1 S 17<sup>28</sup>), the question would not only reveal the family of David, but also account in part for the courage he had shown. Hence the imminations, 'Ye are the children of them that killed the prophets' (Mt 23<sup>31</sup>); 'If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham' (Jn 8<sup>39</sup>); and the defence, 'How can Satan cast out Satan?' (Mk 3<sup>23</sup>). So Ezk 18<sup>2</sup>, Ac 13<sup>10</sup> etc.

5. Spiritual sense of father, son, brother.—The use of the word son in a fig. sense carries the three chief meanings of the literal use, namely, (1) affection, (2) obedience, (3) likeness. By these significations we must interpret 'sons of the Highest,' 'children of belial,' 'son of peace—perdition—disobedience—the commandment.' The new creature born of the Spirit receives new preferences and powers for the new life in Christ Jesus. St. Paul speaks of Timothy and Onesimus as his children; and St. John finds his chief delight in the fact that his children walk in the truth. The Lord's Prayer is an assemblage of all that the children should be and do and expect in order to please their Father in heaven. In the 'call no man your father upon the earth,' the allusion was most likely to a formality of ecclesiastical homage, like the salutation 'Rabbi' of v<sup>8</sup>. Among the Syrian Christians it is customary to salute the priest as Abūna ('our father').

In the East the family is always reckoned from the standpoint of the chief or oldest representative. Those whom he calls children are brethren. Thus the women of Bethlehem said, 'There is a child born to Naomi' (Ru 4<sup>17</sup>). This custom gave a vital and affectionate largeness of meaning to the word 'brother.' When Christians seek to realise the brotherhood that belongs to the society of the redeemed, the most effective way is found to be a return to Bible thought and Oriental custom, namely, united service to the Head of the family, devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ. See also FAMILY; and for Children of God see GOD, CHILDREN OF.

G. M. MACKIE.

CHILEAB (כִּלְיָב).—The second son of David by Abigail, the wife of Nabal the Carmelite (2 S 3<sup>3</sup>). In 1 Ch 3<sup>1</sup> he is called Daniel, while the LXX in Sam. has Δαλουά, which is also given by A in 1 Ch; but B reads Δαμνῆλ. Wellh. considers that כִּלְיָב is only a variant for כִּלְיָ, a bye-form of כִּלְיָ, and therefore not unsuitable for a descendant of the house of Caleb. A comparison of the Heb. text, in which the last three letters of Chileab are repeated in the following word, favours the reading of the LXX, which would correspond to the Heb. כִּלְיָה or כִּלְיָה (Delaiah), cf. 1 Ch 3<sup>24</sup> 24<sup>18</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>50</sup> = Neh 7<sup>62</sup>, Neh 6<sup>10</sup>, Jer 36<sup>12, 22</sup>. J. F. STENNING.

CHILION and Mahlon were the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, of Bethlehem-judah, who migrated as refugees to the country of Moab in consequence of a famine 'in the days when the judges judged' (Ru 1<sup>1-2</sup>). They married women of the Moabites, Mahlon marrying Ruth and Chilion Orpah (Ru 4<sup>10</sup>), and after a sojourn of ten years in Moabite territory died there. (Chilion = כִּלְיָ 'wasting away' = Κελαίων, Χελαιών, LXX B. Mahlon = מַלְחֹן 'sickly' = Μαλῶν, LXX, Mahalon, Vulg., as if the Heb. was originally read כִּלְיָ to connect the name with the high. pter. of מִלְחָ.) Neither of these names occurs elsewhere in the Bible. Jesse is called an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah in 1 S 17<sup>12</sup>. The two names occur in varying order in Ru 1<sup>2</sup> and 4<sup>10</sup>, so that no conclusion can be drawn as to which was the elder. The Targ. on 1 Ch 4<sup>22</sup> connects them with the Joash and Saraph of that passage. H. A. REDPATH.

CHILMAD (כִּלְמָד) occurs in Ezk 27<sup>28</sup> at the close of the list of nations that traded with Tyre. The name has been thought to be the Aram. form of Charmande, a town on the Euphrates mentioned by X. 7. 1. 5. 10. George Smith identified Chilmad with the modern Kalwādha near Baghdad. The LXX reads Χαμάν, which is perhaps the name of Carmania in S. Persia. None of these conjectures has much probability. After Asshur (which there is no reason to suppose means anything else than Assyria) we should certainly expect a country rather than a town, and at the end of the list an important and well-known country. The Targ. seems to have read מדיא ('all Media'). But the best suggestion, after all, is perhaps that of Joseph Kunchi (adopted by Hitzig and Cornill), who reads the word מדיא, explaining: '[Asshur etc. were] as those accustomed to come to thee with their merchandise.' It is to be noted that the Heb. has no 'and' before Chilmad. The whole verse, however, shows traces of textual derangement. J. SKINNER.

CHIMHAM (חִמְחָם).—Probably the son (cf. 1 K 27) of B. . . . the Gileadite, who returned with David from beyond Jordan to Jerus. after the death of Absalom (2 S 19<sup>21</sup>). Acc. to Jer 41<sup>17</sup> (Kere חִמְחָם), C. would seem to have erected a caravanserai near Bethlehem for the benefit of those travelling from Jerus. to Egypt; others suppose that the inn was named after him as the owner of the land, and infer that C. received some land near Bethlehem from David. See BARZILLAI. J. F. STENNING.

CHIMNEY.—In Hos 13<sup>3</sup> 'as the smoke out of the c.' the Heb. is 'drubbah (דְּרֻבָּה), a lattice, hence a latticed opening in a room whence the smoke escapes. But in 2 Es 6<sup>8</sup> [all] 'c.' is the tr. of Lat. caminus, the very word from which c. comes; and the meaning is not the flue or vent, but the fireplace or oven, 'or ever the chimneys in Sion were hot' (RV, after Syr., 'or ever the footstool of Sion was established'). This is the oldest meaning of the word in Eng., and is found as late as Goldsmith. Cf. Milton, L'Allegro, 111—

'Then lies him down the lubbar fiend,
And, stretch'd out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength.'

And Goldsmith, Deserted Village, 235—

'While broken tea-cups, wisely kept for shew,

CHIOS (ἡ Χίος) was a large island which formed part of the province of Asia, situated in the Aegean Sea off the Ionian coast, still called Scio according to the Italian form, about 32 miles long from N. to S., and in breadth varying from 18 to 8 miles. It is separated from the mainland by a channel of varying width, which at its narrowest (about 5 miles across) is blocked by a group of small islands. The ship in which St. Paul sailed from Troas to Patara (on his way to Jerus.) passed through this channel as it sailed S. from Mitylene; and it anchored for a night on the Asian coast opposite the island, and thence struck across the open sea S. to Samos (Ac 20<sup>15</sup>). The voyage of Herod by Rhodes, Cos, Chios, and Mitylene, towards the Black Sea, described by Jos. Ant. XVI. ii. 2, affords an interesting comparison with that of St. Paul. The channel is very picturesque. The chief city of the island, bearing the same name, is situated on its E. coast, towards the S. end, probably facing the point where St. Paul's ship lay at anchor. The island is rocky (esp. in the broader N. part) and unproductive, except that it was famous for its wine, and its gum mastic has been a source of trade and profit both in ancient and in modern times. It was one of the seven places that claimed to be the birthplace of Homer; and a much stronger body of tradition speaks in favour of it than for any of the other claimants. Like Cnidus, Cos, Cyzicus, Ilium, Samos, Smyrna, Mitylene, and many other cities of the province Asia, C. had the rank of a free city, which implied merely that in certain respects it was administered according to native law, while other Asian cities were administered according to Rom. law. W. M. RAMSAY.

CHISLON (חִשְׁלֹן 'strength,' Χασλόν).—Father of Elidad, Benjamin's representative for dividing the land (Nu 34<sup>21</sup> P).

CHISLOTH-TABOR, Jos 19<sup>12</sup>.—See CHESULLOTH.

CHITTIM (1 Mac 1<sup>85</sup>) for KITTIM.

CHIUN.—Notwithstanding the fact that both Luther and our AV have this word, it has continued, even to our own time, to be an open question among English and German scholars whether חִיּוֹן is a common or a proper noun. If it were the former, it would signify the litter or pedestal on which the image of a deity was carried in ceremonial procession [see illustrations in Perrot and Chipiez's Chaldea and Assyria, i. 75, ii. 90]. Ewald maintained this view: 'חִיּוֹן, gestelle, von חָיָה stellen mit dem als zweitem Wurzellaute.' W. R. Smith, too, held that a 'pedestal' was meant (Prophets of Israel, p. 400). The balance of opinion, however, preponderates in the other direction. Chiun is obviously parallel to Siccuth (RV), or rather Sakkuth (Assyr. Sak-kut): if the one is the name of a deity, so is the other. Moreover, it would be very strange if the prophet spoke of the litter rather than of the god carried on it. Ka-ai-va-nu (Schrader, KAT p. 443; cf. SK 1874, p. 327) is the Assyr. name of the planet and the Assyrian deity Saturn, who was credited with the same name. In Arab. and Persian, Saturn is called by the same name. Rawlinson, Phœnicia, p. 26, speaking of the immigration of Phœnician gods into the Egyptian pantheon, says that this deity found his way there under the name Ken. The phrase, 'your star-god,' falls in with his interpretation. The evidence of the VSS is discordant. Ag. and Sym. have χιοὺν [Jer. says chion]. The LXX Παφάρ, a corruption of Καφάρ. The Targ. and Pesh. represent the Heb. The Arab. has Raphāna; Vulg. imagine.

With regard to the sense of the only passage, Am 5<sup>28</sup>, where this deity is spoken of, there can be no doubt that it is a threat: 'But ye shall take up Sakkuth your king, and Kaivān [or Kēvān] your star-god, your images which ye have made for yourselves, and I will cause you to go into exile.' Wellhausen, Die Kl. Proph. p. 83, argues that this threat must be a later addition, seeing that the Israelites of Amos' day were not chargeable with the worship of Assyr. gods. The form of the word has struck many students as anomalous. An Assyrian name for the nation has recently been advanced. According to the fact that its vocalisation is the same as that of Siccuth [חִיּוֹן, חִיּוֹן], Dr. C. C. Torrey says: 'It seems to me pretty certain that for the form of these two names in our present text we are indebted to the misplaced wit or zeal of the Massoretes. It is the familiar trick of fitting the pointing of one word to the consonant skeleton * Schrader, in the above-cited passage, states that Sakkut is another name for Adar or Adrammelech, and that as A-lar = Father of Fate, so Sak-kut = Head of Decision, both words being of Accadian-Sumerian origin.

Some have found an early use of the name in the supposed occurrence of the word in an inscription at Pompeii, i.e. dating before A.D. 79. (CIL iv. 679), which is merely a wall, cannot be deciphered with any certainty before the R are two they are mea

II. By whom was the name invented?—Here we are left without direct evidence. The χρηματίζω (EV 'were called') of Ac 11<sup>26</sup> might be used indifferently of a name adopted by oneself, or given by others (see Thayer, NT Lex. s.v.). But there are certain hints which furnish some clues.

(a) The Christians do not seem to have used it of themselves, at any rate within the apostolic period. They called themselves 'the brethren' (οἱ ἀδελφοί, Ac 14<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>2</sup>, Ro 16<sup>14</sup> etc.), 'the disciples' (οἱ μαθηταί, Ac 11<sup>26</sup> 13<sup>24</sup> 20<sup>30</sup>), 'the saints' (οἱ ἅγιοι, Ro 16<sup>15</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>, Eph 1<sup>18</sup> etc.), 'the faithful' (οἱ πιστοί, Ac 10<sup>45</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>), 'the elect' (οἱ ἐκλεκτοί, Mt 24<sup>22</sup>, Mk 13<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>), 'the way' (ἡ ὁδός, Ac 9<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 22<sup>4</sup>), but never 'Christians.' In the only passage in which this is apparently not true (1 P 4<sup>6</sup>), 'as a Christian' is παρὰ τὸ ὄνομα 'as a thief,' 'as a murderer,' which shows that the writer is speaking for the moment from the point of view of the heathen persecutor. St. Paul (Ac 26<sup>29</sup>) seems even to avoid using the name 'Christian,' which Agrippa had employed, and to substitute for it the periphrasis τοιοῦτος οὗτος καὶ ἐγὼ εἰμι. It is not probable, then, that we must look to Christians themselves for the invention of this title.

(b) Nor is it much more probable that the Jews invented it. The only direct name by which they call the Christians in NT is that of Ναζαρηνοί, 'Nazarenes' (Ac 24<sup>5</sup>). Elsewhere they speak of them as ἡ αἵρεσις αὕτη, 'this sect' (ib. 28<sup>22</sup>; cf. 24<sup>14</sup>). On one occasion, indeed, we find the name in the mouth of the Jewish king Agrippa (Ac 26<sup>28</sup>). But Agrippa had spent a great part of his life in Rom. circles, and was speaking on this occasion at Caesarea before a Rom. audience. It is too much then to infer from this passage that the word 'Christian' was in use amongst the Jews. On the other hand, there is a strong a priori improbability that the Jews, even in irony, would call the new sect 'followers of the Messiah, the Anointed One' (ὁ Χριστός).

(c) More probably it is to the heathen populace of Antioch that we must look for the origin of the name. It was amongst the populace ('vulgar,' in loc. cit.) that Tacitus' attention was drawn to the word in Rome. It was (next to the Jews) the heathen populace whose notice was first attracted by the Christians. And their notice was attracted to them as the followers of οὗτος Christos. This name was always of their lips. It was the name in which they were baptized (Ac 28<sup>38</sup> 31<sup>10</sup> 27<sup>2</sup>). It is not surprising, then, that the Antiochenes, hearing that this Christos had been alive not more than fifteen years, called them Χριστιανοί. We must, however, leave room for the word may have originated in the suite of the legatus, i.e. in the name. Though we learn nothing which would bring the Christians properly into this class in Antioch, yet, in other towns, yet, in our complete the relations between the Christians and this official class in Antioch at the time, this might easily be the case without our knowing anything of it.

III. Early spread of the name.—We must be on our guard against overestimating the attention which the Christian body attracted in Antioch at the time when the name was invented. The ὄχλος ἱκανός, 'much people,' of Ac 11<sup>26</sup> might be almost unnoticeable in so large a metropolis as Antioch, and the arrival of another new teaching would easily escape observation in a great centre of thought, where all the religions of the world jostled with one another. St. Luke, writing at a time when the name had become famous, assigns to its origin an Antioch reflected from its later history. He is writing also from within the Christian circle, to which the name would be familiar long before it became general. But though certain, it may be, in its beginnings to that quarter of the city where the Christians had settled, it must have spread very quickly beyond Antioch to all parts of the empire whither this name had made its way. Less than twenty years after its birth we hear it mentioned in the Rom. official circle at Caesarea as a familiar word, whose significance was too well known for it to need introduction or explanation (Ac 26<sup>28</sup>). A year or two later it is in common use among the populace of Rome (Tac. loc. cit.), and not far from the same date St. Luke indirectly implies that the name has become famous (11<sup>26</sup>). St. Peter, writing probably between 64–67 from Rome to the Christian communities in Asia Minor (1 P 5<sup>13</sup> 14), assumes that it is quite well known over all that district (ib. 4<sup>8</sup>). From the correspondence between the younger Pliny and the emperor Trajan in 112–113 we find that it is by that time equally familiar to members of the official bodies in Rome and Bithynia. Finally, in the Ignatian Epp., written in the first or at the beg. of the second decade of the 2nd cent., we find for the first time that the Christians have accepted the name and use it amongst themselves (e.g. Eph. 11<sup>14</sup>, Rom. 3, Phil. 7).

IV. Significance of the name.—St. Luke evidently wishes to connect the origin of the name with the final departure of Christianity from merely Jewish ideals and the dawning consciousness of this fact in the Gentile mind. It is then fair to ask, 'What were the distinctive marks of the new sect to those who first used the word Christian?' If it did not originate as a sarcastic jeu d'esprit, it very soon came to be used with a contemptuous signification. It occurs with an implication of scorn in the mouth of Agrippa, 'With but little persuasion thou wouldst fain make me a Christian' (Ac 26<sup>28</sup>).

* Many editors take this passage as a direct allusion to the name 'Christian.' The expression τὸ ὄνομα τίνος ὑπὲρ τινος καλῆν is a Hebraism which occurs many times in the LXX. The Heb. equivalent denotes that the person whose name is 'called over' a thing possesses the rights of ownership in it. See esp. 2 S 12<sup>28</sup> 'Lest I take the city, and my name be called upon it' (RVm), and the note of Driver, ad loc. (Heb. Text of Sam.). The allusion in Ja 27 is, then, more correctly referred to baptism in the name of Christ (see Mayor, Ep. of St. James, ad loc.). See also art. CALI.

From 1 P we learn that in heathen mouths 'Christian' was equivalent to 'malefactor' (4<sup>16, 16</sup>, cf. . . .) were the reasons for this malice and contempt? They were perhaps mainly four.

(c) There was much in heathen social life which, even if innocent in itself, suggested associations offensive to Christian scruples (1 P 4<sup>3-4</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>1-13</sup>, Ro 14<sup>1-23</sup>). Again, it must have caused many heart-burnings and domestic strifes when the new religion made its way into families. Hence arose the hatred of Christians as morose and unsociable Puritans.

(d) Besides merely holding aloof from heathen society, Christians were fearlessly outspoken in condemnation of its vices and idolatry (Eph 2<sup>1-3</sup>, 4<sup>19</sup>, Ro 1<sup>18-32</sup>). The secret consciousness that such condemnation was not at bottom unfounded, embittered the heathen world still more against its self-constituted censors. From this hatred it was but a short step to the fabrication of slanders (1 P 2<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>), and such charges found a shadow of support in the mystery with which the Christians invested their acts of worship. At the same time the proofs of their world-wide organization gave them the aspect of a secret society banded together against the religion and manners of the day.

Somewhat later in the corrupted form 'Chrestianus' the Apologists applied the word to themselves as the 'good' (χρηστός). The word Χριστός, though known to the Greeks as an adjective, was not used as a proper name except to translate the Hebrew 'Messiah.' Χρηστός, on the other hand, was a tolerably familiar name. Hence arose the corruption (probably towards the middle of 2nd cent.) into Χρηστιανός. Suetonius (Claud. 25) uses 'Chrestus' for 'Christus'; but there is no evidence that he connected the name with 'Christiani,' which appears (Nero, 16) without any variant reading 'Christiani.' It appears as 'Christiani' also in Tacitus and Pliny (loc. cit.). Justin Martyr plays on the double name (Ap. i. 55 A), ὅσον γε ἐκ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ καταγορεύοντος πολλὸν κολάζετε. Χρηστιανὸν γὰρ εἶναι κατηγοροῦμεθα· τὸ δὲ χρηστὸν μισεῖσθαι οὐ δίκαιον. Cf. Tert. Ap. 3, 'cum et perperam Christianus . . . a vobis (nam nec nominis certa est . . . : vos) de suavitete et benignitate compositum est.'

CHRISTOLOGY.—The purpose of this article is to reproduce the conception of Himself and of His relation to God left by Christ in the minds of His earliest followers; and then to estimate the truth and worth of this conception. For this inquiry, we fortunately have, in the NT, abundant materials. We there find various, and in great part independent, witnesses speaking to us from the first and second generations of the followers of Christ, and comprising some who stood in close relation to Him.

i. 1. The undisputed and well-attested genuineness of some of the Epistles of St. Paul, and the probable genuineness of the others, make these the best starting-point for our inquiry. For in them we have a secure platform on which we may stand firmly, and from which we can survey the entire evidence. We shall then consider the Synoptic Gospels and the writings attributed to the Apostle John.

From the Epistles we notice the profound reverence with which Paul bows before Christ as in the presence of One incomparably greater than himself or the greatest of men. There is no comparison of Christ with other men, and no trace of familiarity, or of that sense of equality, which no differences of rank or ability can altogether efface. But there is everywhere a recognition of the honour of being a servant, or indeed a slave, of so glorious a Master.

St. Paul speaks of Christ, e.g. in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>, as the Son of God, using this term as a title of honour distinguishing Him even from the adopted sons of God. In Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, and again in v.<sup>32</sup>, he calls Him God's own Son whom He sent into the world and gave up on behalf of us all. This last passage suggests a comparison with a human father who gives up to peril or death his own son to save others who are not his sons. And this comparison dominates the whole teaching of St. Paul and of the NT about the death of Christ. It implies that Christ is the Son of God in a sense not shared by other men. Now the word son suggests derivation of one person from another. And the term Son of God given to Christ as a mark of honour, distinguishing Him from all others, suggests irresistibly that He is derived from the Father, but in a manner differing in kind from that by which we sprang from the Creator's hands.

In Ro 3<sup>26</sup> St. Paul teaches that God gave up Christ to die in order to harmonise with His own justice the justification of those who believe in Christ. This implies, not only that among a race of sinners Christ is sinless, but that in moral worth He is equal to the whole race for which He died. In Ro 5<sup>15-19</sup> Christ is contrasted with Adam as the second and greater Head of the race. This gives to Him a unique superiority to all the generations of men.

In Ro 2<sup>16</sup> we read that 'God will judge the secrets of men through Jesus Christ'; and in 2<sup>13</sup> 'He writes that himself and all others 'must needs appear before the judgment-seat of Christ.' Similar teaching is attributed to St. Paul in an address recorded in Ac 17<sup>31</sup>. In 1 Th 4<sup>14</sup> we read that at the voice of Christ the dead will rise; and in Ph 3<sup>21</sup> that by His mighty power He will transform the lowly bodies of His servants into the likeness of His own glorious body.

In Col 1<sup>16</sup>, a document which we may accept with complete confidence as written by St. Paul, we read that in Christ, and through His agency, and for Him, all things, even the successive ranks of angels, were created; that He is earlier than all things; and that in Him all things have their unity, or 'stand together.'

All this proves decisively that, in the eyes of the pupil of Gamaliel, the Carpenter of Nazareth stood infinitely above men and angels, in a position of unique dignity and unique nearness to God. This must be accepted as well-attested historical fact.

2. We turn now to another group of documents differing widely from the Epistles of St. Paul, the Synoptic Gospels. These were accepted without a shadow of doubt in the latter part of the 2nd cent. all round the Mediterranean as written by the Apostle Matthew, and by Mark and Luke, friends of apostles. The First Gospel, as the farthest removed from the theological standpoint of St. Paul, is specially valuable in the inquiry before us.

Throughout the Synoptic Gospels we find Christ making for Himself claims . . . homage constantly paid to Him. In Mt 5<sup>17</sup> the young . . . reth announces that He has come, not to annul the law and the prophets, but to complete and fulfil. In ch. 11<sup>27</sup> He asserts that He alone and those taught by Him know God. He calls to Himself all the weary and heavy-laden, and promises to give them rest by laying upon them His yoke. Yet He speaks of Himself as meek and lowly of heart. And no one resents these strange assertions as involving undue . . .

As in the Epistles of St. Paul, so in the Synoptic Gospels, Christ is called, in a special sense, the Son of God. This title is given to Him by a voice from heaven at His baptism, in Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>22</sup>; and His claim to it is the question at issue in His temptation. The same august title is, as narrated in Mt 16<sup>16</sup>, given to Him by St. Peter, and is accepted by Christ at an important turning-point of His teaching. Its meaning is expounded by Christ in the Parable of the Vineyard in Mt 21<sup>33-41</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1-9</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9-16</sup>; where, after the ill-treatment of his servants, the master sends his son, thinking that, whatever the vinedressers have done to them, they will reverence him. Christ here claims to be as much above the prophets of the Old Covenant, above Moses and Isaiah and John the Baptist, as the master's son is above the highest of his servants. The same contrast is found in He 3<sup>5-6</sup>, where Moses is called a faithful servant in the household, and Christ a Son over the household. That this comparison is found in these four documents, one of them so different from the others, reveals its firm place in the thought of the apostolic Church. It implies clearly that, to the writers of the NT, Christ's relation to God, in virtue of His divine origin from Him, differs in kind from that of even the greatest of men.

As recognised by St. Paul, but more conspicuously, Christ claims in Mt 7<sup>22</sup>, 13<sup>41</sup>, 16<sup>27</sup>, 25<sup>31-42</sup>, and in the parallel passages, that in the great day He will sit upon a throne and pronounce judgment on all men; while the angels do His bidding as His servants. This teaching raises Christ as much above the rest of mankind as the Judge who sits in dignity on the bench is above the criminal who stands at the bar.

3. Another marked type of NT teaching is found in the Fourth Gospel, which a unanimous tradition, reaching back to the 2nd cent., and supported by powerful internal evidence, attributes to the beloved Apostle John. In it we have teaching of Christ given, apparently, not as in the Synoptic Gospels to the many, but to a favoured few, and of the utmost value.

Christ is here represented as making for Himself claims practically the same as those recorded in the Synoptic Gospels. In Jn 7<sup>37-38</sup> He bids all the thirsty to come to Him and drink; and declares that they who believe in Him shall themselves become fountains of living water. He calls Himself in 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup> 'the light of the world'; and in 10<sup>11, 16</sup> 'the good Shepherd' of the 'one flock.' In 10<sup>30</sup> He asserts, 'I and the Father are one.' In 11<sup>26</sup> He calls Himself 'the Resurrection and the Life'; and in 14<sup>6</sup> claims to be the only way through which men can come to God.

In close harmony with the Epistles of St. Paul and the Synoptic Gospels, Christ speaks of Himself in Jn 5<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>4</sup> as the Son of God. The same title is in ch. 1<sup>34, 49</sup> given to Him by the Baptist and by Nathanael. In ch. 3<sup>16, 18</sup> Christ claims to be the only-begotten Son. The same term is found in 1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, and a similar one in Jn 1<sup>14, 18</sup>.

In Jn 5<sup>22</sup> Christ asserts that 'the Father has given all the judgment to the Son, in order that all men may honour the Son according as they honour the Father'; and that an 'hour cometh when all that are in the graves will hear his voice and will go forth, they who have done the good things to a resurrection of life, and they who have done the bad things to a resurrection of judgment.'

In Jn 10<sup>33</sup> 5<sup>18</sup> the enemies of Christ assert that by speaking of God as His 'own Father,' Christ was making Himself God, or equal to God. This is involved in 5<sup>19</sup> 'whatever things he saith, also the Son does in like manner'; in 14<sup>9</sup> 'he that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' and in ch. 16<sup>15</sup> 'all things, so many as the Father hath, are mine.'

In close harmony with Col 1<sup>16</sup>, we read in Jn 1<sup>3</sup> 'all things through his agency came into being, and apart from him came into being nothing which hath come into being.' This careful repetition of a word denoting to begin to be is a marked contrast to v. 1 'in the beginning was the Word.' So v. 10 'the world through his agency came into being.'

In Jn 20<sup>28</sup>, in view of the pierced hands and side of the Risen One, Thomas accosts Him as 'my Lord and my God.' This supreme honour Christ accepts. It is given to Him, in express words, by the evangelist in Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, where we read 'the Word was God.' The assertion immediately following, that through His agency all things were made, compels us to accept this term as involving the infinite attributes of deity.

Similar honour is paid to Christ in the Book of Revelation. In Rev 5<sup>6</sup> we see Him in the midst of the throne as a slain lamb, an object of worship and lofty praise to those nearest the throne, and to every creature in heaven and earth and sea. Yet the interpreter angel twice (19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>) refuses worship from John, saying, 'worship God.'

ii. It is now evident that throughout the various documents and types of thought contained in NT we have one harmonious picture of the dignity of Christ. In the Epistles of St. Paul we noticed the profound reverence with which he bowed before Christ as in the presence of One far greater than himself or the greatest of men, and we found a complete counterpart to this reverence in the lofty claims which in each of the four Gospels He is recorded to have made for Himself. In all these documents the title Son of God is claimed by Christ, or is given to Him, as a title of unique dignity, and as noting a unique relation to God. The meaning of this title is determined by the Parable of the Vineyard recorded in each of the Synoptic Gospels, by the term only-begotten Son in the Fourth Gospel and in the 1st Ep. of St. John, by St. Paul's appeal to the love of God manifested in the gift of His own Son to save men, and by the contrast in the Epistle to the Hebrews between Moses, a faithful servant, and Christ the Son of God. This agreement, in writers so various, leaves no room to doubt that, as matter of historical fact, this title, and in this sense, was actually given to Christ by His earliest followers. It is equally clear that they looked upon Him as the designated Judge of the world. We have also seen that the two greatest writers of NT looked upon Christ as earlier than the universe, and as the Agent through whom it was created. One writer gives to Him the supreme title God, and records His own earlier acceptance of the same.

iii. In this harmonious account, by various writers, of the dignity of Christ we notice marks of development. In the Synoptic Gospels we find it in its most rudimentary form; in the Epistles of St. Paul it is more fully developed; in the Fourth Gospel the development is complete. Even within the writings of St. Paul, and again within the Fourth Gospel, we notice development. In 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> we read of 'one Lord, through whom are all things'; and in Col 1<sup>16, 17</sup>, written in the mature thought of St. Paul's first imprisonment, we read that the Son existed before all creatures, and that through His agency even the successive ranks of angels were created,—a thought much in advance of anything in his earlier Epistles. Very much in advance of Christ's teaching about Himself before His death, are the exclamation of Thomas, and the assertion of the evangelist that 'the Word was God.'

It is worthy of note that this development proceeds always on the same lines, that whatever we read about Christ in the Epistles of St. Paul, and indeed in the Fourth Gospel, is either a necessary inference from the teaching of Christ about Himself in the First Gospel, or is needful in order to give to that teaching unity and intelligibility. Between the accounts of the dignity of Christ given by the different writers of NT there is no contradiction. They differ only in their degree of definiteness and completeness. Indeed there is much greater difference between Mt 19<sup>17</sup> and 28<sup>19</sup> and between Jn 1<sup>1</sup> and 14<sup>28</sup> than between the 'Christ' of the First Gospel, taken as a whole, and that of the Fourth.

Possibly, the more fully developed teaching of the Epistles of St. Paul and of the Fourth Gospel about the Son of God may, in its literary form, have been influenced by Gentile modes of thought and expression. Certainly, St. Paul's modes of thought and expression were moulded by his Gentile surroundings. But the complete harmony of all NT teaching about the Son of God, and the infinite gulf which separates their teaching from all other earlier or contemporary teaching, leave no room for substantial contributions from sources external to Israel. Contemporary Greek or Oriental thought does little or nothing to elucidate the teaching of NT about the Son of God.

iv. The teaching adduced and expounded above involves a new and deeper conception of God. For the assertions of Christ about Himself are equivalent to a claim to share with the Father the infinite attributes of deity; and the contrast between Him who was with God in the beginning and the universe which sprang into being by His agency, suggests irresistibly that, whereas even the bright ones of heaven began to be, He exists, as a person distinct from the Father, from eternity.

Faint indications in the OT of a plurality of persons in the Godhead have been pointed out. But they are dim and uncertain. The new and complex and yet harmonious conception of God, which underlies the teaching about Christ of the various writers of NT, is altogether different from every conception of God set forth in the entire literature of the world, except so far as later literature has been moulded by Christian teaching. It is a matter of simple historical fact that the NT embodies a complete revolution in man's thought about God.

This new and complex conception of God has survived to our day, and has been in all ages the deep conviction of an immense majority of the followers of Christ, and esp. of nearly all those who have done most to spread His name and influence. We hear much about theological differences between contending Churches and schools of Christian thought. Far more wonderful than these differences is the agreement of the mass of the servants of Christ about the dignity of their Master, and about His relation to God.

Of this agreement, the various Creeds and Confessions of the various Churches are decisive proof. The so-called Nicene Creed is accepted by both Greek and Roman Churches, and even by the Armenian Church, which rejected the subsequent Definition of Chalcedon. Even this wide agreement is not the whole. While rejecting much of the teaching of the Church of Rome, the German and Swiss and Eng. Reformers clung to the doctrine of the Son of God in the Nicene Creed. It is to-day the deep conviction of both Anglicans and Nonconformists in England and of the various Churches in America. In other words, the remarkable agreement of the various writers of NT about the dignity of Christ finds a complete counterpart in the wonderful agreement of an immense majority of His followers in all ages and nations.

v. Of these well-attested historical facts, only three explanations are possible.

It may be suggested that Christ was Himself in error. If so, the greatest teacher the world ever knew, the author of the impulse which has changed and raised human thought and life, was in deep error touching the nature of God and touching His own relation to God; and His error has been shared by nearly all those who have done most for the religious life of men. If this be so, the Light of the World was, and they to whom He has been the Light of Life are, in deep darkness. So absurd a suggestion is not worthy of a moment's consideration.

The only remaining alternative is either that Christ is in very truth what the various writers of NT represent Him as claiming to be, and being, or that His immediate followers, those who gained for Him the homage of succeeding ages, and through whom He became the Saviour of the world, misunderstood altogether the teaching of their Master about Himself and about God, and made for Him, and represented Him as making for Himself, claims which He would have rejected with horror as blasphemous. This hypothesis requires us to believe that the various and very different writers of NT, including a friend and colleague of the murderers of Christ, fell into the same error, and adopted the same complicated metaphysical conception of God therein involved. Nay, more. It requires us to believe that this error survived the theological conflicts of later days, and is now the deep and cherished, but mistaken, conviction of nearly all those who have done most to spread the name of Christ and the blessings of Christianity. This is the easiest alternative open to those who reject the harmonious teaching of the NT about Christ and the historic faith of the Church of Christ.

vi. One more difficulty remains. Not a few intelligent and educated men who pay homage to Christ as the greatest of men refuse to accept as correct the portrait of Him given in NT. If this portrait be incorrect, these men have detected an ancient and serious error, and have restored to the civilised world the true conception of God. We expect to see in them as a fruit of their important discovery some moral and spiritual superiority to those who are still held fast by the great delusion. We look in vain. They who deny the divinity of Christ have done very little to carry the gospel to the heathen, to rescue the perishing at home, or to help forward the spiritual life of men.

On the other hand, in the confident belief of the apostles and of the mass of Christians in all ages be correct, the facts of modern Christendom are explained. If Christ be the only-begotten Son of God, His birth was by far the greatest event in the history of our race, and Himself infinitely greater than the greatest of men. We wonder not that His advent was a new era in human thought and in history, and that the Christian nations enjoy to-day a position of unique superiority to all others.

The precise relation of the Son to the Father belongs to the domain of systematic doctrinal theology. The various yet harmonious teaching of NT implies that the Son is, in a real and glorious sense, equal to, yet "distinct from, subordinate to, and one Father. But this mysterious subject lies beyond the scope of this article.

It has been sufficient for our purpose to show that the various and very different writers of NT give one harmonious account of the dignity of Christ and of His relation to God, that this conception has been in all ages the deep conviction of the mass of His followers, and that this remarkable unanimity, ancient and modern, can be explained only by the truth of the conviction so widespread and so firm.

This important result of our examination of documentary evidence receives wonderful confirmation from the direct inward moral and spiritual effects of the doctrine of crucified love. In all ages the vision of the Son of God, yet human, has been a powerful stimulus to every kind of excellence, an encouragement in conflict, a joy in sorrow, and the light of life under the shadow of death. The moral helpfulness of this vision is a sure witness that the vision itself is an apprehension of objective reality. J. AGAR BRET.

CHRONICLES, I. and II.—POSITION IN CANON.—

The name Chronicles is given, in the English Bible, to two books written in historical form, which immediately follow 1 and 2 Kings. In the LXX their position is the same. This arrangement is due to similarity of contents. In the MSS. of the Hebrew Bible, the third division of Ḳ. Ḳ. Ḳ. (כתובים), the Writings (Ḳṭuvim), either at the beginning (so in the MSS. of the Hebrew Bible and in Spanish MSS) or at the end (so in the Talmud, Baba bathra 13b-15, usually in German MSS, and from these in printed Heb. Bibles), rarely in some other position (e.g. third, after Dn and Ezr, Kennicott 30; it is not probable that Jerome (Prolog. Galeat.) had MSS authority for placing it third from the end, followed by Ezr and Est). Its position, whether prefixed or affixed to the other Hagiographa, is probably due to the late date at which canonical authority was ascribed to it. Exactly when this occurred we cannot say. The historian Eupolemus (c. B.C. 150) seems to have known, not merely the Heb. text, but the LXX translation of Ch, so that it must have been reckoned in the Canon not later than c. B.C. 200, at latest (Euseb. Præp. Evang. ix. 33, 34, cf. 2 Ch 2<sup>2-15</sup>; Freudenthal, Alex. Polyhistor, 108, 119, cited by Schürer, HJP ii. iii. pp. 162, 204).

UNITY.—It is evident that the two Books of Chronicles are one. The narrative is continuous, and the division due only to convenience, like the modern division of a book into volumes. Like the division of S and K, it was made in Alexandria prior to our oldest MSS of LXX, passed through the LXX into the Vulg. and the modern versions, including the Textus Receptus and in Heb. in the printed text of the Book of the Bible (1521), and is now customary in printed Heb. Bibles. The Books of Ezra and Neh. form a continuation of the same work, by the same hand, and might with propriety be entitled 3 Chronicles, or included under the one name of Chronicles (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH).

NAME.—The name of Chronicles in Hebrew is Dibhère Haggumim (דִּבְהֵרֵ הַגִּמּוּמִּים), a phrase occurring frequently in K and Ch with the meaning annals, or records of such and such a king (lit. the acts of the days, etc.). The LXX (followed by the Vulg.) adopted the name Τὰ Παραλειπόμενα, of doubtful meaning; the usual interpretation is of things passed over, by Sam. and Kings, but this does not explain the participle. The Eng. name is a good translation of the Heb. name. It can be taken from Jerome (Prologus Galeat.; introduction prefixed to his trans. of S and K): 'Septimus [liber] Dabre Ajamim (דבר אים), id est verba dierum, quod significantius Χρονικόν totius divinæ historiæ possumus appellare. Quibus et το Παράλειπόμενον primus et secundus liber assignat. Signe, Hieron., ed. Vallarsi, ix. 554).

CONTENTS.—The period embraced in Ch extends from Adam to the Restoration of the Jews under Cyrus.

(1) 1 Ch 1-9 contain chiefly genealogies (beginning 'Adam, Seth, Enosh...' and running down through Noah's sons, and then through the line of Shem to Esau and Israel and their sons, with their descendants. The last twelve vv. of ch. 1 contain a list of Edomitic kings and chiefs. In the various tables many problems arise, due in part to the brevity of the text, in part to lack of completeness in the tables, in part to a confusion between names of persons and names of places and peoples. Brief narratives, from various periods, are interspersed among the genealogies (e.g. 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, 10, 32-43 5<sup>4</sup>, 10, 18-22, 25, 26). The last genealogy in this collection, 9<sup>35-44</sup> (repeated, with some differences, from 8<sup>29-38</sup>), makes a kind of transition to the following section.

(2) a. 1 Ch 10-29 are concerned with David's reign, the introduction being the last battle and the death of Saul (ch. 10), and the conclusion the accession of Solomon (23<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>5ff</sup> 29<sup>28ff</sup>). b. 2 Ch 1-9 are devoted to Solomon's reign. c. 2 Ch 10-36 contain the history of the kingdom of Judah down to the fall of Jerus., with the division of the kingdoms as preface, and the Restoration-edict of Cyrus as appendix, or, more exactly, as introduction to the history of the Restoration and the early Jewish community given in Ezz-Neh. (On the . . . see below.)

The style of Ch is strongly marked. The genealogical lists, the religious interests, and the edifying tendency of the author (see below) of themselves impart a certain tone to it; thus there is often comparative brevity and lack of precision in dealing with external details—even such important ones as the capture of the Temple by Sennacherib's invasion, and the abolition of idolatry. The pedigrees, speeches, and matters relating to ritual are given at length. Other essential features of it are a peculiar vocabulary, peculiar syntactical habits, and noteworthy idiosyncrasies in its etymology (see esp. Driver, LOT 522, and the Glossy, Ezra-Nehemiah).

There are also classes of peculiarities in Ch., many of them syntactical; e.g. omission of the relative;  $\neg$   $\eta$  for the relative;  $\text{וְשֶׁנָּךְ}$   $\text{וְשֶׁנָּךְ}$  and other such repetitions with  $\eta$  in a distributive sense:  $\text{וְכִלְכִּלָה}$  and other  $\neg$   $\eta$  phrases at beginning of sentence (for older  $\text{וְכִלְכִּלָה}$ , etc.); and particularly the use of prepositions:  $\neg$   $c.$  inf. with circumstantial force, at the end of sentences, as 1 Ch 15<sup>16</sup> etc.;  $\eta$   $c.$  inf. denoting purpose, etc.;  $\eta$  as the accusative sign after a verbal suffix, e.g. 1 Ch 5<sup>26</sup>, and without a preceding suffix 2 Ch 26<sup>14</sup>;  $\eta$   $\text{וְיָרֵב}$   $\eta$  1 Ch 16<sup>37</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>14</sup> 31<sup>16</sup>;  $\neg$   $\eta$  = without, e.g. 1 Ch 22<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 14<sup>22</sup>;  $\neg$   $\eta$  = without  $\eta$  2 Ch 15<sup>2. 3. 4</sup>;  $\neg$   $\eta$  = wholly, namely, e.g. 1 Ch 13<sup>1</sup> etc.;  $\eta$  and (oft.)  $\neg$   $\eta$ , carrying on another preposition ( $\neg$   $\eta$ , etc., etc.), or introducing a nominative 1 Ch 26<sup>26</sup> 28<sup>1. 21</sup> 29<sup>8</sup>; the curious combination  $\eta$   $\text{וְיָרֵב}$  in  $\text{וְיָרֵב וְיָרֵב}$   $\eta$  1 Ch 15<sup>18</sup>, and  $\neg$   $\eta$   $\eta$  2 Ch 30<sup>8</sup>; the frequent and noteworthy  $\neg$   $\eta$  before both verbs and nouns, e.g. 1 Ch 25<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 16<sup>12</sup> 36<sup>16</sup>;  $\eta$  of accompaniment, without a verb, 1 Ch 16<sup>6</sup> etc.;  $\eta$  before adverbs, e.g.  $\text{וְכִלְכִּלָה}$  2 Ch 29<sup>36</sup>; and others (see esp. Driver, LOT 504-506).

The peculiar and often anomalous phraseology of Ch, which is apparent in every chapter, may be further illustrated by the following specimens chosen almost at random :—

once, that while parts of Ch have no parallel in the earlier books, there are still larger portions of those books presented in Ch. The following are such portions of Samuel and Kings:—1 S 1-30, 2 S 1-4, 9, 11<sup>12-27</sup> 12<sup>1-15</sup> 13-20, 21<sup>1-11</sup> 22, 23<sup>1-7</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>1-32</sup> 2<sup>1-9</sup>, 13-45 3<sup>1-8</sup>, 6, 16-28 4<sup>1-24</sup> 13, 14<sup>1-20</sup> 15<sup>25-34</sup> 16-21, 2 K 1<sup>1-7</sup> 8<sup>1-15</sup> 9, (chiefly), 10, 13, 15<sup>8-31</sup> 17, 25<sup>22-26</sup>, 27-30. They include (1) the entire activity of Samuel, and the reign of Saul; (2) David's lament for Saul and Jonathan; (3) David's flight with Ishbosheth, and dealings with Mephibosheth; (4) the story of Uriah and Bathsheba; (5) the story of Amnon and Tamar, and Absalom's flight and recall; (6) Absalom's rebellion and David's exile; (7) the Psalm of 2 S 22=Ps 18; (8) the 'Last Words of David' 23<sup>1-7</sup>; (9) the intrigues and struggles attending Solomon's accession; (10) evidences of Solomon's wisdom and poetic gifts; (11) Solomon's alliances with foreign women, and his idolatries in later life; (12) his vexation by adversaries, including Jeroboam; (13) the entire history of the Northern Kingdom, after the division, except when the account of the Southern Kingdom makes necessary some mention of the Northern; (14) the governorship and murder of Gedaliah, after Jerusalem's fall; (15) the exile-life of Jehoiachin.

B. Ch condenses also, in several places, and as a result gives statements with less precision than the earlier books. These passages are chronological (as in the genealogies 1 Ch 1<sup>1</sup>, architectural (as in the case of the temple-building 2 Ch 2-4; the building of Solomon's palace is not described at all), political (as Sennacherib's invasion 2 Ch 32<sup>1-22</sup>; the reigns of the last kings 2 Ch 36<sup>1-13</sup>), or humiliating (Michai's contempt 1 Ch 15<sup>2b</sup>; sickness of Hezekiah 2 Ch 32<sup>21</sup>; fall of Jerusalem 2 Ch 36<sup>17-21</sup>; the same quality may partly account for the cases mentioned under the previous head). That Ch expands some political and military narratives is also true, and will be noticed below. Other narratives are modified in various ways, e.g. the sacrifice by Solomon at Gibeon (2 Ch 1<sup>2-6</sup>), the overthrow of Athaliah (2 Ch 23), and the reigns of Jehoram (2 Ch 21<sup>1-20</sup>), Ahaziah (2 Ch 22<sup>1-9</sup>), Joash (2 Ch 24), Ahaz (2 Ch 28), and Manasseh (2 Ch 33<sup>1-20</sup>); some of these will be noticed below under D.

C. In those parts of Ch which have no parallel in S and K, as well as in Ch's expansions and modifications of narratives occurring in them, certain definite interests are prominent:—(1) Moral reflections and explanations of calamities as divine judgments, e.g. 1 Ch 10<sup>13-14</sup>, 2 Ch 36<sup>11-18</sup>; so Shishak's invasion is 2 Ch 12<sup>2</sup>, and Jehoram's misfortunes 2 Ch 22<sup>30-38</sup>; cf. the 'letter of Elijah the prophet' vv. 12-15, and the wreck of ships at Ezion-geber 2 Ch 21<sup>37</sup>, and Amaziah's defeat 2 Ch 25<sup>1-24</sup>, and Uzziah's 2 Ch 26<sup>16-21</sup>, and Josiah's death 2 Ch 35<sup>1-25</sup>; (2) divine intervention in war, e.g. 2 Ch 13<sup>18-18</sup> 14<sup>12-12</sup> 20<sup>22-24</sup>; (3) speeches and prophetic addresses, e.g. 1 Ch 22<sup>1-10</sup> 28<sup>1-10</sup> 29<sup>1-10</sup> 2 Ch 13<sup>1-12</sup> 67<sup>8</sup> 19<sup>2</sup> 3. 9-11 20<sup>5-12</sup> 14<sup>17</sup> 21<sup>12-15</sup> (writing of Elijah) 25<sup>7</sup> 8 28<sup>1-11</sup> 29<sup>5-11</sup> 30<sup>6-9</sup> (decree of Hezekiah) 32<sup>7</sup> 8 35<sup>21</sup>; (4) matters connected with worship, including Levitical, ritual, and especially musical appointments, e.g. 1 Ch 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. the Psalm vv. 6-38) 22-26. 28. 29. 2 Ch 13<sup>14-15</sup> 11<sup>13</sup> 14. 16. 18<sup>13-12</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 9 19<sup>8-11</sup> 20<sup>19</sup> 21. 23. 23<sup>2</sup> 24. 6. 7. 8. 18. 19. 24<sup>5</sup> 6 11 26<sup>15-20</sup> 29<sup>4</sup> 5. 7. 12-35. 30. 31. 34<sup>9</sup> 12. 13. 30 35<sup>1-19</sup> 25<sup>5</sup>; a peculiar case is 2 Ch 8<sup>11</sup> where Solomon's wife, the daughter of Pharaoh, is brought to the house built for her because the house of David has become too holy for residence of the coming of the ark; contrast 1 K 3<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>24</sup>. (On some additions of another kind, see below.)

D. It remains for us to examine the parallel passages a little more closely, selecting some of those most important for purposes of comparison:—

In some cases the IS is not directly verbal, as 1 Ch 10:1-12=1 K 22:1-5 (including the blunder or v. 10b), etc. In others there is im-

2a. 1 S 19 220 (Heb. 19 220) gives the list of chief priests through Eliazur, son of Abiathar, one of the chief priests known to Sam. 1 S 19 220, Ahitub, Eli's grandson 1 S 14 3, Ahijah 1 S 14 3, and Ahimelech 21 2 as 'son of Ahitub.'

22<sup>20</sup>, who was deposed by 10th in Ch's list, the son of an

1 K 12:17-18: son of Zebulun, while in Ch he is son of Jonathan; 1 S 12:12: Gedoni, son of Chai, and so does Jeremiah 2 K 20:18. The names are clearly common or derived from a related root. In addition, there is a 1 S 16:19: son of Ahiach, through his son Ithamar, and these and the following make an attempt to satisfy their rival claims by recognising both in the term "son of".

2 10 136 explains the death of Uzzah as 2 S 6<sup>7</sup> does; but 1 Ch 15<sup>13</sup> gives a new reason, viz., because the Levites did not carry the ark.

3, 1 Ch 20<sup>5</sup> "I will smite thee, brother of Goliath; but 2 S 21<sup>19</sup> he will be smitten."
4 "It is Satan that moves David to number Israel, in 2 S 24<sup>1</sup> it is J".

5. 2 Ch 13<sup>1st</sup> explains Solomon's sacrifice at Gibeon by saying that the tent of meeting and the brazen altar were there (cf. 1 K 21<sup>20</sup>); but 1 K 3<sup>3rd</sup> and 2 Ch 1st say that Solomon sacrificed at Gibeon, and sacrificed at Gibeon because that was the great high place; and v.<sup>15</sup> speaks not only of his coming here, to do so (2 Ch 13<sup>1st</sup>), but also of his standing before the ark and sacrificing there, which Ch omits.

6. 2 Ch 7:1-3 the sacrifices at the temple dedication are consumed by fire from heaven; there is nothing of this in 1 K 8:2ff.

7. 2 Ch 7:12-22 and 1 K 9:1-8 both describe a ceremony of J<sup>h</sup> to Solomon. In the latter case a "crown" is used in the ceremony of 1 K 9:1 and the "crown" is used in 2 Ch.

8. 2 Ch 14<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>6</sup> (cf. 18<sup>3</sup>) commend both Asa and Jehoshaphat for removing the high places; but 1 K 15<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>43</sup> tell us that these kings did not remove the high places (so also 2 Ch 15<sup>17</sup> 20<sup>33</sup>).

9. 2 Ch 20<sup>35,38</sup> says that Jehoshaphat allied himself with Ahaziah of Israel to make ships [for an expedition by sea 1 K 22<sup>49</sup>]; but 1 K 22<sup>49</sup> says that Ahaziah proposed the joint expedition, and Jehoshaphat refused.

10. 2 Ch 26<sup>36</sup> says that they made ships at Ezion-geber to go to Tarshish, i.e. the Mediterranean, not accessible from Ezion-geber. The text simply speaks of Tarshish-ships (large ships) and that they were destined for Ophir.

because of the covenant. ; ; ; ; ; of David, scribes Jehu's murder of Ahaziah thus: 'And he sought Ahaziah: and they caught him (for he was hid in Samaria) and brought him to Jehu: and when they had slain him, they buried him, etc.'; but according to 2 K 9<sup>21</sup> Ahaziah drove out from Jezreel with Jezebel to meet Jehu, fled on his treachery, and was killed in his flight. Hence the text is brought by his servants to Jerusalem.

and buried there 'in his sepulchre with his fathers in the city of David.'

13. 2 Ch 23 represents the overthrow of queen Athaliah thus: Jehoiada and the captains of hundreds, and all the Levites in the cities of Judah, and the heads of families of the people, making 'all the congregation,' were gathered at Jerus.,—Athaliah being ignorant of it,—but while v. 3 says 'all the congregation made a covenant with the king in the house of God,' v. 6 provides that only priests and ministering Levites be allowed to enter the temple, and then the king is proclaimed, and Athaliah slain; but 2 K 11, which contains the main facts, represents a secret conspiracy of the captains of hundreds, the Levites, and the priests, who came and took the king, and the offerings, law of Moses, etc., which appear in Ch. are all lacking in K.

14. 2 Ch 24<sup>1-17</sup>, speaking of the collection for repairing the temple, under Jehoshaphat of Judah, says, 'they brought the rest of the money before the king and Jehoiada, whereof were made vessels for J's house'; but 2 K 12<sup>13</sup> says that no vessels were made for J's house out of the proceeds of the collection.

15. 2 Ch 24<sup>17-22</sup> makes Joash a pious king, the friend of Jehoiada the priest, and after v. 17, 'he did as Jehoiada said,' but 2 K 12<sup>2</sup> says, 'And Jehoiada did that which was right in the eyes of J' all his days, (namely) wherein Jehoiada the priest instructed him,' and K tells us nothing of any apostasy or wickedness, only criticising (v. 2), as in other cases, the non-removal of the high places.

16. 2 Ch 25<sup>1-15</sup> describes slaughter and bondage inflicted on Judah by Pekah of Israel in the reign of Ahaz; but this is not only unknown to 2 K 16 and 17, but is inconsistent with 2 K 16<sup>18</sup> and 17<sup>1-7</sup>.

17. 2 Ch 25<sup>17-27</sup> makes Ahaz send to the king(s) of Assyria for help against the king(s) of Israel, but 2 K 16<sup>7</sup> expressly says that he was afraid to go to the king(s) of Assyria.

18. 2 Ch 25<sup>28-31</sup> says that the king(s) of Assyria came into Sam. and destroyed it, but 2 K 17<sup>18</sup> says that they did not, and again: 'he helped him not.' What is the truth?

19. 2 Ch 33<sup>1-16</sup> represents Josiah's reforms as having changed the colour of his robes, but 2 K 23<sup>1-3</sup> says that he was wholly dark, and makes the fall of Jerus. a punishment specifically for Manasseh's sins (cf. also Jer 15<sup>4</sup>).

20. 2 Ch 34 represents Josiah's reforms as accomplished in his 12th year (v. 3), and the book as discovered in 21st year. 2 K 22<sup>3</sup> represents the reforms as suggested and occasioned by the discovery of the law-book, and as occurring, like that discovery, in the 18th year of his reign.

E. One peculiarity of Ch., which involves some discrepancies with the earlier books, is a fondness for large numbers, e.g. 1 Ch 18<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>18</sup> make David capture 7000 horsemen and slay 7000 chariotmen, over against 700 of each in 2 S 8<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>18</sup>; according to 1 Ch 21<sup>25</sup> David pays 600 shekels of gold for Ornan's threshing-floor, according to 2 S 24<sup>24</sup> only 50 shekels of silver; 2<sup>d</sup> tribes, according to 1 Ch 5<sup>21</sup>, capture from the Hagrites 100,000 prisoners, 50,000 camels, 250,000 sheep, and 2000 asses; 1 Ch 12<sup>12</sup> represents that 339,000 men came to make David king; 1 Ch 22<sup>2</sup> says that David provided for the temple building 100,000 talents of gold (= 4,911,000 kilograms), and 1,000,000 talents of silver (= at least 33,000,000 kgs.); Shishak (2 Ch 28<sup>3</sup>) came with 1200 chariots, 60,000 horsemen, and people without number; 2 Ch 13<sup>17</sup> makes Abijah, with 400,000 men, fight against Jeroboam with 800,000, and kill 500,000 of them; Asa (2 Ch 14<sup>9</sup>) had 300,000 men of Judah and 280,000 of Benjamin; Zerah the Ethiopian, his opponent, had 1,000,000 men and 300 chariots (2 Ch 14<sup>12</sup>); Amaziah (2 Ch 25<sup>6</sup>) had 300,000 soldiers of his own, and hired 100,000 more from Israel; Azariah (2 Ch 26<sup>13</sup>) had an army of 307,500 men; Pekah (2 Ch 28<sup>6</sup>) killed 120,000 Judæan warriors in one day, and carried off 200,000 captives.

F. The combination of these various peculiarities of the author gives a very different aspect to the history from that found in the earlier books. The pre-royal time has only a genealogical interest for him. The beginning of the kingdom, the first reign, the attempts of Saul's dynasty to maintain itself, are no concern of his. Practically, David is his first king. David and Solomon are kings of almost spotless excellence, and enjoy undisturbed prosperity. The ceremonial law of the Priests' Code is recognised and observed by David, even before there is a temple. The service is stated—and rich. After the division of the kingdom the ten tribes are not of importance enough to be mentioned, except incidentally. Interest is concentrated on Judah and Jerusalem. All good Judæan kings, trained in the law of one exclusive sanctuary, of course forbade the high places. Sins, when they do occur, are sternly punished by God, and public calamities are due to sins. Huge numbers give majesty and importance to many scenes, and to the kingdom in its continuous history, and central in that history is the hand of God, His temple, His solemn ordinances, His ceremonial and impressive worship.

SOURCES.—I. For 1 Ch 1-9 the sources are apparently the lists in Gn, Ex, Nu, Jos, and 1 Ch 2-9 is doubtful,—also other lists not found in the earlier canonical books. The latter is the case particularly in the latter half of 1 Ch 2, and in chs. 1, 6 and the middle of 7 (see esp. Wellh. De gentibus, and Kittel). Only twice in these chapters is there reference to an earlier writing; the first is in 1 Ch 5<sup>17</sup>, but whether this writing (or these writings, v. infra. II. 13) really served the Chronicler as a source is extremely doubtful (Kuenen, Ond. i. 483); the second is in 1 Ch 9<sup>1</sup> (see below).

The Psalm 1 Ch 16<sup>3-35</sup> is made up of parts of three Psalms found in our Psalter (see PARALLELS, above).

The reference to the origin of 2 Ch 36<sup>22-28</sup> is to the origin of Cyrus=Ezr 1<sup>2-3</sup>, belongs rather to a discussion of Ezra-Nehemiah.

Ch's own references to earlier writings (with the exceptions noted above) are in the main part of 1 Ch 10-2 Ch 36<sup>2</sup>.

II. Ch refers by name to the following works:—

2. The Book of the Kings of Israel, 1 Ch 9<sup>1</sup> (so Bertheau, Keil, Oettli, Kautzsch, RV; & Kuenen doubtfully. AV adds 'and Judah,' which otherwise is subj. of following vb.).

3. The Doings of the Kings of Israel (2 Ch 33<sup>18</sup> (for Manasseh).

4. The Midrash of the Book of Kings, 2 Ch 24<sup>27</sup> (for Joash).

5. The Vision of Isaiah the Prophet, son of Amoz, in the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel, 2 Ch 32<sup>31</sup>.

6. The Words of Jehu, son of Hanani, which are taken up into the Book of the Kings of Israel, 1 Ch 20<sup>34</sup> (for Jehoshaphat).

The following were probably of limited compass:—

7. The Words of Samuel the Seer, and the Words of Nathan the Prophet, and the Words of Gad the Seer, 1 Ch 29<sup>29</sup>.

8. The Words of Nathan the Prophet, and the Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and the Vision of Iddo the Seer regarding Jeroboam, son of Nebat, 2 Ch 9<sup>29</sup>.

9. The Words of Shemaiah the Prophet and of Iddo the Seer for reckoning by Genealogies, 2 Ch 12<sup>15</sup>.

10. The Midrash of the Prophet Iddo, 2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup>.

11. The rest of the Doings of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the Prophet, son of Amoz, write, 2 Ch 26<sup>22</sup>.

12. The Words of the Seers, 2 Ch 33<sup>18</sup> (cf. v. 18; so & Bertheau, Kautzsch; of Hozai, F, Oettli, RV). The author refers also to—

13. A genealogical enrolment in the days of Jotham and in the days of Jeroboam [II.], 1 Ch 5<sup>17</sup> (since these kings were not contemporary, are two lists referred to?).

14. The Later Doings of David, 1 Ch 23<sup>27</sup>.

15. The Chronicles (יְדִיּוֹת דָּוִד) of king David, 1 Ch 27<sup>24</sup>.

16. The Lamentations (a collection in which the lamentations over Josiah were included), 2 Ch 35<sup>25</sup>. But these are not all separate works. 1 (a) and (b) and 5 refer to the same; so probably do 2, 3, and 6. 'Judah' is not mentioned in the title (except possibly in the case of 2), 3 and 6 relate to kings of Judah, and the title is therefore presumably abbreviated. It is highly likely that 4 is another designation of the same work. The prophetic writings 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 are possibly, though not demonstrably, sections of the same comprehensive book. If not, they are in any case of subordinate consequence. As to 13-16 it is not clear that these have actually contributed anything to Ch; 16 certainly has not.

It is true that the Chronicler refers to none of the documents named, but for what he states, but only as repositories of (further) information. Nevertheless, it is probable that the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel, cited under different names, is the main source of Ch. The many agreements with S and K prove that Ch used either these books or some work based on these. There is no evidence that it used the sources of S and K; these books must themselves have been known to the author, for they had long been in existence in his time, and the order and choice of material follow theirs to a large extent; moreover, the matter which is peculiar to Ch shows the marked characteristics of the author's style, in sharp contrast with those of the matter corresponding to that of Samuel and Kings; in particular, the following additional proofs show that Ch does not go behind them for its materials:—

2 Ch 15<sup>17</sup> 20<sup>33</sup> state that Asa and Jehoshaphat did not remove the high places. This is in conflict with the author's own statements 14<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> (cf. 19<sup>3</sup>), and is evidently due to unthinking imitation of his source. It appears 1 K 15<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>, and the agreement is almost verbal. These statements, however, certainly belong to the Deuteronomic redaction, and not to the sources of Kings.

Other passages common to Kings and Ch, which must be original with Kings (several of them Deuteronomic, and none from the sources) are 2 Ch 10<sup>18</sup>=1 K 12<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ch 21<sup>7</sup>, 8. 10ab=2 K 8<sup>18</sup>, 20. 22, 2 Ch 25<sup>3</sup>, 4=2 K 14<sup>5-6</sup> (verbally), 2 Ch 28<sup>2</sup>=2 K 16<sup>4</sup> (verbally), 2 Ch 31<sup>1</sup> based on 2 K 18<sup>4</sup>; cf. also 2 Ch 32<sup>12</sup>=2 K 18<sup>22</sup> (substantially), 2 Ch 33<sup>3a</sup>=2 K 21<sup>1a</sup> (verbally).

A special class of passages consists of those which are appropriate in Sam. and Kings, but have become unfitting or meaningless because of omissions by Ch:—

1 Ch 20<sup>1</sup> 'But David tarried at Jerus.' = 2 S 11<sup>1</sup>; it is in conflict with 1 Ch 20<sup>2-3</sup>; this is due to the omission of the story of Uriah and Bathsheba 2 S 11<sup>2-20</sup>, and of 12<sup>28-29</sup> which tell of Joab's summoning David.

2 Ch 10<sup>2</sup> speaks of Jeroboam's return from Egypt, 'whither he had fled from the presence of Solomon the king' = 1 K 12<sup>2</sup>, although 1 K 11<sup>26-40</sup> are omitted.

2 Ch 10<sup>15</sup> refers specifically to Ahijah's prophecy about Jeroboam = 1 K 12<sup>15</sup>, although the prophecy itself, 1 K 11<sup>29-30</sup>, is omitted.

2 Ch 32<sup>18</sup> specifies 'the Jews' speech' = 2 K 18<sup>28</sup>, although 2 K 18<sup>28</sup>, which gives point to this detail, is omitted.

Some of these passages are more cogent than others, but all are confirmatory of the position that our S and K and nothing earlier (with possible exceptions noted below) underlie Ch in its narrative portions.

It is, however, improbable that the Chronicler used these canonical books directly, as the chief source of his historical material. We have seen that his main interests are not political, and that he omits or greatly condenses many matters which do not contribute much to his purpose. At the same time some of his material not found in S and K is of a political and personal nature, e.g. the fortifications of Rehoboam, and his might and wisdom 2 Ch 11<sup>8-12</sup>, 17. 23, Asa's war with the Ethiopians 2 Ch 14<sup>9-15</sup>, Jehoash's war with Moab, Ammon, and Edom 2 Ch 24, Amaziah's relations with his Israelitish mercenaries 2 Ch 25<sup>6-10</sup>, 14, Uzziah's wars and buildings 2 Ch 26<sup>6-10</sup>, the successful invasion of Pekah 2 Ch 28<sup>5-10</sup>, and of the Edomites and Philistines vv. 17. 18. Some of these narratives the Chronicler uses to point his own moral teachings, but it is most unlikely that he either invented them, or resorted to some special source for them; they are not such as particularly appeal to him. Most likely, therefore, he found them in the document which was his main source for other matter, and, finding them, used them to enforce his religious views. This source was probably the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel (see above), which was, in that case, based on our S and K, with additional matter of uncertain and probably varying value. Since the style of these additions (with a few minor exceptions) resembles that of the Chronicler, it may be that this Book of the Kings was produced in the school to which he belonged. The alternative is to suppose that he rewrote them. That he at least retouched them is probable. How far the peculiar religious and ecclesiastical tone of Ch is due to this source we cannot tell, but the presence of the same in Exr-Neh, which do not depend on this Book of the Kings, makes it clear that this tone was such as the Chronicler himself would produce, and probably it is, throughout, mainly due to him.

HISTORICAL TRUSTWORTHINESS.—The late date of Ch presumably hinders it from being a historical witness of the first order. It could be so only if its sources were demonstrably such. But it has no sources certainly older than the canonical S and K; its chief source is probably much later. An interval of 250 or 300 years separates it from the last events recorded in K. In all cases of conflict, then (see the examples above), preference must be given to S and K. The obvious special interests of Ch also (see above) are not to its advantage as a simple witness to facts. Intrinsic probability points the same way in many instances (see especially Comparisons n, Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 16, 20, and Driver, Bertheau, Oettli, etc., on the passages); this holds true of the huge numbers of Ch as well.

If this is so in the parallel narratives, it must be so likewise in those matters which we owe entirely to Ch. Some of these conflict with the known course of the history, e.g. the complete Levitical arrangement of David and his successors; others are in themselves most unlikely, e.g. Amaziah's dealings with Israelitish mercenaries. It is plain that the character of Ch's testimony, when we can control it by parallel accounts, is not such as to give us reason to depend on it with security when it stands alone. Perhaps it does not enlarge our stock of historical matter very much, given in S and K. We cannot say, e.g. Rehoboam's buildings,

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT.—The OT contains data from which a chronology may be compiled from the creation of the world to the destruction of Jerus. by the Chaldeans. For convenience, this chronology may be considered under several periods.

i. FROM THE CREATION TO THE FLOOD. — The data for this period, which are found in the genealogical table of Gn 5 and the notice of the year of the Flood in Gn 7<sup>6</sup>, are given differently in the Heb text, the Sam., and the LXX. These differences are exhibited in the following table:—

|                                  | Age of each when nextwas born or eventoccurred. |      |      |
|----------------------------------|---|------|------|
|                                  | Heb.  | Sam. | LXX  |
| Adam . . . . .                   | 130   | 130  | 230  |
| Seth . . . . .                   | 105   | 105  | 205  |
| Enosh . . . . .                  | 90  | 90   | 190  |
| Kenan . . . . .                  | 70  | 70   | 170  |
| Mahalalel . . . . .              | 65  | 65   | 165  |
| Jared . . . . .                  | 162   | 62   | 162  |
| Enoch . . . . .                  | 65  | 65   | 165  |
| Methuselah . . . . .             | 187   | 67   | 167  |
| Lamech . . . . .                 | 182   | 53   | 188  |
| Noah . . . . .                   | 600   | 600  | 600  |
| Years from Creation to the Flood | 1656  | 1307 | 2242 |

Thus we have three different lengths assigned for the period from the creation of man to the Flood. The numbers of the Heb. text have generally been regarded as the original, although recently those of the Sam. have been defended by Dillmann and Budde. The LXX text, however, was accepted by the Hel. Jews and the early Christian Church, and has found defenders among certain Eng. scholars (Hales, Jackson, Poole, Rawlinson, and others), who have looked upon it with favour as furnishing a chronology more in accord with the probable of man than that of the Heb. text. But these numbers, whichever table may be regarded as the original, cannot, in any case, be accepted as historical, and hence for a real chronology of the early ages of man they are valueless. To accept them as genuine records is to assume from the creation of man a degree of civilisation high enough to provide a settled calendar, and a regular notation of births and deaths, and the preservation of such records from the creation of man to the time of the composition of Gn. All that is known of primitive antiquity is against such a supposition. The art of writing was not then known; and however tenacious may have been the memory of man, it is doubtful whether language then possessed the requisite terminology for the expression of such lapses of time. Man also has been upon the earth for a far longer period than that given even by the LXX chronology. The conjectural character of the table of Gn 5 may be also seen from the variations of the three texts. It is probably not have been taken with figures supposed to rest upon authentic historical documents. The sacred writer chose the form of a genealogical table to represent the early period of the world's history. The number of the patriarchs, ten, is a common one in the lists of the prehistoric rulers or heroes of many peoples. It appears at once to be a suggestion from the ten fingers. The length assigned for the period from the Creation to the Flood is more difficult of explanation. Accepting that of the Heb. text, the most probable explanation is seen in connecting the 1656 years with the subsequent data given for the period between the Flood and the Exodus, which together make 2666, or two-thirds of 4000 years. Four thousand years, according to a Jewish tradition, were to elapse from the creation of the world to the coming of the Messiah. Two-thirds of that period, then, would have passed at the Exodus, or the giving of the law and founding of the Jewish Theocracy at Mount Sinai.

ii. FROM THE FLOOD TO THE EXODUS.—For the period from the Flood to the birth of Abraham, we have a genealogical table in Gn 11<sup>10-26</sup> similar to that of Gn 5, and likewise given differently in the three ancient texts. In this instance, however, the Sam. and LXX VSS are almost identical, both giving a much longer period than the Heb. text. The LXX also has an extra name, Cainan, wanting in both the Heb. and Sam. texts, giving 130 additional years, and the years of Nahor at the birth of Abraham in the LXX are 179, while in the Sam. 79. The variations are shown in the following table:—

|                                    | Age of each when next was born or event occurred. |      |      |
|------------------------------------|---|------|------|
|                                    | Heb.  | Sam. | LXX  |
| Shem . . . . .                     | 100   | 100  | 100  |
| Arpachshad . . . . .               | 35  | 135  | 135  |
| Cainan . . . . .                   | —   | —    | 130  |
| Shelah . . . . .                   | 30  | 130  | 130  |
| Eber . . . . .                     | 24  | 134  | 134  |
| Peleg . . . . .                    | 30  | 130  | 130  |
| Reu . . . . .                      | 32  | 132  | 132  |
| Serug . . . . .                    | 30  | 130  | 130  |
| Nahor . . . . .                    | 29  | 79   | 179  |
| Terah . . . . .                    | 70  | 70   | 70   |
| Abraham . . . . .                  | —   | —    | —    |
| Yrs. of Shem's life bet. the Flood | 890   | 1040 | 1270 |
| From Flood to birth of Abraham     | *100  | 100  | 100  |
|                                    | 290   | 940  | 1170 |

Of these three texts the Heb. is undoubtedly the original. The LXX and Sam. show an endeavour to gain more time by systematically heightening the birth year of the patriarchs. The extra name of the LXX probably arose from a desire to make the number of the patriarchs ten (perhaps they were so originally), and thus bring the table more into conformity with that of Gn 5. The LXX text has been preferred by Hales, Jackson, Poole, and others as providing a more adequate time than the Heb. text for the growth of the nations of antiquity. But the LXX period is too short. It places the Flood at about 3000 B.C. But Egyptian remains point to a civilisation whose beginnings were not later than 5000 years B.C., and very likely millenniums earlier (Maspero says 8000 or 10,000 years B.C.), and Assy. discoveries have revealed an historic period extending to as early a date. This table came evidently from the same source as that of Gn 5, and is of the same artificial character, except that in some of the patriarchal names are reminiscences of peoples and places.

The data for the period from the birth of Abraham to the Exodus are given in the notice of the age of Abraham at the birth of Isaac (Gn 21<sup>5</sup>), and of Isaac at the birth of Jacob (Gn 25<sup>26</sup>), and of Jacob at his descent into Egypt (Gn 47<sup>9</sup>), and of the length of the sojourn of the children of Israel in Egypt (Ex. 12<sup>40</sup>). In this last passage the LXX and Sam. texts make the sojourning of the children of Israel to include also the sojourning of the patriarchs in the land of Canaan. From these data we present the following table with a summary of the preceding tables, with also the reference to the age of Abraham at his call from Haran (Gen. 12<sup>4</sup>):—

|--|-----|------|
| Age of Abraham on leaving Haran . . . . .                  | 75  | 75   |
| Age of Abraham at the birth of Isaac . . . . .             | 100 | 25   |
| Age of Isaac at the birth of Jacob . . . . .               | 60  | 60   |
| Age of Jacob at the time of his sojourn in Egypt . . . . . | 130 | 130  |
| Years of the patriarchal sojourn in Canaan . . . . .       | 215 | 215  |
| Years of the patriarchal sojourn in Egypt . . . . .        | 430 | 430  |
| Years of the sojourn in Egypt according to LXX . . . . .   | 215 | ..   |
| From the birth of Abraham to the Exodus . . . . .          |     | 720  |
| From the birth of Abraham to the Flood . . . . .           |     | 1656 |
| From the Creation to the Exodus . . . . .                  |     | 2666 |

How nearly these numbers represent the actual duration of the beginnings of the people of Israel, and of their sojourn in Egypt, cannot now be determined. They are evidently from the same original source as the preceding ones, and there is no reason to suppose that the historical records underlie them.* Some early hist. reminiscences, however, may be preserved in them. The number 400 for the years of the oppression in Egypt appears in Gn 15<sup>13</sup>, which belongs to one of the earliest sources of the Hexateuch.

The Period of the Sojourn in Egypt.—The descent of the children of Israel into Egypt, according to the story of Joseph, took place when a Sem. foreigner might be received at the Egypt. court with favour, and his people readily granted possessions in the land. The reign of the Hyksos or Shepherd-kings meets this condition, and the descent of the children of Israel at that time is both an ancient tradition and the view accepted by biblical scholars. The Hyksos rule, owing to the obscurity and uncertainty of Egypt. chronology, cannot be very definitely determined. It lasted several centuries, and terminated not later than 1530 B.C.† A famine is recorded as occurring during the reign of Aphophis or Apepi, one of the last of the Hyksos rulers; and this monarch may have been the Pharaoh of Joseph. He is so mentioned by George Syncellus, a historian of the 9th cent. A.D.; and the supposition is received with favour by Sayce, Brugsch, Kittel, and others. It is, however, only a supposition.

The Pharaoh of the oppression, under whom the children of Israel built the treasure cities Pithom and Raamses (Ex 1<sup>11</sup>), was Ramses II. This fact, long conjectured, has been settled by Naville's identification of the discovery that it was built by Ramses II. The Exodus has usually been assigned (by Brugsch, Ebers, Rawlinson, Sayce, and others) to the reign of Merneptah (Merentah) or Seti II., the immediate successor of Ramses II. Since, however, both of these kings were no mean sovereigns, and apparently controlled both Pal. and the Sin. Peninsula, it may be better (with Kittel, Maspero, Wiedemann, and others) to assign * More exactly, according to the statement of Gn 11<sup>10</sup> that Arpachshad was born 'two years after the Flood,' the years of Shem's life before the Flood are 93 years. But the 'two years after the Flood' is probably a gloss inserted by some one who, overlooking the round and systematic character of the data of the lives of the patriarchs, desired to make the birth of Arpachshad correspond exactly to the detailed statements of the duration of the Flood (Gn 7<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>13-14</sup>).

† According to the documentary hypothesis of the composition of the Pent. or Hex. they belong to the priestly document now generally regarded as the latest portion of the Pentateuch.

‡ This is the date given by Ed. Meyer as the latest possible, and is thus accepted by Wendel and Erman. Other dates given for the close of this period or the beginning of the New Empire are Wiedemann, 1750; Brugsch, 1706; Mariette, 1703; Rawlinson, 1640; Lepsius, 1591.

the Exodus to the period of royal weakness and general anarchy following their reigns at the close of the 19th dynasty (not later, according to Meyer, than 1180 B.C.; according to Rawlinson and others, about a cent. earlier). McCurdy (Hist., Proph., and the Mon.) places the Exodus in the 20th dynasty, in the latter part of the reign of Ramses III., or immediately after his reign. He does not think the Egyp. control in the Sin. Peninsula or in Pal. to have been relaxed at an earlier period for either the conquest of Pal. to have been possible. He gives the date about 1200 B.C. The children of Israel, however, during the reign of Ramses III. (1180-1148) may have been wandering in the desert and taking possession of the country E. of the Jordan. This would allow about 50 years from their departure from Egypt to their entrance into W. Pal., corresponding roughly with the biblical 40 years. This much at least seems certain, that Pal. was for many centuries an Egyp. province, and that the conquests under Joshua cannot well have begun until the close of the 19th dynasty, and probably the close of the reign of Ramses III. The view of some writers (F. C. Cook, Conder, Köhler, Sharpe, and others), who have assigned the Exodus to earlier periods, is refuted by Naville's discovery of Pithom, built by Ramses II.; by the Tel el-Amarna tablets, which show that Pal. was thoroughly an Egyp. province during the 18th dynasty; and by the fact of the control exercised by Seti I. and Ramses II. over Pal. within the 19th dynasty.*

iii. FROM THE EXODUS TO THE FOUNDING OF THE TEMPLE.—The founding of Solomon's temple is said in 1 K 6<sup>1</sup> to have taken place in the 480th year after the Exodus (according to the LXX, in the 440th year). Such an exact statement, if historical, requires that an accurate system of reckoning time was employed by the children of Israel during all those years. A provision for this has been seen in the yearly Heb. festivals, and especially in the Sabbatical and Jubilee years. If this, however, was the case, it is that we do not find traces of such a system of reckoning in the OT. While there are allusions to the recurrence of feasts as indicating a year's time, there is nothing to indicate festivals or Sabbatical or Jubilee years as being regarded as the units or termini of any calendar. The only method apparent is by the years of the monarch of the land. Before the royal period we have no evidence of any system of reckoning dates, and it is probable that during the period from the Exodus to the founding of the temple, Sabbatical years and years of Jubilee were not observed. The number 480 appears, like the numbers of the Pent., to be conjectural, arising from the supposition that from the Exodus to the founding of the temple there were 12 generations of 40 years each. This period, however, is too long. The interval from the Exodus to the founding of the temple is probably nearer 300 than 500 years. The Exodus we have seen can in no case be placed earlier than after the reign of Ramses II., and the building of the temple occurred not later than the middle of the 10th cent. B.C. Reliable chron. data for computing the exact length of this period we may well believe were not preserved. The disorganized condition of affairs during the period of the judges, when there was no central authority, is against the supposition of the use of a settled calendar and the official registration of events. The chron.

* Since the above article was in type, the new inscription of king Merenptah mentioning the people of Israel has been discovered. This may call for a revision of the opinion expressed above in regard to the date of the Exodus, and may require its assignment to an earlier period. See EGYPT, EXPORTS (Route).

data of the Book of Judges appear also to be somewhat artificial. They are as follows:—

| Total  | 410 years. |

To these years must be added—

|   |                       |
|---|-----------------------|
| The sojourn in the Wilderness               | 40 years.             |

| The judgeship of Eli (1 S 4 <sup>18</sup> ) | 40 "                  |
| The judgeship of Samuel                     | 20 "                  |
| The judgeship of the Judges                 | y "                   |
| The judgeship of the Judges                 | 40 "                  |
| The judgeship of the Judges                 | 4 "                   |
| Total                                | 144+x+y years. |

According to these figures the entire period is over 550 years, and the repeated occurrence of 40 or its multiple shows that some of the numbers are round, and probably conjectural.

Some of the judgeships recorded in the Book of Judges may have been local and contemporaneous with others. In that case no such statements.

The numbers were designed to represent 480 years,—the years of oppression, like those of a usurper, as is customary in Oriental reckonings, being not counted, their interval being included in the years of rest belonging to a lawful ruler. Arranged on this principle we have the following result:—

|  |                       |

| Moses  | 40 years.             |

If 30 years (cf. Jos. 24<sup>28</sup>) are given to Joshua and the elders, and 10 years to Saul, we have exactly 480 years.†

iv. FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE TEMPLE TO THE FALL OF JERUSALEM.—This era is marked by an advance in culture among the Hebrews, and in the office of royal recorders or scribes provision seems to have been made for the regular registration of important events. These events were probably dated by the years of the monarch. At least we find this system in 1 and 2 K, Jer., and Ezk. A provision, however, for the keeping of exact chron. records does not necessarily imply their preservation, and the Books of Kings, our biblical source for the chronology of this period, were not written until its close, several centuries after the earlier events narrated. The writer of these books, it is true, refers constantly to 'the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah,' and 'to the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel,' as sources of his information. But it is not known whether he had access to original royal records or only to two historical works based in some way upon them. Probably the latter, because (1) it is unlikely that the State records of the N. kingdom were preserved and brought to Jerus.; (2) the references are not to the chronicles or annals themselves, but to the book of the chronicles; and (3) it is difficult to account for the statements of the writer in reference to dates of accession and lengths of reigns, if he had access to original records.

* The assignment of 20 years to Samuel is an inference from 1 S 7<sup>2</sup>. The period of Israel's desire for the Lord is regarded as representing Samuel's judgeship, and ceasing when the people desired and chose a king.

† The above scheme is Noldeke's. Moore (Judges, p. xlii.) omits Saul as being to a Judæan writer an illegitimate sovereign, and assigns, after LXX, 20 years to Eli, and conjectures 40 years each for Joshua and Samuel.

1 and 2 K give a complete list of the monarchs of Judah and Israel, and the length of their reigns in years from Solomon to the fall of Samaria and of Jerusalem. The commencement of each reign is dated by the year of the reign of the contemporaneous king in the other kingdom. This mode of cross-reckoning is evidently that of the biblical writer, for it is scarcely possible that in either kingdom the year of the king of the other kingdom should be used to fix the date of its own king. An examination of the synchronisms leads to a similar conclusion. From the construction of the Heb. sentence in many instances the synchronisms appear to be an addition to a statement of the simple duration of a reign, and they seem in some instances to reveal an attempt at an adjustment of two unequal series of numbers. Rehoboam and Jeroboam came to the throne at the same time, also Athaliah and Jehu. The sums of the years of the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah between these two dates should be the same. That of Israel, however, as is seen in the following table, exceeds that of Judah by 3 years. (The 7 days of the reign of Zimri are omitted, for that week naturally was reckoned as belonging either to the reign of Elah or Omri.) :—

Since the lengths of the reigns are expressed in even years, and since actual reigns must have embraced fractions of a year, it is apparent that these years are calendar years. The question now arises whether the calendar year in which a king died was reckoned as his own last year and the 1st year of his successor, or whether the 1st year of his successor began with the following new year. The former method of post-dating introduces the confusion of a calendar year being reckoned as belonging to two reigns; and yet it is in accordance with the Heb. usage, which reckoned fractions of time as full units. For example, the siege of Samaria, which began in the 4th and ended in the 6th year of Hezekiah, is said to have lasted 3 years (2 K 18<sup>6</sup>). There is also the familiar example of 'the 3 days' of Christ's being in the grave. The latter method of post-dating was the usual one of the Assyrians. With them the general practice was to count the regnal years from the new year's day after the accession, and to call the period between the accession and the 1st new year's day 'the beginning of the reign'; while the year from the new year's day was called 'the 1st year,' and the following ones were numbered successively from it. Which of these methods was systematically used by the Hebrews cannot now be decisively determined. Possibly, neither of them consistently or entirely. The Talm. testifies . . . . . method . . . . . (Wieseler, . . . . . p. 47), . . . . . often been . . . . . Heb. method. Jer. and Ezk., however, post-dated, and many scholars (Dillmann, Stade, Wellhausen, and others) believe this to have been the Heb. method. The writer or compiler of 1 and 2 K, as will be seen from the following table of synchronisms, used both methods :—

|   |        |  |    |

|   | 33     | 12. 1. Ahab in 38th of Asa (1 K 16 <sup>29</sup> ).            | 33 |
|   | 39     |  | 2  |
| In 4th of Ahab (1 K 22 <sup>41</sup> ), Jehoshaphat . . . . . | (1) 41 |  | 4  |
|   | 1      |  | 5  |
|   | 17     | 21. 1. Ahaziah in 17th of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22 <sup>51</sup> ). | 17 |
|   | 18     | 1. 22. 2. Joram in 18th of Jehoshaphat (2 K 8 <sup>1</sup> ).  | 18 |
| In 5th of Joram (2 K 8 <sup>16</sup> ), Jehoram . . . . .     | 1. 22  |  | 5  |
|   | 4. 25  |  | 3  |
| In 12th of Joram (2 K 8 <sup>25</sup> ), Ahaziah . . . . .    | 8. 1   |  | 12 |

The method of post-dating is here applied to the reigns of the S. kingdom until the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, the former of whom is made co-regent with his father for four years. Asa and Jehoshaphat come to the throne in the years preceding their 1st years, while Abijam comes in his 1st year. Thus we have two methods of post-dating. The reigns of the N. kingdom are all pre-dated, and Ahaziah is made co-regent with Ahab for one year. Thus the total length of the reigns is shortened, and the interval from Solomon to Athaliah becomes 90 years.

In 1 K 16<sup>28</sup> Omri is said to have begun to reign in the 31st year of Asa, and in 2 K 1<sup>17</sup> Joram in the 2nd of Jehoram. Both of these statements are in general harmony with a scheme of post-dating the kings both of Israel and Judah. This fact, with the apparently systematic shortening of the intervals expressed by the reigns of the N. kingdom and then of the S. kingdom, to make them agree, suggests the possibility of the lengths of the reigns not being entirely derived from accurate historical sources, and . . . . . scheme which the author did not feel free to modify.

Samari. . . . . to 2 K 18<sup>10</sup>, in 'the 6th year of . . . . . was the 9th of Hoshea, king of Israel.' The durations of the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel from the accessions of Athaliah and Jehu to this year, then, should be the same. The figures recorded in 2 K, however, give quite a different result—

|                    |          |                     |           |
|--------------------|----------|---------------------|-----------|
| Athaliah . . . . . | 6 years. | Jehu . . . . .      | 28 years. |
| Joash . . . . .    | 40 "     | Jehoahaz . . . . .  | 17 "      |
| Amaziah . . . . .  | 29 "     | Joash . . . . .     | 16 "      |
| Azariah . . . . .  | 52 "     | Jeroboam . . . . .  | 41 "      |
| Jotham . . . . .   | 16 "     | Zachariah . . . . . | 6 months. |
| Ahaz . . . . .     | 16 "     | Shallum . . . . .   | 1 "       |
| Hezekiah . . . . . | 6 "      | Menahem . . . . .   | 10 years. |
|                    |          | Pekahiah . . . . .  | 2 "       |
|                    |          | Pekah . . . . .     | 20 "      |
|                    |          | Hoshea . . . . .    | 9 "       |

Thus the years of the reigns of the southern kingdom exceed those of the northern kingdom by over 21 years.

The following table gives the biblical synchronisms of this period.* (The various statements have been adjusted to each other by allowing the variable factor of a co-regency, and reckoning the 1st year either from the commencement of the co-regency or of the sole reign):—

The following tables (a) (b) (c) give dates for the accession of the kings of Judah, and (d) (e) (f) of the kings of Israel—(a) according to 1 and 2 Ch, in which the durations of the reigns are the same as those mentioned in 1 and 2 K, and are given without reference to the corresponding reigns of the N. kingdom, so that their sum would be naturally taken as the duration of the S. kingdom; (b) according to the tables of synchronisms given above; (c) according to a determination from the Assyrian inscriptions. An asterisk indicates a co-regency; but see the following paragraphs. (d) corresponds to (a), and is adjusted to it by pre-dating the reigns of Nadab, Elah, and Ahaziah, and lengthening that of Jeroboam II. to 51 years, and Pekah's to 30. (e) and (f) correspond to (b) and (c). The explanation of (c) and (f) is given in the following paragraph. (a) and (d) correspond essentially to Ussner's system of dates given in the margin of the A.V. Of these tables only (b) and (c) are approximately the course of history. The others are given merely for the sake of comparison.

* According to this table the number of years from the accessions of Athaliah and Jehu to the fall of Samaria is 129. This table, with the one above of synchronisms, however, has not been given to present the course of history, but to give a bird's-eye view of the chronological statements of 1 and 2 K.

Our examination of the biblical statements shows from the variety of the modes of reckoning, and from the apparent inconsistencies of the synchronisms (unless an ever variable factor in co-regencies is assumed), that we must look to another source for determining the true chronology of this period. Such a source, in a limited degree, has been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. These inscriptions are dated by the Assyrian calendar or canon. In this canon, which exists in several copies, all of which closely agree, covering the period from about 900 B.C. to about 650 B.C., each year bears the name of an officer called an eponym. From the mention of a total eclipse, which occurred in 763 B.C., is determined the date of all the remaining years. The following persons and events of biblical history are mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions, and dated by the Assyrian canon (COI ii. p. 167 ff.):—

According to the Assyrian sources, Tiglath-pileser III. (745-728) conducted a campaign (742-740) against Syria, Hamath, and Palestine. At the head of a coalition against him (742-740) is mentioned Azariah, king of Judah. Menahem is also mentioned as king of Judah in 738. During the years 737-735 he was campaigning in the East, but in 734 he returned to suppress another coalition in the West, when he overthrew Pekah, and appointed Hoshea king of Samaria in his stead.

According to the biblical account, Menahem and Azariah were contemporaries, and Menahem paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser (called Pul in 2 K 15<sup>19</sup>); and after the death of Pekahiah the son of Menahem, in the last year of Azariah, Pekah came to the throne. Pekah, with Rezin king of Damascus, in the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz, made war on Judah, evidently to coerce Judah to form an alliance against Assyria. During the reign of Pekah the N. Kingdom suffered great loss of territory and was invaded by Assyrian invasion, and Pekah was followed by Hoshea.

These two accounts, the biblical and Assyrian, harmonize, and it only remains for us to fix the dates. In 737 Pekahiah is king, perhaps having come to the throne in the previous year. His reign is brief, and in 736 or 735 he is slain by Pekah. In 737 or 736 Azariah dies, and Jotham, who for some 14 years may be thought of as having been co-regent, his father being a leper, becomes sole king. In 735 Ahaz succeeds Jotham; in 734 Pekah is slain, and Hoshea becomes king. Samaria falls in the winter of 722-721. Thus in this period the biblical chronological statements must be considerably modified. The result is given in tables (c) and (f).

A difficulty is also presented in 2 K 18<sup>10, 12</sup>, which date the fall of Samaria in the 6th year of Hezekiah, and the invasion of Sennacherib in the 14th; but the former event occurred in 722, and the latter in 701. According to the former reckoning, Hezekiah came to the throne in 728 or 727; and according to the latter, in 715 or 714. If we adopt the latter reckoning, the reign of Ahaz must be lengthened to some 20 years, and that of Manasseh or of Hezekiah shortened some 10 years. A coregency of Hezekiah with Ahaz has been suggested as the solution, or that the date of an invasion of Sargon in 711 may have been given for that of Sennacherib. According to this latter solution, however, Hezekiah would have come to the throne in 725 or 724.

The presence of Ahab at the battle of Karkar brings his reign down to 854 at least. At this battle, according to the Assyrian inscription, Ahab appears as an ally of the king of Damascus. According to 1 K 20<sup>34</sup> Ahab formed such an alliance, which lasted three years (1 K 22<sup>1</sup>). In the third year of the alliance the truce was broken, and Ahab was slain at Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22<sup>1-3, 37-40</sup>). Assuming the alliance to have been made in 855, the close of Ahab's reign, then, may be placed in 853.* See AHAB.

In the period before Ahab a change in the biblical length of the reign of Omri has been thought by some scholars necessary from the statement of Mesha on the Moabite Stone where he says: 'And Omri took possession of the land of Mēhēdēba, and it (Israel) dwelt therein during his days, and half his son's days, forty years.' If 'his son' is Ahab, then Omri's reign must be lengthened at the expense of Baasha's. In favour of this is the importance and lasting impression of Omri's reign (Mic 6<sup>16</sup>). The 'land of the house of Omri' in * Another explanation of the events of this period is, that the king present as a Syrian ally at the battle of Karkar was not Ahab but Ahaziah or Joram, the Assyrian scribe having unwittingly given the name of the father for that of the son, being ignorant of the latter's accession. The argument for this view is that Israel would not have assisted the Syrians except as a vassal, and that such vassalage immediately followed the battle of Ramoth-gilead. Ahab's death, then, probably would have occurred in 855.

Assyrian inscriptions is a standing N. kingdom. If, however, 'his grandson Joram, then no great change is needed. This is more probable, agreeing with 2 K 1<sup>3</sup>, which place the revolt of Moab (unlikely to have happened under the powerful king Ahab) in the reign of Joram. If we knew from Egyptian history the precise date of Shishak's reign and invasion of Palestine, we could fix definitely the reign of Rehoboam ('In the 5th year of Rehoboam, Shishak came up against Jerusalem,' 1 K 14<sup>25</sup>). As far as Egyptian history gives any light on this point, it confirms the date given in (c).

For the period between the death of Ahab and that of Azariah (Uzziah) it is necessary to shorten several reigns. The disturbed condition of affairs at the death of Jeroboam II.—a destructive rivalry of factions is indicated in the prophetic writings—suggests the shortening of Menahem's reign to three years to allow the others of Israel to stand. Internal evidence favours allowing the reigns of Athaliah and Joash to remain unchanged. The sole reigns of Azariah (Uzziah) and Jotham, then, may be shortened by making them co-regents for a number of years with their fathers.

The periods given for the reigns of Amon, Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah are undoubtedly correct. The following table gives the dates and synchronisms of their reigns:—

|  |                     |     |   |
|--|---------------------|-----|---|
|  | Amon's accession    | 641 |   |
|  | Josiah's            | 639 |   |
|  | " 1st year          | 638 |   |
|  | " 18th "            | 626 | 1st year of Jeremiah's ministry (Jer 1 <sup>2</sup> ).                      |
|  | " 18th "            | 621 | Discovery of the Book of the Law (2 K 22 <sup>3, 5</sup> ).                 |
| (2 K 23 <sup>31</sup> ) Jehoahaz 3 mos. reign and Jehoiakim's accession    | " 31st "            | 608 | Birth of Micaiah (1 K 22 <sup>3-4</sup> ).                                  |
|  | Jehoiakim's 1st     | 607 |   |
|  | " 4th               | 604 | Jeremiah's 23rd and Nebuchadnezzar's 1st (Jer 26 <sup>1, 7</sup> ).         |
| (2 K 24 <sup>18</sup> ) Jehoiachin's 3 mos. reign and Zedekiah's accession | " 11th              | 597 | 8th of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 24 <sup>12</sup> ).                              |
|  | Zedekiah's 1st year | 596 |   |
|  | " 10th "            | 587 | 19th of Nebuchadnezzar and destruction of Jerusalem (2 K 25 <sup>8</sup> ). |
|  | " 11th "            | 586 |   |

These dates are determined by Nebuchadnezzar's 1st year, which, according to Ptolemy's Canon,* is 604. The reigns given in the table above are post-dated. This arrangement is the one generally accepted. Some, however, have preferred to pre-date them. Then Jerusalem falls in 587 or 588. In favour of this is Jer 52<sup>28, 29</sup>, which place seemingly the captivity of Jehoiachin and destruction of Jerusalem in the 8th and 18th years of Nebuchadnezzar. The battle of Carchemish (Jer 46<sup>2</sup>) is dated in the 4th year of Jehoiakim. According to Tiele and others, this took place in 605, the year of Nebuchadnezzar's accession. This pre-dates the 4th year of Jehoiakim.

From the facts presented, it is evident that only a few dates in Israel's history can be fixed with absolute certainty. The time of most events can only be given definitely within a space of two or three years. There generally remains that amount of uncertainty, hence few tables of dates furnished by OT chron. exactly agree.

* The Canon of Ptolemy is a chron. compilation by the celebrated Alexandrian scholar Ptolemy of the 2nd cent. A.D., with astronomical notes, commencing B.C. 747 with the reigns of the Bab. kings. As far as it has been tested, it has proved an accurate and reliable document. See ASSYRIA, p. 179<sup>b</sup>.

In view of these reactions which must be made in the OT chron. statements from the founding of Solomon's temple to the destruction of Jerus., and in view of the apparent endeavour of the writer of 1 and 2 K to preserve and harmonize in his synchronisms the recorded lengths of the reigns of kings, the question may arise whether in this period as well as the former ones the chronological data may not be partially conjectural or artificial, complete historical data for both the S. and N. kingdom not having been preserved. This is the view of W. R. Smith, Stade, Wellhausen, and others. In its favour is the fact that from the founding of Solomon's temple to that of Zerubbabel, according to the biblical numbers, there are 480 years, and the duration of the N. kingdom (omitting the 2 years of Elah or reckoning Baasha's to 22) is 240 years. The combinations seen in the length of the reigns suggest also, it is said, artificiality.

|---------------------|----------------------|
| Solomon. . . . . 37 | Brought forward 259  |
| Rehoboam . 17 } 20  | Jotham . . . 16 }    |
| Abijam . . . 3 }    | Ahaz . . . . 16 } 38 |
| Asa . . . . . 41    | Hezekiah . . 6 }     |
| Jehoshaphat . 25    | Hezekiah . . 23 }    |
| Jehoram . . . 8 }   | Manasseh . 55 } 80   |
| Ahaziah . . . 1 }   | Amon . . . . 2 }     |
| Athaliah . . . 6 }  | Josiah . . . . 31 }  |
| Joash . . . . . 40  | Jehoiakim . 11 } 53  |
| Amaziah . . 29 }    | Zedekiah . . 11 }    |
| Uzziah . . . 52 }   | Captivity . . . 50   |
| Carry forward . 259 | Total . . . . 480    |

The combination of 41 + 81 + 38 = 40 + 80 + 40, it is said, cannot be mere chance.

A system likewise, it is claimed, appears in the years of the first eight kings of Israel.

|                  |                  |
|------------------|------------------|
| Jeroboam . . 22  | Omri . . . . 12  |
| Nadab . . . . 2  | Ahab . . . . 22  |
| Baasha (24) . 22 | Ahaziah . . 2    |
| Elah . . . . . 2 | Joram . . . . 12 |

Here are eight kings reigning 96 years, an average of 12 for each. Three reign 12+10, three 12-10, and two 12.

From the inaccuracy of some of the biblical numbers, and from the symmetry of their sum, it is not improbable that missing lengths of the reigns of some kings were supplied by conjecture, so as to make the duration of the N. kingdom 240 years, and the interval between the founding of the two temples 480 years. Such an arrangement would be helpful to the memory and analogous to reckonings of the early periods of the world and of Israel, and such an arrangement also finds a counterpart in the genealogy of Jesus in Mt, where the generations are reduced to three series of 14 each. But, taking the biblical data as a whole for this period, they do not present sufficient symmetry to be entirely or mainly artificial. Errors doubtless crept into lists of reigns, and the lengths of some probably were not preserved, and hence were supplied by conjecture.

V. CHRONOLOGY OF THE POST-EXILIC PERIOD.

—When Judah became a vassal, and her own kings ceased, the years of foreign rulers, as we have already seen at the beginning of the Captivity, were employed in dating events. The time of these rulers is fixed by the Canon of Ptolemy. The following table gives the principal OT chronological references of this period:—

CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

I. THE GOSPELS.

The data for the chronology of the Life of Christ group themselves round three points, the Nativity, the Baptism, and the Crucifixion, and the intervals between these, namely, the age of Christ at the Baptism, and the duration of the Ministry. If some of them could be settled conclusively, the rest could be deduced at once: for instance, the date of Christ's birth combined with his age when baptized would fix the date of the Baptism; if the moments of the beginning and end of the Ministry are known, its length follows; and so on. But as it is, since for no one of these dates or intervals is there demonstrative proof, while yet about each of them conclusions more or less probable can be reached, it is imperative to treat them separately, and to check the tentative results by comparison with one another.

A. THE DATE OF THE NATIVITY.—1. The Year.

—a. St. Matthew tells us that Jesus Christ was born in the reign of Herod the Great, who at some period not more than two years afterwards ordered a massacre of all the infants at Bethlehem, and that the Holy Family fled to Egypt, where they remained for the rest of the king's lifetime (Mt 21. 13-16, 19). Thus Herod's death is the terminus ad quem for the Nativity.

For the date of Herod's death of Jewish history of NT times, see BJ and Ant. of Josephus (quote the critical edition of B. Niese, nowhere states the exact year of Herod's death, but he gives the length of his reign from two more or less fixed starting-points, and the length of his three successive reigns to more or less fixed).

(1.) Herod when he died, not very long before he reigned 37 years (Ant. 17. 194). A Roman decree of the 13th Oct. imp. date of B.C. 44 to middle of B.C. 40], and consulship of Domitius Calvinus and Asinius Pollio [B.C. 40], Ant. xiv. 4, 5, xvii. viii. 1; BJ i. xxxiii. 8. Thus the decree belongs to the first half of B.C. 40: but as it is uncertain even so whether the month was earlier or later than the month (March?) of Herod's death, it is uncertain also whether the 37th year had begun before March B.C. 4, or only before March B.C. 3. (2.) He had reigned also 34 years as king de facto since the death of Antigonus; and Antigonus died 'on the day of the great Fast (Sept.-Oct.) in the consulship of M. Agrippa and Candius Gallus [B.C. 37], 27 years to a day since the entry of

* That is, according to the general rule of ancient calculations,—to which attention is here called once for all,—not 37 years or something over, but 37 years or something less.

the point is, that the name Saturninus, since it can hardly be a mere slip for St. Luke's Quirinus, must have come from an independent authority, possibly the same as supplied another reference to Saturninus in Tert. de pœllio, l. 1. In general, last-worthiness, Tertullian is immeasurably inferior to St. Luke; but a Roman lawyer could command familiar access to many sources inaccessible to a physician from the provinces, and it is hardly rash to believe that in this one instance the former has by a happy chance preserved the evidence which at once confirms and corrects the latter,—confirms the fact of a census, and corrects the name from Quirinius to Saturninus.*

If this correction be accepted, the census taken while Saturninus was Syrian legate cannot fall later than the time when Varus succeeded him, or before the middle of B.C. 6. The order of events in St. Matthew will permit of an interval of two or three years between the Nativity and Herod's death; and the data appear to be best harmonized by placing the census of the Nativity to B.C. 7 or thereabouts, and the census of the Epiphany to the end of B.C. 6.

... and Day of the Nativity.—Of these is known; for the patristic evidence, interesting in itself, though too voluminous for discussion here, leads to no real results. It must suffice to say that the oldest traditional date for Christmas Day is, in the East, Jan. 6, in the West, Dec. 25. The earliest trace of the one is the observance of Jan. 6 as the festival, not of the birth of Christ but of his Baptism, by the Basilidian Gnostics of the time of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21.147, p. 408); and a Gnostic tradition is worth nothing at all. The other first appears in the newly-recovered Fourth Book on Daniel, i. 1. 2 and was probably deduced by him from March 25, a day which in his Chronicle marks not only the Crucifixion but the Conception, the γενεὴς Χριστοῦ side by side with the πάθος.

B. THE INTERVAL BETWEEN THE NATIVITY AND THE BAPTISM.—St. Luke relates that Jesus at the time of the Baptism was about 30 years of age, αὐτὸς ἦν Ἰησοῦς ἀρχόμενος ὡσεὶ ἐτῶν τριάκοντα. The word ἀρχόμενος does not qualify the description of age, as supposed by the earliest known interpreters. Valentinians of the Ptolemaean school ap. Iren. II. xxii. 5, ad baptismum venit nondum qui triginta annos supplerat, sed qui inciperet esse tamquam triginta annorum; and so, too, Eripihanus, Hæc. li. 16, τριάκοντα μὲν ἐτῶν ἀλλ' οὐ πλήρης διδὼ λέγει Ἀρχόμενος. It rather means 'when just commencing his ministry,' an idiomatic use of ἀρχεῖν paralleled in Lk 23<sup>5</sup> ἀρχάμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας; Ac 12<sup>2</sup> ἀρχάμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ βαπτίσματος Ἰωάννου; Ac 10<sup>37</sup> ἀρχάμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας μετὰ τὸ βαπτισμα δ' ἐκήρυξεν Ἰωάνης.

The chronological reference, in fact, is limited to the words ἀπὸ τῆς ἐπισημείας, into which in turn the meaning has been read that our Lord was born in 4 BC and completed the 30 years of an authorized teacher. But Jewish laws do not seem to have attached any such importance to this particular age. The minimum limit for the official service, even if originally 30,—and against Nu 34: 16, 17, 1 Ch 23: 26, to be set Nu 48: 47 (LXX)<sup>824</sup>, which give 25,—had been reduced to 20 before the time of the Chronicler (1 Ch 23: 27), who attributes the charge to David. On the other hand, so far as there was any official age for teaching, it was not 30 but 40: see the treatise Ἀποκρίσεις in the Bab. Talm. (ed. Frankfort, 1715, fol 11v; quoted by Schoettgen, ad loc.): Ad quodnam vero etatis momentum respectandum est ut discipuli tui alios docere possint? Resp. Ad exactos annos quatuordecim. Similarly, Irenaeus contrasts the prima (1 Ch 23: 27) 30 years with the magistri perfectam etatem, which appears to be 40 (H. xxi. 4, 5). The traces of an age standard of 30 for different offices of the Christian ministry are due, of course, directly to this very statement in St. Luke; so expressly the Council of Neo-Cæsarea, canon 11.

Thus there is no reason to press St. Luke's note of time into meaning either 'when not yet 30 years' or 'at the moment of attaining the teacher's age of 30 years.' The phrase is an elastic one, and will cover any age from 28 to 32. Reckoned from the Nativity of Christ in B.C. 7-6, the probable limits for the date of the Baptism would thus be A.D. 22-27, a result which must now be tested by its conformity with the direct evidence for this date.

C. For the BAPTISM ad quem in the mentioned next after _____ years of the building of the temple (Jn 2<sup>30</sup>); and a terminus a quo in the synchronism of the beginning of the Baptist's ministry with the years of Tiberius (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>).

a. Jn 220 παροράσαντες καὶ τὴν ἐξουσίαν ἀποσταλέντων ἐν τοῖς αἰσιν, say "having perceived," with our Lord, meaning, not that Herod's reign commenced 27 years from its commencement to its completion at some moment of the past,—for the work was only just complete when the Jewish revolt broke out (Jos. Ant. xx.
 ix. 7).—but that at the time of speaking it 'had been in course of building' 46 years, the aorist παροράσαντες being used in the phrase used of the temple of ἱεροῦσολομῶν ἡ δὲ οὐκ ἐγένετο ἐν ἀποστασίῳ καὶ οὐκ ἐκείνῳ, "from that time to this it has been in course of building," and ἀποσταλῆναι being used of the Herod's term of office, according to Ant. i. 10. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10.
 and as Jos. in both books summarizes the length of Herod's reign by ἡ δὲ βασιλεία αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο ἑξήκοντα ἔτη, "the de jure kingship in B.C.
 40, and the de facto kingship in B.C. 37, an obvious solution of the discrepancy would be to count the 15th year from the later, reckoning from the earlier, of the de jure kingship,—both reckonings then converging on B.C. 23. But Jos. does, when he gives a single date, invariably computes it from the de facto kingship only. So in Ant.—the book which on the subject is just mentioned—ἐκείνῳ τῷ χρόνῳ "at that time," the commencement of the de facto kingship, B.C. 37, is put in the margin, and the date of the de jure kingship, B.C.
 40, is put in the text. Thus the latest date for the Baptism is the early months of A.D. 27.

b. Lik 81 is ἐν ταῖς πεντακαιδέκα τοῖς ἡμέραις Τιβέριου Καίσαρος . . . ἡμερῶν ὅπου θεοὶ ἐκ τῆς Ἰουδαίας. Reckoned from Augustus' death, A.D. 19, A.D. 14, the 15th year of Tiberius would run from Aug. A.D. 28 to Aug. A.D. 29, so that the Baptism of Christ could scarcely fall before A.D. 29. Even if Tiberius' 2nd year be dated from Dec. 1, A.D. 15, so that his 15th corresponds with A.D. 28, matters are hardly mended, for that year, too, would coincide with the results attained in the first two articles, with the temple chronology just discussed and with the calculations which will be established below for a correction of the date of the Ministry with the date of the Crucifixion. If, I think, we place the opening of the Baptist's preaching at Aug. A.D. 25, he must, as in the case of Quirinius, have fallen into error. Within half a century after the view which limited the date of the Baptism to the 15th year of the Ministry from A.D. 28, the date is fixed by the date of the Crucifixion for its close.

At the same time, it is not quite so easy to suppose him deceived about the beginning of the Ministry as about the census of the Nativity. Not only were the events 30 years nearer his own time, but they were of so much more personal character, that they must have been matter of common knowledge to the Baptist's disciples. It is not, therefore, to be supposed that they show a special acquaintance—as we are told—of the time of the Christ. It is certain, then, what is meant by the 15th year of Tiberius? A modern reader is tempted to transfer to the 1st cent. his own associations with the 19th century, where each ruler's reign and power come into existence at the moment of his predecessor's death, neither sooner nor later. The Roman Empire of Augustus was scarcely in fact, certainly not in law, hereditary. The prerogatives of the emperor were due theoretically to the various offices which he held; and in dating events, as on coins and inscriptions, he would recite the number, not of the years of his reign, but of his consulships, his imperatorships, and his years of tribunician power. Clearly, none of these official methods were followed by St. Luke, for Tiberius was never consul more than five times, nor imperator more than eight, while his tribunician power, held permanently as one of the primary factors in the imperial character, was already in its 15th year at the time of Augustus' death. Nor was there yet any stereotyped literary usage upon the point. St. Luke's contemporaries, if Romans, would probably have been employing the old system of dating by the consuls of each year; if Orientals, they might still be using the Olympiads (B.C. 776), the era of Alexander or the Greeks (B.C. 312), the era of Sulla (B.C. 85), or the era of Actium (B.C. 31). So when he himself elected to adopt the Jewish reckoning by imperial years, he would find no absolutely fixed tradition as to the moment from which to compute them; and it has lately been pointed out (Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 387) that not very long before the probable date of the Gospel, there had been associated in the empire with the Julian calendar the simultaneous reception of the indictio or imperial power, together with other insignia of imperial rank (July 1, A.D. 71). The conditions of his own day, Ramsay thinks, may have led the evangelist to emphasize the similar elevation of Tiberius, on whom a special enactment had already in Augustus' lifetime conferred a triumphus; the provinces co-ordinate with the elder emperor's, and the Jewish custom may have taken that as the starting-point of his reign (Velleius Paterculus, 2.13; Suetonius, Tib. 21; 22; 23; 24; 25; 26; 27; 28; 29; 30; 31; 32; 33; 34; 35; 36; 37; 38; 39; 40; 41; 42; 43; 44; 45; 46; 47; 48; 49; 50; 51; 52; 53; 54; 55; 56; 57; 58; 59; 60; 61; 62; 63; 64; 65; 66; 67; 68; 69; 70; 71; 72; 73; 74; 75; 76; 77; 78; 79; 80; 81; 82; 83; 84; 85; 86; 87; 88; 89; 90; 91; 92; 93; 94; 95; 96; 97; 98; 99; 100). As to the exact year of the indictio, most of them connect it with the grant of the libertas or liberum for life in A.D. 13; but there is no necessity to synchronize the two, and Mommsen, on the ground of the context in Velleius, puts it two years earlier, in A.D. 11.

If this solution is possible—and it is not given here for more—the various data are brought into complete harmony. The mission of the Baptist in the 15th year of Tiberius, calculated from A.D. 11, will fall in A.D. 25–26; the Baptism of Christ may be assigned to A.D. 26–27; and the first passover of the Ministry, being at the same time the passover of the 46th year of the temple building, will follow in the spring of A.D. 27.

D. The interval between the Baptism and the Crucifixion, or DURATION OF THE MINISTRY.—a. St. Mark's Gospel, the closest representative of the common synoptic tradition, contains few precise indications of time; events are strung together by no more than the vague expressions 'straightway,' 'after not many days,' 'after many days.' The general impression, however, which the synoptic narrative seems calculated to produce, and probably in primitive times did produce, is that the period described was one of no considerable length. In the absence of other data, especial importance accrues to two episodes which contain in themselves or their context a definite indication of the season of the year. Describing the indictio of the 5000, St. Mark adds to the common tradition the descriptive touch that the grass showed the fresh green of early spring (ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ τῷ ἁπλοῦ Mk 6<sup>39</sup>; cf. Mt 14<sup>15</sup>, Lk 9<sup>12</sup>). And the 'ears of corn' (Mk 2<sup>23</sup>=Mt 12<sup>1</sup>=Lk 13<sup>6</sup>), the harvest being ripe but not yet cut, will fall, if the ears were 'early' or earliest in April, and if wheat, at least in June; see R. Samuel, quoted by Wetstein on Jn 4<sup>35</sup>.

Here, then, a spring or early summer in Mk 2 is succeeded by early spring in ch. 6, the lapse of one year intervening; while a second year is postulated by the events of chs. 6<sup>39</sup>–10<sup>42</sup>, which include journeys to the districts of Phœnicia, of Upper Galilee, and of Peræa (7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>4</sup>), and shut out the possibility that the miracle of ch. 6 and the passover of the Crucifixion can belong to the same spring; so that, at least if the order is even roughly chronological, a two years' ministry would already underlie the record. And though our earliest authority, Papias, seems to deny just this characteristic to St. Mark, saying that, while the facts were all accurate, the order was not (ἀκριβὸς ἔγραψεν ὁ μὲντοι ῥάξει, quoted in Eusebius, HE iii. 39), yet he probably does not mean by this more than the absence of a framework for the history such as St. Luke supplies by notices of movement towards Jerus., and St. John by notices of Jewish festivals. In any case an investigation of the internal evidence borne by the Gospel itself, though necessarily cursory, and limited to a single section, will best show to what extent it may be allowed or denied to be chronological.

From the opening of the Galilean ministry in Mk 1<sup>14</sup> the narrative runs on in a fairly steady scene, the actors, the horizon being all Galilean, and Galilean only, as far as 3<sup>6</sup>. At this point a change takes place, and the larger world of Palestine begins to play a part on the stage. The audience is drawn, not to Jerusalem only, but from Jerus., Judæa, Idumæa, Peræa, and Phœnicia: the action is reinforced by scribes from the synagoga; the apostles are organized into a body for more systematic work (Mk 3<sup>14</sup> 22). To this division, under the headings of chs. 4–9, chapters mark the inchoate stage of the Ministry, the character of the sayings and doings recorded in them fairly corresponds. Five miracles arouse the attention of the populace, and spread the fame of their author (1<sup>21</sup>–2<sup>12</sup>), just as five episodes bring out teaching which provokes the criticism, and soon the hostility, of the scribes and Pharisees (2<sup>1</sup>–3<sup>6</sup>); the cure of the paralytic with the forgiveness of his sins, where the miracle suggests the teaching, marks the transition from the first half of the Ministry to the second. This presentation of development and progress is an argument for the substantially chronological character of the record, so far at least that an episode of the opening section, such as that of the ears of corn, would prima facie be dated in the actual order of events before an episode so much posterior to the great break in 3<sup>6</sup> as the feeding of the 5000. With much less hesitation it may be laid down that the miracle of ch. 6 cannot possibly be placed in the same spring as the Crucifixion; so that these three data, the late spring of one year, the early spring of another, and the passover time of a third, suggest the testimony of St. Mark's Gospel to at least a two years' Ministry (but see below, p. 410<sup>a</sup>).

On the other hand, it does not follow that the arrangement of events within each section is chronological; rather, the evangelist would certainly seem to have here deserted the principle of temporal order for the principle of grouping. For instance, although his general scheme in 1<sup>14</sup>–3<sup>6</sup> is borne out by the natural presumption that some miracles arresting public attention preceded in time the opposition offered to doctrine which might otherwise have passed unnoticed, yet it is hardly likely that all the miracles came first and all the teaching after. That is to say, the probability that the episode of the ears of corn really preceded all events from 3<sup>6</sup> onward, does not carry with it an equal probability that it preceded also the events of 3<sup>6</sup>, or followed those of 1<sup>21</sup>–2<sup>12</sup>. Even if the sections as wholes are in chronological order, the events within each section are obviously massed in groups.

b. St. Luke's account of the Ministry divides itself in the main into two well-marked portions, of which the first (4<sup>14</sup>–9<sup>50</sup>) is parallel to the common tradition of the other Synoptists, while the second (9<sup>51</sup>–19<sup>28</sup>) is almost entirely peculiar; and with this division corresponds a (seemingly methodical) arrangement of notes of place which serves as a setting for the history.

In the first portion, representing the Galilean ministry of the common tradition, the localities named are, with one exception, and that more apparent than real, exclusively Galilean: 4<sup>14</sup> Galilee, 1<sup>10</sup> Nazareth, 4<sup>31</sup> Capernaum; 5<sup>1</sup> Lake of Genesareth; 7<sup>1</sup> Capernaum, 11<sup>1</sup> Nain; 8<sup>24</sup> Mary is of Magdala, and Joanna is wife of Herod's steward; 22<sup>28</sup> Lake of Galilee, with its opposite shore. Mention is made, as in St. Mark, of the gathering of hearers from Judæa, Jerus., Tyre and Sidon, and of the fame of Christ's miracles 'in all Judæa and the country round' (5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>); but nowhere is our Lord himself removed from Galilee save in the single statement in 4<sup>44</sup> that he was 'preaching in the synagogues of Judæa': 'Ιουδαίας, Ν Β C L Q R etc.; Γαλιλαίας, Textus Receptus. Apologetic interest has detected here an 'undesigned coincidence' with the Judean ministry in St. John; but the truth is that in this and some other passages St. Luke is using 'Judæa' in the extended sense of 'Palestine,' a term unfamiliar to NT and to the 1st cent. A.D. generally. When St. Luke wrote, the Rom. province, though it then included all Palestine except Upper Galilee, was still known only as Judæa (Schürer, HJP i. ii. 257). Traces of this usage in his writings (side by side with the narrower sense in which Judæa was opposed to Samaria or Galilee) would be Ac 26<sup>20</sup> 'Damascus, Jerus., all the country of Judæa and the Gentiles'; Ac 10<sup>37</sup> 'throughout all Judæa, beginning from Galilee,' and the similar phrase Lk 23<sup>5</sup> (cf. 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>), in each of which cases 'all Judæa' appears to mean Palestine. The phrase may have been used in 4th as a sort of comprehensive introduction to the Ministry; and though it does not, totidem verbis, confine our Lord to Judæa, it does not necessarily take him beyond its borders. The definite indications of the first half of the record are unanimously Galilean.

In sharp contrast with this, the section peculiar to St. Luke opens with the statement about Christ that 'as the days of his assumption were coming to the full, he set his face firmly to go to Jerusalem'; 9<sup>51</sup> ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι τὰς ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτοῦ. Again and again the same direction is emphasized in the remaining chapters. He is journeying through cities and villages, teaching his way to Jerus. 13<sup>33</sup>; he passes midst of Samaria and Galilee on his journey to Jerus. 17<sup>11</sup>; he is going up to Jerus. 18<sup>31</sup>; he is near Jerus. 19<sup>11</sup>. It is clear that all these chapters, to the mind of the evangelist, represent a conscious working up (though not necessarily a direct journey) towards Jerus., and 'the filling up of the days of his assumption' is a phrase which cannot cover more than a few months at the outside. Nor is there anything to suggest that, the second group of chapters being thus limited in duration, the previous group, which occupy a shorter space in the record, extended over any much longer period. Indeed it is not improbable that St. Luke shared the view, widely spread from very early times, that confined the Ministry to a single year; it is even possible that he himself, like so many of the readers of his Gospel, interpreted in this sense the reference preserved by him to Isaiah's prophecy of the 'acceptable year of the Lord' (Lk 4<sup>16</sup> = Is 61<sup>2</sup>).

c. St. John's Gospel distinguishes itself from the other three by its careful enumeration of six notes of time, five of them Jewish festivals, between the Baptism and the Crucifixion; and these precise arrangements are recollections of an eyewitness must be allowed decisive weight against the apparently divergent testimony of the third Synoptist, not to say that their very precision may have consciously aimed at a silent correction of impressions erroneously derived from earlier evangelic narratives.

218 καὶ ἔρχεται εἰς τὸ πάσχα τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἀνίστη ἐκ νεκρῶν ἐν τῷ πάσχα ἐν τῇ ἰερῇ.

436 οὐκ ἔμελλε λίγαν ὄντι τετραήμερον ἔσθαι καὶ ὁ θρισμὸς ἔρχεται; ἰδοὺ λίγαν ὕμιν ἵπταται τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ὕμιν καὶ θεάσασθαι τὰς χάριτας οὗτις ἐμεκαί εἰσιν πρὸς ὑμῖν.

51 μετὰ ταῦτα ἦν ἰερὰ [οἱ ἡ ἰερὰ] τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἀνίστη Ἰησοῦς ἐκ νεκρῶν.

84 ἦν δὲ ἰγέρης τὸ πάσχα [οἱ οὐκ ἐν τῷ πάσχα] ἡ ἰερὰ τῶν Ἰουδαίων.

72 ἦν δὲ ἰγέρης ἡ ἰερὰ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἡ σκηνοσχηρῆ.

102 ἰγέρητος τότε τὰ ἔργα ἐκείνη ἐν τοῖς Ἰερουσαλήμοις.

Of these, the first and last two are straightforward statements which need no comment. The second admits of alternative explanations either as harvest-time or as four months before it. To the third attaches, not only a variety of reading between 'the feast' and 'a feast,' but, whichever reading be adopted, a doubt as to the actual feast intended by it. The fourth involves, again, a question of reading, carrying with it the difference of a complete year in the chronology of the Ministry; and as this problem is at once simpler and more momentous than the other two, it will be on all grounds best to begin with it.

(1) Jn 6<sup>4</sup>. If the words τὸ πάσχα are retained, three passovers are mentioned by St. John (21<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>55</sup>), so that the Ministry will extend over at least two years. If the words are excised, 'the feast of the Jews,' which was 'near' at hand, may be identified with the Feast of Tabernacles, described as 'near' in 7<sup>2</sup>, and the chronology of the Ministry can then be arranged on a single-year basis: 21<sup>2</sup> Passover in March or April, 4th harvest in May, 5th Pentecost in May or early June, or Trumpets in September, 6th 7th Tabernacles in October, 10th Dedication in December, 11<sup>55</sup> Passover again.

This latter reading, in the belief that it brought the Fourth Gospel into harmony both with the Synoptists and with the earliest extra-canonical tradition, was championed first by Browne in his Ordo Saeculorum (London, 1844), and afterwards with more hesitation by Hort in an exhaustive note ad loc. in Westcott and Hort's Gr. Test. (App. pp. 77-81), from which many of the data in this article have been drawn. But any prima facie presumption on such grounds in favour of the omission of τὸ πάσχα would be counterbalanced by the consideration that every known MS, whether of the original Gr. or of the VSS, contains the phrase or its rendering; moreover, the evidence of St. Mark is, as it stands, against the 'single-year' Ministry, while the evidence of the other two is much more evenly divided than these two writers supposed. Still, the high authority which attaches to all that Hort wrote demands a closer investigation of his arguments. It will be shown that the reading (α) is a phrase unlikely to have been penned by St. John; (β) is unsuitable, as interpreted by Hort, to the context; (γ) is unsupported by the direct witness of more than a single Father.

α. If the words τὸ πάσχα are not genuine, St. John wrote ἐν τῷ ἰγέρῃ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, and by this he is supposed to have meant the Feast of Tabernacles, at least beyond all doubt. 'Feast of the Jews' is not found in the OT and is not used in the NT. The feast is used to denote Tabernacles in Cheyne on Is 30<sup>24</sup>. But even if Tabernacles retained this pre-eminence,* so that St. John as a Jew could have so used the phrase himself, would he have done it in writing for Gentile Christians? To the Passover and Pentecost were attached with associations from the Gospel, while Tabernacles spoke only of the Law, and 'the feast' can only have been referred to them, as the same or a still vaguer phrase suggested in 51 to Irenaeus, the Feast of Passover. And the evangelist, who habitually means by 'the Jews' the enemies of Christ, can hardly have been so wedded to Jewish usage as to employ language which would have one meaning for himself and another for his Ephesian disciples.

β. The evidence of context tells the same tale. In the first place, the abundance of the phrase τῶν Ἰουδαίων: χαλάρης ἐν Μκ 6<sup>29</sup> of the same occasion) points to spring and not to autumn. Further, 'after these things Jesus was walking in Galilee' (Jn 7<sup>1</sup> περιπατεῖ), and yet on Hort's hypothesis the same feast which was already near in 6<sup>4</sup> is still only near—ἰγέρης in both cases—in 7<sup>2</sup>.

γ. The patristic evidence for omission can be reduced from the four witnesses quoted by Browne and Hort—Irenaeus, a Latin text of Epiphanius and called by him Alogi, Origen, and Cyril of Alexandria—to the single testimony of Origen.

Irenaeus brings the Gnostic theory of a one-year Ministry to the test of agreement with St. John's Gospel, where he finds that our Lord went up to Jerus. after the Baptism to three Passovers—the first after the miracle of Cana, the second when he cured the paralytic, the third at the Crucifixion (Hær. ii. xxi. 3). This Father is so eager, it is urged, to swell the number of Passovers that he includes the unnamed feast of 51, and it is impossible that he should have failed to note so clear a fact as that if the word Passover had stood there in his text, Irenaeus is professing to quote only the Passovers at which Christ was present, quoties secundum tempus Hierusalem; and he omits to say that Christ journeyed to and from Jerusalem for the Passovers, for he goes on to argue that the Ministry lasted for ten years or more.

* On the one hand, it is for Passover that Joseph and Mary are said to have gone up yearly to Jerus., Lk 2<sup>41</sup>; on the other, Cyril Alex., probably from Origen, says on Jn 11<sup>55</sup> οὐκ ἐν ἀνάγκῃ ἦν πάντας συνδοκῆσαι ἐν Ἰερουσαλὴμ ἐν τῷ πάσχα ὡς καὶ τὸ σκηνοσχηρῆ.

The Alogi, according to Origen (in Jo. li. 22), rejected St John's Gospel as inconsistent with the Gospels, for the reason, among others, that instead of one Passover it records the observance of two. While they were about it, says Epiphanius, they might have accentuated the inconsistency by pointing to, not two, but three Passovers in this Gospel. Here the answer is again that St. John does not speak of the 'observance' of more than two Passovers by visits to Jerusalem.

Origen's Commentary on St. John is defective for chs. 5-7. But on ch. 4th (tom. xii. 39, 41), against the view of the Valentinian commentator Heracleon, that the material harvest was four months off, and the season therefore winter, he pleads for the alternative of actual harvest-time from the sequence of the events in the succeeding chapters, where 4th is followed almost at once by the feast of 51, and the feast of 51 by a mention of the Tabernacles as 'nigh at hand' (6th or 7th). The argument clearly postulates the absence of any intervening Passover at 51, and yet the omission of τὸ πάσχα in Origen's text is made more probable by the evidence of his follower Cyril, the fourth and last witness alleged.

Cyril of Alexandria's Commentary, like those of so many later Fathers, is composite; his own contributions are inextricably mixed up with those of his predecessors. Hence, if Cyril (ed. Pusey, i. 100), the disputed words τὸ πάσχα, not only in the original text at the head of the section (a position where, no doubt, scribes were prone to replace the more familiar reading), but in τὸ πάσχα at an earlier point; and at the same time explain, οὐκ ἐστὶν, removal beyond the Sea of Galilee (Jn 61) by his desire to avoid the thronging crowds whom the Jews of the Feast (not of Passover but) of Tabernacles were to Jerusalem.—the simplest solution of the inconsistency is to suppose that τὸ πάσχα in Origen's text, and that the connexion of the feast with the Passover beyond Tabernacles is repeated from Origen.

Thus of Hort's four witnesses the evidence of two, Irenaeus and the Alogi, does not really bear on the point raised at all; while the text of Origen is adverse to the words, τὸ πάσχα, as it isimony of Origen. But it is much easier to suppose that Origen in his Commentary either conjectured, or passed over a notice that he saw to the effect that the Passover was a year or more before the text against the concurrence of all the other Fathers.

On no ground, external or internal, can the omission of the reference to a Passover in 6th be defended as original or genuine. The Fourth Gospel excludes the possibility of anything less than a year's interval between the result is a quite definite conclusion: the feast of 51 is half of the Gospel. From 6th to 1st of the next year, the autumn of the year, the winter Feast of Dedication (10th) being signalized in the course of it. The earlier chapters (2nd to 6th) present a more complicated problem, the solution of which depends primarily on the meaning to be attached to the notices of the season in 4th and of the feast in 5th.

(2) Jn 4th. Allusion is here made to two seasons of the year, a period four months from harvest: 'Say ye not, There are yet four months, and the harvest itself'; and the harvest itself: 'Behold the fields, for they are white already to harvest.' Of these, only one of course can be meant in the literal sense; and the question is, which? The patristic exegesis of the passage shows that the difficulty was felt from the first. The earliest recorded commentator, the Valentinian Heracleon, 'like the majority, interpreted literally, and said that the material harvest was four months off, but that the harvest of which the Saviour was speaking, the harvest of souls, was ready and ripe.' Origen answers that it was rather the middle or end of harvest-time, for the connexion of the narrative proves that it cannot have been winter. You cannot allow, he says, as much as eight or nine months—April to January—after the pass-over of ch. 2, for there is nothing in the story to suggest so long a period, and the impression made on the Galileans at that passover was still fresh in their minds when Christ came on to Galilee after leaving Samaria (4th); nor can you allow as much again—January to October—between this episode and the Feast of Tabernacles soon to be mentioned: * Orig. in Jn. tom. xiii. 39, 41.

It is not possible at this stage to dismiss either explanation as in itself inadmissible. The words of the verse, especially the ἐτι, 'still four months,' have, perhaps, a more natural meaning if the harvest was actually four months off. On the other hand, the immediate context, the promise of the water which should quench all thirst, has been taken to suggest a warmer season than January, the season in St. John's Gospel being, it is said, always fitted to their external surroundings. On this view it has been supposed that the τετράμηνον is a proverbial phrase for the interval between seed-time and harvest, ὅχι βυβλὴς λέγεται standing for τὸ λεγόμενον, the regular idiom for a proverb. It is said in answer that no such words are elsewhere preserved; but phrases of similar meaning, emphasizing the interval between preparation and fruition, are common in all languages. It is said also that a strict reckoning would make the interval rather six months than four; but the Rabbis (see Wetstein, ad loc.) were accustomed to divide the year into six stages of two months—seed-time, winter, spring, harvest, summer, dog-days—so that four months does actually cover the period between the two. Considering, too, the differences of climate in different parts of Palestine, and the differences of season between barley and wheat harvest, there is nothing improbable in supposing that the interval which can be described as one of six months can be described also as one of four.

Origen has really hit the mark in making the relation of the passage to the general chronological arrangement of the Gospel the dominating factor in a date which could otherwise only be left open. This relation involves, in the first place, a discussion of the third and last of the doubtful time-notices in St. John.

(3) Jn 5th. Alternative readings ἐοφρή and ἡ ἐοφρή, and alternative explanations of either reading.

ἡ ἐοφρή was analyzed in the discussion of Jn 6th above, and was found to imply either Passover or Tabernacles, though the very existence of a doubt as to the relative precedence of the two feasts made the use of the phrase without further definition unlikely in itself.

ἐοφρή would leave the feast intended quite uncertain. Origen and Epiphanius both argue rightly that the indefiniteness excludes Passover; the former would only make it Pentecost (as does his follower Cyril, though the text at the head of this section of the Commentary contains the article), the latter gives a choice between Pentecost and Tabernacles (Orig. in Jn. tom. xiii. 39; Epiph. Hær. li. 21, Dind.).† But just as Tabernacles is important enough to rival the claim of Passover to be meant by the definite ἡ ἐοφρή, so equally with Passover it is too important to satisfy the indefinite ἐοφρή, which must be referred to one of the less important festivals, Pentecost (May), Trumpets (September), Dedication (December), or Purim (February).

* The latter part of the argument is, of course, vitiated by Origen's own view of the Passover of ch. 2; see above.

† The fact that Origen, who certainly did not read the article, uses of the same feast the words τῆς ἑοφρῆς is not a new discovery. Παπαρυμίναν (tom. xii. 64), shows how easily an oblique reference the article would creep in.

* The first ears of barley harvest would be ready in the most forward districts at the end of March; the most backward wheat would be cut in June. April and May would be the principal harvest months.

As between the 1-118 33, the Egypt, too, Irenæus, on Jn 6<sup>4</sup>); it is O and the Paschal Chronicle. The weight of external evidence favours the latter group, for it has not only early but varied attestation; whereas the other is of much more recent origin, originally purely Egyptian, and the theory which he brought into prominence of a three years' Ministry with four Passovers. And when to this is added the fact that it rests on internal grounds to represent the text of the evangelist.

Thus the first half of the Gospel gives (1) a passover, 2<sup>13, 23</sup>; (2) a note of time, either May or January, 4<sup>30</sup>; (3) an unnamed minor feast, 5<sup>1</sup>; (4) a second passover, 6<sup>4</sup>. These could be combined in more than one way to fit into a single year: e.g. (a) Passover—May—any lesser feast—Passover; or (b) Passover—January—Purim (February)—Passover.

But, Is the minimum duration of the Ministry which results from St. John's Gospel also the maximum? Is it to be assumed that if the notes of time in 2<sup>13-64</sup> can be co-ordinated into a single year, and those of 6<sup>4-11<sup>55</sup></sup> into a second, no further latitude is possible? This is the crucial question.

A negative answer is implied in Irenæus, the earliest in time, the most trustworthy in position, of all extant patristic authorities (Hæc. II. xxii. 3-6). The limitation of the Ministry by the Valentinians to a single year he disproves at once from the record of three visits to Jerus. for the passover (see on Jn 6<sup>4</sup> above); but he finds also three other considerations which prove that the total length of the Ministry was far in excess, not only of one, but even of two or three years' duration.

(i.) A priori: The Lord came to save and sanctify every age, whether of infants, children, boys, youths, or men, and to be at once the perfect example and the perfect master and teacher of all; their example, by passing himself through each of the stages of human life; their teacher, by attaining the age of teaching.* (ii.) Scriptural: St. John records (8<sup>57</sup>) that the Jews asserted that Jesus could not have seen Abraham, because he was still under fifty years old—a phrase implying that he was not far off fifty, at any rate over forty, since to a man between thirty and forty the retort would have been, 'Thou art not yet forty years old.'

(iii.) Traditional: The elders who gathered round St. John during his long old age in Asia, disciples some of them, of other apostles as well, have all handed this down as the apostolic teaching. Of these arguments the first two do not come to much; but the third does establish a prima facie claim, only to be rebutted by the overwhelming evidence on the other side. Is there, then, no method of explaining, or at least minimizing, this at first sight conclusive appeal to Johannine tradition? In a later passage (v. xxxiii. 3) Irenæus makes a similar appeal to 'the elders who had seen John, the disciple of the Lord,' and embodies their witness to the Lord's teaching about the Millennial times in a passage which he then defines as the written testimony of 'Papias, the hearer of John and companion of Polycarp'; and since Papias' work was primarily a commentary on sayings or oracles of the Lord, it is a legitimate conclusion that if the earlier passage contains a particular exegesis of the text Jn 8<sup>57</sup>, accompanied by emphasis on the authority of the elders, there, too, the authority and the exegesis are those of Papias, and probably of Papias only. But Papias had no title beyond that of antiquity to the exaggerated deference which Irenæus pays him. A writer so 'feeble-minded' (the phrase is from Eusebius) would have been just the one to press home to its narrowest meaning the a fortiori argument, 'Thou art not yet fifty years old,' of the Jewish controversialists; it is even conceivable that he attributed the 'forty and six years' of the literal temple to the human temple of our Lord.

But because a theory which extends the length of the Ministry to ten or fifteen years is on all accounts enable, it does not at once follow that of one year, or even two, to the minimum implied by the recorded passovers would be out of court. At the same time, the effect of the four following considerations seems decisive against even this amount of deviation from the stricter interpretation of St. John's narrative.

a. However widely patristic writers differ from one another in their estimate of the number of passovers mentioned, they all, save Irenæus, are in believing that the enumeration, as given in his earlier writings appears to have reckoned no more than the two passovers; and the Ministry lasted only 'a year and some months' (de Principiis, iv. 5). If Eusebius and the Paschal Chronicle find four Passovers in the text, they allot to the Ministry a period of between three years and four. If Jerome, Epiphanius, and Apollinaris speak of three Passovers, they also define the length of the Ministry as two years, or two years and so many days. In itself too much weight must not be attached to this consensus, since the natural tendency of chronologists is to make the most of what they find in their authorities and to build up conclusions even where the data are slight and insufficient. In this case, however, the Fathers appear to be doing no violence to the intentions of the evangelist.

b. For if St. John wrote with earlier forms of the Gospel tradition in his mind or before his eyes, and made it one of his objects to supplement their deficiencies by restatement of his regard to the Judean Ministry or the Ministry itself—it is reasonable to suppose that the numerous notes of time which mark off his narrative into definite periods introduced in definite contrast to the looser tradition which had perhaps been deduced already from other Gospels as to the length of the Ministry, by substituting in his own Gospel an exact or fairly exact chronology. The proof that St. John mentions so many passovers, and so many only, amounts, then, to a presumptive proof that there were no more to mention.

The two preceding arguments are independent of the particular number of passovers recorded in St. John's Gospel; the two which follow derive their force from the result above reached, that there were not more than two years, or at least not more than two years and some months.

c. The tradition dating back to the first century, and perhaps to St. John himself, that the Ministry lasted only 'a year and some months,' therefore, added to the minimum of two years required by St. John makes it more difficult to understand how the error can have had so ancient an origin or so wide a diffusion.

d. The framework in which the events of the Ministry are set, the way in part for the theory of the 'four years' Ministry, is the fact that St. John, in his Gospel, well as in his Apocalypse, refers to the 'first' and 'second' visit to Jerus. at the feast, referring to 2<sup>13</sup> 'when he was in Jerus. at the passover at the feast, many believed on his name, beholding the signs which he was doing'; and ch. 7<sup>21, 23</sup> 'One work I did, and ye are all marvelling... I made a man sound every whit on the sabbath day,' reaches back to 5<sup>1-9</sup>. Not only can there have been no visit to Galilee between 2<sup>13</sup> and 4<sup>30</sup>, no visit to Jerus. between 5<sup>1</sup> and 7<sup>21</sup>, but the miracles themselves must have been relatively small; eight or nine months is the outside limit for the former; and since many signs were performed at the first recorded visit to Jerus., the impression of the one miracle which marked the second visit would scarcely stand out with any distinctness for more than a few days. As 7<sup>21</sup> was spoken at the Tabernacles and a Passover intervenes at 8<sup>4</sup>, this is so far an argument for putting back the visit of 5<sup>1</sup> beyond the previous Purim (February).

The cumulative effect of these considerations warrants the conclusion that while two years must, not more than two years can, be allowed for the interval from Jn 2<sup>13, 23</sup> to Jn 11<sup>55</sup>; and it now remains only to ask how far the results established from St. John's Gospel agree with the more tentative results deduced from St. Mark's.

a compared with c. St. Mark's Gospel was shown (p. 406), if its order of events can be taken as chronological, to imply, exactly like St. John's, a two-year Ministry. Its second note of time, the spring of the miracle of the 5000, corresponds exactly to the Passover mentioned as 'nigh' on the same occasion in St. John (Mk 6<sup>39</sup>=Jn 6<sup>4</sup>). Its first note, the harvest of the ears of corn (Mk 2<sup>23</sup>), must, if recorded in its proper place, belong to the months immediately succeeding the passover of Jn 2. It would follow at once that the visit welcomed by the Galileans (Jn 4<sup>45</sup>), being the first visit to Galilee after Jn 2, must precede Mk 2<sup>23</sup>; and St. John's note of time in Samaria (Jn 4<sup>38</sup>) must be placed between the passover and the episode of the ears of corn, i.e. at the actual harvest season. Very soon after the passover—room has only to be found for the visit of Nicodemus—perhaps about April 20, since passover in A.D. 27 fell on April 11 or 12, Christ leaves Jerus. with his disciples and makes a stay in the 'land of Judæa' while John was still preaching; but the Baptist's arrest probably followed shortly, and may actually have been the cause of our Lord's removal through Samaria to Galilee, at a time when at least the barley was ripe, say about the middle of May (cf. R. B. H. 1, and Westcott, ad loc.). 'After the arrest of John, Jesus came into Galilee' is St. Mark's description of the same moment, 1<sup>14</sup>. So far the chronology is smooth enough; the difficulty is to know whether the six weeks, which is the utmost that can be allowed between the middle of May and the end of wheat harvest, are enough to cover the opening stages of the Galilean Ministry down to the episode of the ears of corn. It has been shown above (p. 406<sup>b</sup>) that within his first section St. Mark certainly groups events by subject-matter rather than by time, so that there is no a priori reason against placing the episode of the corn during, or even before, the circuit of the village-towns (κωμὸνδες, i. 38), which is almost the only distinctively marked occurrence in these chapters. No doubt, however, such a scheme as this would crush the early Galilean Ministry into an uncomfortably narrow space; the double call of the apostles, for instance, is more appropriate if a substantial interval, during which they had returned to their ordinary avocations, elapsed between the return to Galilee in May and the second and final call. But if the harmonization is thought impossible, the chronological order of the events in St. Mark is not the limitation of the Ministry to two years, which must be given up. The corn episode must be transferred to the second year of the Ministry, and placed after the miracle of the Five Thousand.

d. A secure result being thus established from the Gospels for the length of the Ministry, want of space compels the omission of the section on the evidence of antiquity,—evidence the less essential that it is wholly secondary, being based on deductions, some correct, some incorrect, from the Scriptures themselves. Suffice it to say briefly, that among ante-Nicene writers, against the evidence for a single year of the Ptolemæan Valentinians, the Clementine Homilies (xvii. 19), Clem. Al. (Strom. i. 145, vi. 279), Julius Africanus (Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. pp. 240, 306), Hippolytus' later works (Paschal Cycle and Chronicle), and Origen's earlier (in Levit. Hom. ix. 5, de Princ. iv. 5), are to be set, for a two to three years' Ministry, Melito (Routh, Rel. Sac. i. p. 121), Heracleon (to judge from his interpreting Jn 4<sup>38</sup> of winter), Tatian's Diatessaron, Hippolytus' Fourth Book on Daniel, and Origen (c. Celsum ii. 12, Comm. in Matt. xxiv. 15, and probably in the lost Comm. on Is. xxix. 1). No writer before Eusebius maintains a three to four years' Ministry.

E. THE DATE OF THE CRUCIFIXION.—a. The Four Gospels.—1. The dating by officials: a, the governor; β, the high priest.

α. All the Gospels besides the Acts and Pastoral Epistles name Pilate (Pontius Pilate in Mt 27<sup>2</sup>, Ac 4<sup>27</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>) as the governor before whom Christ was tried. His tenure of the procuratorship is approximately fixed by Josephus, Ant. xviii. ii. 2, v. 2. (1) he came as successor to Valerius Gratus, whose eleven years, since they fell wholly under Tiberius, must have extended at least to A.D. 25; (2) he left after ten years of office, and was still on his way to Rome when Tiberius died, March A.D. 37, so that he can hardly have reached Palestine before A.D. 27; and as Lk 13<sup>23</sup> (not to speak of Lk 3<sup>1</sup>) show that he was not quite newly come at the time of the Crucifixion, the possible passovers for the latter are reduced to nine, A.D. 28–36.

β. As high priest Caiaphas is named by St. Matthew (26<sup>3, 57</sup>), and so also by St. John (11<sup>49</sup> 18<sup>15, 24</sup>) as to suggest (correcting the less technically accurate statement of St. Luke, who includes under the title both Caiaphas and his sometime previously deposed predecessor Annas (3<sup>2</sup> ἐπὶ ἀρχιερέως Ἀννᾶ καὶ Καϊάφᾳ; but in Ac 4<sup>6</sup> Annas to the exclusion of Caiaphas, Ἀννᾶς δὲ ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ Καϊάφας). Caiaphas was appointed under Valerius Gratus before Pilate's time. He was deposed by Vitellius, legate of Syria, on the occasion of a visit to Jerus. for the passover, the year of which can be established within certain limits, for (1) his successor Jonathan was deposed by the same Vitellius during another visit for one of the festivals of A.D. 37—probably Pentecost,* since the news of Tiberius' death on March 16 arrived at the same time; at latest, therefore, Caiaphas' deposition was at the passover of A.D. 36, and the Crucifixion at the passover of A.D. 35; (2) the death of Herod Philip in the 20th year of Tiberius, A.D. 33–34, is mentioned by Josephus a page or two after the account of Caiaphas' removal, with the fairly precise indication τότε, 'at that time,' so that, if this order of events is correct, the Passover of A.D. 34 is the terminus ad quem for Caiaphas, and that of A.D. 33 for the Crucifixion. See Josephus, Ant. xviii. ii. 2, iv. 3–v. 3.

The Crucifixion under Pilate and Caiaphas can hardly then lie outside the years A.D. 28–33.

2. The dating by the calendar: α, the day of the week; β, the day of the (Jewish) month.

α. Since the Resurrection fell on the first day of the week, Sunday, the Crucifixion, which was according to Jewish reckoning on the 'third day' before, took place on a Friday. No proof of this would be needed were it not that it has been strangely suggested (by Westcott, Introduction to the Study of the Gospels<sup>2</sup>, appendix to ch. vi. p. 348) that the day of the Crucifixion was not Friday but Thursday, on the ground of the prediction that the Son of man was to be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, Mt 12<sup>40</sup>. But against this view tradition and the NT are equally decisive: (1) The Wednesday and Friday fast is now traced back as far as the Didache, 8<sup>1</sup>. (2) The most common NT phrase for the day of the Resurrection is τῇ τρίτῃ (Gos. besides 1 Co 15<sup>4</sup>), which in Gr. never did or could mean anything but 'on the second day,' whether the day after to-morrow or the day before yesterday; cf. Lk 13<sup>32</sup>, Ac 27<sup>18, 19</sup>, Ex 16<sup>10, 11</sup>, 1 Mac 9<sup>4</sup>. Even the apparently stronger phrases μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας (Mk 8<sup>1</sup>, Mt 27<sup>1, 40</sup>), and τρεῖς ἡμέρας καὶ τρεῖς νύκτας (Mt 12<sup>40</sup>), mean exactly the same thing; cf. Gn 42<sup>17, 18</sup> καὶ ἔθετο αὐτοὺς ἐν φυλακῇ ἡμέρας τρεῖς· εἴπεν

* If it had been the passover, Josephus would probably have mentioned the fact, as he does on the previous occasion of Caiaphas' deposition. If the passover of A.D. 37 fell on March 20–21, Pentecost was about May 5, i.e. seven to eight weeks after Tiberius' death.

β. But the day of the week must be combined with the day of the month before any further results can be attained. On what day, then, of the (Jewish) month did the Crucifixion fall?

The passover was kept at the full moon of Nisan, the first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year; and the months being lunar and commencing with the new moon, the full moon fell about the 15th. On the 14th, in the afternoon, the paschal lamb was killed, Ex 12<sup>9</sup> explained by Josephus, BJ vi. ix. 3, ἀπὸ ἐνάτης ὥρας μέχρις ἑνδεκάτης, and Philo (ed. Mangey, ii. 292) κατὰ μεσημβρίαν ἕως ἑσπέρας; it was eaten on the evening of the same natural day, but as the Jewish day began at sunset, that was already Nisan 15. On the 16th the first-fruits of the barley harvest were offered or 'waved' before the Lord (Lv 23<sup>11-15</sup>; Jos. Ant. iii. x. 5). The whole feast of unleavened bread lasted seven days, from the 15th to the 21st inclusive.

Whether the Crucifixion fell on the 14th or on the 15th, whether (that is) the passover by a few hours followed it or preceded it, has always been a question. For the present purpose, however, it is only an important one in so far as it may happen that in any one of the possible years Friday might be reconcilable with one but not with the other of the two days. But the observation of the Jewish months often cannot be restored with such absolute certainty that if Friday could be Nisan 14 in any particular year it could not be Nisan 15, or vice versa. Moreover, the arguments on each side (unlike most of the points treated hitherto) are well represented in accessible authorities: see in favour of the 14th—Sanday, Authorship and Historical Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, ch. xii., or Westcott, Introduction to the Gospels, appendix to ch. vi.; for the 15th—Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii. 479-482; Lewin, Fasti Sacri, p. xxxi; McClellan, New Testament, pp. 473-494. No more then need be said here upon the Gospels than that, while prima facie the evidence of St. John tells for the 14th and that of the Synoptists for the 15th, indications are not wanting in the synoptic narrative (e.g. the episodes of Simon of Cyrene and of the deposition from the Cross, Mk 15<sup>21-42</sup>) which confirm the Johannine view. Probably, here as elsewhere St. John in repeatedly implying that the passover was still future (13<sup>1</sup> πρὸ δε τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα, 13<sup>29</sup> ἀγόρασαν ὃν χρεῖαν ἔχομεν εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν, 18<sup>28</sup> ἵνα μὴ μανθῶσιν ἀλλὰ φάγωσιν τὸ πάσχα) is intending to correct silently a false impression to which other accounts had, or might have, given rise.*

For the decisive evidence of Christian antiquity, reaching back probably to St. Paul himself, in favour of Nisan 14, see below, p. 412.

In which years, then, between . . . established limits A.D. 28-33, could . . . fall on the 14th—regard being also had to the less probable 15th—of Nisan?

The matter is not so simple as it looks; for it is never possible to be certain which day was reckoned as the new moon or first of any given month, and not always possible to be certain which month was reckoned as the Nisan, or that of any given year.

(1) How was the beginning of a Jewish month fixed? Theoretically, no doubt, by simple observation; and since astronomers can calculate the true time of conjunction for any new moon, it is possible, by adding so many hours (not less than about 80) for the crescent to become visible, and by taking the first sunset after that, to know when each month ought to have begun, if the Jewish observations were accurately made. But what was to happen when observation was impossible? Was the new month to be put off as long as every night happened to be cloudy? Were the Jews of the dispersion from Babylon to Rome to be left at their own day the new month was commencing in Jerusalem? Either of these methods must have been qualified by the permanent rules of some sort of calendar. It is probable, therefore, that the average length of a month, by being 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, could be less than 29 or more than 30 days.

The subjoined table (cf. Salmon, Introduct. to . . . Lect. xv.; Mas Latrie, Traité de Chronologie, . . . the terminus paschalis or 14th of the paschal . . . calendar; secondly, the beginning of . . . the time of the astronomical new moon; thirdly, the fourteenth day, reckoned from the first appearance of the new moon at sunset (it being remembered that the Jewish day begins at that hour)—

|         |           |                |              |
|---------|-----------|----------------|--------------|
| A.D. 28 | Sa. 27 M. | 28 M., 2 a.m.  | (29-) 30 M.  |
| 29      | F. 15 A.  | 15 A., 8 p.m.  | (17-) 18 A.  |
| 30      | Tu. 4 A.  | 4 A., 8 p.m.   | (6-) 7 A.    |
| 31      | Sa. 24 M. | 25 M., 1 a.m.  | (28-) 27 M.  |
| 32      | Sa. 12 A. | 11 A., 11 p.m. | (13-) 14 A.  |

|         |           |                | or (2-) 4 A. |

The first and third columns may safely be taken to represent the possible extremes in any year, and it will be seen at once that Friday cannot have fallen on Nisan 14 or 15 in the three years A.D. 28, 31, 32—in each of these the choice lies from Saturday to Monday or Tuesday for the 14th, and from Sunday to Tuesday or Wednesday for the 15th—and must be sought for therefore in . . . A.D. 29, 30, 33.

(2) But how . . . moons just given were . . .

before the middle of which the first ears of barley harvest were . . . if, when the previous month Adar added, the earliest full moon was not within a fortnight of being ripe, a leap month, Adar II, was intercalated. But as with the month, so also for the commencement of each year, a systematic calendar must soon have prevailed, for strangers from the Dispersion for the passover unless they knew beforehand whether a 15th month were to be intercalated or not. Such a method as was . . . moon . . . the new moon . . . equinox; and this was certainly in use—nor is there any trace of any rival system of harmonization—before the Christian era.

though the reckoning of it varied only . . . as not an absolutely fixed point. The computation of time . . . the Christian world, that of the Jews . . . of the . . . fixed at March 21. But Anatolius of Laodicea (see the passage of his paschos τὸ πάσχα, A.D. 277, preserved in PL III vi. 32), assuming the first new moon of the year of his cycle to Phamenoth 28 . . . says that the sun is then already in . . . (or 12th part of his annual . . . equinox), which he therefore placed on March 10. More . . . there were those who, . . . erroneously took for the precal month what was really not the first month of one of the last of the preceding . . . the . . . chronology of the old Jews . . . Philo, Josephus, Maccabees, and the still earlier Agathangels and Arsenobius. Who these people were whom he is attacking, Anatolius in the extant fragment does not say; but the evidence of various fragments . . . that they were the Jews of his day. The . . . of . . . from . . . one year; . . . of Jewish calendar . . . the . . . just before . . . Chrysostom . . . contemporary Jews and their neglect . . . wise men of antiquity, Philo, Josephus, and others, in terms which seem to be borrowed direct from Anatolius. (Socrates, HE i. 9; Apost. Const. v. 17; . . . Appendix, p. 277; cf., too, Epiphanius, . . .)

It is quite likely that this supposed error of the Jews simply meant that they reckoned the equinox earlier than their Christian contemporaries, better equipped in astronomical . . . Philo (op. cit. II. 293) connects the title of 'first month' given to Nisan in the OT with the concurrence of the spring equinox as an annual reminder of the beginning of all things; and see below for the catena of Jewish authorities appealed to by Anatolius, who quotes the actual language of 'Aristobulus one of the Seventy.'

* The regular synoptic use of τὸ πάσχα for the supper on the evening of Nisan 13-14 is possibly illustrated by passages in Philo, πρὶν τῆς ἰδεῖν αὐτὸν καὶ τὸν ἱερὸν, which seem to distinguish the τῶσχα of the 14th from the ἄζυμα of the 15th-21st (u. 278, 282, 283); e.g. (1) τιστάρη δι [ἱερῶν] τῶν διαβατηρίων ἢ καλεῖται πάσχα· πρὶν αὐτὴν δὲ τὸν ἑσπερινὸν ἀπαρχή, τὸ ἱερὸν δρᾶγμα· ἔπειτα δὲ ἄζυμα. (2) ἀγνῆται δὲ ἡ πάνδημος θυσία τισσαρισκαδικῆς τοῦ μηνός. (3) συνάσσει δὲ τοῖς διαβατηρίοις ἱερῶν . . . ἄζυμα. Does St. Mark, τὸ δὲ τὸ πάσχα καὶ τὰ ἄζυμα μετὰ δύο ἡμέρας (14<sup>1</sup>), imply a consciousness of this distinction? Contrast, however, Mt 26<sup>17</sup>, Mk 14<sup>12</sup>, Lk 22<sup>17</sup>.

... to be done; with the result that the Jews ... keeping the passover when the Christians, holding that the equinox was not yet past, waited for the next full moon. In any case the farther back the Church's paschal calculations can be traced, the earlier does the equinox appear to have been set. Anatolius himself put it two days before the Alexandrian reckoning, just as Hippolytus, the first known author of a Christian cycle (A.D. 222), put it a day before Anatolius. And both ... of primitive times may quite possibly have ... earlier even than the March 18 of Hippolytus.

Now, in the list of the six passovers of A.D. 28-33 there was one year, A.D. 29, in which the new moon of Nisan is placed as late as April 2, 8 p.m., and the 14th as late as April 15-18; but the argument of the last two paragraphs shows that the previous lunation, if its new moon fell in the early hours of March 4 and its 14th on March 17-19, has an equal or superior claim to be considered the month of Nisan. The 14th in this case, if it fell on March 18, would actually be a Friday; and March 18 is really the most probable of the alternatives. It is true that calculation from the phasis of the new moon after sunset would make Nisan 1=March 6, Nisan 14=March 19. But the caution has already been given that simple observation must have been superseded before A.D. 29 by calendar rules; and one of these rules, which may well go back to our Lord's time, was that Adar never consisted of more than 29 days; Nisan therefore commenced a day sooner in relation to the new moon than if it had followed a month of 30 days, so that in this year Nisan 1 would rather be March 5. Suppose, further, that the equinox was calculated one day earlier than by Hippolytus, two days earlier than by Anatolius, and Nisan 14=March 18, A.D. 29, satisfies the equinoctial limit also.

Three years then, A.D. 29, 30, 33, satisfy the Gospel evidence for the date of the Crucifixion; and the choice between them must now be made by recourse to other authorities.

b. Tradition outside the Gospels.

1. The Jewish Date.—Though the evidence obtained from these supplementary sources deals, as a rule, with Roman or other civil computation, the question as between Nisan 14 and 15 is definitely answered by a continuous chain of tradition from the 1st cent. to the 4th.

St. Paul wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthians about passover-time (5th εορτάζωμεν, cf. 16th), and paschal ... underlies his allusions both to the ... ἐκκαθάρατε τὴν παλαιὰν ζύμην ... καὶ γὰρ τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν ἐτύθη Χριστός, and to the Resurrection, 15th νυνὶ δὲ Χριστὸς ἐγήγερται ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀπαρχὴ τῶν κεκοιμημένων. On Nisan 14 and 16, then, the days of the sacrifice of the passover and of the offering of the first-fruits, St. Paul's Churches appear to have kept the memorials of the Crucifixion and of the Resurrection. In the next century the Quartodecimans, as their name implies, observed Nisan 14, not 15: the theory of the Tübingen school, that what these Johannine Churches observed on the 14th was not the Crucifixion but the Last Supper, is too preposterous to call for refutation. Definite testimony for the 14th, from lost writings of three 'holy fathers of the Church,' is quoted in the Paschal Chronicle (A.D. 641; ed. Ducange, pp. 6, 7). (i.) Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis, c. A.D. 180, in his περὶ τοῦ πάσχα λόγος accused of ignorance those who connected the 14th, not with the true Lord's passover, the great Sacrifice, but with the Last Supper,* and put the Crucifixion on the 15th, on the supposed authority of St. Matthew's Gospel: a view, he says, which is out of harmony with the law,—supremely because the paschal lamb is an OT type of Christ,—and sets the Gospels at variance with one another, obviously because St. John was admitted to give the quartodeciman date. (ii.) Clement of Alexandria, in a work ... same title, contrasted the years before the Crucifixion, when Christ ate the Jewish passover, with the year of his ... hen he did not eat it, but suffered ... being himself the ... lamb of God, and rose on the third day ... on which the Law commanded the priest to offer the sheaf of first-fruits. (iii.) Hippolytus of Portus, in his De pascha and Adv. omnes hæreses [to be distinguished from the now recovered longer treatise, Refutatio omnium hæresium], asserted that Christ ate a supper before the passover, but not the legal passover: οὗτος γὰρ ἦν τὸ Πάσχα τὸ προκεκηρυγμένον καὶ τελειούμενον τῇ ὁρισμένῃ ἡμέρᾳ.

Of other early writers Irenæus (iv. x. 1) is hardly clear; but Tertullian (adv. Jud. 8)* seems to imply Nisan 14. Africanus is quite unambiguous, πρὸ δὲ τῆς μᾶς τοῦ πάσχα τὰ περὶ τὸν Σωτήρα συνέβη (Chronicon, fr. 50 ap. Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 297). Even as late as the end of the 4th cent. three writers, all specialists on chronology, can still be cited on the same side: Epiphanius, Hæc. l. 2, εἶδει γὰρ τὸν Χριστὸν ἐν τεσσαρεσκαίδεκάτῃ ἡμέρᾳ θύεσθαι; Ps.-Crisostom, Hom. l. 7. 387; ed. Bened. viii. App. p. 2<sup>a</sup>, ... fulfils the Mosaic ordinance that the lamb should be sacrificed between the evenings on the 14th; Julius Hilarianus (A.D. 397: de die paschæ et mensis xv. ap. Gallandi, viii. 748), the sacrifice of a lamb from the flock is replaced by the sacrifice of the Lord Christ himself on luna xiv. Add to these Anon. in Cramer's Catena in Mt. p. 237, and Orosius, Hist. vii. 4. 15, the darkness took place ἐν τῇ 14th ἡμέρᾳ τῆς σέβας, ... decimam æ die lunam, as well as the Paschal Chronicle itself and the σύνομος διήγησις, an Egyptian system incorporated in it (ed. Ducange, pp. 221, 225).

But by this time the opposite view, which first emerges in the 3rd cent.—in the West, Ps.-Cyprian, Computus de pascha (A.D. 243: Martel's Chronicon 248), § 9 manducavit pascha, § 21 passus est luna xv; in the East, Origen on Mt 26th (Delarue, iii. 895), Iesus celebravit more Iudæi ... aliter ... quoniam ... factus ... beginning to be the prevalent one. So certainly Ambrose, ad epp. Emiliæ (c. A.D. 386; ed. Bened. ii. 880), Chrysostom (e.g. Hom. in Mt. lxxvii. ed. Field, ii. 461, the passover superseded by the Eucharist, τὸ κεφάλαιον τῶν εορτῶν αὐτῶν καταλύει ἐφ' ἑτέραν αὐτοὺς μετατίθελς τράπεζαν), Proterius of Alexandria, ad Papam Leonem (A.D. 444, printed as ep. cxxxiii. in the Ballerini Leo) xiv luna mensis primi ... pascha manducans ... sequenti die xv luna crucifigitur; and probably Theophilus of Alexandria, ad Theodosium Imp. iv. (A.D. 386; Gallandi, vii. 615); for though the Greek has τῇ τεσσαρεσκαίδεκάτῃ, the Latin decimiquinta tallies with Ambrose and Proterius, who both appear to be borrowing from Theophilus.

This later view appears to be derived from the use of πάσχα in the Synoptic Gospels: Origen, its most influential supporter, is directly commenting on the text of St. Matthew. On the other hand, none of the earlier witnesses for the 14th, save Apollinaris, the champion of the Johannine Churches of Asia Minor, appeal to St. John's Gospel; rather they represent an independent and * Strictly, of course, the Last Supper and the Crucifixion were on the same Jewish day; but the usage soon began to use, even for these days of the lunar month, not the Jewish reckoning from sunset to sunset, but the ordinary reckoning from midnight to midnight. Apollinaris distinguishes the two days just in the same way as Clement puts the washing of the feet on the 13th, the Passion on the 14th.

decisive confirmation of it by the living voice of primitive tradition.

2. The civil year may be identified either by the consuls or by the regnal years of the emperor; less frequently by reckoning from some one of the special eras in use in the East, such as the Olympiads or the era of Alexander (otherwise called of the Greeks), B.C. 312.

a. The earliest authority to have fixed the Crucifixion by implication to a certain year is the pagan annalist Phlegon, whose 'chronological collection on the Olympiads' ranged from O. 1. 1 (B.C. 776) down to the times of Hadrian, account of the work is given by the 7), though even he failed to get beyond the fifth book, or about B.C. 170. Photius summarizes the last chapter which he read, as a sample of the style and contents of the whole, concluding that 'the reader gets regularly bored with the lists of names and the accounts of the events, and with the excessive use of the words καταστασις and προφητεία, which were the favorite terms of the author.' It was this interest in the marvellous which led Phlegon to mention the predictions of Jesus Christ, though his knowledge was so vague that, if Origen's explanation is understood, he confused the miracles of Christ (or of St. Peter) with those of the Emperor Trajan.

What gives him his interest for the present purpose is that he recorded under O. 202. 4 (A.D. 32-33) the darkness which accompanied the Crucifixion; though, since the evidence is at second or even at third hand, it is difficult to disentangle his actual words. (i) The reference in the middle of a fragment quoted by Syncellus from the Chronicon of Julius Africanus (Fr. 50; Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 297, 477) is, as Routh has seen, probably an interpolation due to Syncellus, and not a recollection of Eusebius. (ii) The reference in the 14th book of his Chronicles the eclipse under Tiberius and of that time: Comm. in Mt. 134 (Delar. opponents urge that an eclipse, such as the Gospels mention, cannot possibly take place at full moon.—Phlegon recorded, indeed, an eclipse under Tiberius, but not an eclipse at full moon. (iii) But though he did not mention the full moon in so many words, an Anonymous in Cramer's Catena in Mt. p. 237—followed by pseudo-Origen in Mt. (see Routh, op. cit. 479)—does assert that he recorded the eclipse as a marvel, παράδοξον γεγονός, and the Christians, as a matter of course, understood by the 'paradox' the coincidence with the full moon. (iv) A further restoration of Phlegon is possible from the Chronicle of Eusebius as represented in the Armenian version, in Jerome's Latin version, and in the quotations of George Syncellus. 'In the same year as the Crucifixion (i.e. Tiberius 19; see below) the following notice occurs in pagan historians: "the sun was eclipsed; an earthquake occurred in Bithynia, and most of Nicæa fell to the ground": still more precisely Phlegon, the celebrated chronicler of the times, in his 13th book, under O. 212 (A.D. 33), states that the sun more striking than any previous, became night at the sixth hour of the day, so that stars were visible in the heavens; and a great earthquake in Bithynia overthrew most of Nicæa.' Obviously, these two quotations are not independent of one another, but are more general looks like a summary by some one of the same passage from Phlegon which Eusebius then transcribes direct and in full. That Phlegon was here drawing again on Christian sources, whether the canonical Gospels or not, is not likely to have been suspected by Origen or Eusebius, but the mention of the '6th hour' cannot admit of doubt. It does not, however, follow that he borrowed the year also from them; for an annalist, if he has not found a precise date, is bound to invent one. If he ascribed the prediction of the Crucifixion to the 202nd Olympiad simply, as Phlegon would not, and in manifest contradiction to the other early evidence. But as he really fixed them particularly to the 4th year, A.D. 33, he is the only witness before Eusebius' time to do so; and in that case the most probable hypothesis is that he knew from his Christian authorities no more than that the Crucifixion fell in the latter part of Tiberius' reign, and fixed on A.D. 33 because he may have already found reason to select that year for the Bithynian earthquake.

Eusebius, however, found Phlegon's date harmonize admirably with his own theory of the length of the Ministry, and so his Chronicle assigns the Baptist's mission (after Lk. 31) to Tiberius 15, the mission of Christ to Tiberius 16, and the Passion to Tiberius 19 (A.D. 33). The latter point is guaranteed both by Synoptic tradition, and by the Armenian; but the former is allotted to the Ministry only two to three years, and not like Eusebius three to four, substitutes Tiberius 18.

β. Far more important is the tradition—found, it is true, in * Mt. 27:45=Mk. 15:33 simply ἐκείνη ἡμέρα; but in Lk. 23:44 the true text appears to add τὸν ἥλιον ἐκλείποντος with MBOL, both Egyptian versions, Origen 2/3 (rather 2/5) and Cyril of Jerusalem 4/5.

† On Eusebius' reckoning of imperial years see immediately below.

no extant authority as ancient as Phlegon, but found in so many authorities that the common source must ascend to a remote antiquity—which fixes the Crucifixion in the consulship of the two Gemini, or in the 15th or the 16th year of Tiberius, or in the year 340 of the Greeks.

L. Rubellius Geminus and C. Fufius (or Rufus, or Rufus, or Fusus) Geminus were the consuls of A.D. 29. The Seleucid era (era of Alexander, era of the Greeks) commences Sept. B.C. 312, so that its 340th year runs from Sept. A.D. 28 to Sept. A.D. 29. But this same spring of A.D. 29 can be reckoned, according to different methods of calculation, as belonging either to the 15th or 16th year of Tiberius, who succeeded Augustus in Aug. A.D. 14, so that, on the strict reckoning, the passover falling in his 15th year will be that of A.D. 29. But the imperial year might sometimes be adjusted to the calendar year—to which corresponded the consul's tenure of office, Jan. 1 to Dec. 31—by beginning a second imperial year on the first New Year's day of each reign; compare the practice of Trajan and his successors in commencing a 2nd year of tribunicia potestas on the annual inauguration day of new tribunes next after their accession (see below, Ignatius, i. 398). In this case the 15th year would be exactly equivalent to A.D. 28, the 16th to A.D. 29. Or again, the example of the Chronicon suggests that the converse might be done at a year simply omitted, each emperor's first year beginning on some fixed day: thus, for instance, it will be shown (see below in part II. of this article, THE APOSTOLIC AGE, under Felix and Festus, p. 418) that Eusebius appears to commence his chronology with the year of the emperor's accession, and not with the first day of the year, as more normally—with the beginning of A.D. 29, under Tiberius.

Jul.* 8 (but the authorship is doubtful). (iv) Hippolytus, in his early 4th book on Daniel (ed. Bratke, p. 19), gives two irreconcilable data, Tiberius 18 (=A.D. 31, 32) and the consulship of Rufus and Rubellio, the former doubtless his own combination of a three years' Ministry (for he also says that Christ suffered in his 33rd year, loc. cit.) with St. Luke's 15 Tiberius, the latter already traditional; and this year, . . . other works. His Chronicle . . . i. p. 181 reckons 208 years from the birth of Alexander Severus, A.D. 234-235; 15 years to the Crucifixion, the 32nd year as that of the Passion, and since it was a recurring cycle of 112 years . . . 222, the 32nd year will be equivalent to A.D. 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

* But the 16th year—see below under Africanus and pseudo-Cyprian—may also be a combination of Lk. 31 (Tib. 15), as giving the beginning, not of the Baptist's ministry only, but of Christ's, with the estimate of one year for the duration of the Ministry to which both these writers adhered. Julius Hilarius, however (infra, p. 414*), gives both Tiberius 16 and A.D. 29.

Hær. ii. 23.

The first reflection suggested by this content is the unanimity with which (apart from some of the B&B editors) Christian antiquity attributed the Crucifixion to a day not later than March 25; the second, that if a confusion between the ἡμέρη ἐσταυρώθη and the ἡμέρη ἀναστήθη be allowed for, the dates, March 23 and 25, March 18 and 20, pair off with and explain one another as understood, not of the Crucifixion

March 23 became the day of the Crucifixion; or by a similar but converse process, March 20 might be transferred from its designation (with the Crucifixion or March 15) to the Crucifixion. Thus dominating the three Basilidian dates as the Gnostic fancies, of the two passages, the 15-20 and the 20-23, March 20 is the Pertullan, Hippolytus, Acts of Pilate? etc. has clearly older and better authority than March 23 (Lactantius, some known to Epphrasianus, Pascha Acts of Pilate older than himself). But these

For that day of the two for which authority is vastly preponderant, March 25, Dr. Salmon in an admirable article on H. v. A. (Dr. Chrst. Biogr. iii. 92b) looks upon that as the day of the Christi Cycle, published about A.D. 221, as the single source. (He thus abusively supposes that after each . . . round to the same day of the solar month again; and accepting the traditional date A.D. 29 for the Crucifixion, he naturally assumes that, since the full moon in A.D. 221 did the full moon in A.D. 29, 192 or 8 x 24, . . . fall on the same day. 'Actually this is a week astray, the true day being March 18. We are not to suppose that whenever March 25 is mentioned as the date of the Cycle of Hippolytus is the source of the account.<sup>1</sup> Yet this theory, simple and attractive as it is, hardly satisfies all the elements of the problem. It might be possible to explain the wide acceptance of March 25 in both East and West by the dual position of the Western soil; but 'Tert.,' own Commentary on of deducing March 25 as the day for the Passion directly from March 25 as the day of the full moon in A.D. 221. For Tertullian's Montanist writings, commence about A.D. 200, ..

Chronicle and Ibid., p. 8, l. 20-21, c. 392; and as it, too, gives March 25 for the Passion (from which also its "Nativity" comes), Dec. 25 for the Nativity, see above, p. 405<sup>a</sup>), a strong reason is supplied for pushing back the origin of the tradition of March 25 into the 2nd cent.

Genuine, of course, the tradition cannot be, because, as the table given in the preceding section shows, this was the Mass of the Vigil of the Vigil. But this is exactly the day remembering the passion, that, namely, which was given in copies Epiphanius had seen of the Acts of Pilate. It is true that even in these Acts March 25 is the day of the passion, but the MSS. and versions of the Acts are not the same.

is supported (i) by all existing MSS and versions; (ii) by those Quartodecimans who regularly kept the Pascha on March 25 on the authority of the Acts; (iii) by pseudo-Chrysostom in A.D. 387, who accepts the date as the true on the same authority. It seems, therefore, that the 18th is simply an accidental error on the part of the translators, and that the true date is the 25th.

the kalends of April; but genuine reading of the Acts, a popular date, or because the suspicion of falling before the Acts, it is a really curious and remarkable confirmation of a possible date for the Crucifixion, Friday, Nisan 14 of the year A. D. 29.

Dr Salmon indeed says (loc. cit.) that 'it is obvious that if early trustworthy tradition had preserved the day of the solar year on which our Lord suffered, the Church would not have perplexed herself with calculations of paschal full moons.' But (i) not all traditions which may in fact be true were necessarily known to be true to the ancients; (ii) after all, what the Church was aiming at in paschal cycles was a system for calculating beforehand in terms of the solar year a day that was not solar but lunar. As pseudo-Chrysostom lucidly points out, the different data of the chronology of the Christian world converge in dynamics: the Church could only calculate the season as far as was practicable, combining elements from the solar year (the equinox as a first term a quo), from the lunar year (the full moon as a second term a quo), and from the week (Friday). But if the day of the solar year had been considered alone, the full moon would necessarily have been thrown over, and the full moon was the one point which all Christians united in treating as essential to a proper paschal celebration.*

It is not unreasonable, then, to hold that the solitary datum prescribes that the Crucifixion does add a slight additional weight to the datum that the Crucifixion should be placed on Friday.

Conclusion.—To sum up briefly: the separate results of five lines of inquiry harmonize with one another beyond expectation, so that each in turn supplies fresh security to the rest. The Nativity in B.C. 7-6; the age of our Lord at the Baptism 30 years more or less; the Baptism in A.D. 26 (26-27); the duration of the Ministry between two and three years; the Crucifixion in A.D. 29: these five strands, weak no doubt in isolation, become, when woven together, the strong fabric of a consistent chronology of the life of our Lord.

LITERATURE.—For all the preliminary chronological matter as that of this article, Ideler, and technischen Chronologie. 2 vols. 1825, is still standard. O. J. Gerken, Ueber die Chronologie der Lebenszeit Christi, 1825, perhaps be made of Wieseler (Eng. tr. by Venables), and Ca. (E.T. by Evans). The writer of the present article—some points of which had been adumbrated in previous studies of his own, Patristic evidence and the Gospel Chronology in the Church Quarterly Review for Jan. 1892, pp. 390-415, and A Paschal Homily printed in the Works of St. Chrysostom, in Studia Biblica, ii pp 130-149, Oxford, 1890—has learnt much, and derived many references in certain parts of his work, from three writers (though with their general conclusions he in each case disagrees): H. Browne, Origines Chronologicae, London, 1844, Hort on Ju 6<sup>4</sup>, in Westcott and Hort's Greek Testament, 1881, App pp 77-81; and R. A. Lipsius, Die Pilatus-Acten, hiel, 1886.

II. THE APOSTOLIC AGE.

The Apostolic Age may be defined, for the purposes of this article, as the period lying between the Crucifixion (A.D. 29, less probably A.D. 30) and the destruction of the temple. Outside these limits lie, no doubt, several of the NT writings, for the chronology of which see the articles on them; but NT history may fitly be said to close with the great earthquake of A.D. 70.

These first 30 years of Christian history are roughly continuous with the labours of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the principal documents concerned are, on the one hand, their Epistles, on the other, the Acts, one half of which book is in effect devoted to each of the two great apostles. But the writings in question do not bear on the face of them any chronological system of notes of time; and the chronology must be based, in the first instance, on such authorities as are given principally in Acts, a history of Roman history, namely -

- (1) The reign of Aretas of Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>, cf. Ac 9<sup>35</sup>).
- (2) The reign and death of Herod Agrippa I. (Ac 12<sup>1-23</sup>).
- (3) The famine under Claudius (Ac 11<sup>28-30</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>).
- (4) The proconsulship of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Ac 13<sup>7</sup>).
- (5) The expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>).
- (6) The proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia (Ac 18<sup>12</sup>).

their παρα; (ii) the Montanists or Asia Minor, said by pseudo-Chrysostom to observe the 14th, not of a lunar but of the 'Asiatic' solar month beginning on March 24, so that their παρα fell always on April 6.

- (7) The reign of Herod Agrippa II., and marriage of his sister Drusilla to Felix (Ac 24<sup>24</sup> 25<sup>18</sup>-26<sup>28</sup>).
- (8) The procuratorships of Felix and Festus (Ac 24<sup>27</sup> 25; 26<sup>10</sup>-27).
- (9) The Days of Unleavened Bread (Ac 20<sup>6</sup> 7).
- (10) The persecution under Nero.

Two preliminary notes may be offered here.

a. Imperial Chronology.—Augustus died Aug. 19, A.D. 14; Tiberius died March 16, A.D. 37; Gaius Caligula died Jan. 24, A.D. 41; Claudius died Oct. 13, A.D. 54; Nero died June 9, A.D. 68.

b. Authorities for the Period outside NT Writers.—These are principally three: for Jewish affairs, Josephus; for Roman, Tacitus and Suetonius; and as they are occasionally inconsistent with one another, it is important to define their position and opportunities as historians. (i.) Tacitus, born not later and probably not much earlier than A.D. 54, published his latest work, the Annals, or history of the empire from the death of Augustus to the death of Nero, at the end of Trajan's reign, c. A.D. 115; but the work as now preserved is imperfect, being deficient for the ten years A.D. 37-47, besides two shorter lacunae in A.D. 30 and 68-69. The materials at his command for all at least that passed in Rome were ample, and his general tendencies may colour his version of the events, but his tendencies are to the emperors, but to their ministers or favourites, not to the emperors, but to their ministers or favourites.

(iii.) Josephus, the historian of Judaism, was more strictly a contemporary of the infancy of the Christian Church than Suetonius or even Tacitus. Born in A.D. 37-38 and brought up in Jerus., he left that city for three years' stay among the Essenes, A.D. 53-56, and left Pal. on a mission to Rome in A.D. 63-64. His share in the Jewish revolt—for he commanded in Galilee, and was taken prisoner at Jotapata—did not prevent from writing his Jewish War (written before A.D. 70) and on the Antiquities (completed in Domitian's 13th year, A.D. 93-94) are dominated by the distinct purpose of presenting himself and his countrymen in as favourable a light as possible to the Romans. On the other hand, a writer in Rome enjoying imperial favour who had spent in Pal. most of the years with which this article is concerned, was unusually well placed for ascertaining the facts, and, except where his 'tendency' has to be discounted, his testimony cannot be dismissed off-hand even when confronted with that of Tacitus.

1. Aretas at Damascus.—This Aretas (the fourth Aretas in the line of Nabataean kings, on which dynasty see Schurer, HJP I. ii. 348 ff.) reigned within the rough limits B.C. 9-A.D. 40; the exact dates are unknown, but it is certain (a) that he reigned over 47 years, inscriptions being extant of his 48th; (b) that he died somewhere between the death of Tiberius—which brought to a close operations begun against him at that emperor's order by the legate of Syria, Vitellius (Ant. XVIII. v. 1, 3)—and the middle of the reign of Claudius, when his successor Abias is found waging war on Izates of Adiabene (about A.D. 48; Ant. XX. iv. 1). But Damascus did not belong to Nabataea, and was certainly under direct Roman administration in A.D. 33-34, and in A.D. 62-63, for Damascene coins of these years are extant and bear the heads of Tiberius and Nero respectively, without any such allusion to the local prince as was invariable in the coins of client states. It must have come, then, into the hands of Aretas after A.D. 33-34; if by force, the empire would hardly have suffered the Nabataean line to reign unmolested till A.D. 106; if by grant, the donor must almost certainly have been, not Tiberius, whose quarrel with Aretas has just been mentioned, but Caligula, who, unlike Tiberius (see the instance of Herod Philip in the next section), encouraged the dependent princelings of the East. [The silence of Tacitus will then admit of easy explanation, the Annals being defective throughout Caligula's reign.] In this case, St. Paul's escape from the ethnarch of the city must be placed not earlier than the middle of A.D. 37; in any case not earlier than A.D. 34.

2. Reign and Death of Herod Agrippa I.—The tetrarchy of Herod Philip (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>) was on his death, about A.D. 33-34, incorporated by Tiberius into the province of Syria, but 'not many days' after the accession of Gaius (March 16, A.D. 37) was conferred with the title of king on Herod Agrippa, son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great, who was then living in Rome; and to this territory the tetrarchy of Philip was added in A.D. 39-40, and the tetrarchy of Abilene on Claudius' accession, early in A.D. 41. Agrippa reigned altogether, according to BJ, three years over the whole kingdom, and three years over the tetrarchies, according to Ant., four years under Gaius, three over Philip's tetrarchy and the fourth over Antipas' as well,—and three under Claudius over all Pal., the year of his death being 'the 7th of his reign and 54th of his life.' The discrepancy concerns Gaius' reign only (Ant., the later and fuller work, appears the more accurate), and 'three years' under Claudius are common to both accounts. But Ant., as has just been said, also speaks of 'the 7th year,' which (reckoned from the spring of A.D. 37) suggests A.D. 43-44 rather than 44 simply. Against this, however, may be set the evidence of Agrippa's coinage, which apparently goes on to a 9th year; * for even if, as is likely enough, the Jewish kings commenced a fresh year on the 1st of Nisan following their accession,† the 9th year cannot possibly have begun before Nisan 1, A.D. 44, and even then only if the original grant from Caligula preceded Nisan 1, A.D. 37, so that Agrippa's second year may have begun on that day. The coinage reckoning by itself would suggest rather A.D. 45 than 44; Josephus would be compatible with the latter part of A.D. 43; the two in combination are most easily reconciled by a date in A.D. 44 after Nisan (BJ II. xi. 6; Ant. XVIII. iv. 6, vi. 10, vii. 2, XIX. v. 1, viii. 2).

3. The Famine under Claudius.—On Agrippa's death Judaea is made again into a procuratorship under Cuspius Fadus. He intervenes in a quarrel between the Jews of Peræa and the city of Philadelphia, seizes and executes the brigand leader Tholomæus, and from that time forward keeps Judaea clear of similar disturbances; then (Ant. XIX. v. 1) enters on a dispute with the authorities at Jerus. over the custody of the high-priestly robes.‡ 'About this time,' κατὰ τοῦτον τὸν καιρὸν, Helena, queen of Adiabene, and her son Izates become converts to Judaism; the story and antecedent circumstances are related at length, and it is added that Helena, seeing that their kingdom was at peace and her son envied even by foreigners for the divine protection he enjoyed, desired to go up to the temple at Jerus., while Izates made great preparations of gifts to be offered there. Her arrival was peculiarly well-timed, for famine was raging 'at that moment,' κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν ἐκεῖνον. But Josephus does not say that all this happened under Fadus. On the contrary, having digressed to relate what was contemporary with Fadus, namely, the conversion of Helena and Izates, he continues the digression through the long chapters XX. ii. iii. iv., bringing the history of Adiabene down to a point much later even than this visit: and then, after returning to Fadus and recording the revolt and death of Theudas under him, he goes on to say that his successor was Tiberius Alexander, 'in whose time it chanced that the great famine in Judaea occurred in which' Helena acted so generously. After Alexander, of whom nothing further is related except the execution of the sons of Judas the Galilean, Cumanus comes as the new procurator; in the 8th year of Claudius [A.D. 48], Herod king of Chalcis dies. These two last events are reversed in BJ: 'after Herod of Chalcis' death C. Augustus brother of the younger Agrippa, and Cumanus' arrival in Judaea.' Both accounts, in fact, treat the two changes as practically simultaneous, so that Josephus certainly places Cumanus' arrival in A.D. 48. Thus the whole tenure of both Fadus and Alexander falls within the limits of the years 44-48 A.D.; and since the bulk of the events recorded under the former is considerably the greater, Alexander cannot have arrived before, say, the spring of A.D. 46. This is the terminus a quo for Helena's visit; and as Helena had not apparently heard of the famine before she arrived, it is the terminus a quo for the famine also, while Josephus' language leaves no doubt that 'the great famine' ran its whole course under the same governor. It is therefore possible that it should be placed, or placed partly, in A.D. 47; it is certain that even the earlier part of the crisis cannot be placed before A.D. 46 (Ant. XX. i. 1, 2, ii. 1, 5, v. 1, 2; BJ ii. xii. 1).

* See Madden, Coins of the Jews, ed. 2 (1881), p. 180. The ascription of these coins to Herod Agrippa I. is due to de Saulcy, however, thinks that the coins themselves. But the figure is quite certain, and the inscription is not on a coin except the chronological difficulty of dating them.

† See the Chronicon of Babylon, Treatise Rosch-hashanah or the New Year, fol. 2a: 'Our rabbins teach that a king who ascends the throne on the 29th Adar has completed a year as soon as he reaches Nisan 1.'

‡ The emperor's answer to the deputation sent to Rome on this subject is dated in the consulship of Rufus and Pomponius Sabinus; and if these were, as is generally assumed, consuls suffecti of A.D. 45, the letter will fall somewhere after the early months of that year. [Older editors read ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκείνου καὶ τοῦ 'thereafter,' but the latter word is simply a retranslation of fulu in the inferior Latin MSS; just omits it, and marks a lacuna.] But to date by other than the consuls ordinarii would be so unusual, if not unexampled, that (especially in the absence of any other proof of the existence of these particular suffecti) the genuineness of the letter must be considered doubtful.

4. The P. . . . . Sergius Paulus in Cyprus.—The name of this governor has been found in a Cypriot inscription ἐν Παύλου [ἀν]τιπάρχου 'in Paulus' proconsulship,' but unfortunately without any . . . . . which would fix the year. On the . . . . . a dedication to Claudius in the name of the city of Curium in Cyprus by the proconsul L. Annius Bassus, 'in accordance with a decision previously taken by the proconsul Julius Cordus,' is signed 'in the 12th year,' i.e. of the emperor, A.D. 52. Cordus' tenure, if, as seems to be implied, he was Bassus' immediate predecessor, will cover the year 51, so that in neither of those two years can place be found for Paulus. (Cesnola, Cyprus, p. 425; Boeckh, CIG 2632.)

5. The Expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius is recorded in Suetonius (Claudius 25), Judeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit; but as this writer's method is to group together the events in any one reign of similar character—in this case dealings with the provincials—no suggestion of a date is given at all. Tacitus, whose Annals, however, are extant during the last seven years only of Claudius' reign, A.D. 47-54, says nothing of the Jews, though he mentions, under A.D. 52, the expulsion of the astologi from Italy, a measure at once 'cruel and ineffective.' Orosius, A.D. 417 (Hist. vii. vi. 15), is the earliest authority to give a date, Claudius IX. = A.D. 49, quoting it as from Josephus; but, in fact, Josephus is as silent as Tacitus, not about the date only, but about the whole matter. Nor is there any reason to believe that Orosius had access to Josephus direct; the only other reference to him (vii. ix. 7) appears to be repeated from Jerome's Chronicle. It must therefore remain uncertain whether or not Orosius' source in this case is trustworthy. [Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 68) supposes that all Orosius' dates for events under Claudius are a year too early (as might easily be the case if, for instance, he was copying a chronicler like Eusebius, whose 1st of Claudius began, not in Jan., but in Sept. A.D. 41; see below, No. 8. a), so that this expulsion would then rather belong to A.D. 50.]

6. The Proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia must fall after A.D. 44, in which year (Dio Cassius, lx. 24) this province, taken by Tiberius in A.D. 15 into his own hands, and ruled thenceforward by legati propraetore (ἀντιπάρχοντες), was restored to the control of the senate, and to administration by proconsuls (ἀνθύπατοι). Further, if Gallio so far shared the disgrace of his famous brother Seneca—who was only recalled in A.D. 49 (Tac. Ann. xii. 8) from an exile that had lasted about eight years—that he would have been passed over while it lasted, then the terminus a quo is not 44 but 49, or rather, since the proconsuls entered on their provincial governments early in the year, A.D. 50. At the same time, the distinction between the method of appointment to imperial and to senatorian provinces was just this, that the emperor was quite unfettered in his choice, while, in the other case, all ex-holders of offices in Rome, ex-consuls and ex-prætors, succeeded naturally to senatorian governorships; Dio, for instance (loc. cit.), describes this very change as one from selection to lot: τὴν δὲ Ἀχαΐαν καὶ τὴν Μακεδονίαν ἀπὸ τοῖς ἀρχουσὶν ἐξ οὗπερ ὁ Τιβέριος ἤρξεν διδομένης ἀπέδωκεν ὁ Κλαύδιος τὸτε τῷ κλήρῳ. Still, it is likely enough that candidates obnoxious to the government either did not stand at all, or were unsuccessful by ἀναρρίσσειν, at the balloting. Gallio, then, entered on office in Achaia certainly not before A.D. 44, and probably not before 49, or even 50.*

7. The Reign of Herod Agrippa II. and Marriage of Drusilla to Felix.—This Agrippa, son of Herod Agrippa I., at his father's death was thought too young to succeed; but on the death of another Herod, his uncle, king of Chalcis, in the 8th year of Claudius (A.D. 48), he obtained that . . . . . from which he was transferred after . . . . . and completed his 12th year, i.e. about the beginning of . . . . . to the two tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, i.e. the northern part of Palestine. On this accession to new dignity he bestowed his sister Drusilla in marriage on Azizus of Emesa, a husband whom, not long after, μετ' οὐ πολλὸν χρόνον, she deserted for the Roman procurator Felix. Thus, if Josephus' order of events is correct, St. Paul's appearance before Felix and Drusilla, which was . . . . . not very long after Pentecost (Ac 20<sup>18</sup> 24<sup>1-26</sup>), cannot fall in A.D. 53, but at earliest in A.D. 54 (Ant. XX. v. 2, vii. 1, 2).

8. a. The Proconsulship of Felix. The events which led up to the . . . . . the last-mentioned proconsul, Cumanus, appointed in A.D. 48, are related . . . . . by Josephus (Ant. XX. vi. 1-3, more briefly by Tacitus, Ann. vi. 16); the two writers, while consistent in the main about Cumanus, differ seriously in regard to Felix. Both agree that troubles broke out . . . . . the Galileans and Samaritans, originating, says Josephus, in an assault on Galileans travelling up to Jerus. for one of the feasts. Both agree that the Roman soldiery intervened; that the quarrel was taken before Quadratus, legate of Syria, who investigated the responsibility of the Roman officials for their conduct in relation to it; and that the ultimate result was the deposition of Cumanus. Both agree further on the date; for Tacitus records the proceedings under A.D. 52, Josephus mentions the recall of Cumanus immediately before the notice of the completion of Claudius' 12th year, Jan. A.D. 53. On the other hand, Josephus, throughout the story, speaks of Cumanus as the only governor, whether of Galilee, Samaria, or Judæa. Tacitus gives Cumanus in Galilee and Felix in Samaria co-ordinate jurisdiction; which of them ruled Judæa proper is not said by him in so many words (by his authority perhaps not at all), but he apparently assumes it to be Felix, whom he introduces as iampriorem Iudææ impositus. Thus in Josephus, Cumanus is the only procurator arraigned before Quadratus, and even he is sent off to the imperial tribunal; in Tacitus, Cumanus and Felix are equally involved; but since Felix was brother to Pallas, the emperor's favourite and minister, the legate, to avoid having to condemn him, puts him on to the commission for the trial of his partner in guilt, who is condemned then and there for the crimes of both.

* See also Ramsay, Expositor, March 1897, p. 206: Seneca addressed his de Ira to his brother, not under the adoptive name Gallio, but under the name Novatus; and if it is true that he wrote this treatise after his return from exile, it follows that his brother's adoption, and . . . . . ship under the name Gallio, . . . . . not earlier than A.D. 49.

How are these divergences to be reconciled? The answer is not with bearing on the chronology of St. Paul's life; see b. Let it be conceded, then, to Tacitus, that Felix must have been holding some position in Samaria as one of the viduces for Cumanus' is warranted by Josephus' statement, that the high priest Jonathan was continually urging good government on Felix when procurator, 'lest he himself should incur blame before the populace for having requested his appointment from the emperor' (Ant. xx. vii. 5), a request which was more natural if Felix were already known in Palestine. Some of the best modern viduces, Eng. tr. ii. 202; Rar further still. But Joseph account of the history of his own country during his own lifetime; and to him it must be conceded in turn that Cumanus' rule certainly included Judæa (in the narrow sense) with Jerus., and that Felix was probably only a vidux in Samaria. Prejudice against so near a relation of Pallas made it easy for Tacitus or his authority to project back on to the earlier years of Felix' residence something of the position, and a share of the misdeeds, of his later procuratorship.

A third authority for the dates of Felix' tenure is the Chronicle of Eusebius—the Armenian VS, with some MSS of Jerome's tr., placing his arrival in the 11th year of Claudius, the other Lat. MSS in the 10th. [In the Bodleian MS of the Jerome, this note commences in the second of the two lines given to the 10th year, is continued through the two lines of the 11th year, and ends in the first line of the 12th.] But how are these imperial years reckoned?

So much of the Chronicle of Eusebius (Armenian VS, pp. 233-237) on Eusebius' Chron. i. 1. 1. Both Harnack himself (ib. p. 234) Essays, p. 223, n. 2; but this essay is as old as 1803! assume a reckoning in the case of each emperor from his own accession-day. But it is in the last degree unlikely that a chronicle, where every year is reckoned from the emperor's accession, should in the case of Nero, who reigned three months of a 3rd year (June 79–Sept. 81 A.D.), or Trajan, though he reigned six months of a 20th year (Jan. 98–Aug. 117 A.D.), are yet allotted only two and nineteen years respectively, it seems clear that, as was to be expected, the imperial years are manipulated into accord with the more fixed years of the Chronicle. But two questions arise.

(1) What is the Chronicle to fix as the year in which the first of Jan. 1, the commencement of the Roman consular year. But Eusebius was an Eastern and in the East the year was all but universally commenced about September. The Jewish civil year commenced in the month of Nisan, the old Attic lunar year in July; the old Roman year in October; the calendars of Asia Minor in imperial times used the Macedonian months made into a solar year, commencing Sept. 23; the similar calendar of Syria used the same months in the same way, only that each month was pushed down one place, so that the year presumably began at the end of October; the Alexandrian year on Aug. 29; the era of Alexander or the Greeks was reckoned from Sept. B.C. 312; the Indictions, an invention of Eusebius' own day, were counted, certainly from September, probably from Sept. A.D. 312. The strong presumption that Eusebius' Chron. i. 1. 1. this mass of usage is reinforced by the parallel year by year, to his own years of Abraham, for the Olympiads began in July, and a year that began on Jan. 1 must be out of reckoning with an Olympiad year for either its first or last six months.

(2) Granted, then, that each Eusebian year began in the September of a Julian year, can that Julian year be conclusively fixed? Now, the starting-point of the Olympiads is known to be July of the Julian year B.C. 776, if, therefore, a fixed relation is established between Eusebian years of Abraham and Olympiads, a fixed relation between Eusebian and Julian years follows. Unfortunately, the two versions of the Chronicle differ by one year as to which year of Abraham is parallel to Ol. 1. 1, the Armenian giving Ann. Abr. 1240, and the Latin, and so on. The Latin version is the more trustworthy is now, as Harnack (Chronologie, p. 113 ff.) and even by scholars who had pinned their faith to the Armenian (so, e.g., Harnack, Chronologie, p. 113 ff.); and in this particular case two synchronisms of years of Tiberius with the Olympiads, the one given in the Armenian Chron. i. 1. 1. and repeated in the Latin Chron. i. 1. 1. (other given in the Armenian Chron. i. 1. 1. and the Armenian), clench the proof. In the first case Tib. 15 is said to coincide with Ol. 201, or more fully in the Latin Chron. with Ol. 201. 4. Now, in the Chronicle itself Tib. 15 is said to coincide with Ol. 201. 4 (Jerome and Armenian)=Ol. 201. 4 (Jerome, but Ol. 202. 1 Arm. In the second case the date for the Crucifixion is supported by appeal to Phlegon's date, Ol. 202. 4. Now, Tiberius 19 (which is unquestionably correct for the Passion, see previous art. p. 413*)=Abr. 3614 and Arm.=Ol. 202. 4 (Jerome, Ol. 203. 1 Arm. Clearly, then, the parallelism of the columns is right in Jerome, wrong in the Armenian.

It follows from this investigation that, according to Eusebius, Tiberius 1=Ol. 198. 2 (Jerome)=Sept. A.D. 14 to Sept. A.D. 15; Gaius 1=Ol. 204. 1 (Jerome)=Sept. 37–Sept. 38 A.D.; Claudius 1=Ol. 205. 1 (Jerome)=Sept. 41–Sept. 42 A.D.; Nero 1=Ol. 208. 3 (Jerome)=Sept. 55–Sept. 56 A.D. As the true accession-days of these four emperors were Aug. 19, A.D. 14; Mar. 16, A.D. 37; Jan. 24, A.D. 41; Oct. 13, A.D. 54, an entirely consistent result is obtained, namely, that Eusebius commences the 1st regnal year of each emperor in the September next after his accession. When, therefore, he puts the arrival of Felix in Claudius 11, he means not (as Harnack says) Jan. 51 to Jan. 52, but Sept. 51 to Sept. 52, and his evidence, instead of contradicting, comes into line with that of Tacitus and Josephus.

b. The Departure of Felix and Arrival of Festus.—The chronology of so large a period of St. Paul's apostleship can be reckoned without difficulty backwards and forwards from his imprisonment at Cæsarea, that this date of Felix' recall becomes the most important of the series of synchronisms that have been under discussion. Yet there is none about which opinions vary more widely, years so far apart as A.D. 55 and 61 being preferred by different enquirers; what may be called the received chronology (Wieseler, Chron. des apost. Zeitalters, pp. 66–99; Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, pp. 217–220; Schürer, HJP i. n. 182, and the bibliography there given) assigning it to A.D. (61 or) 60, but not earlier, while a few older writers, reinforced now by Harnack (o.c. p. 233 ff.), push it back to quite the beginning of Nero's reign, A.D. 55 or 56. Blass (Acta Ap. pp. 21–24) leaves the question open, but is, on the whole, against the 'received' view; Ramsay (see No. 9, below) modifies the latter by one year, to A.D. 59.

(i.) Arguments for the later date, A.D. 60 or 61.

a. St. Paul at the time of his arrest, two years before Felix' recall, addresses him as 'for many years past a judge of this nation,' ἐκ πολλῶν ἐτῶν ὄντα κριτὴν τῇ ἔθνει τούτῳ (Ac 24<sup>10, 27</sup>), a phrase which it is said cannot mean less than six or seven years' procuratorship, i.e. from 52 to 58 or 59 A.D. But it has just been shown from Tacitus that Felix had been in Samaria before he came into office in Judæa; and since St. Paul's purpose is naturally to press all that could truly be said of Felix' experience, he would not too minutely distinguish between his present position as procurator and his previous position as a subordinate. The ἐκ πολλῶν are therefore to be reckoned from an indeterminate point previous to A.D. 52, and no certain deduction of any sort can be drawn about them.

β. Josephus, after the mention of Nero's accession, records as all happening under Felix: the death of Azizus, king of Emesa; the succession of Aristobulus in Chalcis, and readjustment of the dominions of the younger Agrippa; the jealousy between Felix and the high priest

Jonathan, and the terror which, after Jonathan's assassination, prevailed at each of the feasts; the appearance of various robber chiefs or impostors, especially a certain Egyptian; and lastly, the 'great quarrel' between the Jewish and Syrian inhabitants of Caesarea (Ant. xx. viii. 4-8). Now, this long succession of incidents cannot, it is said, be brought within less than five or six years, i.e. from Oct. 54, Nero's accession, to 60 A.D., especially as the rising of the Egyptian was already 'before these days' (Ac 21<sup>38</sup>) at the time of St. Paul's arrest, two years from the end of Felix's tenure. But two considerations deprive this line of argument of a good deal of its force.

(1) Josephus naturally groups together all he has to say about Pal. under Felix. That he does this after Nero's accession, means that he conceived, not that the events described began only then to be true, but that the main part of Felix's government, and its most striking events, belonged to the new reign, and that if Felix's procuratorship began in A.D. 52, could easily be the case so long as it ended not earlier than A.D. 57 or 58. Exact information about the latter date Josephus obviously did not possess, or he would, as in other cases, have given it.

(2) The various events described were not necessarily successive. The political arrangements in Galilee or Chalcis, the growing disorder in the time of a series of deceptions practised on the highly-wrought minds of the populace by miracle-mongers of all sorts; for whereas the rest led their followers into the wilderness with the promise of signs and wonders, 'a fellow from Galilee' at this time, καὶ οὗτος τὸν λαόν, ἔδωκεν ἀποκρίσεις, gave rendezvous to the Mt. of Olives, that from thence he might show how the walls of Jerus. should fall down at his bidding. At the same time, if this rising is to be placed under Nero at all, then St. Paul's arrest cannot fall before Pentecost 56, or rather, if the full natural meaning is to be given to the words ἐπὶ τοῖς ἡμέραις τῆς πεντήκωστος, before Pentecost 56, and Felix's recall before the summer of 57 or rather 58 A.D.

It appears, then, that the arguments used to support the 'received' date, A.D. 61, will not bear the whole weight placed on them, but that, so far as they go, they do suggest a year not earlier than A.D. 58, or at any rate than 57. The arguments used on the other side must now, in turn, be subjected to examination.

(ii.) Arguments for an early date, A.D. 55 or 56.

a. Eusebius' Chronicle places Festus' arrival in Nero 2, i.e. according to Harnack, in the year Oct. 55-Oct. 56 A.D.; and Eusebius' chronology of the procurators is probably derived from Julius Africanus (A.D. 220), who, whether through the Jewish kings of Josephus' contemporary, Justus of Tiberias,* or through personal enquiry (for he lived in Palestine), had excellent opportunities of arriving at the facts. But, again, a twofold answer may be given. (1) In any case Eusebius' true date for Festus is Nero 2=Sept. 56-Sept. 57 A.D., see above, p. 418<sup>b</sup>. (2) It cannot be too often repeated that chroniclers were tempted to invent dates for all undated events of historical interest; and as Festus' connexion with St. Paul would deter a Christian from passing him over without mention, it is possible that Eusebius (or Africanus), if the usual authorities failed him, simply set him exactly midway between his predecessor Felix, A.D. 51-52, and his successor Albinus, A.D. 61-62.

For the last procurator, Gessius Florus, Eusebius gives Nero 10=Sept. 64-Sept. 65 A.D.; this agrees well enough with Josephus' statement that the breaking out of the war—Aug. 68 A.D.—fell in the 12th year of Nero (i.e. on Josephus' system Oct. 65-Oct. 66) and 2nd of Florus, Ant. xx. xi. 1. For Albinus, the last but one, Eusebius has Nero 7=Sept. 61-Sept. 62 A.D.; and Josephus relates that a certain visionary was brought before Albinus at the Feast of Tabernacles, four years before the war, i.e. Oct. 62 A.D., BJ vi. v. 3, so that Eusebius' date is at any rate the latest possible, and is very likely correct.

β. Felix on his recall was prosecuted before Nero by the leading Jews of Caesarea, and 'would certainly have been condemned for his wrongdoings towards the Jews had not his brother Pallas, who at that moment stood very high in Nero's favour, interceded on his behalf,' Ant. xx. viii. 9. Now, according to Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 14, 15, Pallas was removed from office not long before Britannicus celebrated his 14th birthday; and Britannicus was born in A.D. 48, his father Claudius' accession, circa Feb. 41 A.D.; again, if Pallas' retirement fell in Jan. 55 A.D., and Felix' trial preceded it, the latter must have fallen in the very first months of Nero's reign, and Festus must have come out as procurator in the summer of A.D. 54 under Claudius, a result which it is hopeless to try and reconcile with the other authorities.

Harnack, o.c. p. 238, on the ground of the confusion which besets even the best chronologists through the different methods of reckoning imperial years, conjectures that Tacitus has mistakenly put Britannicus' 14th birthday for his 15th, so that the whole story should be transferred from A.D. 55 to 56. But this is unlikely: in the first place, because Tacitus reckons his years, as a Roman naturally would, by consulships, and not by regnal years of the emperor at all; in the second place, because the date of Pallas' retirement is not given, but only that he retired. It seems obvious—there is certainly no reason against the view—that Pallas retained sufficient influence in the early years after his retirement to be able to secure immunity for his family. Tacitus expressly says that he stipulated that no inquiry should be made into his conduct in office, a very different attitude to what most fallen ministers had to adopt under the empire. But most of all, when he speaks of Nero at the date of Pallas' retirement, καὶ οὗτος τὸν λαόν, ἔδωκεν ἀποκρίσεις, but this appears to be only his way of accounting for the acquittal of an oppressor of the Jews.

Stated as a proof for the year A.D. 55 or 56, this argument, too, breaks down; but if restated with a more modest scope, it will be found not without force. It is, in fact, difficult to believe that the Jews would not have gained their case against Felix had Pallas' ascendancy over Nero which enabled them under the next procuratorship to win their cause in the matter of the temple wall against Festus and Agrippa combined, Ant. xx. viii. 11. It is under A.D. 58 that this woman's first introduction to Nero is recorded, but it was not till A.D. 62 that she set the crown to her ambition by marrying him, Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 45, 46, xiv. 60 ff. It was in the same year, 62, that Pallas, who, according to Ann. xiv. 65, was too rich and too slow in dying for Nero's avarice, was poisoned. Not improbably, the interest of Claudius' favourite waned with that of Claudius' daughter, so that it was no mere coincidence that the same year saw the murder of Octavia to make room for Poppæa, and the murder of Pallas. Anyhow, considering the respective histories of Pallas and Poppæa, the years 57, 58 (59?) are not so late to suit the circumstances of Felix's trial as the years 60, 61.

In the arguments for the extreme position on either side have been shown to be equally devoid of conclusive force. But, on the other hand, each set of them, though it does not establish its own case, tends to disprove the opposite. The facts about Pallas and Poppæa, not to speak of the evidence of Eusebius, do not prove that Festus succeeded Felix as early as 55 or 56, but they do seem to exclude a date as late as A.D. 60. Conversely, the account of Felix' procuratorship in Josephus, though it does not show that he was governor as late as 60 or 61, does seem to show that he remained later than A.D. 56. The probabilities, therefore, both sides being considered, concentrate themselves on the intermediate years A.D. 57-59 for Felix' recall (A.D. 55-57 for St. Paul's arrest).

9. The Days of Unleavened Bread (Ac 20<sup>6-7</sup>) in St. Paul's third missionary journey have lately been brought again into notice by Ramsay (Expositor, May 1896, p. 336) as a date which 'can be fixed not merely to the year, but to the month and desire long before expressed by him (Ro 15<sup>28</sup>) to go on from Rome to Spain, is made more than probable by the testimony of St. Clement, that the apostle '... ἐπὶ τὴν ὅλην τὴν οὐρανὴν καὶ τὴν γῆν' (ἐπὶ τὴν πέραν τῆς ὁδοῦ ἐλθὼν, ad Cor. v.), and of the Muratorian Canon [c. A.D. 200], profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis. For a journey to districts so untouched, where the very foundations of Christianity would still have to be laid, at least a year must be allowed, and six months more must be added for the preaching on the route... Southern Gaul—Marseilles, Arles, Nîmes, the Galatia to which Crescens was sent (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>) was, as Eusebius, HE iii. 4, and other Greek Fathers suppose, not the lesser Gaul of Asia Minor, but the greater Gaul of the West.

That St. Paul also revisited the East results from the Pastoral Epistles; and even critics who, like Harnack (o.c. p. 239, n. 3), reject these Epistles as a whole, admit that genuine accounts of St. Paul's movements after his release have been incorporated in them. But for the journey to Ephesus and Macedonia (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), for the evangelization of Crete (Tit 1<sup>9</sup>), for the final visits to Troas, Miletus, and perhaps Corinth (2 Ti 4<sup>13, 20</sup>), for the winter at Nicopolis (in Epirus; Tit 3<sup>12</sup>),* a second eighteen months are required.

Thus three full years, though not necessarily more, appear to have elapsed between St. Paul's departure from and return to Rome; and it follows that if his martyrdom in the first great outbreak of Nero's persecution holds good, of the two alternative years to which his release was narrowed down (No. 9, above), A.D. 61 has to be rejected. A.D. 62, and A.D. 56, 58 over A.D. 57. The date of his arrest at Jerusalem and of his journey as a prisoner to Rome.

So far, then, ten points from Jewish and secular history have been fixed with more or less probability: (1) Aretas in possession of Damascus, certainly not before A.D. 34, probably not before A.D. 37; (2) Herod Agrippa I's death, probably in A.D. 44; (3) the famine in Jerusalem, nor before A.D. 46; (4) the proconsulate of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus, not in A.D. 51, 52; (5) the expulsion of the Jews from Rome, perhaps in A.D. 49 or 50; (6) the proconsulate of Gallio in Achaia, probably not before A.D. 49 or 50; (7) the death of Drusilla with Felix, not before A.D. 54; (8) the procuratorship of Felix as procurator of Judaea in A.D. 52, from his recall in one of the years A.D. 57-59; (9) of these three years the first seems to be excluded by the note about the days of unleavened bread; (10) and the third seems to be excluded by the calculation of the necessary interval between St. Paul's hearing before Festus and his martyrdom in A.D. 61 (61). Thus the crucial date of Festus' arrival seems to be established as A.D. 58, and therefore the close of the Acts after St. Paul's two years' captivity at Rome as A.D. 61; and a sort of framework is erected into which the details to be gathered, first, from the comprehensive history of the Acts, and then from the fragmentary notices in the... now to be inserted.

(A) The Acts; second half (chs. 13-28). For the special criticism of this book, see ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. More need not be said here than that Ac is accepted in what follows as containing, on the whole, an accurate and trustworthy picture of events between Pentecost and St. Paul's first Roman captivity, A.D. 29-61. The picture is cut up, as it were, into six panels, each labelled with a general summary of progress; and with so careful an artist, the divisions thus outlined are, in the absence of more precise data, the natural starting point of investigation. (i.) First period, 1<sup>1</sup>. The Church in Jerus., and the preaching of St. Peter: summary in 6<sup>7</sup> 'and the word of God was increasing, and the number of disciples in Jerus. was being greatly multiplied, and a great number of the priests were becoming obedient to the faith.' (ii.) Second period, 6<sup>8</sup>. Extension of the Church through Pal.; the preaching of St. Stephen; troubles with the Jews: summary in 9<sup>31</sup> 'the Church throughout all Galilee and Judaea and Samaria was having peace, being built up, and walking in the fear of the Lord and in the consolation of the Holy Spirit was increasing daily.' (iii.) Third period, 9<sup>31</sup>. The extension of the Church to Antioch; St. Peter's conversion of Cornelius; further troubles with the Jews: summary in 12<sup>24</sup> 'and the word of the Lord was increasing and being multiplied.' (iv.) Fourth period, 12<sup>25</sup>. Extension of the Church to Asia Minor; preaching of St. Paul in 'Galatia'; troubles with the Jewish Christians: summary in 16<sup>5</sup> 'the Churches then were being confirmed in the faith, and were increasing in number daily.' (v.) Fifth period, 16<sup>6</sup>. Extension of the Church to Europe; St. Paul's missionary work in the great centres, such as Corinth and Ephesus: summary in 19<sup>20</sup> 'so forcibly was the word of the Lord increasing and prevailing.' (vi.) Sixth period, 19<sup>21</sup>. Extension of the Church to Rome; St. Paul's captivity: summarized in 28<sup>31</sup> 'the kingdom of God and teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ, with all boldness unhindered.'

Of these six sections the protagonist in the first three is St. Peter, in the last three St. Paul; and the two halves into which the book thus naturally falls make almost equal divisions at the middle of the whole period covered. But the further consideration of the earlier half may best be postponed until the rich chronological material of the later sections has been set in order.

Starting-point of St. Paul's First Missionary Journey (1st M.J., Ac 13<sup>1</sup>).—The summary which closes the first section of the Acts intervenes between the notices of the death of Herod Agrippa I. (Ac 12<sup>19</sup>; see No. 2, above), and of the completion of St. Paul and Barnabas' famine 'ministry' at Jerus.; so that it appears that the journey to Antioch was not begun until after the death of Herod. The date of the journey is fixed by the fact that the delegates had not merely begun to collect contributions in anticipation, which was natural enough, but had closed their fund before the famine was heard of, which does not seem natural at all. Certainly, if the delegates helped to administer the relief, the year 46 is the earliest possible.

Nor was the start on the 1st M.J. made immediately after their return to Antioch. The description introduced at this point (13<sup>1</sup>) of the personnel of the Antiochene 'prophets and teachers' suggests at least some further period of settled work; and the journey was not undertaken as a sudden departure, but as a well-considered and planned expedition. The journey was therefore undertaken in the summer (March or April to Nov.), and that during the other months he was in general stationary. Thus the spring of A.D. 47, or more particularly the end of the paschal season (in that year circa Mar. 25-Apr. 4), is the earliest starting-point at all probable.

Duration of the First Missionary Journey (Ac 13<sup>1-14</sup>).—Crossing to Cyprus the apostles landed at Salamis and passed on to Paphos, preaching in the island. The stay in Cyprus can hardly have been less than some months; the results, at any rate, encouraged the Cypriot Barnabas to select, as his share of the communities visited or founded in common (13<sup>9, 10</sup>), a small part, then, in the summer of the same year, A.D. 47, the party crossed to the mainland of Pamphylia; and whether or not Barnabas' attractive conjecture be true, that the 'infirmity of the flesh' was a malarial fever caught there in the lowlands and necessitating an immediate move up into the hills, no stay is recorded anywhere short of Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13<sup>14</sup>, 15). To the evangelization of this city and of Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, the main efforts of the journey were directed. The return was made by the same route, and the cities were visited twice. The first sojourn in Antioch P. was long enough for the word to be preached abroad in the whole of Syria (13<sup>19</sup>), etc. the return of the missionaries to Antioch P. was long enough in other words in Corinth, he stayed three months—obviously the winter months of A.D. 55—<sup>10-60 A.D.</sup> and then he sent Paul to him to Philippi just in <sup>10-60 A.D.</sup> the month of February, E.G., 208. This longer <sup>10-60 A.D.</sup> stay was a sudden substitute, at the time of starting, for the direct voyage to Pal (208), and the party had to hurry in consequence if the distance from Philippi to Jerus was to be covered in the six weeks between the end of the paschal season and Pentecost (210<sup>4</sup>). A week (six days) was spent at Troas, and another at Tyre, perhaps while waiting for weather or ships; but the journey between these two places was made with only necessary halts, and appears to have occupied not more than a fortnight. The days that remained to spare were spent at Caesarea (211<sup>0</sup>), and Jerus. was probably reached just in time for the feast.

St. Paul's Continuities.—At Jerus. St. Paul was arrested (May A.D. 56), and conveyed thence to Caesarea, where his imprisonment, though not of a rigorous character, had lasted a full two years (ἑξήκοντα ἡμέρας, 2427) when Porcius Festus succeeded Felix in the middle of A.D. 58. Festus, unlike his predecessor, gave a fairly prompt hearing to the Jews (251 b 23), and late in the summer he transferred Paul to Caesar, was sent, with other prisoners, in charge of a centurion to Rome. But the voyage was much delayed by contrary winds, and they were still off Crete at a time when the great fast (ἡμέρα ἀσπερ, Sept. 15 in A.D. 59) had already begun (254 a 23). It was the beginning of November, and the three months at Malta (284) are reckoned to the full, the voyage was continued early in February, before navigation would naturally have begun; but no doubt an official on government business would be more likely than ordinary folk to risk sailing at an unpropitious season. Anyhow, somewhere in the early months of A.D. 59 St. Paul may be believed to have arrived in Rome, and after 'two whole years' (ἑξήκοντα ἡμέρας, 2830), i.e. in the spring of A.D. 61, the book of the Acts closes, and leaves him still a prisoner; though the mention of the particular period suggests that a different condition of things supervened at the end of it, in which case the release, and visit to Spain, would follow at this point. [See for the rest of St. Paul's life, supra, pp. 420b-421a.]

Thus the second section of Acts, from the beginning of the 1st chapter to the end of the 28th, covers a period of fourteen years, certainly not less, and apparently not more; and if the starting-point was rightly placed in A.D. 47, the fourteen years will come to an end in A.D. 61.

(B) The Epistles of St. Paul.

Of these the Pastoral Epistles fall outside the Acts, and have been written already (p. 421<sup>a</sup>). The two to the Thess. were written in the company of Silas and Timothy, the first not long after leaving Athens, 1 Th 1<sup>3</sup>-2<sup>6</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>1</sup>; that is to say, during the long stay at Corinth on the 2nd M.J., A.D. 51 (50-52). The two to the Cor. fall, the one just before, the other soon after, the departure from Ephesus for Macedonia, towards the end of the 3rd M.J., A.D. 55 (see above, p. 422<sup>b</sup>). The Epistle to the Rom. belongs to the winter residence at Corinth, A.D. 55-56 (Ro 16<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>23-26</sup>=Ac 19<sup>21</sup>). The Epistles to Philippi, Ephesus, Colossæ, and to Philemon belong in the interval between the Roman imprisonment, A.D. 56-60. But the one Epistle which contains some fragments of a chronology of St. Paul's life (Gal 1<sup>1</sup>-2<sup>2</sup>), the one Epistle which would bring together a point in the second half of the Acts with a point in the first, is also, from the absence of allusions to contemporary history, unfortunately the most difficult to date of all the Epistles.

Date of the Galatian Epistle.—(i.) Resemblance of style and subject-matter to general letters critics to assign Gal to the second group of Epistles, with 1, 2 Co and Ro, or even to a particular place in that group, between 2 Co and Ro (so Lightfoot, Galatians,<sup>3</sup> pp. 44–56), i.e. on the chronology above adopted, in the latter part of A.D. 55. But perhaps too much stress has been laid on such resemblances taken alone,—as though St. Paul's history was so strictly uniform that a given topic can only have been handled at a given moment,—and too little on the influence of external circumstances to revive old ideas or call out new ones. Thus the Philippian and Ephesian letters belong to the same period; but the difference of conditions between the 'Asiatic' province and a Romanized community in Macedonia has produced a marked difference of topics and illustrated a marked progress of thought. Conversely, Gal and Ro may grapple with the same problems on the same lines (and yet what an alteration of tone between the two!) without being at all nearly synchronous with one another. The Galatian Epistle must be earlier than the Roman, earlier, that is, than A.D. 56; nothing more can be asserted positively, so far. (ii.) At the other end, the terminus a quo for the Epistle is the 1st M.J.; thus, even if addressed, as is probable, to the Churches then founded, it falls after A.D. 48. Further, the phrase in 4<sup>18</sup> 'because of weakness of the flesh I preached the gospel to you τὸ πρότερον,' implies either some considerable lapse of years, 'in the old time,' or a second visit 'on the former of my two visits.' With the first alternative a date as late as A.D. 53-55 is possible; with the other, the Epistle must fall between the second and third visits, i.e. between the spring of A.D. 50 and the autumn of A.D. 52 (supra, p. 422).

[Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 189) dates the letter from Antioch S immediately before the third visit, and finds a reason for this precision in the assertion that so critical a situation must have called for necessity for a prompt personal inspection; but it might be urged with at least equal reason, from Gal 1<sup>6</sup> οὐκ ἔρχομαι· μετατίθετε, that the interval after St. Paul's last visit—whichever that was—had not been a long one.]

Visits to Jerusalem in the Galatian Epistle.—

For the date, then, the years A.D. 50-55 remain open; and therefore St. Paul when he wrote had paid according to the Acts either three visits to Jerus.,—Ac 9<sup>26-30</sup> after the flight from Damascus Ac 11<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>25</sup> the contribution for the famine, c. A.D. 46, Ac 15<sup>34-36</sup> the apostolic Council, A.D. 49,—or four, adding to the three former Ac 18<sup>22</sup>, the flying visit at the end of the 2nd M.J., A.D. 52. In the Epistle, on the other hand, two visits only are named, the first a fortnight's visit to Cephas (Gal 1<sup>18</sup>), the second an official visit of the representatives of Gentile to the representatives of Jewish Christianity (Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>). Thus, even if St. Luke's enumeration is exhaustive, St. Paul omits either one or two visits altogether. But if this seems a difficulty, the solution is simple; St. Paul is enumerating, not his visits to Jerus. per se, but his visits for intercourse with the elder apostles, πρὸς τοὺς πρὸ ἐμοὶ ἀποστόλους (Gal 1<sup>17</sup>), and would necessarily omit any visit when they were absent. What, then, of the occasion when the famine contribution was brought to Jerusalem? If St. Luke mentions only elders or presbyters as the recipients of the bounty (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>), the natural, though of course not the only possible, explanation is that the elders—that is, the local ministry with St. James the Lord's brother at their head—were by that time the supreme authority. Certain it is that, whether gradually or at some definite moment, the Twelve did separate themselves from the Church at Jerus., and became more completely the missionaries which after all their common mission Christ and their very title of 'apostles' meant them to be. After the persecution of Herod they are never mentioned at Jerus. save during the Council of ch. 15. Doubtless, they returned from time to time, as opportunity offered, to keep the feasts like other Jews; but neither at St. Paul's fourth nor at his fifth visit is there the least hint of their presence. [If the ancient tradition that the apostles, according to divine command, remained at Jerus. for twelve years after the Ascension (Prædicatio Petri, ap. Clem. Al. Strom. vi. 5; Apollonius ap. Eus. HE v. 18; Harnack, o.c. p. 243; von Dobschütz, Texte u. Unters. xi. 1, pp. 52, 148) substantially represents historic fact, as may well be the case, then A.D. 41 or thereabouts will mark their departure.] Here is ample reason for St. Paul's silence about the visit of Ac 11. 12 and (if the Epistle was written after the summer of A.D. 52) that of Ac 18. Thus the first visit of Gal corresponds with the first of Ac; the second of Ac is omitted; and the second of Gal answers to the third of Ac (A.D. 49).

[This connexion of Gal 21-10 with Ac 15 is generally accepted, and a strong argument for it is the common atmosphere of crisis which pervades both. Though they are from different points of view (St. Paul, pp. 152-166), strongly maintains the second of Acts. Some by some illustrate the not wholly without cause, attributes visit cannot be said in St. Paul to have been κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, Gal 22, in St. Luk of Antioch, as the harmony. Very St. Paul's emissaries (Ac 15) with St. Luke's 'emissaries from Judaea' (Ac 15) make St. Peter's visit to Antioch (Ac 18) in view that St. Peter and St. James gave a formal pledge of brotherhood, and then violated it. But this identification of the two Judaizing missions from Jerus. to Antioch may be set aside with the ordinary view that Gal 21-10 is to be allowed in order of time to precede Gal 21-10. There is nothing like the ισχυρὸς of Gal 118 21 to suggest that the chronological series is continued. On the contrary, St. Paul's argument may perhaps be best paraphrased as follows: 'I have not received my apostleship from the elders and apostles. I went up to their headquarters at Jerus., not on my conversion, but first at an interval of 3 years, and then at one of 14; the first a private visit, the second an official one, when I treated with them, and was recognized by them, on equal terms. So far from simply submitting to them, I once publicly rebuked their chief on the occasion when to prove his main point, but has shown the way to a subsidiary rearrangement of much importance. The dispute at Antioch may then be placed in the winter (A.D. 48-49) before the Council, at which St. Peter employs to others the argument that had convinced himself.]

Date of St. Paul's Conversion.—The second visit of Galatians being thus identified with the Council, the date has already been fixed as in all probability A.D. 49 (above, p. 422*); and this visit itself was 'at an interval of 14 years' (διὰ δεκατεσσάρων ἔτων, Gal 21), while the first visit was '3 years after' the conversion (μετὰ τρία ἔτη, Gal 18). But are the 14 years of the second visit also to be reckoned from the conversion (11 years, therefore, from the first visit), with Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 332, or from the first visit (17 from the conversion), ad loc.? The Greek suits either; the former argument favours the former, for St. Paul would naturally state the intervals at the highest possible figure. The first is established above (p. 416*), the second is established when St. Paul came to Antioch for the first visit, he had just fled from the ethnarch of Aretas at Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>22</sup>=Ac 9<sup>25, 26</sup>), and Aretas probably did not become master of Damascus till A.D. 37. But the addition of the 3 to the 14 years would throw back the first visit to A.D. 35-36, probably beyond the time of Aretas, and the conversion to A.D. 32-33, whereas the inclusion of the 3 in the 14 would put the conversion in A.D. 35-36, and the first visit under Aretas in A.D. 38.

(C) The first half of the Acts: chs. 1-12.

Thus, from the dates established in the second half of the Acts, it is possible, by means of the Epistles, to argue back to the first half of the Acts and to reach two rough dates for the conversion of St. Paul (Ac 9<sup>12</sup>), A.D. 35-36, and for his first visit to Jerus. (Ac 9<sup>23</sup>), A.D. 38. It remains only to adjust, by the help of these points, the division into periods (see p. 421*), which is the single hint at a chronology supplied by St. Luke in the earlier part of his work. St. Paul's conversion apparently followed not very long after St. Stephen's martyrdom, and that, in turn, is the first event recorded in the 2nd section of the Acts (9<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>7-9</sup>). The first period of relatively undisturbed progress will then end about A.D. 35, having covered six years from A.D. 29. The second period, marking a commencement, but only a commencement, of conflict, begins in A.D. 35, and the last event mentioned in it is St. Paul's first visit to Jerus., A.D. 38; but the peaceful development implied in the summary of this period (9<sup>31</sup>) justifies, perhaps, the extension of the period as far as A.D. 39-40. The third period ends with the record of advance in 12<sup>24</sup> after the death of Herod in A.D. 44, and before St. Paul's second visit (at any rate before its conclusion) at the time of the famine in A.D. 46, and lasts altogether from A.D. 39-40 to, say, A.D. 45. That the chronology here adopted results in a more or less even division of periods—i. from A.D. 29; ii. from A.D. 35; iii. from A.D. 39-40; iv. from A.D. 45-46; v. from A.D. 50; vi. from A.D. 55 (to A.D. 61)—such as St. Luke seems to be contemplating, must be considered a slight step towards its verification. On the other hand, Harnack's chronology, which puts St. Paul's conversion in the same year as the Crucifixion, or, at latest, in the following, allotting even in the latter case no more than about 18 months to Ac 11-9<sup>18</sup>, neglects these period-divisions altogether.

Conclusion.—This article may be concluded by a comparison of the dates here adopted (col. ii.) with those preferred by three representative writers—Harnack (col. i.), who throws everything early; Lightfoot (col. iv.), who throws all the latter part late; and Ramsay (col. iii.), who investigates independently, but is nearer to Lightfoot than to Harnack.

| St. Paul's martyrdom                     | 64       | 64-65 | 65    |

If these several schemes are brought to the test of agreement with the ten results established on a comparison of probabilities in the first half of this article, it follows, with regard to each in turn—

1. That certainly Harnack (A.D. 33), and probably Ramsay (A.D. 35-36), put St. Paul's first visit to Jerus., and therefore his flight from Damascus, earlier than it seems that Aretas can have obtained possession of the latter city.

2. That for the death of Herod Agrippa I., A.D. 44 is accepted in all schemes.

3. That Harnack, at least, puts the return from the second or famine visit to Jerus. [A.D. 44?] considerably before the famine can have begun.

4. That no scheme puts the 1st M.J. and visit to Cyprus (A.D. 45, 47, 48) in either of the two years which are impossible for Sergius Paulus' governorship.

5. That all schemes bring St. Paul to Corinth (autumn of A.D. 48, of 50, of 51, of 52) under Claudius; but that if Orosius' date for the expulsion of the Jews from Rome (A.D. 49-50) is correct, then, since Aquila's arrival immediately preceded St. Paul's (Ac 18<sup>2</sup> προσφάτως ἐληλυθότα), Harnack's date is certainly too early; Lightfoot's certainly, and Ramsay's possibly, too late.

6. That all schemes make St. Paul appear before Gallio at Corinth (A.D. 49-50, 51-52, 52-53, 53-54) in a possible year for the latter's proconsulship; but that the earliest of these years, Harnack's, is not a likely one.

7. That, in the same way, Harnack's scheme makes St. Paul appear before Felix and his wife

God. It is thus that St. Paul says, 'the kingdom of God is . . . and joy in the Holy Ghost' (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>); . . . it to the hid treasure and the pearl of great price (Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>); or that He says, 'Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness' (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>, Lk 12<sup>31</sup>). 'The k. of God is within you' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>). It is used in this sense in the expressions, 'the glad tidings' (i.e. the gospel) of the kingdom' (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>1</sup> etc.), 'to preach the kingdom' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup>, Ac 20<sup>25</sup> etc.). (2) In a concrete sense the establishing of such a rule considered as an event. We have here two points of view from which such an event might be considered: (1) As soon as Christ's teaching found disciples, the kingdom was already established; or if we regard the miraculous power of Christ over nature, we might say with Him, 'if I by the spirit of God cast out devils, then is the k. of God come upon you' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). From the point of view of the

(2) A future establishment of the idea is especially connected with the second coming of Christ 'with the angels of his power, in flaming fire' (2 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, cf. 1b 5-10). of the kingdom in power (cf. Mt 3<sup>610</sup>). A third but rare use is (3) the present rule of God in heaven (2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>, cf. Lk 23<sup>42-43</sup>, Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). (4) Basileia = sphere of rule, not so much local, as in the prevailing use of 'kingdom,' but in the sense of the society or community over which the rule extends. This meaning has also two variations corresponding to the first two meanings of (3). They are (1) the actual society of Christians, including good and bad members, so . . . the Tares (Mt 13<sup>24-30</sup>), the Draw-net (ib. 47-50), and the (ib. 22<sup>1-13</sup>), but always with a reference to (2) . . . of those who are admitted to the . . . when it is established with pow . . . society of the blessed, to be rejected from which is eternal misery, its membership is the reward of faithful service; cf. the expressions, 'Thers is the k. of heaven' (Mt 5<sup>10</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>20</sup>), 'to enter into, to inherit the k.' (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>, Ac 14<sup>22</sup>, Gal 5<sup>21</sup>, Col 1<sup>3</sup>, and many other places).

Of these meanings ἐκκλησία coincides only with the last. It does not per se denote moral or spiritual qualities, e.g. we would not say, 'The Church is righteousness and peace and joy,' etc. . . . the word ἐκκλησία of an event. It is properly . . . denoting the people of God. Even when it is spoken of ideally or as a . . . fundamental meaning is still that of God's folk.* . . . of God' is then a very much wider conception than 'Church.' Where the two occur side by side (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), the 'kingdom' appears as the future and heavenly counterpart of the Church. The 'bindings' and 'loosings' of the latter . . . in the former; cf. the words 'on earth' . . . (=kingdom), ib. 19 18<sup>18</sup>, cf. Jn 20<sup>23</sup>.

II. THE ACTUAL CHURCH is the society of . . . of it.

The necessary qualifications for membership were repentance of former sins and submission to baptism in the name of Jesus Christ (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>), which carried with it the demand of faith in Christ. The privileges of membership acquired at baptism were: (1) The Christian became reconciled with God through . . . to himself Christ's satisfaction for sin (Ro 5 6-7, Col 1<sup>21-22</sup>). His past life of sin no longer stood against him in his account with God. He was justified. (2) He was sanctified, and henceforth was called 'holy' (ἅγιος), because he belonged to God by the consecration of baptism (1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>). (3) He received the gift of the Holy Ghost* (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>) as a supernatural power within him. (4) He was admitted to the common life and sacraments of the Christian brotherhood. On his part, in turn, he was bound, so far as he could, to live up to the high standard of that life, 'to put on the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth' (Eph 4<sup>24</sup>).

(B) The Life of the Church.—The new life, to which the convert was introduced by his baptism, was the practical expression of the relation in which he stood to God as a member of His 'people.' His life was henceforth given up to the service of God. And that service was the worship of God in the public . . . of worship and in the holiness of his . . . So we may consider the life of the Church under these two aspects: (1) the public worship, (2) the Christian conduct.

* He 12<sup>28</sup> πανήγυρις καὶ ἐκκλησία πνευματικὴ is not to the point as an instance of a distinctively Christian usage of ἐκκλησία. It is plain from the connexion with πανήγυρις that ἐκκλησία is used here in a quite general meaning, 'assembly,' without reference to its technical Christian significance.

i. The Public Worship.

This subject divides itself into two branches: (1) Occasional ceremonies. These were the rites of baptism and ordination. We . . . special forms of service in connexion . . . or burial. (2) Ordinary services. These were also of two kinds: (a) a public (i.e. not confined to Christians) service, which was of a didactic ('edification,' 1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>) and missionary character; (b) the 'breaking of the bread,' a private (i.e. confined to Christians) act of worship.

(1) Occasional Ceremonies.—(a) Baptism was the rite by which the convert was formally admitted as a member of the Church (Ac 2<sup>41-42</sup>). It was therefore (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>) to be administered to every Christian without exception. St. Paul always takes it for granted that his hearers have been baptized (e.g. Ac 19<sup>3</sup>, Rv 6<sup>9</sup>, Col 2<sup>11-12</sup>). It is indeed regarded as necessary for salvation that a man should have undergone this ceremony (Jn 3<sup>5</sup>), which saves the Christian as the ark saved Noah (1 P 3<sup>20-21</sup>). At the same time, it is never regarded as a merely mechanical means of salvation, but is contrasted with circumcision by its spiritual significance (Col 2<sup>11-12</sup>), and the subjective element (i.e. faith and a good conscience) is insisted upon as the necessary accompaniment of the ceremonial act, if the receiver would obtain its advantages (1 P 3<sup>21</sup>). The ritual of baptism consisted of an immersion of the baptized person in water (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, Ac 8<sup>38</sup>). The baptizer accompanied the act with the formula 'in the name of Jesus Christ' (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>48</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>, cf. Ja 2<sup>7</sup>), or more fully 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Didache 7). No limitations are expressly mentioned in NT which forbid us to suppose that the right to baptize did not belong to every Christian, but as a matter of fact we find no instances of persons baptizing except those with some sort of recognized position of authority. Our Lord (Jn 4<sup>2</sup>) and the apostles (Ac 10<sup>48</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>) generally avoided baptizing in . . . the duty to helpers and assist.

(b) Ordination.—Every Christian had a charisma (=gift, talent), the nature and degree of which determined his position and duties in the community. But while the charisma in most cases is considered as coming direct from the Holy Ghost to the individual at the time of or after his baptism, without any further human agency, in some instances a charisma was bestowed through the 'laying on of hands.' The 'laying on of hands' in OT was the symbolic act of conveying a gift (as in blessing Gn 48<sup>14</sup>, appointing 1 Co 12<sup>28-29</sup>) or a curse (as the scapegoat Lv 16<sup>7</sup>). In the case of our Lord the 'laying on of hands' was especially attached to the miracles of healing (e.g. Mt 9<sup>18</sup>, Mk 5<sup>23</sup> etc.), and He left to His disciples the power of healing through the same act (Mk 16<sup>18</sup>). In the apostolic age it is also found in connexion with healing (Ac 9<sup>12-17</sup> 28<sup>3</sup>). It thus had the significance of a miraculous power. In the passages where it is mentioned as an accompanying or supplementary ceremony to baptism, the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost attends its employment (cf. Ac 8<sup>18</sup> δῶδ, i.e. the 'laying on of hands' is the instrument by which the Holy Ghost was given in this instance), and is contrasted with the ordinary gift of the Holy Ghost through baptism. So, too, when a man was to be 'set apart' for a particular work, he receives a special 'gift' for its performance through the 'laying on of hands.' This is especially mentioned of the Seven (Ac 6<sup>6</sup>), the mission of Barnabas and Saul (Ac 13<sup>3</sup>), and the work of Timothy at Ephesus (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>), and it appears in the Pastoral Epp. as the regular form of ordaining a bishop or deacon (1 Ti 5<sup>22</sup>). It was accom-

(2) The Regular Worship.—We turn now to the regular services of the early Christian Church. At the first the community met for the purpose of worship daily (Ac 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>46</sup>), and we find no intimation or allusion that any day was marked with more solemnity than the others. But at a later period the 'first day of the week' is singled out from the rest and observed with especial honour. The first occasion on which we meet with this is in 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup> 'upon the first day of the week let each one of you lay by him in store' his contribution to the collection. Then Ac 20<sup>7</sup> we notice the disciples of Troas gathered together on the first day of the week to break bread. By themselves these two instances could not be pressed. But in Rev 1<sup>10</sup> there is a mention of 'the Lord's day,' τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ, which appears as κυριακὴ κυρίου in the Didache 14<sup>2</sup>, and as κυριακὴ simply in Ignatius (ad Mag. ix. 1). These all hang together with the fact recorded by all the evangelists that on the first day of the week Christ rose from the dead (Mt 28<sup>1</sup>, Mk 16<sup>2</sup>, Lk 24<sup>1</sup>, Jn 20<sup>1</sup>). The resurrection of Christ was the foundation of Christian hope (1 Co 15<sup>17-19</sup>), and therefore the day of the resurrection was par excellence the Lord's day (see Ignatius, loc. cit., Ep. Barn. 15), and when it became impracticable for the 'breaking of the bread' to be celebrated daily, it was celebrated with special solemnity on this day (Did. 14<sup>2</sup>; Pliny, Epp. x. 97, 'convenire'). To what precise date this practice goes back in Christian history we cannot say. St. Paul (Ro 14<sup>5</sup>) speaks of those who esteem one day above another, and those who esteem every day alike, but he is here probably referring to the Jewish Sabbath. The Jewish Christians themselves observed the Sabbath, and some attempted to force its observance upon the Gentiles (Gal 4<sup>10</sup>, Col 2<sup>16</sup>). But the Sabbath and method of its observance are especially distinguished from the Lord's day [cf. Ign. loc. cit. 'no longer sabbatizing' but living according to the Lord's day, ib. 1 p. Barn. loc. cit. Sabbaths are not pleasing to God, 'therefore we observe the eighth day for rejoicing']. On the early history of the Christian Sunday, see esp. T. Zahn, Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche, cap. vi.

Of the existence of yearly festivals we have no intimation at all in NT. The Jewish Christians still observed the Jewish feasts (Ac 2<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>). There is no allusion in 1 Co 5<sup>7-8</sup> ('Our passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ, wherefore let us keep the feast,' etc.) to the observance of Easter. The context shows that the apostle is not speaking literally. The starting-point of his theme is the comparison of the Church to a 'new lump' from which the old leaven has been purged out. 'We, too,' he says, 'as well as the Jews, have a Passover lamb; therefore let us keep the feast . . . with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.' His imagery is borrowed from the distinctively Jewish passover, but the lesson drawn applies to the whole Christian life, not to any special occasion—τοῦ ἀγῶνος is rather 'keep festival' than 'keep the feast.' It is noticeable, however, that in the later Paschal controversy both parties referred to apostolic usage (see Eus. HE v. 23, 24), in view of which we are not justified in drawing an argument from silence against the apostolic foundation of the Easter festival, and the exact date of its institution must be left an open question.

In 1 Co we find that St. Paul presents to us a picture of two kinds of Christian worship. In ch. 14 is described a meeting whose chief aim is mutual edification; in 11<sup>17-34</sup> one of a very different character and ceremonial, the purpose of which is to 'eat the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον). In the same way two kinds of religious observance are distinguished in the account of the primitive Church (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>), 'the breaking of bread and the prayers.' It is not quite certain whether ταῖς προσευχαῖς here refers to the public prayers in the temple which the Christians attended (e.g. 3<sup>1</sup>), or to the prayers of the community; but as the writer is . . . the salient elements distinctive of the . . . life, the latter has a slight balance in its favour. In any case there is abundant evidence (e.g. Ac 1<sup>14</sup> 24<sup>46</sup>, 47 4<sup>31</sup> etc.) that the Christians at this time held assemblies for worship distinct from the . . . ad.'

Christian worship was not held to take the place of the temple services, which were attended with scrupulous regularity (Ac 3<sup>1</sup>). Neither—and this, of course, refers not only to the first days of Christianity—did it take the place of individual private prayer (cf. Ac 10<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>22</sup>, Eph 6<sup>18</sup>, Ph 1<sup>4</sup>).

(a) The public service.—The purpose of this service was before all things edification, and this not only for those who were already believers, but also for unbelievers. It had, then, a missionary aspect, and for this purpose was made as public and open as possible. At Jerus. it took place especially in the temple as long as this was permitted (Ac 2<sup>46</sup> 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>), or in some public place (Ac 2<sup>4</sup>, cf. 6<sup>1</sup>). Unbelievers were welcome to attend and listen (1 Co 14<sup>23</sup>). Every Christian had received the Holy Ghost and a 'gift' as the 'manifestation of the Spirit' within him (see 1 Co 12<sup>7-10</sup>). Whatever was the gift he possessed, he was bound to put it at the service of the community and use it in harmonious working with the whole (ib. 12<sup>25</sup>). But if we look through the lists of gifts in Ro 12<sup>2-6</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>28-31</sup> we see that there are some (e.g. miracles, healings) which would not qualify the possessor to contribute to the worship of the community. So we find a distinction drawn in 1 P 4<sup>10-11</sup> between the gifts of speaking and the gifts of ministering (διακονεῖν = contributing by personal help or offerings to the common support). To the former it fell to take part in the public worship. St. Paul mentions (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>) as constituent elements of this service 'a psalm,' 'a teaching,' 'a revelation,' 'a tongue,' 'an interpretation.' The division is not a rigid one: a 'psalm' might be also a 'tongue' (cf. ib. 15<sup>1</sup>). Nor is the enumeration exhaustive; prayer is not included, though it formed an integral part of the service (cf. 11<sup>4</sup>). We may then, perhaps, divide as follows: (a) teaching, (β) prayer, (γ) praise.

(α) Teaching.—We are only considering here the place occupied by teaching in the services. We must treat later of the wider question of teaching in general. A discourse formed part of the service in the Jewish synagogue where it was connected with the reading of an appointed portion of the OT Scriptures (Lk 4<sup>16-20</sup>, Ac 13<sup>15</sup>; see Vitrings, de Syn. Vet. Bk. iii. pt. I. c. 5, pt. II. c. 12; Schurer, HJP. § 27). We have several instances of discourses in the Christian services (e.g. Ac 20<sup>7-12</sup>), and there is no doubt the 'teaching' in these assemblies took the form of one or more discourses. But the question of public reading is not quite so obvious. It is, however, on a priori grounds quite probable in itself, and is supported by certain supposed allusions in NT. Thus Timothy is told (1 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>) to 'give heed to reading, to exhortation, and to teaching,' and the writer of the Apoc. alludes to the arrangements for the public reading of his book (Rev 18, cf. Col 4<sup>16</sup>). Somewhat later there arose a separate office called that of the 'reader,' whose duty it was to read in the public services (see Harjack, Die sog. apost. Kirchenordnung, 'Texte u. Unt.' Bd ii. Hft. 5).

(β) Prayer was made standing (Mk 11<sup>23</sup>) or kneeling (Ac 20<sup>36</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>) with uplifted hands (1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). Even if the words of the prayer were uttered by one person only, the prayer was regarded as that of the whole congregation. Thus in Ac 14<sup>23</sup> the prayer is given in the plural, but is ascribed to the whole assembly ἐκκλησία. We must not press this too literally, as it actually spoke in the words given. It may

St Paul gives us a picture of this act of worship as it was celebrated in Corinth at the time, which we may infer from other hints in NT. A discourse preceded it (1 Co 14:17), and it is clear that this was not the case in Corinth, for the apostle complains that each one, as he arrived, brought with him the food he had brought with him, without waiting for the rest (1 Co 11:21-23). During the meal came the formal 'breaking of bread' (cf. 1 Co 10:16), probably with a prayer of thanks (cf. εὐχαριστίας in the accounts of the institution by Christ, and the prayer of thanks in the Did. 9<sup>2</sup>). All present then partook of the bread (1 Co 10:16). Then perhaps after the meal (cf. 1 Co 10:16), wine (this is more probable, as water was used, cf. Mt 26:29, 1 Co 10:16), and all drank from it (11:26). The prayers of thanks (εὐχαριστίας) by which the bread and wine were consecrated probably varied with the occasion. In the Didache (ch. 9) formal prayers are prescribed, but the prophets present are allowed to 'give thanks' (εὐχαριστίας) in words of their own choice (ὡς ἂν βούληται), 10<sup>8</sup>. There is some doubt as to whether the bread or the wine came first in the order of service. In Lk 12:13 (WH), 1 Co 10:16, Did. 9, the blessing of the cup is placed before that of the bread. In all other places, however, the cup follows the bread, and this has always been the traditional order in the Christian Church.

ii. The Christian Rule of Conduct.

(1) The Christian in his Private Life.—By baptism the Christian died to the world, and so the negative, prohibitive, sphere of law had no longer any meaning for him (Ro 6:3, Col 3:8-12, cf. Gal 2:19-5:24). His life was consecrated to Christ (Ro 12:1-2), who is its goal (Ro 14:8, Ph 1:21), its example (Ph 2:5, 1 P 2:21-24), and the source of its spiritual strength (Jn 6:48, 2 Co 12:9, Eph 4:16). His body is the sacred temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6:19), a member of Christ (ib. 12), and therefore personal holiness and purity are his natural condition. The near expectation of the second coming of Christ led to two practical results: (a) a holy enthusiasm which buoyed him up under every trial with the consciousness that the present evils were only transitory (Ro 8:18-23, 2 Co 12:5-7, Eph 1:4-6), and would be succeeded by a glorious future (Ro 6:8, 1 Co 15:53, Col 3:3). Death itself is welcomed as a quicker realization of this (Ph 1:21). (b) A severe and stern discipline of self. Men waited in hourly expectation of Christ's appearance (1 Th 5:2, 1 Jn 2:18). It was then no time to give oneself up to feasting. Even marriage and family cares are regarded as competition against the service of the Lord, which should absorb every thought and feeling (1 Co 7:34-35). The Christian must be ever on his guard, watchful and vigilant, fasting (cf. Ac 13:14-15, Did. 7:4-8), ever in arms against temptation (1 Th 5:8, Eph 6:10-17), and pray without ceasing (1 Th 5:17). His mind is set on things above, not on things that are upon the earth (Col 3). But as he is on the earth he has to perform his human duties and to bring into all his relations with fellow-men principles in accord with this high and ideal life.

(2) The Christian and his Fellow-Christians.—The central principle of Christian ethics is love, the practical expression of faith, πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη (Gal 5:6). Faith without works is dead, says St. James (2:26), and St. Paul is at one with him, for above faith he puts love (1 Co 13:13, cf. ib. 2), and love does not exist apart from works of love (cf. 1 Jn 3:18). Love is the 'end of the charge' (1 Ti 1:5), the bond of perfection (Col 3:14). And this love was chiefly exercised towards the fellow-Christian (Gal 6:10). The name of 'the brethren,' by which the Christians denoted their fellow-believers, was especially significant. It implies descent from a common ancestor, membership in the same family, and was used among the Jews to denote their fellow-countrymen, the 'sons of Israel' (e.g. Ex 2:11, Dt 18:15, Ac 2:37-38). So when applied by Christians to one another it introduced the idea of a tie as strong as that of blood relationship binding them to one another. The love of the brethren (φιλὰδελφία, He 13:1) manifests itself in a spirit of humility, gentleness, and kindness to all (Gal 5:22 etc.), in obedience and gratitude towards the workers and rulers in the Church (1 Co 16:16, 1 Th 5:12, He 13:17), forbearance of the stronger towards the weaker (Ro 15:1, 1 Co 10:33, 1 Th 5:14), charity to the poor (Ro 12:8, 1 Ti 6:18, He 13:16, 1 Jn 3:17), compassion and help to the suffering and helpless (He 13:3, Ja 1:27), and hospitality to all who need it (Ro 12:13, 1 Ti 5:10, He 13:2, 1 P 4:9). By the strength of this Christian love is realized the truth of the gospel, that all outward distinctions of rank, nation, and sex are abolished in the common participation of membership in Christ (Gal 3:28, Col 3:11). At the same time, it is important to remember that even within the Christian community concrete social reforms were not aimed at, except so far as was demanded by the new morality. In the expectation of the second coming, social and political questions were matters of secondary importance. The general principle of St. Paul was that a man should stay in the position in which the 'call' of God was received (1 Co 7:18), and work truly and honestly in that position (1 Th 4:11, 2 Th 3:10-12) until the Lord came. So the relations of rich and poor still remain, but are softened by the duty of charity; slavery is not abolished (Eph 6:5-9, Col 3:22-4:1, 1 Ti 6:2, Philem), but its sting withdrawn by the proclamation of brotherly equality; the current view of woman's position was accepted (1 Co 11:3-7, 1 Ti 2:11-12), but toned down by the same truth (cf. 1 P 3:7). In regard to marriage, indeed, new principles were introduced which the laxity of heathen and even Jewish views made necessary on moral grounds. St. Paul (1 Co 7) in view of the second coming discourages the unmarried from seeking marriage in accordance with his general principle, 'each man wherein he was called, therein abide with God' (v. 24). But he condemns those who would forbid marriage on ascetic grounds (1 Ti 4:3; cf. the same teaching in He 13:2), and sanctifies the relation of man and wife by comparing it with that of Christ and His Church (Eph 5:22). The reform which Christ introduced was the sacred inviolability of marriage, which He gave to the marriage bond by forbidding divorce (Mt 19:9, 1 Co 7:39). The question of remarriage, after the death of one party, is somewhat doubtful. The injunction as to bishops and deacons (1 Ti 3:2-12, Tit 1) that they should be the husbands of one wife, and to widows (1 Ti 5:9) that they should have had one husband, were interpreted in the 2nd cent. as prohibitions against a second marriage. But this remarriage is recommended in the case of younger widows (1 Ti 5:14, cf. 1 Co 7:39), which leaves the question doubtful. On the other hand, it is very unlikely that the apostle would speak in such moderate language if he were referring to remarriage. The natural result of this nobler conception of marriage was to quicken the sense of mutual affection between husband and wife, parent and child (Eph 5:22-6:4, Col 3:18-21 etc.), and to establish those beautiful family relations which distinguish the Christian home.

The chief difficulty in the way of mutual intercourse within the Church was the traditional exclusiveness which the Jewish Christian brought with him into the Church. The exact relation of Jew and Gentile Christians was one of the most perplexing problems of the apostolic age. St. Paul held with regard to his own relation to the law that, in the abstract, belief in Christ made him free (e.g. he says of himself, 'not being myself under [the principle of] law,' 1 Co 9<sup>20</sup>). But he rated far above this abstract claim to freedom, the love which he owed to his 'brethren in the flesh,' and so to the Jew he was as a Jew, and observed the commands of the law (e.g. Gal 2:14-2:21, 28:17), although he recognized that a man could be saved, not by the works of the law, but only by faith; cf. Gal 2:16. As regards the Gentile, however, the apostle of the 'freedom' for the freedom which he thought the Jew should be free from claiming. His position, that the Gentile should be free from circumcision and the law, was confirmed by the conference at Jerus., and at the same time the further question of daily intercourse between Jew and Gentile was also settled. It was assumed, as a matter of course, that the two should mix freely and without restraint; but to lessen the offence which this intercourse would give to Jewish instincts, the Gentile was required to abstain from things offered to idols, from blood, and from things strangled. (These prohibitions were possibly conceived as 'concrete indications of a pure and true religion,' and only indirectly as concessions to Judaism as they were specially revered by Jews.) Thus was the way prepared for those communities in which Jew and Gentile converts were to be found together. It is too much to assume from Ja 2<sup>2</sup> that in such communities the Jews had their separate 'synagogue,' and lived apart. The author is writing from the standpoint of things as they were in his own church, i.e. where the community included only Jews who had formed themselves into a synagogue congregation. The incidents related in Gal 2:11-14 presuppose a close and daily intercourse (especially in the way of meals) between the Jewish and Gentile communities. If St. Paul condemned so strongly in this instance a reaction to the exclusiveness from which a break had been made, it is certain that he would not have encouraged the establishment of separate congregations. We are therefore like the apostle, and even St. Peter himself (cf. Ac 10:48 11:3), did not refuse to mix with the Gentiles, even if to some extent the two did fall into separate congregations. And intercourse of any kind implied a principle of love (1 Co 8:1), that he might give no cause of stumbling to Jews. And there were grades between the pure Jew and the pure Gentile. The 'proselyte of the gate,' on becoming a Christian naturally felt an instinctive sense of obligation towards the whole or parts of the law. St. Paul has in his mind, not only Jews, but the class of εὐσεβέων in Ro 14<sup>5</sup>. And Ro 14:2, 1 Co 8:1-8 10:23-33 must be understood generally without exclusive reference to Jew or proselyte.

In the mixture of religions from which Christianity drew converts, there were many scruples, serious enough to those in whom they were ingrained from childhood, but which might draw a smile of contempt from the man of 'knowledge.' St. Paul's respect and forbearance towards them, is essential (see Ro 14:15-17, 1 Co 8:13).

(3) The Christian and the World.—The earliest persecutions proceeded, not from the Romans, but from the Jews, either publicly, where they were allowed a measure of local authority (e.g. Ac 4:1-22 5:17-9:1, 2 Co 11:24), or in the way of private maltreatment. The Jews succeeded in some instances in raising Gentile mobs against their enemies (e.g. Ac 9:29, 13:50 14:7). On rarer occasions the hatred of the Gentiles was aroused by personal losses occasioned through Christian teaching (Ac 16:19-20, 19:24-25). But the Roman government and its responsible representatives neither originated nor supported these persecutions. Its attitude was one of indifference (e.g. Gal 6:10 in Ac 18:17) or active protection (cf. Pilate's attitude Mt 27:18-24, the authorities at Thessalonica Ac 17<sup>9</sup>, Ephesus 19:35, Jerus. 21:22 23:17). The Jewish accusation, that the Christians were rebelling against the Romans and setting up another king, was never regarded seriously by the government (cf. Lk 23:3, Jn 18:38, Ac 17). On occasions of tumult, indeed, Christians were apprehended as the apparent causes of disturbance, and treated with the rough-and-ready method of Roman provincial justice (Ac 16:22-23); but this was a universal practice, and not confined to Christians. The period of official persecution did not begin till Nero opened it in 64. So the Church looked to the Roman government as a protector rather than a persecutor (cf. 2 Th 27). Those especially who were fortunate enough to possess the Roman citizenship found it a great safeguard against injustice (Ac 16:37 22:25 25:11). These facts prepare us for the attitude of favour observed by Christian teachers towards the civil authorities, although they do not wholly account for it, since the principles upon which civil obedience is enjoined are independent of personal like or dislike. 'The powers that be are ordained of God,' says St. Paul (Ro 13<sup>1</sup>). The Christians are exhorted to obey and respect them as the representatives of divine justice (Ro 13:1-6, Tit 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2:13-17), to pray for them (1 Ti 2<sup>2</sup>), to pay them tribute as their due (Lk 20:25, Ro 13:6-7).

From Pliny's letter to Trajan (Epp. x. 96) we find that the government regarded the Christian communities as clubs (hetaeriae), and the Christians acquiesced in this official definition of their position.

As regards the social and industrial world around them, the Christians did not cut themselves off from their former ties to a greater extent than was necessary. The regulation of St. Paul was, that each should remain as he was until the Lord came. So the believing husband or wife is not to leave an unbelieving spouse (1 Co 7:12, cf. 1 P 3<sup>1</sup>). If the unbeliever depart, the believer is, however, not under bondage to follow. But this applies only to marriages contracted before the conversion of the one party. When this is not the case the believer is enjoined not to marry with an unbeliever (1 Co 7:39 'she is free to marry whom she will only in the Lord,' i.e. a Christian husband, cf. 2 Co 6:14). On the same grounds the slave is advised not to seek his freedom (1 Co 7:21), but to do his duty to an unbelieving master as to a believer. We hear of Christians, too, carrying on their former professions, e.g. physician (Col 4:14), tentmakers (Ac 18:3), soldiers (Ac 10:1, Ph 13), public officers (Ac 16:33, Ro 16:28), purple dyers (Ac 16:34), lawyer (Tit 3:13), and as traders generally (Ja 4:13).

A difficult question was the extent to which a Christian should join in heathen social gatherings. There was a danger in so doing, not only because of the actual immorality connected with them (1 P 4:3-4), but also on the grounds of the ordinances against eating meat sacrificed to idols. St. Paul does not wish to cut his congregations entirely off from their former connexions (e.g. 1 Co 5:10). He does not forbid them to accept an invitation to dine with a heathen (1 Co 10:27), but leaves it to the individual judgment, 'if ye are disposed.' In regard to the scruple against εἰδωλόθυτα, he recommends the Christian to eat what is given without question; but if the fact be forced upon him that it is an εἰδωλόθυτον, he is to refrain for the sake of conscience and example (1 Co 10:28-30). We find that some of the advanced liberal party at Corinth even attended the feasts in heathen temples. Thus St. Paul forbids, not only as 'sinning against the brethren and the church,' but also, 'when it is weak' (1 Co 8:12), but also, 'that, in the interpretation put upon it, it is really an act of idolatry' (ib. 10:15). At a later period it was made a ground of complaint against the Christian that he held aloof from social gatherings (1 P 4).

In his contact with unbelievers the Christian had to remember that the law of love extends to all men, although it found a greater outlet for its expression in the relation of Christian to Christian (Mt 5:44-48, Ro 12:20, Tit 3<sup>2</sup>). The same principles of honesty and charity were, accordingly, to be observed also towards 'them which are without' (Ro 12:17, Gal 6:10, Col 4:5, Ph 4:5, 1 Th 3:12 4:12), even towards the persecutor (Ro 12:14), that thus the believers, by their life and conduct, might appeal to and touch the best conscience of the heathen world (1 Ti 3:1, 1 P 2:12).

(C) The single Community.—The first centre of the Christian community immediately after the ascension of Christ was the upper room in a house. Hither they returned immediately after parting from Christ to wait 'steadfastly in prayer' for the coming of the promised Holy Ghost (Ac 1:13-15). Thus the Christian community was in its origin a house-congregation; and when it outgrew the limits of a single house, it did not form a 'synagogue' (such as those, e.g., in Ac 6<sup>9</sup>), but spread as a number of house-congregations (cf. κατ οἶκον, ib. 2<sup>46</sup> 5<sup>42</sup>). For their general assemblies and their missionary preaching the disciples were able to meet in the temple or its precincts (5<sup>12</sup> 20, 43), but for their private worship they were divided into groups, the centre of each being the household of a convert, who was able and willing to provide the necessary accommodation in his house. Thus the Church presented the aspect of a number of households. The same principle of division into households in other places besides Jerus., as Christianity spread farther. It appears, e.g., at Thessalonica (Ac 17<sup>7</sup>), Troas (20<sup>8</sup>), Ephesus (20<sup>20</sup>), Corinth (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), Colossae (Philem 2), Laodicea (Col 4<sup>15</sup>), and in Rome (assuming that Ro 16<sup>5-16</sup> is an integral part of the Epistle: see vv. 5, 14, 15 τοὺς σὺν αὐτοῖς ἀδελφοὺς). These house-congregations also bear the name of ἐκκλησία (e.g. Ro 16<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>, Col 4<sup>15</sup>, Philem 2). The condition of the household in ancient society favoured this feature. The master of the house was its lord, and his conversion was generally followed by that of his family and domestic staff (e.g. Ac 10<sup>24</sup>, 48 16<sup>33</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>16</sup>). In this way the nucleus was at once formed for a church, and it is doubtless isolated converts who were brought to the church in the house of a wealthier convert. The only passage in NT which seems to imply the existence of a church, i.e. a building set apart for purposes of worship, is Ja 2<sup>2</sup> 'if there come into your synagogue, etc. In this passage we have a picture of a Christian place of worship, with seats of honour like the προτοκαθεδραὶ in Jewish synagogues. Apparently, then, by the time this Ep. was written, the Jewish Christians of Jerus. (for the writer speaks from the standpoint of the conditions in his own church) had formed themselves into a synagogue and built a place of meeting (cf. Ac 6<sup>12</sup>). The 'school of Tyrannus,' in which St. Paul taught at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>9</sup>), was, however, not of this kind. It did not supersede the house-congregations (20<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), but was used, as the context shows (v. 10), for the missionary preaching, which had hitherto taken place in the Jewish synagogues.

The city-church was composed of a number of these house-churches, and it grew by the addition of new congregations. The first household which had received the apostle generally became the centre of these smaller groups. To its members, the first-fruits (ἀπαρχή) of the city, a special respect was due (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>, 16). It had been the home of the apostle during his visit, and, in consequence, the centre of guidance and direction. In some cases the prominence of some other member caused the centre of the community to shift from the original household; e.g. the house of Mary, the mother of Mark, was at first the centre of church life in Jerus. (Ac 12<sup>12</sup>), but later (Ac 21<sup>18</sup>) James' house appears as the official place of meeting. The whole community met together on occasions of necessity either at this central house or some other convenient place (e.g. Ac 15<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>4</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>17</sup>, Col 4<sup>16</sup>). Thus, apparently, Gaius received the community in his house when they assembled to meet their apostle and founder (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>). The same community met on occasions for common worship (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>), though their numbers do not allow us to suppose that this could always have been the case. For the purpose of worship the house must have been the unit. But for the purpose of direction and administration the unit was not the house, but the city-congregation (cf. Ac 11<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>28</sup>). So the apostle directs his letters to the church of the city, e.g. at Corinth (1 Co 1<sup>1-2</sup>), because the city-church and not the house-church was the primary unit in the regulation of affairs.

The Organization of the Community.—The writer of Ac sums up the distinctive elements of the new Christian life in the words (2<sup>42</sup>) προσκατεροῦντες τῇ διδασκῇ τῶν ἀποστόλων καὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ, τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου καὶ ταῖς προσευχαῖς (VH), 'abiding in the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, in the breaking of the bread and the prayers.' The words go by pairs, the 'breaking of the bread' and 'the prayers' making up the common worship of the community, while the 'teaching' and the 'fellowship' cover the ground of their common life. No community can exist without organization, least of all a community in which are combined a religion and a common life. But before passing on to ask what was the nature of this organization, we must first see what was the work to be done. This will be found to group itself under four main heads: (1) The instruction of converts, (2) the collection and administration of the common funds, (3) general administration and direction, (4) discipline.

(1) Instruction.—When we remember how slowly the disciples assimilated the teaching of their Master, and what patient and careful labour it needed to perfect their faith, we shall realize the work which was involved in the instruction of new converts when the numbers of the Church were counted by thousands. And if this is true with regard to Jews, how much greater must have been the labour when the community included pure Gentiles, who had scarcely any knowledge of Jewish law and custom, and lacked the sound foundation of Jewish religious life. The labour of 'watering' was not less than the labour of 'planting'. The instruction cannot have been confined to the apostles or to the services, or the teaching of the apostle in person or by letter. Such a knowledge of the OT as St. Paul presupposes in Gentile converts (e.g. Ro 7<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>16</sup>) must have been the fruit of long and systematic teaching. The main work of men like Aquila and Apollos. There was a special 'gift' of 'teaching,' and a special class of men in the Christian Church who were called 'teachers' from the exercise of this gift. Of the content of this teaching we can only say on a priori which has been necessary for Gentiles to understand the very frequent allusions to the OT in the Epistles. The Ep. of 1 Co 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 16<sup>15</sup> 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>16</sup>. This last passage shows how the doctrinal and hortatory elements are inextricably interwoven with instruction in a narrow sense. The same doctrinal truths are drawn as their consequences (cf. the Ep. Eph 4<sup>17</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>).

The instruction proceeded on the Jewish method of repeated oral teaching (cf. the word κατηχήσας, Lk 14, Ac 18<sup>25</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>19</sup>, Gal 6<sup>6</sup>). In NT a convert was baptized as soon as he declared his belief in Christ (Ac 24 and often), but later the practice arose of deferring baptism until the convert had been instructed in the rudiments of the faith, and during this period he was called a 'catechumen' (κατηχούμενος). The content of the teaching had for its kernel first and foremost sayings of the Lord (cf. the words ῥήματα τοῦ κυρίου, 1 Th 5<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>), which were added to the doctrinal truths. So there arose gradually a fixed body of sayings, which were added to the doctrinal truths. The frequent frequency of such expressions in the Pastoral Epistles illustrates the more stereotyped form which this teaching assumed when death and imprisonment were removing the apostles from personal contact with their churches. The frequent recurrence of isolated dicta with the introduction κύριος λέγει (1 Th 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>11</sup>, Tit 3<sup>9</sup>), shows that such sayings were highly valued and carefully preserved. Finally, after the death of the apostles we have a specimen of the way in which their teachings were collected, in a work which has been preserved to us under the title 'The Teaching of the Lord through the Twelve Apostles' (Did. 11).

(2) The Management of Common Funds.—(a) Sources of the common revenue.—In the early days of enthusiasm almost nothing but the offerings of all private persons would have sufficed for the needs of the community. These offerings had to be collected and had the money at the apostles' feet as a contribution to the common fund. This condition of things was, however, the result of purely voluntary action in each individual case, and is not to be confused with a compulsory community of goods. It was probably not universal; thus, e.g., we find the other of Mark in possession of a private house and many alms-deeds—all her property.

the church (e.g. 1 Co 11:24, Eph 6:9, Col 4:1, 1 Ti 6:17, voluntary (e.g. 4:35), but ecclesiastical and organized instead of being voluntary and spontaneous. The sole source of the Church's revenue remained always the voluntary offerings of the congregation. Under the head of such offerings must include the Agapæ (implied), the food, the furnishing of the necessary accessories (e.g. etc.) for the public worship, which was probably undertaken by the owner of the house in which the services were held, the on behalf of the Church towards (cf. 1 Ti 3:2 'given to hospitality,' 5:10 'if she hath used hospitality to strangers, if she hath washed the feet of the saints'), and the practice of private charity (Ac 9:36, 1 Ti 5:16). (b) The expenses.—The money thus offered to the church was used for the support of the poor and the support of the poor generally, and part extraordinary and occasional (e.g. the offerings sent to the poor brethren in Judea, Ac 11:29-30, Ro 15:26-27, 1 Co 16:1-7, 2 Co 8-9, Gal 2:10). Another source of expenses was the support of the ministers of the gospel. The right to live of the gospel (cf. 1 Co 9:1-14, 1 P 5:2). St. Paul remarks that he was an exception in this respect, and resigned (cf. 1 Co 9:17, 2 Co 11:13). He did not receive any help (2 Co 11:9, Ph 4:10). The order is given to receive and lodge the prophet, and send him on his way with food enough to last him until the evening, but not to let him stay in the house. The resident prophets are to receive the burden of the ministry, and not to fall on certain individuals rather than on the whole, and so cause a degree from public funds. To these charges would inevitably be incurred from time to time in the management of affairs. See further on this subject AIMS, COMMUNITY.

(3) General Administration and Direction.—Under this head we must include all such work as the arrangement of times for the services and other common meetings, the ordering of the services, and the management of the thousand and one details involved in the administration of the common affairs. To this class of duties St. Paul would add the task of arbitrating in the case of disputes among brethren (1 Co 6:5) to avoid the scandal of Christian attacking Christian before the public law courts. (4) The Enforcing of Discipline.—To this class of duties St. Paul solemnly committed the power which He Himself possessed (Mt 18:18 etc.) of remitting or retaining sins. These words laid on the Church the duty of enforcing discipline, of pronouncing punishment upon the sinner, or declaring his forgiveness when he repented by confession and by repentance. Punishment was to be pronounced by the Church, and not by the individual. It was, then, a power of authority, but rested upon the guarantee that the decision coincided with the will of God in the matter. The disciplinary power thus belonging to the Church was in practice only exercised against sins which were a public offence to the community. It was only when an act of sinfulness became public, and therefore a scandal to the community, that the Church felt itself called upon to take cognizance of the matter. The searching out of private offences was no part of the common discipline, nor was the confession of private offences required for such offences. Christians are encouraged to confess their sins to one another (Ja 5:16), that they may receive the benefit of others' prayers for their forgiveness (cf. ib. 15, 1 Jn 5:16). From this last passage we see that there are 'sins unto death' which cannot be forgiven (cf. Mk 3:29, Lk 12:10). But above all, the Church was to pardon his sins with God by confession to Him and prayer for pardon (1 Jn 1:9), and the punishment for sin comes direct from heaven (1 Co 13:1), as well as through the Church. Taking cognizance, then, only of these public offences, and pronouncing punishment was administered in proportion to the wrong. The lightest punishment was simple reproof. Thus could he be rebuked by any Christian to a fellow-Christian (Mt 18:15, 1 Th 5:14). It assumed an official form when the rebuke was pronounced by a recognized authority (1 Ti 2:15). In case of obduracy on the part of the sinner, or of more serious faults, the offender might be expelled from the community, and its members forbidden to speak, or eat, or have any communication with him (Ro 16:17, 1 Co 5:11-13, 2 Jn 10). Finally, when the sin was particularly grievous the same sentence of excommunication might be accompanied with the miraculous infliction of a physical punishment (Ac 5:10-11, 1 Co 5:1, 1 Ti 1:20), or with the imprecation of a curse (anathema) on the offender (1 Co 16:22, Gal 1:8). Christ Himself directed that in the case of brother wronging brother the injured person shall (1) reprove the wrong-doer in private;

(2) if that fails, it is to be followed by formal reproof in the presence of witnesses; (3) in case he still refuses to repair the wrong, the matter is to be reported to the Church, by whom the offender is to be excommunicated, 'be to thee as the Gentile and the publican' (3). The punishment is always reformatory. In the case even of the most serious offences (1 Co 5:1-13, 1 Ti 1:20). Their purpose is to bring the offender to repentance.

Gal 6:1, Jude 22-23. During the time that the ban of the community is upon him the offender is not to be regarded as an enemy, but pitied as an erring brother (2 Th 3:15).

Under the four heads of administration of funds, direction, and discipline, we have summarized the work to be done in the government of the community. Now the question arises, In whose hands did this work lie? The problem here is wider than that of the right to take part in the public worship. There the right of speech was limited only by the nature and degree of the 'gift' received by the individual. All did not possess the higher gifts (1 Co 12:29-31) of prophecy and teaching, or even the lower gift of knowledge (ib. 30). Some there were who, without being unbelievers, did not possess the special gifts which fitted a man to take part in the services (the 'unlearned' of 14:23-24, cf. ib. 33, Ja 1:5). He who had not a 'gift' of speaking (1 P 4:10-11) was not called upon to speak. In a case, then, where the number of those qualified to take part in the service was so indefinite, we cannot press the 'each one' of 1 Co 14:23 to mean 'every one.' There were other gifts of ministration (see Ro 12:6-8, 1 Co 12:28, and cf. 1 Co 7:7) besides those of the word; every Christian had received his gift according to the will of the Giver (1 Co 12:7, Eph 4:7), and each exercised it in its proper sphere. But though the number of those qualified to speak in the services was limited, the sphere was quite indefinite as far as human recognition was concerned. How far was this so in regard to teaching and general administration?

At the head of all stand the apostles. This term is not confined to the Twelve. The two are expressly distinguished in 1 Co 15:7 'then to the twelve,' ib. 'then to all the apostles,' and others besides the Twelve are called apostles (Ro 16:7, 1 Co 9:1-6, Gal 1:19). The conditions of apostleship were to have 'seen the Lord' and to have done missionary work (1 Co 9:1-2). The superiority of the apostle's authority rested on this personal contact with Christ (cf. Ac 1:21), and for this reason he was of higher rank than the prophet. He received his authority from the Lord (2 Co 10:13-15). His teaching was irrefutable because it came to him from the Lord (1 Co 11:23, Gal 1:12). The apostles then occupied the first rank in the Church (1 Co 12:28, Eph 4:11). There was no branch of government in which they had not the supreme right to command. In teaching their doctrine is the norm of truth (Gal 1:8-9). They lay down directions in all matters affecting the religious and social life of the community: they pronounce punishment (1 Co 5:5), and forgive 'in the person of Christ' (2 Co 2:7).

Next to the apostles come the prophets, who constitute the second order in the Church (1 Co 12:28, Eph 4:11). We find them, like the apostles, claiming and exercising an authority in every department of church direction, e.g. teaching (Ac 15:32, 1 Co 14:25-31, cf. Didache 11), general direction (Ac 8:29-30, 13:1-3, 1 Ti 1:18-19, cf. Ignatius, ad Philad. 7; Didache 11).

These two classes of Church rulers (apostles, prophets) stand entirely above all others in the sole possession of a divine revelation (ἀποκάλυψις). Their command was more than human, because they spoke not of themselves, but as the direct mouthpieces of the Holy Ghost. To them have been revealed the mysteries of the gospel (cf. Gal 1:12 'the gospel . . . came to me through revelation

We see, in the apostles and prophets rested an authority which was supreme, because it was based on revelation. Here we have the fundamental principle of NT church government, viz. direct divine rule of the Holy Ghost as expressing itself through its human mouthpieces the recipients of revelation. But the question we have now to consider is, To what extent was this principle carried out in practice? Did the apostles and prophets monopolize all the direction of the Church? If we look at the early chapters of Ac, we shall see that this was at first the case. Not only the general supervision, but also the executive work in all its details, falls upon the apostles (Ac. 1. 24<sup>25</sup>, 37<sup>52</sup>). But when the work grew too large for them, a division of labour became necessary, and this led to the appointment of officers called 'the Seven,' whose work was to receive the offerings and attend to the 'daily ministration' of alms to the needy (6<sup>3</sup>). Here we see the delegation of a definite department of administration. While retaining their supremacy, the apostles surrender the actual daily working of this department to a new class of officers, who were not necessarily apostles or prophets, but appointed by popular election (ib. 8. 5). We hear nothing further of this office after the persecution by which one of its holders lost his life, and the rest were driven away from Jerus. (8<sup>4</sup>). When the community is reassembled, the 'presbyters' appear in connexion with the administration of funds (11<sup>30</sup>). This class of persons is mentioned without introduction, and indeed government by elders was so familiar to Jews, that it is highly probable that from the first the 'heads of families' had held a recognized position of influence. Later we find these same persons forming with the apostles a committee of general management with the widest powers. The great question of Gentile circumcision was first threshed out by them (15<sup>2</sup>; v. 12 πάν τὸ πλῆθος does not necessarily imply the whole community), and their decision put before the whole Church for approval (v. 22). Then the general language (πολιτὴν is never used as the name of an officer, but to describe his position and work, cf. Ac 20<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>2</sup>, Jude<sup>12</sup>) shows that he is thinking of functions which were universal, while the persons . . . . . them perhaps bore different names. We find, however, presbyters at Ephesus (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>), whom St. Paul calls ἐπισκόπους, 'overseers' or bishops (v.<sup>28</sup>). The letter to the Philippians, written some years later than the events described in Ac 20, is addressed to 'the saints . . . at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons.' This is the first certain mention of these officers, for ἐπισκόπους in Ac 20<sup>28</sup> has probably only a general sense 'overseers,' and it is by no means certain that διάκονος in Ro 16<sup>1</sup> is used technically (cf. ib. 15<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>), while identifications of the Seven with the deacons, though as early as 2nd cent., are only conjectural (see DEACON). In the Pastoral Epp. (1 Ti 3<sup>1-13</sup>) the bishops and deacons appear as the two local officers. (For the relation of presbyters to bishops, see BISHOP.) We see from these letters that it was the desire of the writer to establish a uniform organization of bishops and deacons (cf. Tit 1<sup>5</sup>), . . . . . as an accomplished fact in the next generation (cf. the Ep. of Clement of Rome to the Cor., esp. chs. 42, 44). Amongst the Jewish Churches we find the presbyteral organization still in force (Ja 5<sup>14</sup>); so, too, in 1 P 5<sup>12</sup>. We see, then, in the local Churches of the apostolic age various stages of organization, tending towards the end of that period to assume a uniform aspect. In the earlier history we find the greatest contrasts in this respect. In the Church of Jerus. we see a highly developed organization with well-marked distinctions of rulers and ruled. But if we turn to the Corinthian Church of the same time, the state of things there presented to us implies organization of a most rudimentary type. In the proud consciousness of 'knowledge' (cf. 1 Co 1<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>28</sup>) the individual member placed too great reliance on his own judgment. The result was a forwardness and independence of action on the part of the individual in his private life and in the meetings for public worship (e.g. 8<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>20-25</sup>), which indicates the absence of firm central control and obedience to authority. The apostle has to teach them that love is better than knowledge or any other gift (8<sup>1</sup> 13), that gifts are to be exercised for the benefit of the whole, each in its place and measure (12<sup>12-27</sup>). We have not, then, to deal with an iron uniformity of local organization, but with a variety of degrees. We can trace in the Pauline Epp. the following stages in the growth of organization. (a) At the outset the idea of ruling does not appear. Earnest believers come forward and, according as their gifts permit them, volunteer their services in the work . . . . . out the necessary arrangements for . . . . . in the way of teaching, collecting, and distributing the public alms, etc. The incentive is not the desire to rule, for as yet no position of command is attached to the work, but a purely disinterested labour of love. They 'set themselves to minister to the saints,' ἐς διακονίαν τοῖς ἁγίοις ἐραζόντες ἑαυτοῖς (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>, cf. Ac 16<sup>15</sup> 40 18<sup>25-26</sup>, 28, Ro 16 passim, Ph 2<sup>30</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>10</sup>). (b) Those who thus volunteered were accepted by the apostle in the first instance. They worked under him in the task of constructing the new community. What would be, then, more natural than that on departing he should leave them in charge with instructions how to carry on the work? We cannot suppose that he went away without leaving anyone to superintend the affairs of the infant Church. Such persons are those to whom he alludes as 'presiding in the Lord,' προϊστάμενοι ἐν Κυρίῳ, 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>, for whom he claims the respect and gratitude due to those who have laboured for the common good. Here we have a status, unofficial indeed, but recognized by the community and the apostle. Compare the position of Stephanas at Corinth (1 Co 16<sup>18</sup>). (c) This position becomes gradually of a more definite and official character. The work of ruling gravitates more exclusively to these presidents, and the appointment becomes more definitely . . . . . as an appointment. In the Churches . . . . . missionary . . . . . a well-marked and definite official . . . . . after the lapse of, at most, a few months from the first . . . . . At Thessalonica (1 Th 5<sup>12-13</sup>) such a . . . . . is perhaps not yet established, but there are persons possessed of a recognized authority to preside and admonish. In Corinth the indefiniteness of authoritative rule, suggested by 1 Co 16<sup>15-16</sup>, is quite supported by the condition of things described in the Epistle, of which we have already spoken. Then in the later Epp. (Phil. and the Pastoral Epp.) we see the gradual tendency to a uniform organization of presbyter-bishops (cf. Ac 20<sup>28</sup> at Ephesus also) and deacons establishing itself in all the Pauline Churches. Later, as we know from the earliest Christian writings, outside NT, which have come down to us, this organization of bishops and deacons became more and more universal. Among Jewish Christians, where previous writers had spoken only of presbyters, e.g. Ja 5<sup>14</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>12</sup> (with perhaps a hint at the name bishop in 2<sup>25</sup>), Rev 4<sup>4</sup>, et saepe, we find in the Didache the Pauline system of bishops and deacons in full exercise (Did. 14<sup>1-2</sup>). Among Gentile Churches Clement of Rome (Ep. ad Cor. 42, 44) represents it to be universal. The single bishop as the centre of all authority in the community appears first at Antioch and in the Asiatic Churches of the Ignatian Epistles.*

* The idea of popular election had become by no means an essential element in the meaning of χριστοῦτος in later Greek. It is still seen in some instances, e.g. 2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>, Jos. Ant. vii. xi. l., but has quite disappeared in many others, e.g. Jos. Ant. vi. xiii. 9, τὸν ἑκαστὸν τοῦ λαοῦ χριστοματούμενος βασιλέα. It is immaterial to our present purpose whether πρεσβυτέρους is here the name of the officers created or of the persons from whom they were chosen, but it would be a singularly abrupt way of speaking to say, 'They appointed elders for them' (i.e. to be rulers), χριστοτόουσεν αὐτοῖς πρεσβυτέρους. In a somewhat similar pass [e.g. Lk. i. 10] κατεστήσαντες κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους, it would be just possible that πρεσβυτέρους represents the class from which selection is made, because κατεστήσαντες (= to set down in a place) had a more technical meaning 'to put into office'; but even here the omission would be strange. With χριστοῦτος, which had a vaguer meaning, 'to appoint,' the omission would be still more remarkable.

† The evangelist was a missionary working on new ground (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>; Eus. Hist. Eccl. 3.1.1) and not concerned with the organization of Churches already established. In 2 Ti 4<sup>4</sup> the word is used in a general (=preacher of the gospel) and not in a special sense. The application to the writers of Gospels is much later.

Over against the authority of these local officers, which did not extend beyond the single community, stands the universal authority of the apostles and prophets, who constitute the foundation of the whole Church (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>), whose sphere of action is not limited to the single Church (cf. Ac 11<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>, Did. 11), though they might settle down for some length of time in one place (e.g. Ac 13<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>10</sup>, Did. 13). What was the practical relation of these two authorities in the actual working of affairs in the community?

It will be useful, first, to compare the two in regard to the method of their appointment. Every Christian possessed one or more 'gifts' of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 7<sup>7</sup>). These gifts were of many kinds, including all the mental, moral, and spiritual endowments of the Christian. Thus we find 'mercy,' 'almsgiving' (Ro 12<sup>8</sup>), 'faith' (Ro 12<sup>8</sup>, 5, 1 Co 12<sup>9</sup>), 'wisdom,' 'knowledge' (1 Co 12<sup>8</sup>). The . . . . . festations of the Spirit in the . . . . . Every one possessing a gift is called to exercise it for the benefit of the community. Every one, therefore, is a minister to the community in his branch of service: 'each one as he has received a gift, ministering it towards one another as good stewards of the manifold grace of God' (1 P 4<sup>10</sup>). According, then, to the ideal of the Christian Church, there would have been no appointed officers, but each Christian would have performed his proper part of the work according to his 'gift' or 'gifts' granted to him. In the same way as the Christian was 'called' by the grace of God to be a believer, so he was 'called' by the gift of God to perform certain functions within the community. Among these gifts was that of 'prophecy.' He who possessed, then, the gift of 'prophecy' was 'called' to be an apostle or prophet. (For distinction of apostle . . . see . . . The apostle's . . . ked . . . his personal contact with the Lo . . . speaks of himself, 'Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God' (1 Co 1<sup>1</sup>). He insists strongly on the direct nature of that call, 'an apostle, not from men, nor through man, but through Jesus Christ and God the Father' (Gal 1<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ac 20<sup>24</sup>, 'the ministry which I received from the Lord Jesus'). These facts show that he does not consider the events of Ac 13<sup>1st</sup>, but those of his conversion, as the occasion of his appointment to the apostolate. The appointment of Mr . . . is not to be taken as . . . In the first place, the appointment was . . . position, i.e. to fill up the number of twelve apostles; secondly, the descent of the Holy Ghost had not yet taken place, and the method of determining by 'charisma' was not yet possible. So the method here adopted (i.e. popular election, followed by the final selection by lot between the two thus chosen) is extraordinary.

* It is not probable that the 'angel' of these Churches in the Apoc (120 21 2 12 18 21 7 14) is meant to be a single episcopus. The messages are given (see the language throughout) directly to the Churches, not through an intermediate representative.

Like the apostle, the prophet was a prophet because he possessed the gift of 'prophecy.' The Holy Spirit divideth 'to each one severally even as he will' (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>). It follows, then, that the prophet, like the apostle, received his appointment by a subjective 'call,' i.e. he exercised his authority without reference to human appointment or permission. St. Paul gives instructions to Timothy about the appointment of bishops and deacons, but says nothing of prophets. The Didache also gives instructions to elect bishops and deacons, but is equally silent as to prophets. Nor is this surprising, for the prophet was not an officer, but the exerciser of a spiritual gift. There could be no more question of electing him than of electing those who should speak with tongues. St. Paul's language in 1 Co 14 (e.g. 24 'if all prophesy,' 27 'if any thinketh himself to be a prophet or spiritual,' 29 'desire earnestly to prophesy') would be perplexing if those only were prophets who were appointed to the office of prophet. It presupposes that the number of prophets is not fixed, but indefinite. But, on the other hand, the 'gift' . . . occasions be regarded as coming through . . .

We find instances in which men were appointed to carry out a special work through a prophecy put in the mouth of others, e.g. Paul and Barnabas, Ac 13<sup>2</sup> (but, as we said above, Paul did not regard this as an appointment to the apostolate); also Timothy (1 Ti 1<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>11</sup>). In the case of the latter the 'gift' is described as coming to him 'through prophecy, with the laying on of hands by the presbytery' (4<sup>14</sup>), or through the laying on of the apostle's hands (2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). We have here a solemn transmission of gifts by the 'laying on of hands' (cf. Ac 8<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>), which illustrates the absence of strict uniformity so characteristic of the first age of the Church. Absolutely fixed rules did not yet exist in either way; but, apparently like the possessor of any other 'gift,' the prophet ordinarily, was neither appointed nor appointed to office, but the bearer of a 'revelation,' of which he was subjectively conscious.

But with the appointment of those who were to manage the daily affairs of the community it was different. The early condition of things in which this work was performed by the chance individual in the voluntary exercise of his gift, led (as in Corinth) to disorder. For the management of external affairs, it was necessary, in the early days, that a few recognized persons should undertake the work. The 'selective' appointment was found to be impracticable and productive of confusion, unless confirmed by an objective recognition. And so, somewhat in the manner described above, the voluntary worker became an officer, since, from the moment that his appointment was determined by the community, or an apostle, or his delegate, organization had begun, and an office was created. The actual machinery of appointment varies considerably in NT. We find a system of popular election in the appointment of the Seven (Ac 6<sup>3</sup>), of Barnabas and Saul to carry alms to Jerusalem (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>), and of the officer-appointed Corinth to take the collection (1 Co 16<sup>7</sup>). Presbyters (bishops) and the apostle (Ac 14<sup>23</sup>) or his delegate (1 Ti 3<sup>1-13</sup> 5<sup>22</sup>, Rom. ad Cor. 42). In the Didache we find a system of popular election for bishops and deacons. . . . with the apostles . . . they have already . . . because they have the necessary 'gifts,' and the will to exercise them (cf. 1 Ti 3<sup>10</sup>, Did. 15<sup>1</sup>). The Seven were especially selected because they were . . . port, full of the Spirit and of wisdom. Those to . . . gives a semi-official position by enjoining the community to pay respect to them, had already shown their ability for the position. Clement of Rome, Ep. ad Cor. 42, says the apostle 'appointed their first-fruits as bishops and deacons after testing them with the Spirit' (ἀρχαίους τῶν πνεύματος) or, in other words, by first making certain that they really possessed the necessary gifts. When he speaks of the . . . st converts to be bishops and deacons as a . . . universal . . . been occasionally true (e.g. Ro 16<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>), but not necessarily universal.

In the significance of the word 'office' we find the keynote of the relation between the prophetic authority and that of the officers in actual practice. Theoretically, the sphere of 'revelation' covered every branch of work; in practice, the actual details of the daily . . . upon the 'officers,' while the sup . . . revelation appeared in occasional direction on great questions (e.g. Ac 13<sup>1st</sup>), or negatively in checking an abuse. Another fact is here brought before us. The apostles and prophets were largely an itinerant order. They belonged to the whole Church, not to any particular Church. Only occasionally did they settle in a particular place for any length of time. It was, then, impossible for them to carry on the daily administration of a Church in all its details. In no case does this come out more clearly than with regard to the collection and distribution of alms. This department was the first to be separated from the original centralization of all work in the hands of the apostles and put into the hands of 'officers.' Later we find it in the hands of 'presbyters' at Jerusalem (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>). In Galatia (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), Achaia (ib., 2 Co 8. 9), Macedonia (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>), the apostle gives general instructions about the collection for the poor brethren of Judaea, but the carrying out is left to local workers. In 1 Ti 3<sup>8-9</sup>, Tit 1<sup>7</sup> the qualification for the office of bishops and deacons, that they should not be 'lovers of money,' 'greedy of filthy lucre,' suggests that dealing with public moneys formed a part of their duties. In Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. 44, they are spoken of as those who 'offer the gifts,' τοὺς . . . προσερχομένους τὰ δῶρα. The management of finance constituted in later times also one of the most important of the bishop's duties.† In the same way as the manage-

* We have here a double . . . as the person who appointed proceeded or . . . or his own discretion. Thus, on the one hand, St. Paul speaks of the presbyters of Ephesus as those 'whom' . . . d bishops'; on the other, he gives . . . as to the . . . of those whom . . . (1 Ti 3. 1-13), and exhorts . . . too great haste in this matter (1 Ti 3. 10), . . . that he has in view a system of appointment by their human discretion, not one in which the proper persons were denoted

i. 73 ft.) assigns to the prophet this and distribution on the strength of Did. 13<sup>3</sup> 'The first-fruits shall be brought to the prophets.' But this passage is treating of the support of prophets and teachers by the community, not of financial . . . It directs that if there are no prophets in the . . . first-fruits are to be given to the poor. And there is no other passage in which the prophets as such appear undertaking these duties. Occasional injunctions given by the prophet as a 'revelation' (e.g. Did. 11<sup>12</sup>) are different from permanent management. Still less is Sohni's case proved from Did. 15<sup>1</sup> χειροτονήσαντες οὐν λαοὺς πιστεύοντας καὶ δίδοντας ἀξίους τοῦ Κυρίου ἀδελφὰς πρεβίς καὶ ἀκισμογύρους καὶ διδομισμαμένους ὑμῖν γὰρ λειτουργήσαν καὶ αὐτοὶ τὸν λειτουργῆσαν τὸν προφητῶν καὶ διδασκάλων. The γὰρ in this passage is most naturally referred back to ἀξίους τοῦ Κυρίου; this is the main thought which πρεβίς, ἀκισμογύρους, and διδομισμαμένους describe more exactly. But if the ment of finance, the daily administration of discipline fell upon the local officers (cf. 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>), as well as all those general duties included in presidency.

The exact division of labour between the 'prophetic' and the local rulers naturally varied with the strength and efficiency of the local organization. In Jerus., where the local organization was very strong, the work of the prophet sinks into the background. There were prophets at Jerus. (cf. Ac 11<sup>27</sup>), and their voice was heard on great occasions (e.g. ib. 15<sup>23</sup> 'it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us'), but the prophets are more prominent in the administration of affairs. In Corinth, where the local organization was lax to a degree, St. Paul finds it necessary to issue commands on the administration of a variety of matters connected with their private life and assemblies for worship, which, in a more organized community, would have been determined by the local officers. Another feature which would affect the relation of prophet and prophet to the local community, is the possibility that, in cases where the prophet was settled in a place, he was also a local ruler, i.e. not quâ prophet, but appointed in the regular way; e.g. Judas and Silas, who were chief men among the brethren (Ac 15<sup>22</sup>), appear also as prophets (ib. 32). In general, the direct rule by revelation appears as initiative in great steps (e.g. Ac 8<sup>29</sup> 9<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>40</sup> 13<sup>2</sup> 16<sup>6</sup> etc.).

Growth of the local Ministry.—The closing days of the apostolic age witnessed a rapid advance in the importance of the local officers. The immense growth of the Church made the personal supervision of the apostle more and more intermittent, and naturally threw more initiative on the bishops. Again, certain dangers developed themselves in regard to prophecy. There had always been a risk that the prophet should introduce a subjective element into the message as it was revealed to him. But this was not all. There arose false apostles (2 Co 11<sup>13</sup>) and false prophets (Mt 23<sup>35</sup>, Mk 13<sup>22</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, Rev 16<sup>13</sup>). Against these dangers there existed a special gift called the discernment of spirits (1 Co 12<sup>10</sup>). In Thessalonica (1 Th 5<sup>19-21</sup>) and Corinth (1 Co 14<sup>29</sup>) St. Paul found it necessary to remind the Christians to exercise discrimination in regard to the prophet's message. He lays down also (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>) an objective criterion by which the false prophet may be detected (cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, Rev 22<sup>19</sup>). The great rise of false prophets in later days necessarily weakened the authority of the prophet, and this, again, tended to strengthen the bishops. There are three directions in which this increased authority developed.

(1) Teaching.—Of course the apostles and prophets were also teachers. Teaching was one of their main functions. But, exactly as in the case of other local administration, the daily burden of drilling new converts probably did not fall on them. Teaching was more occasional. On whom, then, fell the task of teaching? The existence of a class of persons called 'teachers' answers the question for us. These were persons possessing in an eminent degree the 'gift' of teaching (Ro 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>), i.e. a power of grasping and imparting the truths of the Christian religion. They were not, like the apostles and prophets, guided by direct revelations, but they counted, next to these, as the third order in the Church (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>). They appear, too, in the Didache, as wandering ministers, possessing authority in all Churches, and not confined to any one single Church. Again, they were not appointed to an office of teaching, but became teachers by the voluntary exercise of their 'gift' (cf. Ja 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>15</sup>). They appear, then, as a middle stage between the prophetic order and the local administrators, connected with the former by their voluntary exercise of an authority extending over the whole Church, but having, in common with the latter, no claim to a 'revelation.' Teachers, in fact, represent (except that they were not confined to the single Church) the position of the local ruler, before it became transformed, by appointment, into an office. Their right to teach lay in their possession of the gift, and submission to them was the result of a voluntary respect. But every Christian was in some degree a teacher, because every Christian had the responsibility of edifying his brethren (cf. Col 3<sup>16</sup>). And the local ruler was, from the very nature of his position, a teacher in a higher degree (cf. 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>). With the growth of the tendency, already described, to transform the apostolic teaching into an apostolic tradition, the work of handing on this sacred 'deposit' became part of the local ruler's duty. Timothy is enjoined to select able men, and instruct them carefully in this apostolic teaching (2 Ti 2<sup>2</sup>). At the same time, the voluntary teacher, who was teaching on his own lines, became discredited, in a similar manner as the prophet, by the rise of false teachers (1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>3</sup> etc.). Everything tended, therefore, to throw extra weight upon these accredited teachers, and diminish the authority of the others. But in 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup> St. Paul expresses the desire that the bishops shall be persons who possess, in an eminent degree, the 'gift' of teaching: in 1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup> he orders that elders who 'labour in the word and in teaching' (i.e. who are also teachers) shall be especially honoured (cf. Eph 4<sup>11</sup> τοὺς δὲ ποιμέντας καὶ διδασκάλους, i.e. local officers of administration and teaching). Finally, he regards these rulers as the special guardians of the faith, the bulwark of true and destroyers of false doctrine (Ac 20<sup>29-31</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9-11</sup>, cf. He 13<sup>17</sup>). Thus, on the one hand, the voluntary teacher was tending to become merged into the official bishop; and, on the other, the bishop was acquiring an authoritative right to teach. In the Didache the teacher still appears by the side of the prophet, but nothing is said of him separately, which shows that his importance was of the nature of a survival rather than active. The bishops and deacons, however, are spoken of as also performing the service of the prophets and teachers (15<sup>1</sup>). Thus we see in the Didache that what St. Paul desired had come to pass, viz. the bishops were all teachers.

(2) Spiritual Functions.—The 'ruler' had at first no exclusive right within the assemblies for worship except that he presided. The right of the 'word' belonged to every one who possessed a gift of speaking, and this was possessed in an eminent degree by the 'prophets,' who were regarded with a higher respect than any other possessors of 'gifts of speaking.' Now, when we turn to the Didache (chs. 9, 10) we find a fixed liturgy prescribed for the Eucharist, with formal prayers for the consecration of the cup and the breaking of the bread, and, at the close of the service, the whole is followed by the injunction, 'But permit the prophets to give thanks as much as they will,' τοῖς δὲ προφήταις ἐπιτρέπετε εὐχαριστεῖν ὅσα θέλουσι. The contrast τοῖς δὲ προφήταις, κ.τ.λ., implies that the fixed formula of prayer was uttered, not by a 'prophet,' but by a bishop in his absence, or in addition to the free 'giving of thanks.' This prominence of the bishop in spiritual functions, which he shared with the 'prophet' and 'teacher,' is alluded to in the sentence already quoted (Did. 15<sup>1</sup>), 'For they also perform for you the service of the prophets and teachers.' There were cases in which no 'prophet' or 'teacher' was present in the community (Did.

γὰρ refers to ἀρχιερεῖς, this implies no more with regard to the prophet than is said in ch. 11, viz. that the prophet must not demand monetary payment directly. We have, then, in the apostolic government of the Church the rule of a unus et idem which traced its authority back to Christ. In spite of differences due to individual character and scope of work, the apostolic teaching agreed in its main outlines, so that the Church can be said to have been under the government of one common principle. (b) The intercourse between Churches. There exists no higher proof of the facilities afforded by the Roman government for travel and intercourse, than the evidence to be seen in NT of the close relations which the early Churches kept up with one another. (See esp. on this subject Th. Zahn, Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche.) This intercourse was kept up mainly by those who were members of the Church or on private business. . . . class, of course, . . . but most prominently, but only . . . of their journeyings comes that of their helpers and attendants. The prophets, too, were great travellers (e.g. Ac 11<sup>27</sup> etc.). As conspicuous examples of the extent of private travels we may point to the wanderings of Aquila and Priscilla, whom we find first in Italy (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>), then in succession at Corinth (ib.), Ephesus (18<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), Rome (?) (Ro 16<sup>3</sup>), Ephesus (2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup>); or those of Onesiphorus (2 Ti 1<sup>17, 18</sup>); or the journeys involved in the collection and delivery of the Gentile collection for the poor of Judæa (e.g. Ac 11<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>18, 19</sup>), and the carriage of the apostles' letters. And besides the wanderings of official or well-known Christians, it must be remembered that there was a constant stream of other Christians moving from place to place on private business, who attached themselves to the . . . and found in it a welcome and hospitality. . . . they passed on farther (cf. Did. 12; . . . 13<sup>1</sup>). Intercourse by letter was also very frequent. A fruitful cause of this correspondence was the practice of furnishing travellers with letters of recommendation (συντακτικὰ ἐπιστολάι; cf. Ac 18<sup>27</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup>). We have instances of other correspondence in the letter of the Jerusalem Church to that of Antioch (Ac 15<sup>23</sup>), and the letter of the Roman to the Corinthian Church (Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor.).

How far, then, did all this lead to the establishment of one organic unity, or of a higher unity of organization than the city-Church? We find, indeed, in a sense, an organic unity embracing the whole Church in the earliest period. In the Church of Jerus., and esp. in the apostles, is to be seen a centralization of government stretching over all the existing Church, viz. Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, and the district around Antioch, i.e. Syria and Cilicia (cf. Ac 8<sup>14, 19, 22</sup>). This condition of things continued nominally until the time of the conference at Jerus. (Ac 15<sup>23</sup>). But St. Paul's visit to Jerus. on this occasion (which must be taken as identical with that described in Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>), beyond establishing the freedom of the Gentiles from circumcision, led to a further very important result. Now that a purely Gentile Church was possible, St. Paul saw that not only the separation of distance, but also in a greater degree the vast difference of life and thought, between the Pal. Jew and the ordinary Greek or Roman, made it impolitic that the centralization of power in the Church of Jerus. should continue. And the 'pillar' apostles, after convincing themselves of his authority and assigning to him the care of the Gentiles, while they contented themselves with the management of the Jewish Churches (Gal 2<sup>9-10</sup>). The partition of authority here described was not regarded by either side as a rigid separation of spheres. The main work of the Apostle of the Gentiles was with Gentiles, while that of the pillar apostles was with Jews. Thus it was the practice of St. Paul to preach to the Jews first when breaking up new ground (see Ac 13-end, passim), and he occasionally, though very rarely, addressed himself to Jews in his epistles (e.g. Ro 2<sup>27</sup>). Again we find St. Peter active at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>), Corinth (?) (1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>), and Rome. St. James addressed his Epistle to the Jews of the Dispersion, 1<sup>1</sup>; and 1 P is addressed, not only to Jews, but also to Gentiles . . . Asia Minor (cf. 1<sup>14, 43</sup>) at a time when . . . was probably still living. Nor was the separation accompanied by any bitterness in the relations between the two parties. The pillar apostles gave to St. Paul and Barnabas the 'right hand of fellowship.' These promised in turn to remember the poor of Judæa, and we know that the promise was faithfully kept. St. P . . . with deep affection and respect of the Judæan Christians (e.g. 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, Ro 15<sup>27</sup>). The momentary break with St. Peter (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>), and the efforts of some to exaggerate and . . . effects (1 Co 1<sup>12, 32</sup>), did not impede his . . . of the deeper truth, that all differences found their unity in Christ (3<sup>14</sup>).

Within these two great divisions, each of which had something of an organic unity in its common rule, resulting to a large extent in common practice (e.g. 1 Co 11<sup>16, 14, 35</sup>), appear smaller divisions, according to the Roman provinces. Such are the Churches of Judæa (Gal 1<sup>22</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>), Galatia (Gal 1<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), Macedonia (2 Co 8<sup>1</sup>), Achaia (Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>9, 2</sup>), Asia (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), Syria and Cilicia (Ac 15<sup>23, 41</sup>). This grouping was also something more than a mere form of speech. The Churches of Galatia (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), Macedonia (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>), and Achaia (1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 8-9) each formed a separate whole for the purposes of gathering and delivering to Jerus. the collection for the poor of Judæa. Officers were appointed by each province to act for and represent the province in this respect (1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>19, 23</sup>). St. Paul particularly notes the close and affectionate relationship which bound together the Macedonian Churches (1 Th 4<sup>10</sup>).

These provincial Churches (it is to be noted that ἐκκλησία is never used of the Church of a province, but always ἐκκλησίαι, 'the Churches') had their natural centre in the capital city (e.g. Corinth, 2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>; Ephesus, Ac 19<sup>10</sup>; cf. Rev 2<sup>1</sup> where it comes first in the list of the seven Churches). At a later period these districts were in some cases temporarily put under the authority of an apostolic delegate, e.g. Timothy in Asia (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), Titus in Crete (Tit 1<sup>5</sup>). At the end of the apostolic age we find the Churches of Asia under the guidance of St. John (Rev 1<sup>4</sup>).

The extent of the apostolic Church included Palestine, Phœnicia (Ac 15<sup>2</sup>), Syria (the region around Antioch), Asia Minor (1 P 1<sup>1</sup>), Macedonia, Achaia, Illyricum (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>), Italy (Ac 28<sup>14</sup>), Crete, and Cyprus. Thus much we know from certain evidence in NT. But there were doubtless many other Churches which are not mentioned, and which, nevertheless, were founded before the close of the NT period. It is quite probable that St. Paul himself preached in Spain (cf. Ro 15<sup>28, 29</sup>; Clem. Rom. ad Cor. 5; Murat. Fragment, l. 38). The Church of Alexandria ascribed its foundation to St. Mark (Eus. HE ii. 16, 24; Epiph. Hær. li. 6; Jer. de vir. illust. 8; Nicephorus, HE ii. 43; Acta Barnabæ). And without setting any value on the traditions (e.g. in Eus. HE i. 13, iii. 1) current in the later Church, we may well refrain from drawing any arguments from the silence of NT in this respect.

III. THE IDEAL CHURCH.—So far as we have proceeded hitherto, we have considered the word ἐκκλησία always in the sense of the Christian body in its actual state of imperfection. We come now to a conception of the Church in which the empirical idea disappears and an ideal Church appears, still capable of being ideal, in some of the similes under which it is presented (e.g. Eph 4<sup>16</sup>), but free from all the negative elements of evil. From one point of view, every Christian can be regarded as perfect. He was washed by baptism from every stain (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>, He 10<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>), and from henceforth is holy (ἅγιος). The Christians are 'the saints' (οἱ ἅγιοι). So the distinction of the ideal from the actual body of Christians was a thought which lay near at hand. It is the actual Church to which reproof and blame are addressed; the ideal which 'shall judge the world,' 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>. It is the actual Church upon the foundation of which some build badly and some well (1 Co 3<sup>10-15</sup>), the 'great house' in which some are 'vessels unto honour' and some 'vessels unto dishonour' (2 Ti 2<sup>20</sup>); it is the ideal which is a 'holy temple of God' (ναὸς = shrine) (1 Co 3<sup>17</sup>), sanctified and cleansed by 'the washing of water with the word . . . a glorious Church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing . . . holy and without blemish' (Eph 5<sup>26, 27</sup>). The metaphors under which the ideal Church is spoken of, and its relation to Christ expressed, are of three kinds—(a) the Church as a building, (b) the Church as a body (σῶμα), (c) the Church as a bride.

[illegible]

(2) The Church as a Body (σῶμα)—The idea of the Christian unity in Christ seems to have suggested the comparison of the society to a human body, in which the individuals are members, each with his proper function, and idea of the believers all in the Eucharist (1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>, J 1<sup>16</sup>), Agapae called outright (Co 13<sup>24</sup>, 2<sup>20</sup>). In the earlier Epp. it is the vaguer "we," you," for nearly the command to which the apostle is writing, a "second" and a "third" (615). In this is sometimes identified with the whole body (1 Co 12<sup>27</sup>) but in the later Epp. the second the Head and the first the director (Eph 5<sup>23, 32</sup>), as the source of life, filling it with His fulness (Eph 1<sup>23</sup>), as the centre of its unity and the cause of its growth (Eph 4<sup>15</sup>, Col 2<sup>19</sup>). These last two are reminiscent of the actual Christ, who is actually found first in 2Co 11<sup>2</sup> "I espoused you to one husband that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ." Here the idea of Christ as the bridegroom is also present. The expressions ἐνδεδεσμένος (1 P 51<sup>3</sup>), ἡ ἐκλεκτὴ ἐκκλησία (2 Jn 1<sup>2</sup>), ἡ ἐκλεκτὴ κληρία (1 Pt 2), are common to all the communities. But the application of this term to the whole Church as the Bride of Christ is a step beyond the rest. We are here, says St. Paul (Eph 5), called to face a great mystery. Man and wife become one flesh, so that a man should love his wife as his own body. The Church is the Bride of Christ; the two are one body, just as man and wife are one body; and as Christ loved the Church and gave Himself up for it, so the husband should love his wife. We see here how closely connected is this conception with that of the Church as the body of Christ. The union of the two ideas is seen also in the relation of the individual Christian to Christ (1 Co 6<sup>12a</sup>). As man and wife become one flesh, so he who cleaveth to Christ (the expression ὁ κολληόμενος αὶ Κουὰ is πῶς τοῖς ἀγαλλόμενοις τῇ πόρῃ) becomes one 'spirit' (πνεῦμα) ἡμῶν, and belongs to his bodies are members (μέλη) of Christ. The bride is found also in the imagery of the Apocalypse. The marriage table is spread (Rev 19<sup>7</sup>), the bride is arrayed in fine linen, 'which is the righteous acts of the saints' (ib.<sup>3</sup>). In c. 20 the powers of evil are bound or destroyed, and the New Jerusalem comes down out of heaven as a 'bride adorned for her husband' (21<sup>2</sup>); 'she is the Bride, the wife of the Lamb' (ib.<sup>2</sup>, cf. 22<sup>17</sup>)

SUMMARY.—Such were the life and teaching of the Church in NT times. If we compare them with that of the succeeding age, two features stand out as especially characteristic of the earlier period. The first is a much more vivid consciousness of the power and presence of God in His Church. The apostles, who were daily with them, had all been in close contact with the Lord, and most of them during a period of some years. The risen Lord was to them a living memory, and they imparted to the Church the force of that memory in all its freshness. The power of the Holy Ghost also was a fact of which men were more directly conscious in themselves than at any other time. Never have the central truths of Christianity—the position of Christ as the Son of God, of His death—been more fully realized, and at no time has the Christian life in its practice been more closely connected with, and derived from, that belief. To the fixed apostolic tradition of doctrine and life all succeeding ages have looked as their authority. But in the strongest contrast with this fixedness of doctrine and moral standards the freedom from formal conditions in the life outside these. Thus, if we turn to the offices, we notice the informal way in which offices grew up, and the comparative absence (until the close of the period) of a fixed division of labour. It is characteristic also of the time, that most of the technical terms are used also in a general sense, e.g. πρεσβύτερος, διάκονος (διακονία, διακονέω) διδάσκαλος. Or, if we turn to the worship, we are struck by the freedom of speech, the absence of exclusive ministerial rights, of a formal liturgy and fixed ritual, except in the case of baptism, laying on of hands, and the Eucharist. In the transition period immediately following the apostolic age came the fixing of organization with its clear-cut division of labour, and the stereotyping of liturgies and ritual. And along with these developments came, at once their cause and their effect, the decline of the prophet and prophecy.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT IN THE APOSTOLIC AGE.—Our knowledge of Church government in the apostolic age comes almost entirely from the NT. We can glean something from Clement and the Teaching; but with Ignatius we are already in a new age, and later writers are too full of later ideas to help us much. Besides this, things were in a fluid and transitional state, complicated on one side by the indefinite authority held in reserve by the apostles, on the other by the ministry of gifts, which was crossed, but not yet displaced, by the local ministry of office.

The general development is clear, though its later stages may fall outside NT times. The apostles were of necessity the first rulers of the Church; then were added gradually divers local and unlocal rulers; then the unlocal died out, and the local settled down into the three permanent orders of bishops, elders, and deacons. The chief disputed questions are of the origin of the local ministry, of its relation to the other, and of the time and manner in which it settled down.

Twice over St. Paul gives something like a list of the chief persons of the Church. In 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup> he counts: first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers; fourth, helpers, gifts of healings, helps, governments, kinds of tongues.' A few years later (Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) his list of gifts for the work of service (διακονία) is 'some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers.' At the head, then, of both lists is the Apostle. The apostles were not limited to the Eleven, or to the number twelve. Whether our Lord ever recognized Matthias or not, Paul and Barnabas (e.g. 1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>) were certainly apostles, and we may safely add (Gal 1<sup>19</sup>) James the Lord's brother. There are traces of others, and the old disciples Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>) even seem to be called 'notable' apostles. On the other hand, Timothy is tacitly (2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>) excluded. The apostle's work was first and foremost to have seen (Ac 1, 2 Co 9<sup>1,2</sup>) the risen Lord, and to have been sent out by Him; secondly, to have wrought (2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>) 'the apostle's signs.' His work was to bear witness of the things he had seen and heard (e.g. Ac 18)—in short, to preach; and this implied the founding and general care of Churches, though not their ordinary administration. St. Paul interferes only with gross errors or with serious disorder; and he does not advise the Corinthians on further questions without hinting that they might have settled them for themselves. His mission was (1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>) simply to preach, so that he had no local ties, but moved from city to city, sometimes working for a while from a centre, but more commonly moving about.

Next to the apostle comes the Prophet. He, too, sustained the Church, and showed him (Eph 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>) the revelation of the mystery. He spoke 'in the Spirit' words of warning, of comfort, or it might be of prediction. His work was universal like the apostle's, but he was not like him an eye-witness of the resurrection, so that he needed not to have 'seen the Lord.' Nor did 'the care of all the Churches' rest on him. His office, so far as we know, was purely spiritual, and there is nowhere any hint that he took a share in the administration of the Churches. Women, too, were prophets. Philip's daughters (Ac 21) and the prophetess Jezebel (Rev 2<sup>20</sup>) at Thyatira. Yet even in the apostolic age we see the beginnings (1 Th 5<sup>20</sup>) of false prophets, and false prophets flourishing (2 P, Jude). After the prophet comes a group of preachers, followed in 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup> by special 'gifts of healings, helps, governments, kinds of tongues.'

It will be seen that the lists have to do with a ministry of special gifts, and leave no place for an ordinary local ministry of office, unless it comes in under 'helps and governments,' or 'pastors and teachers.' Any such ministry must therefore have been subordinate to the other: yet there is ample proof that one existed from a very early time. We have (1) the appointment of the Seven in Ac 6: (2) elders at Jerusalem in 44, in 50, and again in 58; mentioned by James and Peter; appointed by Paul and Barnabas in every Church about 48; at Ephesus in 58: (3) bishops and deacons at Philippi in 63; Phoebe a deaconess at Cenchreae in 58. Also (4) in the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy and Titus are in charge of four distinct orders of bishops (or elders), deacons, deaconesses (1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup> γυναίκες, not ῥὰς γυναίκας, cannot be the wives of deacons), and widows. This great development, which some think points to a much later date, seems fairly accounted for by the vigorous growth of Church life and the need of organization which must have been felt near the end of the apostolic age. To complete our statement of the evidence, we may add (5) the πρεσβύτεροι who carried out Ananias (Ac 5<sup>3</sup>), though the tacit contrast with πρεσβύτεροι is clearly one of age, not of office, for we note that νεανίσκοι buried Sapphira; (6) the prominent position of James at Jerus. in 44 (Ac 12<sup>17</sup>), in 50, and in 58; and (7) of Titus at Ephesus and in Crete; (8) the ἐπίσκοποι of 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup> and the equally indefinite rulers (ηγούμενοι) of an unknown Church (He 13<sup>7,17</sup>) of Heb. Christians shortly before 70; and (9) the angels of the seven Churches in Asia.

Our questions may be conveniently grouped round the later orders of bishops, elders, and deacons—taken, however, in reverse order.

i. DEACONS.—The traditional view, that the choice of the Seven in Ac 6 is the formal institution of a permanent order of deacons, does not seem unassailable. The opinion of Irenaeus, Cyprian, and later writers is not decisive on a question of this kind; and the vague word διακονία (used too in the context of the apostles themselves) is more than balanced by the avoidance of the word deacon in the Ac (e.g. 21<sup>8</sup> φιλιππου τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ υἱος ἐκ τῶν ἑπτά). If we add that the Seven seem to rank next in the Church to the apostles, we may be tempted to see in them (if they are a permanent office at all) the elders whom we find at Jerus. in precisely this position from 44 onward. In this case we are thrown back on the Philippian Church in 63 for the first mention of deacons. As, however, Phoebe (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>) was deaconess at Cenchreae in 58, there were probably deacons before this at Corinth, though there is no trace of them in St. Paul's Epistles to that Church.

ii. ELDERS.—We first find elders at Jerus. (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>) receiving the offerings from Barnabas and Saul in 44. They are joined (15<sup>7</sup>) with the apostles at the Conference in 50, and with James in 58 (21<sup>18</sup>). As Paul and Barnabas appoint elders (14<sup>23</sup>) in every city on their first missionary journey, we may infer that Churches generally had elders, though there is no other express mention of them before 1 Peter and the Pastoral Epistles, unless we adopt an early date for Ja 5<sup>14</sup>, where, however, it is not certain that the word is official.

The difference of name between elders and bishops may point to some difference of origin or function; but in NT (and Clement) the terms are more or less equivalent. Thus the elders of Ephesus are reminded (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>) that they are bishops. So, too, we find sundry bishops in the single Church of Philippi. In the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy appoints bishops and deacons, Titus elders and deacons, though (1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup>) Timothy also has elders under him. The qualifications also of a bishop as laid down for Timothy are practically those of the elder as described to Titus, and equally point to ministerial duties in contrast to what we call episcopal. Though the elder's proper duty is to 'rule' (1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup>), he does it subject to Timothy, much as a modern elder rules subject to his bishop.

iii. BISHOPS.—Is there any trace of an order of bishops in NT? The name of a bishop, as we have seen, is applied to elders; but are there permanent local officials, each ruling singly the elders of his own city? This is the definition of the bishop when he first appears distinct from his elders; and if we find this, we find a bishop, whatever he may be called. The instances commonly given are James the Lord's brother at Jerus., Timothy and Titus in Ephesus and Crete, and the angels of the seven Churches. The plural rulers (He 13<sup>7,17</sup>) of a single Church are hardly worth mention. Now, James was clearly the leading man of the Church at Jerusalem. His strictness of life and his near relation to the Lord (a more important matter with Easterns than with us) must have given him enormous influence. But influence is one thing, office is another. No doubt he had very much of a bishop's position, and his success at Jerus. may have suggested imitation elsewhere; but there is nothing recorded of him which requires us to believe that he held any definite local office. The case of Timothy and Titus is a stronger one, for we know that they appointed and governed elders like a modern bishop. But this is work which must be done in every Church, so that a man who does it is not necessarily a bishop. Neither Timothy nor Titus is connected with any city. They are rather temporary vicars-apostolic, sent on special missions to Ephesus and Crete. The letters by which we know them are (2 Ti 4<sup>9</sup>, Tit 3<sup>12</sup>) letters of recall; and there is no serious evidence that they ever saw Ephesus and Crete again. Titus is last heard of (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>) in Dalmatia, Timothy from the writer to the Hebrews (13<sup>23</sup>), a work which there is no reason to connect with Ephesus. There remain the angels of the seven Churches; and it would be very bold to take these for literal bishops. In addition to the general character of the passage, from the symbolic character of the woman Jezebel (the woman reading τὴν γυναῖκα σου would make her the angel's wife) can hardly be taken literally. Moreover, these angels are praised and blamed for the doings of their Churches in a way no literal bishop justly can be. It is safer to take them as personifications of the Churches.

Our general conclusion is, that while we find deacons and elders (or bishops in NT sense) in the apostolic age, there is no clear trace of bishops (in the later sense), or of any ordinance that every Church was to have. This conclusion is fully confirmed by Clement and Ignatius. If Corinth had had a bishop in Clement's time, or been remarkable or blameworthy in having no bishop, we should scarcely have failed to hear of it in a letter called forth by the unjust treatment of certain elders. Instead of this, it is clear that the elders at Corinth had no authority of any sort over them to compose their quinquaginta. Ignatius certainly uses the most emphatic language in urging obedience to the bishop; but the greater his emphasis the more significant is the absence of any institution of bishops by the apostles. The absence of an argument which would have rendered all the rest superfluous, seems nothing less than an admission that he knew of no such institution.

Nevertheless, his earnestness implies apostolic sanction. Epi-copacy must have originated before the apostles had all passed away; and its early strength in Asia cannot well be explained without some encouragement from St. John. But it must have been at first local and partial, and due perhaps to more causes than one. On one side, the need of firmer government after the apostles and prophets died out, would often tend to raise the chairman of the elders into something like a bishop's position; on the other side, the type of Timothy might be imitated, and if they remained at their posts and settled down into genuine bishops. See also Hor. Christian Ecclesia (1897), published too late for use in this article.

CHURCHES, ROBBERS OF, is the misleading rendering in AV Ac 19<sup>37</sup> of the word ἐκκλησία (implying the word 'churches' in the wider old Eng. sense to pagan temples), while in RV the rendering is 'robbers of temples'; but both are unsatisfactory. The secretary of the city (γραμματεὺς τῆς πόλεως) of Ephesus points out to the riotous assembly in the theatre that St. Paul and his friends are not guilty of sacrilege, the category of crime under which it was natural for St. Paul's accusers to bring his action. After the word ἀσέβεια had been appropriated to translate the Rom. legal term lesa majestas 'treason,' ἐκκλησία was the natural word to use; and here for emphasis the speaker uses the double term οὐτε ἱεροσουλῶν οὐτε βλασφημοῦντας τὴν θεάν, which implies 'guilty neither in act nor in language of disrespect to the established religion of our city.'

In 2 Mac 4<sup>42</sup> the epithet 'church-robber' (AV, 'author of the sacrilege' RV) is applied to Lysimachus, brother of Menelaus the high priest, who perished in a riot (B.C. 170) provoked by the theft of sacred vessels committed by his brother and himself.

CHURCHES, SEVEN.—See REVELATION.

CHURL.—'The Saxons made three degrees of free-men; to wit—an earl, a thane, and a churl'—Risdon (1630). And soon 'churl' and 'churlish' were applied to any boorish person. In this sense churlish is used of Nabal, 1 S 25<sup>5</sup>, and of Nicanor 2 Mac 14<sup>30</sup>. But 'churlish' as applied to Nabal being popularly taken in the sense of niggardly, helped to give the meaning of niggard, miser, to 'churl.' In this sense alone churl occurs, Is 32<sup>7</sup>, though the Heb. (כַּרְלִי, כַּרְלִי) probably means crafty (so RVm) or fraudulent (Vulg.). J. HASTINGS.

CHUSI (Χούσι B, Χουσι A).—Jth 7<sup>18</sup> mentioned with Ekrebel (Akrabeh) is possibly Kūzah, 5 miles S. of Shechem and 5 miles W. of Akrah. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv. C. R. CONDER.

CHUZA (Χουζᾶς, Amer. RV Chuzas).—The steward (ἐπιτροπος) of Herod Antipas. His wife JOANNA (which see) was one of the women who ministered to our Lord and His disciples (Lk 8<sup>3</sup>).

CIELED, CIELING.—This is the spelling of the Camb. ed. of AV of 1629, the ed. of 1611 having sieled and sieeling in all the passages. Amer. RV prefers the mod. ceiled, ceiling. Wright (Bible Word Book<sup>2</sup>, p. 134) identifies the word with seel, to close a hawk's eyes, and quotes—

'But when we in our eyes grow hard,
O misery on't!—the woe is in our eyes.'
Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. iii. xiii. 112.

'Come, seeing night,
Scarf up the tender eye of pitiful day.'
Macbeth, iii. ii. 46.

But Skeat (Etymol. Dict.<sup>2</sup> s.v.) denies the identification or connexion. Ciel, he holds, is from celum, 'heaven,' 'sky,' and has no connexion with sill, seal, or seel. Its meaning, therefore, is 'a canopy,' then, as vb., 'to canopy' or 'cover'; and the only meaning in AV, as in mod. Eng., viz. to cover with timber or plaster, i.e. wainscot, is a later derivation. The Heb. always means 'to cover.' In Dt 33<sup>22</sup> AVm gives 'cieled' (text, 'seated,' RV 'reserved,' the Heb. being sāphan 'to panel' [see Driver's note and Add. in Deut<sup>2</sup> ad loc.], tr<sup>4</sup> 'ciel' in Jer 22<sup>14</sup>, Hag 1<sup>4</sup>). The 'cieeling' (only 1 K 6<sup>15</sup>, Ezk 41<sup>16m</sup>) is any part cieled, walls as well as roof, the roof indeed being formerly distinguished as 'the upper ceiling.'

CILICIA (Κιλικία), a country in the S.E. corner of Asia Minor, on the coast, adjoining Syria, always closely connected with Syria in manners, religion, and nationality, and generally more closely united with Syria than with Asia Minor in political and in Byzantine ecclesiastical arrangement. It was commonly divided into two territories—(1) on the W. (reaching as far as Pamphylia), Cilicia Tracheia (Aspera), a land of lofty and rugged mountains, drained by the considerable river Calycadnus; (2) on the E., Cilicia Pedias (Campestris), a low-lying and very fertile plain between the sea and the mountain ranges Taurus and Amanus. The entire double country is summed up as C. in Ac 27<sup>5</sup>, a geographical description of the lands touching the Cyprian Sea. But elsewhere it is clear that only the civilized and peaceful C. Pedias (in other words, the part subject to Roman rule) is intended when C. is mentioned in NT, whereas C. Tracheia was inhabited by fierce and dangerous tribes, loosely ruled by king Archelaus of Cappadocia from B.C. 20 to A.D. 17, and by king Antiochus of Commagene from A.D. 37 to 74. C. Pedias had been Roman territory from B.C. 103; and, after many changing arrangements for its administration, it was merged by Augustus in the great joint province Syria-Cilicia-Phoenice probably in B.C. 27; and this system probably lasted through the 1st cent. after Christ (though temporary variations may possibly have occurred). Hence Syria and C. are mentioned together in such a way as to imply close connexion in Gal 1<sup>2</sup>, Ac 15<sup>23, 41</sup>; the combined Rom. province is there meant, over which the influence of Christianity spread from the two centres, Tarsus in C. and, above all, Antioch in Syria. The close connexion of C. with Syria arose from two causes—(1) C. communicates with it by a very easy pass, the 'Syrian Gates' (Pylæ Syriae, Beilan, summit level 1980 ft.), whereas the passes between Taurus and Cilicia and Cappadocia are difficult, the best being the 'Cilician Gates' (Gulek Boghaz, summit level 4300 ft.); (2) C. Pedias was long separated from Roman territory on the W. and N. by a great extent of independent country, while it adjoined Rom. Syria. C. has been identified wrongly with the Tarshish which is so often mentioned in OT (Gn 10<sup>4</sup> etc.), by some modern scholars, following Jos. Ant. (i. vi. 1), who says that C. was originally called Θαρσός.

That a large Jewish population existed in C. is evident from Ac 6<sup>8</sup>; and it is rather strange that Cilician Jews are not mentioned in Ac 2<sup>9-11</sup>. The existence of Jewish colonists in the Seleucid cities of C. would be in itself highly probable, for they were always the most faithful and trusted adherents of the Seleucid kings in their foreign settlements; and the Cilician Jews are alluded to by Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, § 36 (ii. p. 587, Mang.). St. Paul had the rights of a citizen of Tarsus (which see), as he mentions in Ac 21<sup>39</sup>; these rights must have been inherited, and they imply, beyond doubt, that there was a colony of Jews forming part of the Tarsian State. An interesting memorial of the religious influence exerted by the Jews in C. is attested by the society of Sabbatistai, mentioned in an inscription, probably dating about the time of Christ, which was found near Elaïoussa and Korykos (see Canon Hicks in Journ. of Hellenic Studies, 1891, pp. 234-236); this society was evidently an association of non-Jews in the practice of rites modelled, in part at least, on Judaistic ceremonial.

LITERATURE.—Cilicia is very fully described in Monmsen, Provinces of Rom. Emp. (Rom. vol. v.) ch. viii. See Marquardt, Rom., pp. 379-392; Ramsay, Hist. Geog. A., and Hicks in Journ. of Hellenic Studies, pp. 206-278; Sterrett, W. of Persia, p. 206; Explor. Asiat. de la Cilicie.

CINNAMON (κιννάμωμον, κιννάμωμον, cinnamomum).—The identity of name makes it impossible to mistake the substance intended. It was early known to the Hebrews, as it entered into the composition of the holy anointing oil (Ex 30<sup>23</sup>). It is represented as being used to perfume a bed (Pr 7<sup>17</sup>). The Oriental women use musk for a similar purpose. Like other tropical plants, it seems to have been cultivated in the botanical gardens of Solomon (Ca 4<sup>14</sup>). It is the product of Cinnamomum zeylanicum, Nees, a plant of the Lauraceae, growing in Ceylon and other E. I. islands, and in China. The tree attains a height of 30 ft., and has paniced clusters of white blossoms, and ovate, acute leaves. The cinnamon is the inner bark, separated from the outer, and dried in the sun, in the shape of cylindrical rolls. The best oil is obtained by boiling the ripe fruit. In Rev 18<sup>13</sup> it is enumerated among the merchandise of the Great Babylon.

G. E. POST.

CIRCLE.—In AV c. means the vault of heaven. It occurs Is 40<sup>22</sup> 'It is he that sitteth upon the c. of the earth,' i.e. the c. overarching the earth (אֶרֶץ, also in Job 22<sup>14</sup>, AV and RV 'circuit,' RVm 'vault'; Pr 8<sup>27</sup> AV 'compass,' RV 'circle'); and Wis 13<sup>2</sup> 'the c. of the stars' (κύκλος ἀστέρων, RV 'circling stars,' RVm 'c. of stars').

J. HASTINGS.

CIRCUIT occurs 4 times in AV, 1 S 7<sup>16</sup> (a late and doubtful passage acc. to which Samuel went on circuit [i.e. to various high-places], Job 22<sup>14</sup> (אֶרֶץ RVm and Amer. RV 'vault,' i.e. the vault of heaven), Ps 19<sup>6</sup> (מַסְלַח, of the sun's course in the heavens), Ec 1<sup>6</sup> (מַסְלַח, of the circuits of the wind). Besides retaining these instances, RV substitutes 'made [make] a circuit' for AV 'fetch a compass' in 2 S 5<sup>23</sup> (where for MT נָסַח read with Driver and Budde נָסַח, 2 K 3<sup>9</sup>, Ac 28<sup>13</sup> (περιελθόντες, RVm 'cast loose,' following WH περιελθόντες). See COMPASS.

CIRCUMCISION (מילה Ex 4<sup>26</sup>, περιτομή Jn 7<sup>22</sup> etc.).—The cutting off of the foreskin, an initiation rite or religious ceremony among many races, such as the Jews, Arabians, and Colchians in Asia, the Egyptians, Mandingos, Gallas, Falashas, Abyssinians, and some Bantu tribes in Africa, the Otaheitan, Tahitian, and some Melanesians in Polynesia, the South Wales tribes in Australia, and the Athabascans, Nahuatl, Aztecs, and certain Amazonian tribes in America.

In Egypt its practice dates back at least to the 14th cent. B.C., and probably much farther. The circumcising of two children is represented on the wall of the temple of Khonsu at Karnak. The record of the invasion of Egypt by Mediterranean tribes in the time of Merenptah states that as the Aquashua (supposed to be Achaeans) were circumcised, their dead were not mutilated by the Egyptians, except by cutting off a hand (Lepsius, Denkm. iii. 19).

Like other mutilations, such as tattooing, cutting off a finger-joint, filing or chiselling out of teeth, the operation may be a tribal mark. In all these there is the twofold idea of a sacrifice to the tribal god, and the marking of his followers so that they may be known by him and by each other. The sacrifice is a representative one, a part given for the redemption of the rest. Stade (ZAW, 1886) has collected a number of notices from many peoples, from which he infers that circumcision is not so much a mark of membership in a tribe as initiation into manhood and acquirement of the full rights of citizenship.

However, the rite is said to have been appointed by God as the token of the covenant between Him and Abraham's descendants, to be performed on himself, on his descendants and slaves, as well as on strangers joining themselves to the Heb. nation (Gn 17<sup>12</sup> etc. Ex 12<sup>10</sup> both P), to signify their participation in the benefits of the covenant and their acceptance of its obligations. It was practised by the Jews during their captivity in Egypt (Jos 5<sup>5</sup> D<sup>2</sup>), but discontinued in the wilderness. Even Moses neglected to circumcise his son (Ex 4<sup>24</sup> JE). On this occasion Zipporah recognized the cause of God's displeasure, and removed the reproach by operating (Ex 4<sup>25</sup>). She thus showed her acquaintance with the ceremony; and as she called Moses on this account a hathan of blood, which may mean one brought into a family by a blood-rite, it has been conjectured that the Jews received the rite from the Midianites. There is, however, no evidence that this was so, and it is contrary to the whole weight of tradition. As women were not permitted by the Rabbins to circumcise, the case of Zipporah is explained away in the Tosephta on Ex 4 as meaning that she caused Mo to be circumcised.

The characteristic of Hebrew circumcision is being performed in infancy. Wellhausen (Hist. 340) sees in Ex 4<sup>25</sup> the substitution of this for the older and more severe operation in youth or manhood. (See the same writer's Skizzen, iii. 154, 215; and cf. Nowack, Heb. Archäol. i. 167 ff.; Cheyne, art. 'Circumcision' in Encyc. Brit.<sup>9</sup>)

On the arrival of the Jews in Canaan the rite was renewed at Gilgal (Jos 5<sup>2</sup>), the occasion being performed at a place named Gib'ath 'Arabah, or 'the hill of the flint knives', with flint knives, which, according to the Sept. addition to Jos 24<sup>31</sup>, were buried with Joshua. Although the ceremony is scarcely again mentioned in the historical part of OT, yet it was probably observed continuously, and there is no real ground for the statement made by the Rabbins (Yalkut on Jos), that on the separation of the two kingdoms circumcision was forbidden in Ephraim. The Midrash on La 1<sup>9</sup> conjectures that the priests were uncircumcised in the days of Zedekiah (see 1 Mac 1<sup>25</sup>); but this is doubtful.

Abraham was circumcised at the age of 99, and, according to Pirke R. Eliezer, the anniversary of the ceremony is the great Day of Atonement. Ishmael was circumcised at 13, and among Islamite nations it is performed at some age between 6 and 16, as soon as the child can pronounce the religious formulæ. It is not enjoined in the Koran, but, according to the Arabian tradition, the Prophet declared it to be meritorious, though not an obligatory rite.

As Isaac was circumcised on the eighth day, so that he was named in the mitzvah (Gn 17<sup>12</sup>), and so that the proper date by the Jews to this day. The child is named at the ceremony in memory of the change in Abraham's name (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>). At the present day the rite is performed either in the house of the parents or in the synagogue, and either by the father or by a Mohel or circumciser, who is usually a surgeon, and must be a Jew of unblemished character, who is not paid for his services. In former times the Rabbins preferred flint or glass knives, but now steel is almost invariably used. Blood must be shed in the operation, and the inner layer must be torn with the thumb-nail; this supplemental operation is called pēr'ah, and is said to have been introduced by Joshua. The pēr'ah is peculiar to the Jewish mode of operating. In former days the flow of blood was stopped by suction, and the bleeding stopped by which the Mohel's mouth is filled; but these practices, called by the Jews Mēzizah, are not now adopted in many places, where the operation is performed with antiseptic precautions. Chloroform may be used if the Mohel think it necessary.

The night before the rite the parents keep watch, a survival of the precautions formerly adopted to prevent the child being stolen by Lilith, the devil's mother; they are visited by their friends; and all the little children of the community are gathered together, and the teacher reads the Shema or verses from Dt 6<sup>4-9</sup> 11<sup>13-21</sup> and Nu 15<sup>37-41</sup>. On the day of the operation the child is carried to the door of the room by a lady, who is called the Baalath Berith, and is taken by a godfather or sandek, called also Baal Berith, who sits in a chair, beside which is a vacant seat dedicated to the prophet Elijah, in memorial of his jealousy for the maintenance of the covenant of which this rite is the token. The Mohel sets this chair apart with prayer, asking that the example of Elijah, the messenger of the covenant, may sustain him in his task. Prayers, according to a set form, are recited in Heb. by him, and the child's name is given, then the father and bystanders join in the recitation of formulæ. After the operation a blessing is invoked by the Mohel, and the event is celebrated by feasting in the parents' house. The prayers for the occasion are set forth in the work of B. Asher, Brecher, and Auerbach. The po'el of the po'el is either burned or buried in accordance with ancient rabbinical directions.

After the defeat of Haman's plot, many are said to have been circumcised 'for fear of the Jews' (Est 8<sup>17</sup> LXX). Circumcision was also imposed by Hyrcanus upon the Idumæans (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1). Occasionally Gentiles submitted to it. Flavianus, Antoninus, and the two sons of Ptolemy Epiphanes (Midrash Bereshith) were circumcised; but in the Justinian Code the performance of the operation on a Rom. citizen was prohibited on pain of death (i. 9. 10). Antiochus Epiphanes also prohibited the rite, and many Jews were tortured and put to death on this account (1 Mac 1<sup>48</sup>, 2 Mac 6<sup>10</sup>). Similar prohibitions were issued by Hadrian and Constantius, as well as by the Spanish Inquisition in later years.

In apostolic times the Judaizing section of the Church wished to enforce circumcision on Gentile converts; and in order to avoid contention, St. Paul circumcised Timothy as he was a Jew by his mother's side (Ac 16<sup>3</sup>). He refused to perform the rite on Titus (Gal 2<sup>3</sup>), and argues in the Ep. to the Rom. (4<sup>10</sup>) that Abraham was as yet uncircumcised when God made His covenant with him. On this subject the Council of Jerusalem gave a final decision adverse to the Judaizers (Ac 15<sup>23-29</sup>). In some of the Ethiopian and Abyssinian Churches, however, the operation was continued, being the persistence of a pre-Christian custom. In the 12th cent. a short-lived Christi. Kirchengesch. arose in Italy (Schrokh, Christi. Kirchengesch. xxix. 655).

Among the Jewish teachers circumcision was regarded as an operation of purification, and the word foreskin has come to be synonymous with obstinacy and imperfection. The rite was regarded as a token in the flesh of the effect of Divine grace in the heart, hence the phrases used in Dt 30<sup>6</sup>. Philo speaks of it as a symbolic inculcation of purity of heart, and having the advantage of promoting cleanliness, fruitfulness, and avoidance of disease. Jeremiah (9<sup>25</sup>, 26 RV) recognized that the outward rite and the inward grace do not always go together, and he groups together Egypt, Judah, and Edom as races which, though circumcised in the flesh, are uncircumcised in heart.

It is worth noticing that it is only in the writings of St. Luke, thorough Greek as he was, that the word 'citizen' occurs, Lk 15<sup>15</sup> 19<sup>14</sup> (add RV reading in a LXX quotation in He 8<sup>11</sup>).

2. Development.—The city grew out of the village, as the ḥayy grew out of its origin to the house. The expansion of the ḥayy follows the lines as that of the nation from the tribe, and the tribe from the family. Looking, therefore, to these ultimate factors, we find that each house had its ba'al or lord, and under him the family was an independent organism, seeking its own livelihood and welfare. An act of hospitality to a stranger gave him the sacred privileges of the family guild, and the sanctity of the guest became the right of later citizenship. The gradual weakening of this bond is given in the Arab proverb, 'My brother and I against my cousin, my cousin and I against the stranger.'

wall and the courage and fidelity of its inhabitants. The agricultural life of Palestine knew nothing of separate farmsteads dotting the landscape. The peasants had to retire for the night to the village, like the sheep to the fold. It was customary for the smaller villages to recognize the motherhood or superior protection of a large city. Thus the inhabitants of Laish looked to Zidon the Great (Jg 13<sup>30</sup>), and at the present day every inhabitant of Syria is considered to belong to Esh-Shâm (Damascus). Hence the . . . es and their villages, 'cities and . . . in Nu 21<sup>25</sup> 32<sup>42</sup>, Jos 15 and 19. The feudal lords or the superior cities, in return for protection offered against nomad invasions and other dangers, received payment in service and produce (see TAXES). The service rendered by . . . his superior was originally of the . . . obedience to the father's command, and passed eventually into corvée labour.*

In an Oriental city each house had its own inviolability, its power to admit and exclude. The passer-by in the narrow street could know nothing of what was going on within those dead walls, with their windows and balconies all opening on the central court. He was as much outside as the dog at his feet. It is probable that the streets of Oriental towns have always by preference been narrow, sufficient for the foot passenger and baggage-animal, and affording shelter from the sun to the merchants and tradesmen. Such are the streets of Hebron and Zidon; and in Damascus the 'street called straight' (Ac 9<sup>11</sup>), once a broad Roman carriage-way, with a foot-path on each side of the stately colonnade, now shows a return to the Oriental type.

* Any payment made from time to time by the Emir or Sheikh was of the undefined nature of a gratuity, the term for which in Arabic, judl-in-Na'amah, is the equivalent of St. Paul's 'exceeding riches of grace.'

Then, lastly, the entire city, with its massive girdling wall, had the attitude both of friendly enclosure and hostile exclusion.

DAMASCUS CITY-GATE—ENTRANCE TO STRAIGHT STREET.

The chief meanings of an Oriental city are thus found to be Safety, Society, Service. Thus we read in Ps 107 of 'a city to dwell in,' 'a city of habitations,' around which men 'sow fields' (vv. 4, 36, 37). Abraham, dwelling in his black movable tent, journeyed by faith towards a fair city 'which hath foundations' (He 11<sup>10</sup>). In Rev 21. 22 these various features appear as borrowed from the green earth in the glorified vision of the Holy City. There the tabernacle of God is with men; the city has its wall and gates; as an extended family-house it has 'foundations' like the special cornerstone; it is a place of safety into which the nations bring their glory and honour; it has its own fountain-head supply of water, and abundant means of sustaining life; there the servants serve their Lord; and all who are hostile to its order and interests shall in no wise enter into it. CLAUDIA (Κλαυδία).—A Christian lady at Rome, who, with Eubulus, Pudens, and Linus, was on intimate terms of friendship with St. Paul and Timothy at the time of St. Paul's second imprisonment (2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>). The name suggests a connexion with the imperial household, but whether as a member of the gens Claudia or as a slave there is nothing to decide. Tradition treats her as the mother or, less probably, the sister of Linus (Apost. Const. vii. 46, Αἰὼς ὁ Κλαυδίας); she may also have become wife of Pudens, if they are to be identified with Claudius Pudens and Claudia Quinctilla, whose inscription to the memory of their infant child has been found between Rome and Ostia (CIL vi. 15,066). Another very ingenious but precarious conjecture identifies her with Claudia Rufina, wife of Martial's friend, Aulus Pudens (Martial, Epigr. iv. 13, xi. 53). On this theory she would be of British origin, a lady of high character and cultivation, and the mother of three sons; perhaps the daughter of the British king Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, who had taken the name of Rufina from Pomponia, the wife of Aulus Plautus, the Roman commander in Britain, and had come to Rome in her train (T. Williams, Claudia and Pudens, Llandoverly, 1848; E. H. Plumptre in Ellicott, N.T. Comm. ii. p. 185; but against the theory, Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, Clem. i. pp. 29 and 76-79). W. LOCK.

CLAUDIUS (Κλαύδιος), the name by which the fourth emperor of Rome is commonly known. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus was the son of Nero Claudius Drusus and of Antonia, whose mother, Octavia, was a sister of the emperor Augustus. Born at Lyons on 1st August, B.C. 10, he was of weak health and apparently feeble intellect (see the opinion of Augustus as given in Suet. Claud. 4, and the excuse of C. himself in Suet. Claud. 38); consequently he was kept in retirement, without being allowed to hold any but unimportant offices, until the reign of Gaius, while the honours conferred upon him by the latter would scarcely seem to have been seriously meant. His time was occupied in historical and literary studies, as well as in less creditable occupations (Suet. Claud. 33. 41-42), until the prætorian guards, by a freak which disappointed all previous expectations (cf. Tac. Ann. iii. 18. 7), raised him to the principate on 24th Jan. A.D. 41—a position which he occupied until he was murdered by his wife Agrippina, on 12th Oct. 54.

Recent inquiry has conclusively shown that the government of the Roman Empire under Claudius compares not unfavourably with that of the other early emperors. It is pointed out that C., although originally appointed through military influence at a time when the restoration of the republic was being seriously discussed, managed to conciliate the Senate and to obtain a permanent reputation as a constitutional 'princeps'; while, at the same time, considerable advances were made under his rule towards concentrating power more completely in the hands of imperial officers. The views of C. on the citizenship (see the speech quoted in Furneaux, Annals of Tacitus, ii. 208) show him to have been very different from the colourless figure to which traditional historians, following exclusively one side of the picture drawn by Tacitus and Suetonius, have reduced him. It might, however, be argued that the present reaction in his favour is going too far. He allowed his wives, Messalina and Agrippina, whether through their influence over him, or even without his knowledge, to interfere with the course of justice, and to do incalculable harm in Rome; he entrusted power to subordinates in a way which (in spite of the just remarks of Bury, Student's Rom. Emp. 244) shows him to have been but a weak ruler; and it is probable that C. should be considered to have had good intentions in certain respects, but to have been, for most practical purposes, powerless; while the effects of his reign, for good or evil, will have to be mainly set down to the credit of his leading freedmen, over whom he had proverbially little control (cf. Seneca, Ludus de morte Claudii, vi. 2).

For the events mentioned in NT which fall in the reign of Claudius, see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The emperor is twice mentioned by name:—

(1) In Ac 11<sup>28</sup> the prophecy by Agabus of a famine 'over the whole world' is said to have been fulfilled 'in the time of C.' Meyer and others protest against interpreting these words of any other famine than that to which Josephus refers (Ant. xx. ii. 5, v. 2) as occurring under Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander. Wieseler (Chron. apost. Zeit. p. 159), though puzzled by the allusion in Ant. III. xv. 3 to the high priest Ishmael, fixes the date of this famine, with considerable probability, at A.D. 45, adding that it may well have lasted for more than one year. There seems to be no reason to doubt that this famine is the one referred to in Ac 11<sup>28</sup>. At the same time it must be noted that famines seem to have been unusually prevalent during the reign of C. (see, for instance, Dio, lx. 11; Eus. Chron. ii. p. 152, ed. Sch.; Suet. Claud. 18, 'assiduæ sterilitates'); the person of C. was in danger from this cause (Tac. Ann. xii. 43), and the emperor became so sensitive on the point as to allow a dream, which was interpreted as foretelling dearth, to bring about the ruin of two Rom. knights (Tac. Ann. xi. 4). The carelessness of Gaius as regards the corn supply (Sen. de Brev. Vit. xviii. 5; Dio, lix. 17. 2) caused great difficulties to C. on his accession, and very vigorous measures were at once taken by the latter, and continued throughout his reign (Suet. Claud. xviii. 20; cf. Lehmann, Claudius, p. 135). When it was noticed that, in spite of these special precautions, famines were a characteristic of the time of C., it is not hard to see how the prophecy may have come to be regarded as amply fulfilled, even if taken in the widest sense.

(2) St. Paul met at Corinth two Jews, Aquila and his wife Priscilla, who had come thither 'because C. had commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome' (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>). Suetonius says (Claud. 25) that C. 'Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes expulit.' Dio (LX. vi. 6), perhaps correcting Suet., asserts that the Jews, whose numbers were so great as to make expulsion difficult, were not indeed expelled, but only forbidden to assemble together. The general policy of C. towards the Jews was favourable, as is shown by the two edicts, one relating to Alexandria, the other to the whole empire (Jos. Ant. XIX. v. 2, 3; cf. the edict of Petronius in XIX. vi. 3), which granted to them religious toleration, exemption from the hated military service, and some measure of self-government. But we are expressly told that he was influenced by his personal feeling towards Herod Agrippa I. (id. ib. XX. i. 1; cf. XIX. v. 2), to whom the emperor was indebted at the time of his accession (XIX. iv. 5). Not only did Agrippa receive 'consular honours' and such extensions of territory as to make his dominions coincide with those of Herod the Great, but his brother was given 'proconsular rank,' the rule over Chalcis, and, under the same title, over other districts, as well as the oversight of the temple (Dio, LX. viii.; Jos. Ant. XX. vii. 1, i. 3), while his son is described as having great influence at court (Jos. Ant. XX. i. 2; cf. vi. iii.). Anger has accordingly shown that the edict of Ac 18<sup>2</sup> must be put during the years when Agrippa II. was absent from Rome. As he remained in the capital till A.D. 50 (Wieseler, p. 67 n., 124), and had returned before the end of 52 (Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 3), these limits may be regarded as reasonably certain; but the attempt of Wieseler (pp. 125-3) to fix the date absolutely by a comparison with Tac. Ann. xii. 52. 3, though interesting and ingenious, is hardly convincing. It is no doubt true that the Jews often practised magic (e.g. Ac 8<sup>9</sup>), and Jews and magicians are often mentioned together, but they are, as Wieseler admits, clearly distinct, and Tacitus does not mention the Jews at all in this connexion.

P. V. M. BENECKE.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS (Κλαύδιος Λυσίας), the military tribune of the Roman cohort in Jerus., who is mentioned in Ac 21-23. Hearing that all Jerus. was in confusion, he came down with soldiers and centurions to investigate the cause of the uproar, and bound St. Paul with two chains. As the 'sicarii' had recently become very prominent in Judæa (cf. Jos. Ant. XX. viii. 5, 6), and were especially in evidence during the great festivals (id. BJ II. xiii. 3, 4), he imagined, the season being Pentecost, that St. Paul was an Egyptian who had recently led out 4000 'assassins' into the wilderness (Ac 21<sup>38</sup>), and who is described by Jos. (BJ II. xiii. 5) as having had 30,000 associates in all. On discovering his mistake, L. allowed St. Paul to address the people from the castle stairs; but the mention of the Gentiles renewed the disturbance, so that the tribune was obliged to bring him into the castle, and was only prevented from examining him by scourging through receiving the news that he was a Rom. citizen, and therefore by the Lex Porcia exempt from such treatment. L. next arranged an interview between St. Paul and the Jewish Council, but a dispute between the Sadducees and Pharisees was the only result; subsequently he learned that a synagogue had been formed with the object of converting the Jews, so he sent him to Cæsarea by night under an escort of 200 foot-soldiers, 70 horsemen, and 200 'spearmen' (δεξιολάβοι, see Meyer on Ac 23<sup>23</sup>). The letter given in Ac 23<sup>26-30</sup> as written by L. to the procurator Felix on this occasion has been considered by some eminent critics to be an invention by the historian. The letter would almost certainly have been written in Latin, and the word τύπος (v. 25) would seem to imply that only the general sense is given. But it must be noticed that in v. 27 L. represents himself as having rescued St. Paul because he discovered him to be a Roman, a falsification and inconsistency with Ac 23<sup>26-27</sup> of which the author of Ac. had been inventing, would not have been guilty (see, on opposite sides, Wendt and Nösgen on Ac 23<sup>27</sup>). The admission of L. that he had gained Rom. citizenship 'for a large sum' (implying his incredulity that a native of Tarsus should be a citizen and yet apparently so poor) illustrates the 'avarice of the Claudian times,' and the traffic in honours by Messalina and the imperial freedmen, partly due, no doubt, to a desire to replenish the treasury, partly to even more questionable motives, on which Dio Cassius indignantly comments (lx. 17. 6). See CITIZENSHIP. P. V. M. BENECKE.

CLAW.—In older Eng. c. was used for an animal's hoof, and for any of the parts into which a cloven hoof is divided. So in Dt 14<sup>6</sup> AV we read, 'And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, . . . that ye shall eat' (RV 'and hath the hoof cloven in two'); and in Zec 11<sup>18</sup> 'he shall eat the flesh of the fat, and tear their claws in pieces' (RV 'hoofs'). The Heb. is parṣah, the ordinary word for 'hoof,' in both passages. Cf. Lovell (1661): 'With claws like a Cow; but quadrifide.' The bird's c. is mentioned only Dn 4<sup>33</sup> 'his [Nebuchadrezzar's] nails like birds' claws' (no word in Heb., 'nails' [נַיִם] being understood). J. HASTINGS.

CLAY, (τις, γη, πηλός).—This word is frequently used in the Bible either in a literal or a metaphorical sense, in which latter it is parallel with 'dust' (comp. Gn 2<sup>7</sup> and Is 64<sup>4</sup>). Clay is widely distributed over the surface of nearly all countries, especially in valleys, and from the earliest times of the human race was used both for the construction of buildings and habitations and for the manufacture of pottery and works of art. It is a mixture of decomposed minerals of various kinds, and hence is exceedingly variable in composition. Alumina, silica, and potash are the principal constituents; but along with these may be variable quantities of lime, magnesia, and iron, which give variety both to the quality and colour. Hence various kinds of clay are suited for different uses in the arts.

1. As a building material, clay has been used from the earliest ages. Ancient Babylon, as described by Herodotus, and verified by modern discovery, was built of brick, either baked in kilns or dried in the sun; the other remains is the great wall of brickwork,—known as Babil, the Gate of God, corrupted by the Jews to 'Babel',* well have been supposed to be the 'Tower of Babel' described in Gn 11<sup>3-7</sup>, but that the inscriptions found thereon, by Sir Henry Rawlinson, show it to have been the famous Tower of the Seven Planets built by Nebuchadnezzar II. (B.C. 604-562). Of similar materials was built, in the main, the capital of Assyria, though blocks of limestone, alabaster, and other materials were also employed. The clay used in Nineveh was derived from the alluvia of the Tigris.† The brickmaking in Lower Egypt of the time of the Exodus is still carried on, the clay used being derived from the silt of the Nile; and bricks in the British Museum, inscribed with the names of Tahutmes I., B.C. 1700, and Ramses II., B.C. 1400, show straw mixed with the clay in order to bind it together as described in OT (Ex 1<sup>24</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>). Most of the villages both in Lower Egypt and in the Nile Valley are built of sun-dried clay; bricks of clay were also largely used in the construction of ancient Troy.‡

2. The use of clay for pottery was coeval with its use for building purposes. Remains of jars, vases, bowls, and other vessels are found amongst the most ancient ruins of Assyria, Babylonia, and Egypt. The potter's wheel was commonly employed in such works, and is often referred to in the Bible; but of all the purposes for which clay was employed in very ancient times, none was more interesting than its use for imprinting letters of cuneiform characters on tablets which have been discovered in immense numbers amongst the ruins of Assyria and Babylonia:§ they were either in the form of brick, or cylinders of clay, baked after the characters had been impressed. Amongst the most interesting is the story of the Creation, the Fall, and the Deluge, deciphered by the late George Smith of the British Museum:¶ of only less interest are the Tel el-Amarna tablets in Egypt, one of which has been discovered by Bliss amongst the ruins at Tell el-Hesi in Southern Palestine supposed to be Lachish, one of the five Amorite cities, Jos 10<sup>10</sup>, and dating as far back as B.C. 1480.** E. HULL.

CLEAN (see also UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS).—1. The orig. meaning of the word is clear, free from impurity, as applied to glass, gold, and the like, as Wyclif's tr. of Rev 21<sup>18</sup> 'The citee it self was of cleene gold, likk to cleene glas.' Whence it is used of the transparent purity of white garments, Rev 19<sup>8, 14</sup> 'fine linen, c. and white' (καθαρός, RV 'pure'). And then it is applied to anything that is not dirty (its modern use), as Pr 14<sup>4</sup> 'Where no oxen are, the crib is c.' (כר); Is 30<sup>24</sup> 'c. provender' (קִיץ, salted, RV 'savoury'); Zec 3<sup>5, 18</sup> Amer. RV 'a c. mitre' (מִטָּה, AV and RV 'fair'); Mt 27<sup>30</sup> 'a c. linen cloth' (καθαρός).

2. Before passing from its physical uses we may notice an early application in the sense of complete, still retained in such a phrase as 'a c. sweep.' The only example of the adj. is Lv 23<sup>22</sup> 'thou shalt not make c. riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest' (RV 'shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field'). But the adv. is more frequent, Jos 3<sup>17</sup> 'all the people were passed c. over Jordan' (עָבְרוּ מֵעַל הַיַּרְדֵּן were finished crossing), so 4<sup>1, 11</sup>, Ps 77<sup>8</sup> 'Is his mercy c. gone for ever?' J1 1<sup>7</sup> 'he hath made it c. bare'; Zec 11<sup>17</sup> 'his arm shall be c. dried up'; Wis 2<sup>13</sup> 'he is c. contrary to our doings' (ἐναντιοῦνται); 2 P 2<sup>18</sup> 'those that were c. escaped' (ΤΡ ἐν τῷ ἀποφύγοντας, edd. ὀλίγους ἀποφύγοντας, RV 'those who are just escaping'); and Ezk 37<sup>11</sup> RV 'we are c. cut off' (AV 'cut off for our parts'). Cf. Hooker, Echl. Pol. iii. i. 13 'Excommunication neither shutteth out from the mystical, nor clean from the visible Church.'

3. At a very early period the word passed into the language of religion to designate (1) that which does not ceremonially defile, whether (a) beasts, as Gn 7<sup>2</sup> 'of every c. beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens'; Dt 14<sup>11</sup> 'Of all c. birds ye shall eat'; or (b) places, as Lv 4<sup>22</sup> 6<sup>11</sup> 'without the camp unto a c. place'; or (c) things, as Is 66<sup>20</sup> 'the children of Israel shall bring an offering in a c. vessel'; Ezk 36<sup>25</sup> 'I will sprinkle c. water upon you'; Lk 11<sup>41</sup> 'all things are c. unto you' (where the ethical [see 4] closely approaches); and Ro 14<sup>20</sup> RV 'All things indeed are c.' (καθαρός, AV 'pure'); (2) persons who are not ceremonially defiled, as Lv 7<sup>19</sup> 'all that be (RV 'every one that is') c. shall eat thereof'; 1 S 20<sup>28</sup> 'Something hath befallen him, he is not c.; surely he is not c.'; Ezk 36<sup>25</sup> (see above) 'ye shall be c.' (יִכְיֶהוּ).

4. Closely related to its ceremonial use is the ethical, and quite as old. In passages like Ezk 36<sup>25</sup> Lk 11<sup>41</sup>, and esp. Jn 13<sup>10</sup> vs 15<sup>8</sup> we see the one passing into the other; in others the ethically stands out from the ceremonially religious meaning. Take first of all some passages where the Heb. is the usual vb. (tāhēr) or adj. (tāhór) used for ceremonial cleanness: Ps 19<sup>9</sup> 'The fear of the LORD is c.' (that is, the religion of J<sup>n</sup> is morally undefiled, in contrast to heathen religions; cf. Ps 12<sup>6</sup> 'the words of the LORD are pure words', where the Heb. is the same, a word freq. applied to 'pure' gold); Lv 16<sup>30</sup> 'from all your sins shall ye be c.'; Gn 35<sup>2</sup> 'Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be c., and change your garments'; Ps 51<sup>7</sup> 'purge me with hyssop, and I shall be c.'; 51<sup>10</sup> 'Create in me a clean heart.' Next, where the Heb. is bar, that is, 'clean' because cleansed, 'bright' because polished (as a p. arrow, Is 49<sup>2</sup>); Ps 73<sup>1</sup> 'such as are of c. heart'; Job 11<sup>4</sup> 'I am c. in thine eyes'; cf. Is 52<sup>11</sup> 'be ye c. that bear the vessels of the LORD' (קִרְיָ). Finally, where the Heb. is zākhāh or zākhak, 'be c.', zak, 'c.', always in a moral sense, Job 15<sup>14</sup> 'What is man that he should be c.?'; 9<sup>30</sup> 'If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so c.'; 15<sup>15</sup> 'the heavens are not c. in his sight'; 33<sup>9</sup> 'I am c., without transgression'; Pr 16<sup>2</sup> 'all the ways of a man are c. in his own eyes.'

5. In Ac 18<sup>8</sup> 'Your blood be upon your own heads; I am c.' the sense is guiltless, a very rare meaning for this word. Skene (1609) says, 'Gif he be made quit, and cleane; all his gudes salbe restored to him.' See under CLEAR.

J. HASTINGS.

CLEAR, CLEARNESS.—The orig. meanings of these words (from Lat. clarus) are 'bright,' 'brilliant,' 'manifest,' 'famous.' But the Eng. words early adopted the moral sense of 'pure,' 'guiltless,' partly through the natural association of these ideas, and partly through confusion with the native words clean, cleanness. 1. Of the orig.

meanings, we find in AV (in add. to the mod. sense of 'manifest') (a) ? 2 S 23<sup>4</sup> 'By c. shining after rain'; Am 8<sup>1</sup> 'I will darken the earth in the c. day'; Zec 14<sup>8</sup> '... shall be c.' (RV 'with ...'); Is 18<sup>4</sup> 'like a c. heat upon herbs' (RV 'like a c. heat in sunshine'); Rev 22<sup>1</sup> 'c. as crystal' (λαμπρός, RV 'brilliant'); 2<sup>11</sup> 'c. as crystal' (κρυστάλλινον); so with 'clearness', Ex 24<sup>10</sup> 'as it were the body of heaven in his c.' (RV 'the very heaven for c.'); 2 Es 2<sup>1</sup> 'let the blind man come into the sight of my c.' (RV 'glory'); (b) Brilliance, Job 11<sup>17</sup> 'thine age (RV 'thy life') shall be clearer than the noonday' (RV 'arise above'). Cf. Wyclif's tr. of Wis 6<sup>18</sup> 'Wisdom is cler' (λαμπρός, AV 'glorious', RV 'radiant'). A thing is bright often because it is unspotted, whence the transition is easy to moral spotlessness. We see the transition taking place in Ca 6<sup>10</sup> 'fair as the moon, c. as the sun' (RV); and Rev 21<sup>18</sup> 'the city was pure gold, like unto c. glass' (καθαρός, RV 'pure'). 2. Purity, innocence, Ps 51<sup>4</sup> 'that thou shalt be ... c. when thou judgest' (RV); Gn 2<sup>1</sup> 'thou shalt be c. from my oath' (RV); Sus<sup>46</sup> 'I am c. from the blood of this woman' (RV); 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> 'ye have approved yourselves to be c. in this matter' (RV). In this sense only is the verb used, Ex 34<sup>7</sup> 'that will by no means c.' (RV); Nu 14<sup>18</sup>; Gn 44<sup>18</sup> 'how shall we c.' (RV); 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> 'what clearing of yourselves' (RV). And in this sense there is a solitary instance of the use of 'clearly', Job 33<sup>8</sup> 'my lips shall utter knowledge c.' (RV 'speak sincerely'), with which cf. Tillotson (1694), 'Deal clearly and impartially with yourselves.'

J. HASTINGS.

CLEAVE, CLEFT, CLIFF, CLIFT.—There are two verbs 'to cleave' distinct in origin and meaning. (1) Cleave, to split asunder, cleave, cloven. (2) Cleave, to adhere, cleaved, cleaved. But the one has affected the other so as to cause some confusion. Thus c.=to split, has also a past ptep. cleft, Mic 1<sup>4</sup> 'the valleys shall be cleft'; and c.=to stick, has the quite irregular past tense clave, more common in AV than any other form of either verb. Clift, meaning a fissure or crevice, is a word of distinct origin from either verb. It occurs in AV Ex 33<sup>22</sup> 'I will put thee in a clift of the rock'; and Is 57<sup>8</sup> 'under the clifts of the rocks.' In other places where it occurs in mod. edd. of AV it is spelt cleft (and RV so spells it in these passages) through confusion with the verb cleave, 'to split.' Thus Ca 2<sup>14</sup>, Jer 49<sup>16</sup>, Ob<sup>3</sup>, Is 2<sup>1</sup> (RV 'caverns'), Am 6<sup>1</sup>. In Dt 14<sup>6</sup> 'Every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws' (lit. 'cleaveth the cleft of the two hoofs'), the word 'cleft' no doubt means the division of the hoof, but it is formed directly from 'cleave' in imitation of the Heb. (cf. Lv 11<sup>3</sup> פָּרָה שֶׁקֶץ שֶׁקֶץ), the division or toe of the hoof being properly represented by 'claws.' This word 'clift' has been further confused with cliff, a steep face of rock; whence in Job 30<sup>6</sup> it is spelt 'cliff' in mod. edd. of AV (1611 'clifts', RV 'clefts'). The word 'clift' itself occurs once, 2 Ch 20<sup>18</sup> 'they come up by the c. of Ziz' (RV 'ascent').

CLEMENT (Κλήμης), a fellow-labourer with St. Paul at Philippi (Ph 4<sup>8</sup>). It was commonly held in the early Church that this C. is to be identified with Clemens Romanus, one of the first bishops of Rome, who wrote the well-known Epistle to the Church of Corinth (cf. Orig. In Joan. i. 29; Eus. HE iii. 4). But, though in the absence of fuller information it is impossible to say for certain, there are serious difficulties both as to place and time in accepting this view. Thus we hear of St. Paul's fellow-labourer in connexion only with Philippi, while the other C. is associated with Rome. Nor is it likely that the former can have lived till A.D. 110, that is, about 50 years after the date of the Philippian Epistle, and before which date we cannot well place the death of the Rom. bishop. Again, as proving the commonness of the name, it has been pointed out that Tacitus alone mentions five Clements (Ann. i. 23, ii. 39, xv. 73; Hist. i. 86, iv. 68). (See Lightfoot on Ph 4<sup>8</sup>, and detached note p. 166; and the same writer's St. Clement of Rome.) G. MILLIGAN.

CLEOPAS (Κλεόπας).—Only Lk 24<sup>18</sup>; whether to be identified with Clopas of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> and Alphæus of Mt 10<sup>3</sup> etc., see ALPHÆUS and BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

CLEOPATRA (Κλεοπάτρα, 'daughter from a famous father').—A female name of great antiquity (Aristot. Pol. i. 5; Il. ix. 556), and very common in the names of the Ptolemies and Seleucids.

1. A daughter of Antiochus the Great. In B.C. 193 she was married to Ptolemy Epiphanes, with the taxes of Coele-Syria and Pal. as her dowry (Jerome ad Dan. 11<sup>17</sup>; Jos. Ant. xii. iv. 1; App. Syr. 5; Liv. xxxvii. 3; Polyb. xxviii. 17). After her husband's death she ruled with vigour as regent for her son until her own death, in B.C. 173.

2. A daughter of Cleopatra and Ptolemy Epiphanes. She married in B.C. 173 her own brother Ptolemy Philometor (Ad. Est 11<sup>3</sup>), and afterwards her second brother Ptolemy Physcon (Liv. xlv. 13; Epit. 59; Justin, xxxviii. 8). She greatly favoured the Jews in Egypt (Jos. c. Apion. ii. 5), and encouraged Onias IV. in the erection of the temple at Leontopolis (Jos. Ant. xiii. iii. 2).

3. A daughter of Cleopatra and Ptolemy Philometor. In B.C. 150 she was given in marriage by her father to Alexander Balas (1 Mac 10<sup>57, 58</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 1). When Balas was driven into Arabia she became (B.C. 146) at her father's bidding the wife of his rival, Demetrius Nikator (1 Mac 11<sup>12</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 7; Liv. Epit. 52). Whilst Demetrius was detained in captivity amongst the Parthians, she married (B.C. 140) his brother, Antiochus Sidetes (Jos. Ant. xiii. vii. 1). Sidetes died in B.C. 128; but when Demetrius, after his restoration, sought help from Cleopatra, she refused to see him, and possibly instigated his murder (Jos. Ant. xiii. ix. 3; Justin, xliix. 1; App. Syr. 68; Liv. Epit. 60). Her son, Antiochus Grypus, became king through her influence; but, being detected in treason, she was compelled to take poison in B.C. 120 (Justin, xxxix. 2).

4. A native of Jerus., and wife of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvii. i. 3). She was the mother of Philip, tetrarch of Ituræa (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>).

R. W. MOSS.

CLOKE, so in both AV and RV instead of mod. cloak (עֵל מִעֵל, עֵלֶם simlah, etc.; ἱμάτιον, στολή, etc., Arab. jubbeh, abba, etc.).—The cloke was the ordinary upper garment worn over the coat (kethoneth). The two occur together in Mt 5<sup>40</sup>, Lk 6<sup>29</sup>. The prominent meanings in these different terms are those of spaciousness, length, ornament, etc. Hence they are used to represent the general, and translated 'apparel', 'garment', 'vesture', and metaphorically as the 'robe of zeal' (Is 59<sup>17</sup>) or the robe of righteousness (Is 61<sup>10</sup>). In size and material it varied according to age and sex, the class and the wearer: as shepherd, tradesman, priest, prince. In shape it might be sewn up to have the surplice form of the robe of the ephod (Ex 39<sup>23</sup>), or be worn loose and open, like a Geneva gown or Spanish cloak. It was the 'garment' not to be kept as a forfeited pledge (Ex 22<sup>26</sup>, Dt 24<sup>18</sup>), the 'garment' of Joseph in Potiphar's house (Gn 39<sup>12</sup>). It is the equivalent of 'mantle', 'robe', as the robe that Jonathan gave to David (1 S 18<sup>4</sup>), Saul's cut robe (1 S 24<sup>4</sup>), Samuel's robe (1 S 28<sup>4</sup>), the 'best robe' of the parable (Lk 15<sup>23</sup>). The cloke of 2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup> (φελδύτης) may have been a light mantle like a cashmere dust-cloak, in which the books and parchments were wrapped. The use of cloke in 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup> (προφασίς), 1 P 2<sup>13</sup> (ἐπικάλυμμα) is general for covering, excuse. See DRESS, under μέλι.

G. M. MACKIE.

CLOPAS (AV Cleophas) is named only in Jn 19<sup>25</sup> Μαριάμ ἡ τοῦ Κλωπά. As to his identity see ALPHEUS and BROTHERS OF THE LORD.

CLOSE in the sense of secret occurs Lk 9<sup>38</sup> 'they kept it c., and told no man' (ἐσίγησαν, RV 'they held their peace'). Cf. Pref. to 1611, 'How shall they understand that which is kept close in an unknown tongue?' The 'close places' of 2 S 22<sup>46</sup> = Ps 18<sup>45</sup> are castles or holds, places shut in with high walls, and so deemed safe. Cf. More (1529), 'al close religious houses.' J. HASTINGS.

CLOSET (from Lat. claudere, through Fr. closet, dim. of clos, 'an enclosed space').—Any private apartment, as Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. ii. 134—

'But here's a parchment with the seal of Cæsar;
I found it in his closet, 'tis his will!'

Hamlet, II. i. 77—

'As I was sewing in my closet.

The king's private secretary was called 'clerk of the closet.' Closet occurs J1 2<sup>16</sup> (καρτ. fr. καρτ 'to cover,' prob. of the bridal tent, used also of the bridegroom's c., Ps 19<sup>5</sup>); Mt 6<sup>6</sup>, Lk 12<sup>3</sup> (RV 'inner chamber.' Gr. ταμείον, properly 'a storeroom,' as in Lk 12<sup>34</sup>: 'store-chambers,' says Plummer in loc., 'are commonly inner-chambers, secret rooms, esp. in the East, where outer walls are so easily dug through'). See HOUSE. J. HASTINGS.

CLOTH, CLOTHING.—See DRESS.

CLOTHED UPON in 2 Co 5<sup>2</sup> has been chosen to express the force of the ἐντρί in ἐπενδύσασθαι (only here in NT), to put on something in addition to what is already on. In Jn 21<sup>7</sup> Peter 'girt his coat' (ἐπενδύσας) about him, 'without which he was 'naked,' that is, had on only the light undergarment, perhaps only the loin cloth. See DRESS.

J. HASTINGS.

CLOUD (πῦρ ἀνάν; νέφος).—Much of the precious and beautiful thought of the Bible is written on the clouds, and in the sky of Syria this writing of religious symbolism and moral teaching is as readable to-day as the inscriptions engraved on Assyrian brick or Egyptian granite. Though the Hebrews had various names for clouds, it is probable that their knowledge of the weather, like that of the modern Syrians, was confined to such general and obvious points as the direction of the wind and the deeper flame of the evening sky. This indifference is partly due to the uniformity of the climate, with its recognized season of rainfall from Oct. to April, and of sunshine from May to Sept. Forecasting the changes of the weather would also be difficult on account of their suddenness in that narrow land of mountains and valleys, with a desert on one side and the sea on the other. Except to the fishermen of Galilee, and the husbandmen at the time of sowing, the interpretation of the signs of the weather was a matter of small importance. Further, the Jews, who generally preserve most of the ancient piety of the land, disapprove of criticising the weather, as savouring of irreverence. Any pointed reference to the weather or inquiry about it usually finds a Syrian surprised and unprepared for comment, as it is a matter out of the usual round of his salutations.

Such attention to the clouds is in fact not held in high repute: as the Arab proverb says, 'The man who will not work becomes an astrologer.'

I. CLOUDS AS AN INDICATION OF RAIN.—1. 'A cloud rising in the West' (Lk 12<sup>54</sup>).—The rainy quarters are W. and S.W. Hence Gehazi was told (1 K 18<sup>44</sup>) to look toward the sea for the first sign of rain. He saw what is still often seen at the end of Sept., when the dry summer season is about to end in the early rain, namely, a small cloud of cool ashy-grey colour rising over the glittering horizon. It is the first token that a strong steady S.W. wind has set in, and will carry everything before it. In a few hours the sky becomes a course of swiftly moving black clouds, which congregate in dense masses on the mountains, and before long the storm breaks with a grand prelude of thunder peals and incessant flashes of lightning. 2. 'Clouds of the latter rain' (Pr 16<sup>15</sup>).—The king's favour. This refers to the rain which depends on the more continuous winter rains, but they refresh the ripening fields of barley and wheat, delaying the harvest, and causing the ears to mature into a heavier crop in May and June. 3. 'Clouds of dew in the heat of harvest' (Is 18<sup>4</sup>).—The season is here the autumn harvest of fruits, when unusual moisture in the sky, or a wandering shower, is an unwelcome phenomenon, causing withering heat in the vineyards and feverish symptoms among the people (see, however, Del. ad loc.). 4. 'Heat by the shadow of a cloud' (Is 25<sup>3</sup>).—This is most likely an allusion to the prostrating wind from the Syrian desert, S. and S.E., which covers the sky with hot sand-clouds (Sirocco, from Arab. shirkh, East). It is this that gives the 'sky of brass' (Dt 28<sup>3</sup>), and the 'cloud without water' (Jude v. 12).

II. CLOUDS AS A SYMBOL OF THE TRANSITORY.—It is a common phenomenon of the Syrian sky to see a cloud, borne eastward by the sea-breeze, suddenly and mysteriously dissolve as it encounters the hot dry air of the inland district. The cloud is something that melts and leaves no vestige of its existence. The artistic appreciation of landscape did not exist in ancient times: the thought had not been expressed that the floating clouds can lend their state and grace of motion to those who live in communion with them. The eye was occupied with moral issues. Thus the cloud becomes a text on life's brevity (Job 7<sup>9</sup>). Such was prosperity (Job 30<sup>15</sup>). In the same way, it represents the deep reality of forgiveness (Is 44<sup>22</sup>). Such evanescence is the special peculiarity of the morning cloud, which appears at sunrise in the valleys and melts away an hour afterwards. It was the moral emblem and historical epitome of Ephraim and Judah (Hos 6<sup>4</sup>). Its companions were the chaff of the threshing-floor and the smoke of the chimney (Hos 13<sup>3</sup>).

III. CLOUDS AS A COVERING.—In this connexion the meaning passes from the screening of the sun's rays (Lk 13<sup>27</sup>), to imply shadow, obscurity, and oblivion. Job prays that a cloud may rest upon the day of his birth (Job 3<sup>5</sup>). Again (Job 38<sup>9</sup>) we have the majestic metaphor of the cloud as the swaddling-clothes of the new-born world. The union of power and humility in the king, 'when mercy seasons justice,' is likened to the bright benediction of a morning without clouds in spring-time (2 S 23<sup>4</sup>).

IV. CLOUDS AS THE DWELLING-PLACE OF THE ETERNAL.—The highest stratum of cloud-imagery was reached when, in addition to what was merely high and wonderful and mysterious in nature, clouds came to be recognized as a means of revelation the vesture of the divine presence, and the vehicle of the divine purpose. 'The bow in the cloud' (Gn 9<sup>14</sup>) was so far in the line of the old astrology, which saw a divine meaning in the heavens. The cloud (ánán) seems here to mean the whole circle of the sky: hence mē'nēn, soothsayer; cf. Arab. falāk 'sky,' falaki 'astrologer.' The cloud often appears as the God's presence, power, and protection. He keeps the rain-clouds suspended (Job 26). He numbers, balances, commands them, and has a purpose in their mysterious spreadings and motions (Job 36<sup>29</sup> 37<sup>18</sup> 38<sup>27</sup>, Ps 78<sup>23</sup>). The cloud of His presence settled upon the mount, and left there the light of His commandments. In this form His presence crowned the preparations of the sanctuary, rested upon it when it rested, led its marches in the wilderness, and reappeared in the completed temple (Ex 13<sup>21</sup> 40<sup>34</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>10</sup>). Clouds are the chariot of God (Ps 104<sup>3</sup>, Is 19<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 10<sup>4</sup>), and the dust of His feet (Nah 1<sup>9</sup>). The same emblem of intercession; the light, partial knowledge, and hidden glory appears in NT, where a cloud closes the story of the Incarnation (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>), and clouds are the heralds of the Second Advent (Rev 17). See also PILLAR.

CLOUT.—As subst. Jer 38<sup>11-12</sup> 'So Ebed-melech took thence old cast clouts and old rotten rags, and . . . said unto Jeremiah, Put now these old cast clouts and rotten rags under thine armholes under the cords.' As vb. Jos 9<sup>5</sup> 'old shoes and clouted upon their feet' (Amer. RV 'patched'). Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry VI. iv. ii. 195—

'Spare none but such as go in clouted shoon;'

and Latimer, Serm. p. 110, 'Paul yea, and Peter too, had more skill in mending an old net, and in clouting an old tent, than to teach lawyers what diligence they should use in the expedition of matters.' The word is Celtic, and came in early, but Wyclif, in Jos 9<sup>5</sup>, has 'sowid with patchis.'

CLUB (Job 41<sup>29</sup> RV).—The 'club' was a common weapon among shepherds. See HAND-STAVES and also under DART (Heb. shebhet).

The rod, sceptre, or club of iron (shebhet barzel, Ps 2<sup>9</sup>) was carried by kings, as seen in the Assyr. reliefs in the Kouyunjik Gallery, B.M., esp. the figure of Assur-nazir-pal. Cf. Is 10<sup>5</sup> 'Ho Assyrian, the rod (shebhet) of mine anger.'

CNIDUS (Κνίδος), a city of Caria, a Dorian colony, was situated at the extremity of a narrow peninsula which juts far out towards the W. into the Aegean Sea. In this situation it was the dividing point between the western and southern coast of Asia Minor. Hence a coasting voyage westward along the southern coast of Asia Minor came to an end off C.; and from thence the ship had to begin a new period and method in its course towards Rome (Ac 27<sup>7</sup>). The city was situated partly on a small island off the south side; the island was connected with the mainland by a causeway in ancient times, and is now joined to it by a sandy isthmus. There were two excellent harbours at C., one of which could be closed by a chain. Like Chios (which see), C. had the rank of a free city. It contained Jewish inhabitants as early as the 2nd cent. (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>; see CARIA, DELOS).

COAL (חֶמֶד, חֶמֶד, חֶמֶד, חֶמֶד; ánθραξ, ánθρακιά).—The variety, esp. in OT, of the words rendered 'coal' in AV makes it advisable to consider them separately, first of all. For philological details the lexicons must be consulted.

1. Gáheleth (LXX uniformly ánθραξ, Vulg. pruna, carbo, scintilla) is the most frequently used, occurring seventeen times. Its design:

live embers, and is sometimes full expressive of 'coals of fire,' or 'burning coals of fire.' Its special meaning is well seen in Pr 26<sup>21</sup> (RV embers), where it evidently denotes burning, as contrasted with fresh unburnt fuel (see Peham below). In Pr 6<sup>28</sup>, Is 44<sup>19</sup> 47<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 24<sup>11</sup> it is used of a fire in reference to such ordinary effects as burning, baking, warming, boiling. In 2 S 14<sup>7</sup> it describes figuratively the life of a family as embodied in the last surviving member of its line (Vulg. scintilla). In 2 S 22<sup>5, 18</sup> and the parallel Ps 18<sup>8, 12</sup>, and also in Ezk 1<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> 'coals of fire' are associated with the manifestation of God, the reference being to lightning, or to the elemental fires from which lightning is supposed to proceed. Gáheleth occurs in Job 41<sup>21</sup> in a metaphor (similar to that in Ps 18 above) descriptive of the fiery breath of leviathan. In Ps 120<sup>4</sup> we find 'coals of broom' (ánθ, gemista monosperma, not JUNIPER, which see) used to denote either the punishment of the false tongue, or its devouring character, the emblem of the plant in question being known to retain their heat for a specially long time. In Ps 140<sup>10</sup> 'coals of fire' form one of the punishments of the wicked, as also in the famous figure of retribution by kindness in Pr 25<sup>22</sup>, repeated in NT Ro 12<sup>20</sup>.

2. Pe'et (פֶּתֶת, Vulg. carbo, pruna) occurs in Pr 26<sup>21</sup> it clearly means unburnt coals put on live embers. In Is 44<sup>12</sup> 54<sup>16</sup>, however, the reference is to the live coals used in smiths' work. In Ps 11<sup>6</sup>, if the conjectural reading פֶּתֶת (for פֶּתֶת) be correct, we have 'coals of fire' (so AVm) rained on the wicked, along with brimstone, instead of the less congruous 'snares, fire,' etc.

3. Rizpah is found twice, in the phrases 'a cake baked on the coals' (1 K 19<sup>6</sup>), and 'a live coal . . . from off the altar' (Is 6<sup>6</sup>). It is probable that in both cases the word means a hot stone (RVm). In the latter, LXX has ánθραξ and Vulg. calculus, while in the former both VSS are less literal (LXX ἐγκρυφίλας ὀλυπετρης, Vulg. subcinericius panis), with a general allusion to the process of BAKING (which see).

4. Resheph is twice rendered 'coal' in AV, Ca 8<sup>6</sup> (LXX περίπρεπον, Vulg. lampas, RV 'flash'), Hab 3<sup>5</sup> (LXX omits the subject in clause b, Vulg. diabolus, AVm 'burning diseases,' RV 'fiery bolts'). The word occurs elsewhere in OT (Dt 32<sup>24</sup>, Job 5<sup>7</sup>, Ps 76<sup>3</sup> 78<sup>48</sup>), and means 'a pointed, darting flame.' In Dt and Hab it seems to denote 'the fiery bolts by which J' was imagined to produce pestilence or fever' (Driver). In connexion with this it is suggestive that Resheph appears to have been the name of a Phoen. fire-god. He is referred to as an Asiatic deity in inscriptions found in Egypt and elsewhere, particularly in certain bilingual (Gr. and Phoen.) ones in Cyprus, where he is identified with Apollo. (For this point see the note in Driver, Deut. pp. 367, 368, and the authorities there given.)

5. Shêhor is tr. 'coal' in La 4<sup>8</sup>. The literal meaning of the word is 'blackness' (RVm).

6. ánθραξ (tr. 'carbuncle' To 13<sup>14</sup>, Sir 32<sup>5</sup>) means 'coal' in Sir 8<sup>10</sup> (ánθρακας ἀμαρτωλοῦ), Ro 12<sup>20</sup> (from Pr 25<sup>22</sup>). ánθρακιά is found in Sir 11<sup>32</sup>, 4 Mac 9<sup>20</sup>, Jn 18<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>.

'Coal' therefore is, strictly speaking, a correct rendering only of gáheleth and peham and their Gr. equivalents. Gáheleth may denote the glowing embers of any kind of fuel (wood, bones, etc., Ezk 24<sup>11</sup>), but by it and peham, apart from their poetic and figurative use, we are generally to understand charcoal, which is a common article of fuel in the E., and in the preparation of which the forests of Pal., as well as those of other districts, are rapidly

The subject of fuel will be more fully dealt with under FIRE.

True mineral coal has not been found in Pal. proper, where the only formation as a whole is recent. The only carboniferous period, if they exist, are not near the surface. Two strata of this age, however, have been recognized. They are those known as the Desert Sandstone and the Wady Nasb limestone, but they are not accompanied by any coal. Coal of an inferior quality has been found at Sidon, and coal-mining was also carried on for a time in Lebanon, but was abandoned after some 12,000 tons had been extracted (Conder, Tent Work in Pal. ii. 326. For the coal of Pal. see Hull, Survey of W. Pal. and there mentioned, pp. 5, 6).

COAST (Lat. costa, rib, side) is now confined to the sea-shore, but formerly was used of the side of any person, place, or thing, and in AV is frequently used for the border or any place, inland or other. Thus, "and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof."

"It would be unreasonable," says On a Fresh Revision, p. 194, "to expect the reader to understand that when St. Paul passes 'through the upper coasts' (ἐν ἀνωτάτοις μερίσιν) on his way to Ephesus (Ac 19), he does in fact traverse the high land which lies in the interior of Asia Minor. . . . of our Lord's time (Lk 7:31), he naturally speaks of the sea-board, knowing these to be maritime cities, whereas the word in or other for ὅρια . . . the eastern . . . may be utterly . . . upon the sea-coast" (Mt 4:13).

COAT (קִּיטָה kēthōneth, χιτών), made of cotton, linen, fine wool, and probably silk. The garment of home-life and ordinary work, worn under the cloak and over the undershirt, or sheet (ἵμας), and sometimes instead of it, drawn tightly round the waist by belt or girdle, in shape like a dic-sing-gown or cassock (see DRESS, under k'thōneth). It is the coat of Joseph (Gn 37), of the priests (Ex 28<sup>4</sup>, Lv 8<sup>13</sup>), of women's dress (Ca 5<sup>3</sup>), of Christ (Jn 19<sup>23</sup>), of the disciples (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>, Lk 6<sup>29</sup>). Coat is translated 'garment' in 2 S 13<sup>18, 19</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>29</sup>, Neh 7<sup>70</sup>, Jude 23; 'clothes' in Mk 14<sup>68</sup>; 'robe' in Is 22<sup>21</sup>. The coat of 1 S 2<sup>19</sup>, the annual present to Samuel, was a woollen cloak (mē'il); that of Jn 21<sup>7</sup>, fisher's c. (ἐπενδύσας), would be a large cloak for covering in public and protection at night, the fisherman merely wearing a large apron or waist-cloth when busy with the net. The coat of Dn 3<sup>21</sup>, RV hosen (חֲסִינָה, Arab. sirwāl), was the skirt-trousers of Persian costume.

COCK (ἀλεκτωρ, alektor, gallus).—The domestic fowl may be the bird mentioned 1 K 4<sup>23</sup>, בָּרְבָרִים barburim, and translated in AV and RV fatted fowls. It is not unlikely that Solomon, who had commerce with the far East, and imported peacocks and apes from Ophir (1 K 10), had heard of the barnyard fowls from the same source. The original stock of these fowls is usually supposed to be indigenous in farther India and China. Gallus gigas, of Malacca, seems to be the feral state of some of the larger tame breeds, and G. bankiva, of Java, which is regarded by many as specifically the same as G. ferrugineus, the jungle fowl, is supposed to be the parent of our ordinary poultry. In India, poultry have been domesticated from the earliest times. But no representation of them is found on the Egyptian monuments. Pindar mentions the cock, and Homer names a man Ἀλέκτωρ, the word for a cock. Aristophanes calls it a Persian bird. It may have been introduced into Pal. before it came to Greece. Nevertheless, unless in this doubtful passage, it is not mentioned in OT. Commentators have tried various other renderings of barburim, as swans, guinea fowls, geese, capon, and fatted fish. But these are pure conjectures.

The Romans were very much given to raising fowls, both for food and for cock-fighting. The Mishna states that cocks were not allowed in Jerus., for fear of polluting the holy things. But there is rabbinic evidence that the Jews kept fowls. The Romans and other foreigners also kept them.

The cock is mentioned in NT in connexion with Peter's denial of Christ (Mt 26<sup>34, 74</sup> etc.). Cock-crowing (Mk 13<sup>35</sup>) refers to the habit of crowing before the dawn. This is the second cock-crowing (Mk 14<sup>30</sup>), the first being at midnight, but less certain or less heard than the second. Hence the other evangelists speak of the crowing of the cock without specifying that it was to be a second one (Mt 26<sup>34</sup>, Lk 22<sup>34</sup>, Jn 13<sup>38</sup>). In point of fact, cocks crow somewhat irregularly at intervals in the night. The hen is alluded to (Lk 13<sup>34</sup>) with reference to her motherly care of her brood, with which the Saviour compares his solicitude for Jerusalem.

COCKATRICE.—See SERPENT.

COCK-CROWING (ἀλεκτοροφωνία, Mk 13<sup>35</sup>).—See COCK, TIME.

COCKER.—Sir 30<sup>9</sup> 'C. thy child, and he shall make thee afraid,' that is 'pamper' (Gr. τιθηνέω, nurse, suckle). Cf. Shaks. King John v. i. 70—

'Shall a beardless boy,
A cocker'd silken wanton, brave our fields?'

and Hull (1611) 'No creatures more cocker their young than the Asse and the Ape.' The word is not found earlier than the 15th cent. Its origin is obscure.

J. HASTINGS.

COCKLE (שָׂחָה bo'sháh, βάτος, spina).—The last word of the second member of a parallelism (Job 31<sup>40</sup>), 'instead of wheat let thistles grow, and instead of barley, cockle.' The signification of the parallel word שָׂחָה hōah is general, brier or bramble. Therefore this word should be general. And as the first is harmful, the second should be the same. The root of the word is שָׂחָה = 'stink,' hence the marginal rendering, AV stinking weeds, RV noisome weeds, is the case well. There is no want of such in the Holy Land. There are a number of ill-smelling goose weeds, Solanum nigrum, L., Datura Stramonium, L. (the stink-weed par excellence), D. Metel, L., and several fetid arums, and henbane, and mandrake. Neglected fields are overrun by the host of thorny and unsavoury weeds which afflict the farmer in all parts of Pal. and Syria. Some have thought that bo'sháh means ergot or smut or bunt, and others tares. There is, however, no ground for this.

A word from the same root, שָׂחָה bē'shām (Is 5<sup>24</sup>), is tr. in AV and RV wild grapes. The context and the etymology are against this rendering. The terrible judgment pronounced against the vineyard (vv. 26-28), the common use of the product were simply inferior. The contrast must be between judgment and righteousness and the cry of the oppressed. We should therefore look for some ill-smelling fruit, having some resemblance to a grape, and occurring in vineyards. Such plants are Solanum nigrum, L., and its congeners S. minutum, Berb., and S. villosum, Lam., called in Arab. inab-edh-dhib, wolf's grapes. They are of a heavy narcotic odour, and poisonous, and grow commonly in the vineyards. Celsius supposes aconite; but the latter is not found south of Amanus, and hence would not be known to the readers of Isaiah. It is perhaps better to regard bē'ashim as stinking fruits in general, and bo'shah as stinking weeds. G. A. JONES.

COELE-SYRIA (Κολλη Συρία, 'hollow Syria') was the name given under the Seleucids to the valley between the Lebanons (Polyb. i. 3; Dionysius, Perieg. 899, 900), and this rest is retained in 1 Es 4<sup>48</sup>. The same ars in Am 1<sup>5</sup>, where, however, 'the valley of Aven' (which see) cannot be identified with Coele-Syria. 'The valley' (Jos 11<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>) denotes the same district. Strabo (xvi. 2) confines the term to this valley in describing the boundaries of the separate parts of Syria; but he also uses it more widely as covering the whole of Συρία or 'Syria of Damascus.' Theophrastus, too (Hist. plant. ii. 6. 2; see also ii. 6. 8), extends the name to the valley of the Lower Jordan, and in ii. 6. 5 to the of the Red Sea. Under the later most loses geogr. limitations altogether, and becomes a convenient name for a political division of the empire, the central valley always being included, but the boundaries being extended or contracted with every change in the relative influence of the local governors. For some time Phœnicia and Coele-Syria include between them the whole of the southern part of the Seleucid kingdom, and the latter term covers the entire district E. and S. of Lebanon. The term is so used in 1 Es 2<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>7</sup> 6<sup>29</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>67</sup>, 2 Mac 3<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>; and the relation between the two provinces is so close that a single governor generally suffices for both. In 1 Mac 10<sup>39</sup> the settlement of Jewish affairs is entrusted almost as a matter of course to the governor of Coele-Syria, and in 2 Mac 3<sup>8</sup> 9 Jerus. is expressly represented as within that province. In later times Jos. (Ant. xiv. iv. 5) wrote of the province as from the Euphrates to Egypt; and within it were the Phil. coast towns of Raphia (Jos. Wars, iv. xi. 5; Polyb. v. 80) and Joppa (Diodor. xix. 59). But he the term to the districts E. of the Moab and Ammon (Ant. i. xi. 5; admittin, S. (Bethshan) because of its connexion apolis (Ant. xiii. xiii. 2). He mentions also specifically Gadara (Ant. xiii. xiii. 3) as in the province, whilst the evidence of coins places within it also the neighbouring town of Rabbah; Gerasa, and Philoteria (Polyb. v. 70). Strictly, therefore, the term does not cover Judæa and Samaria, but was made to do so when it was wished to assert or enforce Syrian claims to those districts. In Jos. Ant. xii. iv. 1-4, in the time of Ptolemy Evergetes, the fiscal system and prob. the entire administration of C. are distinct from those of Judæa and Samaria. In the civil wars between the sons of Antiochus Grypus (B.C. 95-83), C., with Damascus prob. as its capital, was the name of a trans-Jordanic kingdom, separate from that of Syria proper. In B.C. 47 Herod was appointed by Sextus Cæsar (Jos. Ant. xiv. ix. 5; Wars, i. x. 8), and again by Cassius in B.C. 43 (Jos. Ant. xiv. xi. 4; Wars, i. xi. 4), military governor of C.; but on neither of these occasions did his appointment carry the exercise of any authority within Judæa.

COFFER occurs only in 1 S 6<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>15</sup>, and the Heb. term (קופה, LXX thēsa), of which it is the tr<sup>a</sup>, is also found nowhere else. From the fact that in the tr<sup>a</sup> the word has the article, some have an 'argāz was an appendage to every cart ('āghālāh), but this is not necessary (Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. p. 43 f.). The 'argāz appears to have been a small chest which contained (?) the golden figures sent by the Philistines as a guilt-offering. COLLAR.—1. The collars of Jg 8<sup>26</sup> (קוֹלָרִים) are golden ear-drops, RV pendants. 2. The ref. in Job 30<sup>16</sup> is to the collar-band (קַיִם) of the undergarment or coat (kēthōneth). In v. 17 the symptoms of high fever are pierced bones and gnawing pains; hence in v. 18 the complaint that his large outer-garment or cloak (שָׂרָבִית), in which he vainly tried to sleep, had become so completely soaked through with the fever-sweats that it clung around him like the collar of his coat. It is frequently assumed that the reference is to Job's emaciated condition, which causes his outer garment to cling to him like the neck of the close-fitting inner tunic. Davidson suggests that the idea may be that through Job's writhing under his pains his clothes are twisted tightly about him. Dillmann finds a reference to the unnatural swelling of Job's body by elephantiasis, till his garment becomes tight like a collar. G. M. MACKIE.

COLLECTION occurs in AV of 2 Ch 24<sup>5</sup> as tr<sup>a</sup> of קָבָץ (mas'ēth), and in 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup> as tr<sup>a</sup> of λογία (logia, a ἀπ' λογ.) [all]. In OT the reference is to the tax prescribed in Ex 30<sup>12</sup> 15 (P), and RV more suitably tr<sup>a</sup> 'tax.' The NT reference is to the collection made by St. Paul in the Gentile Churches for the poor at Jerusalem. RV retains the word and also substitutes 'collections' in v. 3 for AV 'gatherings' (where the same Gr. word occurs in the plur. λογιαί). See COMMUNION 3, TRIBUTE—MONEY. J. A. SELBIE.

COLLEGE (קולגה; LXX 2 K 22<sup>14</sup> μασενά; 2 Ch 34<sup>22</sup> μασσαναί; Zeph 1<sup>10</sup> ἀπὸ τῆς δευτέρας; Vulg. in secunda).—This word properly denotes the 'second quarter' of the city; RV 'the second quarter' m. 'Heb. Mishneh'—comp. Avm 'in the second part'; in 2 Ch 34<sup>22</sup> Avm. gives also 'the school.' From Zeph 1<sup>10</sup>, where the term occurs again (AV 'the second'), it appears that this quarter of Jerusalem was not far from the Fish-gate, which lay on the north or north-west of the city (Neh 3<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>39</sup>). It was perhaps first enclosed within the walls in the time of Manasseh (2 Ch 33<sup>14</sup>). Probably the 'second quarter' lay to the west of the temple-mount, in the hollow between this and the northern portion of the western hill, the modern Sion. It would thus occupy the upper end of the Tyropœan Valley (comp. Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5).

The Targ. Jonathan on 2 K 22<sup>14</sup> renders by בֵּית מדרש, i.e. 'house of instruction.' This Jewish tradition is clearly the origin of the rendering 'college' in the AV. It is doubtless due to the influence of the post-biblical Heb. word Mishna, which, meaning originally 'repetition,' δευτέρωσις, came to signify the doctrine of the law, and especially the oral law.

COLLOP.—A collop is a slice of meat, but in Job 15<sup>27</sup> 'he . . . maketh collops of fat on his flanks,' it is used in the now obsolete sense (except in dialects) of 'a thick fold of flesh on the body as evidence of a well-fed condition' Cf. Fuller, Worthies, i. 166, 'Fat folk (whose collops stick to their sides) are generally lazy.' J. HASTINGS

COLONY.—Colony (Κολωνία, a literal transcript of the well-known Latin designation) occurs in NT only at Ac 16<sup>12</sup>, where it is applied to Philippi. The Roman colonies belonged to three periods and classes: (1) those of the earlier republic before 100 B.C.—the burgess and Latin colonies, which served as curb fortresses and influential centres of Roman authority in conquered or annexed territory; (2) those of the Gracchan times—the agrarian colonies, provided as an outlet for the starving and clamorous proletariat of the capital; and (3) those of the Civil wars and the Empire, termed military colonies, intended for the reception and settlement of soldiers disbanded at the end of their service or at the close of war. While in the former classes the colony was initiated by a formal law (lex), and carried out by a commission (generally of three), the later, or military colony, was established simply by the exercise of his this latter class Philippi belonged. It had already received (as we learn from Strabo, vii. fr. 41) something of this character after the defeat of Brutus and Cassius in 42 B.C.; but its real development as a colony was the work of Augustus who, having to provide for his soldiers after the battle of Actium (B.C. 31), gifted to them (as we learn from Dio Cassius, li. 4) cities and lands in Italy which had belonged to partisans of Antonius, and transferred most of the inhabitants thereby dispossessed to other quarters, esp. to Dyrrhachium and Philippi. The latter thenceforth bore, in its name, the name Colonia Augusta Philippensis, or Philippensis. The community thus constituted possessed (D. 50, tit. 15, sec. 8) the privileged position known to jurists as that of the municipium, which apparently carried, in addition to the right of munus (munus), and that of exemption from poll-tax and tribute (immunitas), the right of holding the soil in full ownership under the forms of Roman law (ex iure Quiritium). (On the development of the Roman colonial system, see Marquardt, Handb. iv. 427 ff., on the military colonies, pp. 449–56; and on Philippi in particular, Mommsen, CIL III. i. p. 120.)

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

COLOSSÆ (Κολοσσαί) was an ancient city of Phrygia (very important in early history, dwindling in the later centuries as Laodicea waxed preëminent), lying on the upper part of its course. It was distant only about ten miles from Laodicea and thirteen from Hierapolis; and hence the three cities formed a single sphere of missionary labour for Epaphras, an inhabitant of C. (Col 4<sup>12–13</sup>). Churches were formed in these three cities at a very early period, partly by the work of Epaphras, but also through the work of Timothy, who had evidently come into personal relations with C. (Col 1<sup>7</sup>), and probably of other preachers. In Rev 1<sup>11–12</sup> the single Church of Laodicea must be taken as representative of the Churches of the whole Lycus valley. Paul himself had not been at Laodicea or at C. (Col 2<sup>1</sup>). C., like Laodicea (which see), stood on the most important route of commerce and intercourse in the eastern part of the Rom. Empire; it was therefore a place where new ideas and new thoughts were always likely to be simmering, and the new religion seems to have developed there with feverish rapidity, and not in a direction that satisfied St. Paul. During his first imprisonment in Rome, the views which were brought to him by the various sects and practices in C. are alluded to in an Epistle, in which he rebuked the tendency of the Colossians to stray from the straight path under the influence partly of Judaism (observance of Sabbaths, etc., Col 2<sup>16</sup>; circumcision hinted at, 2<sup>11</sup>), and partly of a species of theosophic speculation, which sought to find demonic or angelic powers intermediate between the supreme unapproachable God and human beings,—a kind of speculation which was an attempt to express the ideas of the Logos in the terms and forms of the philosophic and religious thought current in Phrygia and in Asia generally. The Judaic elements in this Colossian development of Christianity show that Jewish teachers had visited it, and that Jewish religion and thought had influenced the population; and from the position of the city such influence is natural, and Jewish traders had probably settled in it for commercial purposes. The trade in the beautiful wool of the Colossian sheep (called Colossinus, perhaps dark purple). There is, however, no evidence that an actual settlement of Jews at C. as colonists by any of the Seleucid kings ever occurred (as is probable or certain at Laodicea, Tarsus, etc., which see); for such a settlement was considered as a re-foundation, and was usually accompanied by change of name. Again, the semi-Gnostic style of Colossian speculation revealed to us by the Epistle shows that the Lycus valley was the seat of some kind of activity, which had doubtless its centre at C. (which see), but extended to the other cities. The same kind of speculation long clung to the valley, as Theodoret mentions in the 5th century; and in the 9th and 10th centuries Michael, the leader of the host of angels, was worshipped as the great saint of C. (and of its later representative Chonæ), and a legend was told of his appearance to save the city from a great inundation. C. disappeared from history during the 7th or 8th cent., and was much exposed to the terrible raids of the Saracens; and it was succeeded by Chonæ (now called Chonas), a fortress about three miles farther south, in a lofty situation, with an impregnable castle upon the steep slope of Mount Cadmus (summit 8013 ft.). In 787 Bishop Dositheus took his title from C., but had his actual home in Chonæ (ἐπίσκοπος Κολοσσῶν ἡτοι Χωνῶν); but in 870 and 879 Samuel was bishop (afterwards archbishop) of Chonæ, and C. had been practically forgotten.

Colossæ is a Grecized form of a Phrygian word (modified to give an apparent meaning in Greek, as if connected with κόλοςος); and the native form was more like Κολασσαί. Hence the ethnic Κολασσαῖος occurs in the (not original) title of the Epistle, and in several Byzantine lists of bishops. Κολοσσῆνός is the invariable ethnic on coins.

LITERATURE.—The exact site of C. was discovered by Hamilton, Researches in Asia Minor, i. p. 11, and other travellers had previously visited the modern Chonas, and believed it to be C. The situation and history of C. and Chonæ are very fully described in Ramsay Cities and Bishops of Phrygia chs i and vi and Ch. in the Rom. Emp. ch. xiv.

W. M. RAMSAY.

**COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—This Epistle forms one of a closely connected group of three. It is linked on the one hand to the little letter to Philemon by the group of personal salutations common to the two, and on the other to the Ep to

' by a remarkable and intricate contents, by the fact that the two letters are entrusted to the same messenger (4<sup>1</sup>, cf. Eph 6<sup>21</sup>), and probably by an express reference in the Colossians to the sister Epistle under the title of 'the Ep. from Laodicea' in 4<sup>16</sup>.

I. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—The various questions which have been raised during the present cent. with respect to the authorship of this group of Epp., and the particular stage in St. Paul's first imprisonment (assuming them to have been written by him) to which they may be most suitably assigned, can be best dealt with in connexion with the Ep. to the Ephes. (which see). For the present it will be enough to say (1) that the admitted differences in language, style, and, to a certain extent, in doctrine, between this group of Epp. and those of the central period, 1 and 2 Co, Gal, Ro, are by no means sufficient to establish a diversity of authorship; and (2) that two facts, (a) the conversion of Onesimus, who, as far as we know, could hardly have had access to St. Paul in Cæsarea, and (b) the remarkable development in the doctrine of the Ecclesia, which marks Eph, make it on the whole most probable that the whole group was written from Rome shortly before the outbreak of the Neronian persecution.

II. DESTINATION.—The situation of Colossæ and the chief elements in its population have already been described (see COLLOSSÆ). It will be enough here to notice that whatever may have been the proportion of resident Jews in the place, St. Paul treats the Church <sup>as</sup> as specifically a Gentile Church (127). The fact which brings them within his sphere of influence, and explains the tone in which he addresses them. The difficult and obscure references in 214 τὸ χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασι δ ἦν ὑπεραντίον ἡμῖν, and in 28 τὸ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, both of which must refer chiefly, if not exclusively, to the law of Moses, are not really inconsistent with this. Language of fundamentally the same import occurs in Gal 3<sup>38</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>, esp. 4<sup>9</sup> (πρωτὰ στοιχεῖα οἷς πάλιν ἄνωθεν δουλεύσαι θέλετε). Before the coming of Christ the only way by which a Gentile could enjoy the privileges of the covenant people was by accepting circumcision and submitting to all the ordinances of the law.

St. Paul's language in the Epistle leaves no doubt that the Church at Colossæ had not been directly founded by him, and that he was personally unknown to the bulk of its members, though individuals among them, such as Philemon, may have met him during his long stay at Ephesus, and have owed their conversion to him.

Ramsay's: ἡ δὲ ἀνωτερικὰ ὑπὲρ (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>) would make it probable that Paul had not, even on his third missionary journey, traversed all of the voyage. But there is no hint of the existence of a Christian Church in that locality at the time of that journey, and still less of any evangelistic activity of St. Paul's there, and so, by whatever road St. Paul reached Ephesus, there is nothing in Ac inconsistent with the obvious meaning of the Epistle.

III. OBJECT AND CONTENTS.—The object of this Ep. is to bring before the Colossians a true ideal of Christian life and practice, based on a true conception of the relation of Christ to the universe and to the Church. It was occasioned by the appearance in Colossæ of a form of false teaching, which, under the garb of a 'philosophy' (28), was enticing men back to the trammels of an outward asceticism. The practices to which reference is made (21<sup>ff</sup>) are in some cases, perhaps in all, distinctively Jewish. And it is probable that they were put forward as the gateway to a higher state of purification than that which was accessible to the ordinary believer. It is uncertain to what extent these practices were connected with any definitely formulated metaphysical or cosmological theories. The term 'philosophy' as Hort has shown (Judaistic Christianity, p. 120 ff.), does not necessarily imply more than an ethical system. Yet the Colossians were in danger, actual or prospective (2<sup>8</sup> 4), of doctrinal error respecting the Person of Christ. And some of St. Paul's '...garding Christ's relation to 'the ...and powers' (1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>10</sup>) would gain in point if we might suppose that a speculative justification of the 'worship of angels' had already been put forward, involving expressly 'either a limitation of His nature to the human sphere, or at most a counting of Him among the angels'. On the other hand, substantially similar language occurs in Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, where there is no necessity to postulate any polemic reference. And it is hard to believe that St Paul would have contented himself with this indirect method of attack, if the error had already taken such definite shape. In any case there seems no sufficient ground for ... a specifically Gnostic or Oriental ... influence on the Church at Colossæ. Above all, the later Valentinian usage of πλάσματα throws back no light on the meaning of the term in the cardinal passages in which it occurs in Col 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>9</sup> and Eph 1<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>.

The key to the positive teaching of the Ep. is certainly to be found in the conception of the Person and the Work of Christ which it unfolds. Over against the false philosophy, and as the assurance of the perfect satisfaction of the genuine human need of assistance in the attainment of truth to which that philosophy appealed, St. Paul sets the thought of Christ as the Image of the Invisible God (<sup>15</sup>), the perfect manifestation in human form of the Eternal Truth, ‘the Mystery of God’ (<sup>22</sup>), in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and . . . Their aspiration after a new ideal of . . .

tions were not in vain, because the fullness of the divine perfections had found an embodiment and home in One who had a human nature upon Him, and borne and bears a human form (2<sup>9</sup>, cf. 1<sup>19</sup>). Did they quail before the material forces of this world? These were arrayed against them, or they held or the inherent dignity that belonged to them, as men in the presence of the countless multitudes of the hosts of heaven? There was no power in the universe but from Him. And He had revealed upon the Cross the impotence of all the powers that had set themselves in array to thwart His purposes (2<sup>16</sup>). The evil from which they were longing to get free clung so close that it might seem almost an integral part of their being; and they were willing to submit to any discipline that would set them free. In the death of Christ they could attain to the reality of that deliverance from the corruption of their nature which had been foreshadowed by circumcision (2<sup>11</sup>), as they realized the newness of life which was theirs by union with His resurrection.

The following analysis may help to bring out the sequence of thought, and to show how this central conception is interwoven with the whole of the Epistle.

A The opening section, after the salutation (vv. 1-2), is devoted to the knowledge of God as Father and Son (8-24). St. Paul speaks of the knowledge of God as Father and Son, which is witnessed by their evangelist's preaching, and prays for a further development of this knowledge in the hearts of his readers, so that they may be able to share fully in the deliverance from the bondage of sin through the grace of the Son of His love (24-16). This section concludes with a full, though condensed statement of the doctrine of the Sonship of Christ.

(A) In relation to the universe as the source and goal, and the present principle of its existence, the Sonship of Christ is stated (15-17).

(B) In relation to the individual man, the Sonship of Christ is stated (18-24).

(blue), air; scarlet, fire (so also Jos. Ant. III. vii. 7).

BLACK is used in OT only of natural objects. (1) שָׁחָר of hair Lv 13<sup>26</sup>, Ca 5<sup>14</sup>, horses Zec 6<sup>2-6</sup>, skin that is burnt with the sun Ca 1<sup>5</sup>, and that peels off in disease Job 30<sup>30</sup>. (2) שָׁחָר is used of sheep only Gn 30<sup>32, 35</sup>, and is rendered in LXX by φαῖος, a word denoting the greyiness of twilight, or any mixture of black and white. In v. 40 it is an interpolation. (3) The verb שָׁחָר (originally 'to be dirty, foul') is used of the darkened sky Jer 4<sup>28</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>45</sup>, and from its original 'to be dirty' comes to signify mourning Jer 8<sup>21</sup> 14<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>1</sup>, 31<sup>4</sup>. It is also used of the dark colour of ice-covered water Job 6<sup>16</sup>. In Pr 7<sup>9</sup> 'blackness of night' is literally as in RVm 'pupil of eye of night.' In Ep. Jer (v. 21) faces are blackened (שָׁחָר) by smoke. In NT μέλας is used of hair Mt 5<sup>27</sup>, of horses Rev 6<sup>8</sup>, and especially of ink 2 Co 3<sup>3</sup> etc.; γνόφος for the darkness of night He 12<sup>18</sup> (cf. Dt 4<sup>11</sup>), and ὄσφος for the darkness of the nether world 2 P 2<sup>4</sup> (cf. Homer, Il. xxi. 56). It is used symbolically for affliction and death Zec 6<sup>2-8</sup> ('famine in consequence of a siege,' cf. Hitzig-Steiner's Comm.), La 4<sup>8</sup>, and as above for 'mourning' generally Mal 3<sup>4</sup>.

BLUE (חֹלֶבֶת, LXX βάκινθος, δασυδρόφυρος only in Nu 4<sup>7</sup>, cf. Xen. Cyrop. VIII. iii. 13). In NT there is no mention of this colour. In Assy. the word ta-kil-tu occurs in several inscriptions (Delitzsch, Assyr. Hwb. p. 706). This colour seems to have been a violet-purple as distinguished from שָׁחָר (see PURPLE), but even in early times there was great indefiniteness in its use (cf. Talm. Bab. Menachoth 44<sup>a</sup>, and for use of βάκινθος and hyacinthus in classical writers see Kitto, Cyclop. of Bibl. Lit. i. 40 f.). It was obtained from a shell-fish found on the Phoen. coast attached to the rocks. The Targ. pseudo-Jonathan to Dt 33<sup>19</sup> calls it חֹלֶבֶת, and this is usually identified with Helix ianthina. (For other purple-producing shell-fish see PURPLE.) In the tabernacle (see SCARLET) in the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 26<sup>1</sup>), the veil of the ark (26<sup>31</sup>), the screen of the tent-door (26<sup>36</sup>), the screen of the gates of the court (27<sup>16</sup>), parts connected with the ephod (28), the mitre (28<sup>37</sup>), and the girdle (39<sup>29</sup>) of the priest, also in the coverings of the table of shewbread, the candlesticks, the golden altar, and the vessels of the sanctuary (Nu 4). A cord of blue was to be put on the fringes or tassels of the Israelites' garments (Nu 15<sup>38</sup>). In the veil, before the holiest place in Solomon's temple, blue was wrought with purple and crimson according to the Chronicler (2 Ch 3<sup>14</sup>). It was also used in the clothing of idols (Jer 10<sup>9</sup>). In Ezk it is the colour of the clothing of young Assy. nobles (23<sup>6</sup>), and in his description of the luxury of Tyre, awnings of blue and purple were their coverings on ships; and bales of blue and brodered work were among their merchandise (27<sup>7-24</sup>). Hangings of white and blue cloth figure in the palace of Ahasuerus (Est 1<sup>6</sup>), and royal apparel is of blue and white (Est 8<sup>16</sup>). In Pr 20<sup>26</sup> the AV 'blueness of a wound' is correctly given in RV as 'stripes that wound.'

CRIMSON is identical with scarlet. It occurs in RV only in Is 1<sup>18</sup> as tr. of שָׁחָר (see SCARLET), and in 2 Ch 27<sup>14</sup> 31<sup>4</sup> for שָׁחָר, which seems to be a Persian word, from کرم 'a worm,' and thus equivalent to שָׁחָר (cf. Ges-Buhl.). See separate art.

GREEN (in Heb. various derivatives of the root קָדַח, cf. Assy. arālu, 'to be pale,' Is. 47, Hwb. p. 243). Gr. χλωρός.—It denotes the green of vegetation Gn 1<sup>30</sup> 9<sup>6</sup>, Mk 6<sup>39</sup>, Rev 8<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>4</sup> etc. Greenish, קָדַח, that is, inclining to yellow, is used of the plague of leprosy in skin or garment Lv 13<sup>49</sup> 14<sup>37</sup>. The same word is used of gold Ps 68<sup>18</sup> (RV 'yellow'). In the many other passages where the word 'green' occurs in RV, the Heb. equivalent contains no reference to colour.

GREY is used only of 'grey hair,' Heb. שֵׁבֶרֶת Gn 44<sup>29</sup> etc.

PURPLE (LXX and NT πορφύρα, πορφυρούς, Heb. זָרָה, Aram. ܙܪܗ, Assy. Argamannu, Del. Assyr. Hwb. p. 129).—This was a red-purple colour obtained from the Murex trunculus, near Tyre, and Murex brandaris on the shores of Taranto and the Peloponnesus. The Phoenicians seem to have long monopolized the sale (and perhaps the preparation) of it, not only on their own coasts, but on those of the 'isles of Elishah' (acc. to Targ. on Gn 10<sup>4</sup>=Italy, more exactly Ἐλίας; cf. Smend's Comm.), Ezk 27<sup>16</sup>, and the anafactories of Syria (Ezk 27<sup>16</sup>).

In later times the dye was sold (and manufactured?) in Asia (Ac 16<sup>14</sup>), and in Pliny's time in the islands on the N. coast of Africa and Madeira (HN ix. 36, vi. 36; cf. Strabo, 835). For other methods of preparing purple see Vitruvius, vii. 13, 14. Purple was used in combination with blue and white in the curtains and veils of the tabernacle, in certain parts of the priests' dress and ornaments, and alone in the cloth spread on the altar (Ex 26-28. 35. 39, Nu 4<sup>13</sup>, cf. Sir 45<sup>10</sup>), also in Solomon's temple (see BLUE). It was especially the colour used in the raiment and trappings of royalty. The kings of Midian wore purple (Jg 8<sup>26</sup>), so did the royal courtiers of Persia (Est 8<sup>16</sup>), of Babylon (Dn 5<sup>7-18</sup> 2<sup>20</sup>), and of Syria (2 Mac 4<sup>38</sup>). The fittings of Solomon's palanquin (Ca 3<sup>10</sup>) and the cords in the hangings of the palace of Ahasuerus (Est 1<sup>6</sup>) were of purple; and the absence of this colour from the dress of the all-powerful Romans was noted with surprise (1 Mac 5<sup>1</sup>). Purple is thus the sign of royalty and nobility (Pr 31<sup>22</sup>, Rev 17<sup>4</sup> 18<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>16</sup>), and hence it is used in the dressing of idols (Jer 10<sup>9</sup>, Ep. Jer<sup>13</sup>). A purple robe was put on our Lord in mockery before his crucifixion (Mk 15<sup>27</sup> [πορφύραν], Jn 19<sup>2</sup> [μάτιον πορφύροισιν], but Mt 27<sup>28</sup> reads 'scarlet' [χλαμύδα κοκκίνη]). In Ca 7<sup>5</sup> the brilliance of the hair is compared with that of purple (see Graetz, Comm.).

RED (דָּמָם and דָּמָה; for other words see below, LXX and NT πυρρός, πυρρόκης, πυρρίων. In Assy. the root adm is used for dark-red as of blood [Delitzsch, Assyr. Hwb. p. 26]).—This colour is in most passages used of natural objects, as of pottage Gn 25<sup>30</sup>, a heifer Nu 19<sup>2</sup>, water discoloured 2 K 3<sup>22</sup>, wine Pr 23<sup>31</sup> (cf. RVm to Ps 75<sup>8</sup>, Heb. דָּמָה), horses Zec 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, Rev 6<sup>4</sup>, the face red with weeping Job 16<sup>16</sup> (RVm), and the sky Mt 16<sup>28</sup>. But it was also artificially produced. Pliny and Ptolemy says that red-dyed leather was made in Egypt before B.C. 3000). Rams' skins dyed red were used for the covering of the tent of the tabernacle Ex 25<sup>5</sup> 35<sup>22</sup> 36<sup>19</sup> 39<sup>25</sup> (see TABERNACLE). Garments dyed red are mentioned in Is 63<sup>2</sup>. In Nah 2<sup>3</sup> the words 'made red' mean dyed red according to Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade, but 'lit up by the sun' (cf. 1 Mac 6<sup>30</sup>) according to Hitzig-Steiner's Comm. In Gn 49<sup>12</sup> the word translated 'red' means 'dull' (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. to דָּמָה, and Assy. akālu), and in Est 1<sup>6</sup> 'red' is ei (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. to דָּמָה, and Ryssel's Commentary). In Wis 13<sup>14</sup>, see VERMILION) it is the RV rendering of ερυθρίνας.

A lighter shade of the same colour is expressed by the word reddish (דָּמָה), used of leprous spots on the flesh Lv 13, or on the wall of a house Lv 14<sup>37</sup>.

SCARLET (שָׁחָר, זָרָה, שָׁחָר, and very commonly שָׁחָר, LXX and NT κόκκινος. See also CRIMSON).—It denotes the source of the colour, the brilliance of it (cf. Pliny, HN xxxiii. 40, 'Coccinitor'; Martial, x. 76, 'cocco mulio fulget'). It is an artificial colour obtained from the female of an insect (Coccus ilicis) which is found attached to a species of oak, and forms a berry-like protuberance about the size of a cherry-stone. It was found chiefly in Palestine, Asia Minor, and South Europe. The poor of Spain at the time of Pliny paid half their tribute by means of this insect (HN xvi. 12). In OT scarlet is used chiefly of thread (Gn 38<sup>28, 30</sup>, Jos 2<sup>13, 21</sup>), cloth (Nu 4<sup>8</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>24</sup>), and wool (He 9<sup>19</sup>). In the coverings of the tabernacle it was used sometimes alone Nu 4<sup>8</sup>, oftener with purple and blue Ex 26<sup>1, 31</sup> etc. So also in the dress of the priests Ex 28<sup>6</sup> etc., cf. Sir 45<sup>11</sup>. In ordinary life scarlet clothing was a sign of prosperity 2 S 1<sup>24</sup>, Pr 31<sup>21</sup>, La 4<sup>5</sup>. Its brilliance made it a source of attraction Jer 4<sup>30</sup>, and led to the figurative use for what was glaring Is 1<sup>18</sup>. Once only it is used of a natural object, when the lips are compared to a thread of scarlet Ca 4<sup>3</sup>.

SORREL (סָרָסָר) occurs once of horses in Zec 1<sup>8</sup>, where LXX translates by σαρπός, 'dappled grey,' cf. 6<sup>3</sup> (LXX).

VERMILION (Heb. שָׁרָד, Gr. μυλρος [but ἐν γραφίδι in Ezk]).—A pigment used among the Assyrians (for refl. see Smith, DB i. 623). Rooms were painted with it Jer 22<sup>14</sup>, images of the Chaldeans are portrayed on a wall with it in a description in Ezk 23<sup>14</sup>, and wooden idols are smeared with it in Wis 13<sup>14</sup>. The Vulg. translates by sinopide in Jer, coloribus in Ezk, and rubrica in Wis. Virgil (Ecl. x. 26 f.) and Pliny (HN xxxv. 45, cf. xxxiii. 36) describe Roman images of deities thus adorned.

WHITE.—In OT the most usual word employed is לָבָן, LXX λευκός. It is used of such objects as snow Is 1<sup>18</sup>, milk Gn 49<sup>12</sup>, manna Ex 16<sup>31</sup>, horses Zec 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>3, 6</sup>, and leprous hair Lv 13. Lebanon seems to have received its name either from the white snow on its summits or the limestone of which it was composed (see Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies, p. 103). In Ca 5<sup>10</sup> the word נָחַם 'white' (RV) denotes dazzling, and in Dn 7<sup>9</sup> a late word קָוִי is used of raiment. The same root is used in the word translated 'white bread' Gn 40<sup>18</sup>. In NT λευκός is used of natural objects and of linen, but chiefly as the symbol of purity or innocence and holiness, as in the T. ἁγία, or of angels Jn 20<sup>12</sup>, etc., the saints Rev 6<sup>11</sup>, or the throne of God Rev 20<sup>4</sup>, or of victory Rev 6<sup>19</sup> 14<sup>14</sup> (cf. Virgil, Aen. iii. 537 f.).

YELLOW (צָהָב, ξανθίζουσα) is used in OT only of the hair in leprous sores Lv 13<sup>30, 32, 36</sup> (but see Greenish). In Est 1<sup>6</sup> the word יָצַד 'yellow' in RV, 'alabaster' in RVM, probably means 'pearl' or 'mother-of-pearl' (Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Ges-Buhl under יָצַד).

In addition to the words denoting specific colours, there are a few used in OT to indicate a mixture, generally of black and white. The chief of these are: 1. Speckled נֶקֶד, literally dotted or spotted, used of sheep and goats, Gn 30. 31. In Jer 12<sup>9</sup> it is used of birds and is a tr. of נֶקֶד, lit. 'dyed.' 2. Spotted נֶקֶדָה, i.e. covered with patches, Gn 30. The same Heb. word is used in Ezk 16<sup>16</sup> of high places, and is translated in RV 'decked with divers colours.' 3. Ringstraked נֶקֶדָה, marked with rings or bands Gn 30. 31. 4. Grisled נֶקֶדָה, marked with white spots resembling hail, used of he-goats Gn 31<sup>10, 12</sup>, of horses Zec 6<sup>3, 6</sup>.

In Jg 5<sup>30</sup> the word נֶקֶדָה is tr. 'of divers colours' in RV, or 'dyed garments' in RVM (cf. also under Speckled). The word נֶקֶדָה is tr. 'of divers colours' in 1 Ch 29<sup>2</sup>, of precious stones, similarly in Ezk 17<sup>3</sup> of feathers. In other places it is generally translated 'brodered work.' It is derived from a root which, according to Fleischer, originally meant to make a thing many-coloured by engraving, drawing, writing, or brodering.

G. W. THATCHER.

COLT is not applied in the Bible to the young horse, but to the young ass, and once (Gn 32<sup>18</sup>) to the young camel. Outside the Bible it is not applied to the young of any animal but the horse See ASS. J. HASTINGS.

COME.—1. Come about, i.e. 'come round,' either lit. 2 Ch 13<sup>18</sup>, 'Jeroboam caused an ambushment to c. about behind them' (סָבַח); or fig. 1 S 1<sup>20</sup> 'when the time was c. about' (הִקְרַב הַיָּמִים) on the return of the days. 2. Come again, i.e. 'come back' (see AGAIN), as Jg 15<sup>19</sup> 'when he had drunk, his spirit came a. and he revived' (שָׁוָה). 3. Come at, (1) 'come near,' 'reach,' Dn 6<sup>24</sup> 'the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever they came at the bottom of the den'; Lk 8<sup>19</sup> 'they could not c. at him for the crowd'; (2) 'come near,' 'touch,' Nu 6<sup>8</sup> 'he shall c. at no dead body' (RV 'c. near to'); (3) so as to have sexual intercourse, Ex 19<sup>15</sup> 'c. not at your wives' (RV 'c. not near a woman'). 4. Come by, 'come near,' esp. so as to get hold of, Ac 27<sup>18</sup> 'we had much work to c. by the boat' (RV, 'we were able, with difficulty, to secure the boat'): cf. Pref. to AV 'Translation it is . . . that removeth the cover of the well, that we may c. by the water'; and Shaks. Two Gent. of Ver. iii. i. 125—

'Love is like a child,

That longs for everything that he can come by.'

5. Come in, 'enter upon,' 'begin,' Ro 11<sup>28</sup> 'until the fulness of the Gentiles be c. in' (εἰσέρχουσι). Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry IV. v. iii. 62—

'Now comes in the sweet of the night.'

For the phrase 'He that should come' (ὁ ἐρχόμενος, RV 'he that cometh') see JESUS CHRIST, and MESSIAH. And for the Second Coming see PAROUSIA. J. HASTINGS.

COMELY, COMELINESS.—These words, now slightly archaic in any sense, are quite obsol. in the sense of moral fitness or beauty, a meaning which they have a few times in EV, as Ps 33<sup>1</sup> 'praise is c. for the upright.' Dr. Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v.) thinks the earliest meaning of 'comely' may have been 'delicately fashioned,' so that we may compare Jer 6<sup>2</sup> 'the c. and delicate one, the daughter of Zion.' But the usage of AV (foll. by RV) gives us: (1) Befitting, Ec 5<sup>18</sup> 'it is good and c. for one to eat and to drink and to enjoy the good of all his labour'; 1 Co 11<sup>13</sup> 'is it c. that a woman pray unto God uncovered?' (ἀπέρει, RV 'is it seemly?'). (2) Pleasing to the eye, because befitting, Job 41<sup>12</sup> 'his c. proportion' (Amer. RV 'goodly frame'); Ezk 27<sup>10</sup> 'they set forth thy comeliness' (תָּקַר). Then (3) handsome, beautiful, majestic (the distinction 'might be rather called comely than beautiful' being quite modern), Ca 6<sup>4</sup> 'Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, c. as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners'; Is 53<sup>2</sup> 'he hath no form nor comeliness.'

J. HASTINGS.

COMFORT (נֶחֱמָה, נֶחֱמָה, παράκλησις).—The state of relief from trouble, or the means of solace. In OT the evils to which the consolations of God are most characteristically opposed are the calamities of the chosen people, while in NT the divine comfort is mainly represented as enabling the individual Christian to endure, and even to rejoice under, the natural ills of human life and the persecutions to which the faithful are subjected. As the sources of comfort

W. P. PATERSON.

COMFORTER.—See PARACLETE.

COMING OF CHRIST.—See PAROUSIA.

COMMANDMENT.—The distinction bet. 'command,' the order of a secular authority, and 'commandment,' a divine charge, is modern. In older Eng. we find, e.g., Rogers (1642) saying, 'As Papists have done with the second Command'; and in AV 'commandment' is freely used for the orders of a king or other secular power. Thus, Est 2<sup>20</sup> 'Esther did the commandment of Mordecai'; Mt 15<sup>9</sup> 'teaching for doctrines the commandments of men' (ἐντάλματα, RV 'precepts'); Ac 25<sup>23</sup> 'at Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth' (RV 'at the command of Festus'). To give commandment is an archaic phrase often used for the simple vb. 'to command,' and even 'to give in commandment' Ex 34<sup>28</sup> (ἡν). The vb. to command is itself used in many obsol. constructions. Besides the mod. use to command one to do a thing, or a thing to be done, we find 'c. to do' without the person, Ac 5<sup>34</sup> 'Gamaliel . . . c<sup>ed</sup> to put the men forth.' Sometimes the pers. only is mentioned, as Gn 18<sup>19</sup> 'he will c. his children and his household after him'; sometimes the thing only, as Ps 133<sup>3</sup> 'there the LORD c<sup>ed</sup> the blessing'; or the pers. and thing without the infin. as 1 S 21<sup>2</sup> 'the king hath c<sup>ed</sup> me a business.' The subst. 'command' occurs once in AV, Job 39<sup>27</sup> 'Doth the eagle mount up at thy c.?' and only one earlier occurrence is found in Eng. literature, Shaks. Two Gent. IV. iii. 5—

'One that attends your Ladyship's command.'

For the Ten Commandments see DECALOGUE.

J. HASTINGS.

COMMEND, COMMENDATION.—To c. is now to approve of, speak well of, and in this sense it is used in AV, as Gn 12<sup>15</sup> 'The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and c<sup>ed</sup> her before Pharaoh' (בָּרְכוּ RV 'praised'); Pr 12<sup>8</sup> 'A man shall be c<sup>ed</sup> acc. to his wisdom' (בָּרְכוּ); Ec 8<sup>15</sup> 'I c<sup>ed</sup> mirth' (הִנֵּחֵ); Lk 16<sup>8</sup> 'the Lord c<sup>ed</sup> the unjust steward' (ἐπαινέω). But in older Eng. 'c.' also signified (1) to present a person or thing to another as worthy of approval (mod. recommend): thus, Ro 16<sup>1</sup> 'I c. unto you Phœbe, our sister' (προτίθημι.* So 3<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>); 1 Co 8<sup>8</sup> 'meat c<sup>eth</sup> us not to God' (παριστῆμι). In this sense is commendation used, 2 Co 3<sup>16</sup> [all], 'epistles of c.' (2) To entrust, Lk 23<sup>46</sup> 'Father, into thy hands I c. my spirit,' and Ac 14<sup>23</sup> 20<sup>32</sup> (all παρατίθημι). Cf. Shaks. Henry VIII. v. i. 17—

'I love you;
And durst commend a secret to your ear.'

J. HASTINGS.

* On the meanings of this verb see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 3<sup>8</sup>, where, as in 5<sup>8</sup>, the meaning is rather 'prove,' 'establish'

COMMENTARY.—Thus RV translates midhrāsh (שִׁדְרָשׁ, AV 'story') in the only passages in which that word is found, 2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>27</sup>.

The term Midrash, says Driver (LOT<sup>5</sup> 487), 'is common in post-Bibl. literature. Darash is "to search out," "investigate," "explore"; as applied to Scripture, to discover or develop a thought not apparent on the surface,—for instance, the hidden meaning of a word, or the particulars implied by an allusion to the Chaldees, what Eldad and the circumstances of Moses' development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, especially a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (Tobit and Susanna are instances of Midrashim).'

The two Midrashim of OT are (1) 'The Midrash of the Prophet Iddo' (2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup>), and (2) 'The Midrash of the Book of Kings' (24<sup>27</sup>). They were didactic developments of the historical narratives we possess, making use of these narratives to emphasize some religious truth; but nothing is known of them beyond their titles. See under CHRONICLES. J. HASTINGS.

COMMERCE.—See TRADE.

COMMON.—1. Following the Gr. (κοινός), c. is used in NT in two chief senses. 1. That is 'c.' which is shared by all, as Ac 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>32</sup> 'they had all things c.'; Tit 1<sup>4</sup> 'Titus, mine own son after the c. faith'; Jude<sup>3</sup> 'the common salvation.' 2. That which is common to all is distinguished from that which is peculiar to the few; whence the application to the religious practices of the heathen in contrast with those of the Jews; or of the ordinary people, 'the people of the land' (אֲדָמָה), in contrast with those of the Pharisees—i.e. ceremonially unclean. Thus Ac 10<sup>14</sup> 15 'But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is c. or unclean.* And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed (ἐκαθάρισε), that call not thou c.' (σὺ μὴ κοινῶν, RV 'make not thou c.'). In this sense c. is twice (1 S 21<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>) the tr. of Heb. ḥōl (never tr<sup>d</sup> by κοινός however in LXX, but always by βέβηλος), elsewhere rendered in AV 'unholy' (Lv 10<sup>10</sup>) or 'profane' (Ezk 22<sup>26</sup> 42<sup>20</sup> 44<sup>23</sup> 48<sup>15</sup> [all]), but by RV always 'common.'

2. In Lv 4<sup>27</sup> we find the expression 'the c. people.' The Heb. אֲדָמָה, 'am ḥādāmeh is lit. 'the people of the land,' and is so tr<sup>d</sup> Gn 23<sup>7</sup> (where it describes the Hittites), 2 K 11<sup>18</sup> 19 16<sup>15</sup> 21<sup>24</sup>, Jer 1<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 7<sup>27</sup>. The phrase was chosen by the Pharisees to describe the people dwelling in the Holy Land who were not Haberim. See under PHARISEES, and consult the foll. literature on the subject—

3. For 'common hall' Mt 27<sup>27</sup> see PRÆTORIUM. In Ac 5<sup>18</sup>, 'the c. prison,' c. is used in the old sense of public. This is after Wyclif, who tr. Vulg. in custodia publica, 'in comun kepyng' (1388 'in the comyn warde'). Cf. Eng. Guilds (1467), 391, 'That no citezen be putt in comyn prisone, but in one of the chambers of the halle benethforth'; Coverdale's tr. of Ac 17<sup>22</sup> 'Paul stode on the myddes of the comon place'; Latimer's Serm. p. 326, 'I told you the diversity of prayer, namely, of the common prayer, and the private'; and 'the Book of Common Prayer.' See PRISON.

J. HASTINGS.

* RV gives 'c. and unclean,' reading κοινὸν καὶ ἀκαθάρτον with edd., instead of TR καὶ ἁγία. Nevertheless κοινός and ἀκαθάρτος have the same meaning. The classical passage is Mk 7<sup>2</sup>, κοινὰ χεῖρες, τὸν ἴδιον ἀνίσταται, 'with defiled (AVM, RVm 'common'), that is, unwashed, hands.' With which cf. vv. 18 19, where Jes is says, 'whatsoever iron without goeth into the man, it cannot defile him' (αὐτὸν κοινῶσαι, lit. 'make him c.'). and St. Mark adds the comment, [this he said], making all meats clean' (καθαρίζων). See Page on Ac 10<sup>14</sup>.

COMMUNE.—In its earliest use 'commune' (which had the same origin as 'common') signified to make common property, to share. This may be either by giving, as Wyclif's tr. of Ph 4<sup>14</sup> 'Ye han don wel, comunynge to my tribulacioun'; or by receiving, as his tr. of 2 Jn 11 'He that saith to him, Heyl, comuneth with his yuele werkis.' Being by and by restricted to speech, it meant sometimes simply 'talk to,' as Gn 42<sup>3</sup> '[Joseph] returned to them again, and communed with them' (עָנַן וְדַבָּר, RV 'and spake to them'). But generally the sense of both giving and receiving is present, either with others, as Lk 6<sup>11</sup> 'they communed one with another what they might do to Jesus' (διαλαλέω); or with oneself, as Ps 4<sup>4</sup> 'c. with your own heart upon your bed, and be still'—a meaning which Dr. Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v.) describes as 'now only literary, devotional, and poetic.' In 1 S 25<sup>38</sup> (AV 'And David sent and communed with Abigail') the Heb. (דָּבַר) is lit. '... A., and has the special meaning of ... marriage,' as in Ca 8<sup>3</sup> (same Heb.) AV and RV 'the day when she shall be spoken for.'

J. HASTINGS.

COMMUNICATE.—Like commune (wh. see), to c. is to make common property, either more particularly by giving, as Gal 2<sup>2</sup> 'I ced unto them that gospel' (ἀνατίθεμαι, RV 'laid before them'); Ro 12<sup>13</sup> RV 'c. to the necessities of the saints' (AV 'distributing'); He 13<sup>16</sup> 'to do good and to c. forget not': or by receiving, as Ph 4<sup>14</sup> 'ye did c. with my affliction' (RV 'had fellowship with'). Cf. Fenton (1579) 'Cæsar the Dictator, of whom you beare the surname, and communicate in his fortunes.' But generally by giving and receiving equally, as Ph 4<sup>15</sup> 'no (thine) c. with me as concerning giving and receiving' (RV 'had fellowship with me'). Communication is generally conversation,* as 2 K 9<sup>11</sup> 'Ye know the man, and his c.' (RV 'what his talk was'); Col 3<sup>8</sup> 'filthy c. out of your mouth' (αἰσχρολογία, RV 'shameful speaking').

In 1 Co 15<sup>33</sup> 'evil or corrupt good manners,' RV takes the Gr. (ἑμιλίαι κακὰ) in the sense of 'evil company,' Amer. RV 'evil companionships.' This is a new tr., V. '... maia'; Wyclif, 'yue spaci's', Tindale, '... Cranner, 'evil words'; the Geneva, 'evu speakinges', the Rheims and AV 'evil communications.' And it is not certain that it is a correct tr. The vb. ἑμιλία occurs in NT only in the sense of 'speak with' (as in LXX, Jos. and mod. Greek—see Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek p. 155), and ἑμιλία, which occurs only in the NT, is a loan-word from the Greek eccles. usage in the Septuagint (see note) of the Christian preacher.

COMMUNION.—The word κοινωνία is variously rendered in the English Bible by 'communion,' 'fellowship,' 'contribution,' 'distribution.' It is used in relation to the Christian Society to express the idea of the fellowship in which the idea is realized. Its general NT use deserves to be considered as introductory to its specific application to the Eucharist, or Holy Communion (see below SUPPL.).

The corresponding verb κοινωνεῖν has two senses: (1) 'to have a share in,' (2) 'to give a share to'; so that we are prepared for a twofold meaning of κοινωνία: (1) 'fellows'hip' as a social and enjoyed, (2) 'fellowship' as a social and enjoyed which give it expression. Four passages or groups of passages, deserve special notice.

1. 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup> 'The fellowship of the Holy Spirit'; Ph 2<sup>1</sup> 'If there be any fellowship of the Spirit.' The first of these passages is one of the few in which, as in the Baptismal formula (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>), the three Persons of the Holy Trinity are brought into emphatic juxtaposition: 'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all.'

The order is remarkable. It is explained, however, when we observe that we have here an expansion of the final salutation with which St. Paul regularly closes his epistles. Thus in 2 Th 3<sup>17, 18</sup> we read: 'The greeting of me Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: thus I write: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all.' It was his invariable habit to take the pen from his amanuensis at the close and write a parting salutation as his sign-manual. This was always a prayer that 'grace' might be with his readers; the word was characteristic of his teaching, and it always occurs, even in the briefest form of the closing salutation.

To understand the enlarged form of this salutation in 2 Co, we must recall the circumstances of the Corinthian Church. Party divisions were its chief trouble: all its manifold troubles St. Paul traces to this root. Unity must be restored: this is the first injunction of the first epistle (1 Co 1<sup>10</sup>), and the last injunction of the second (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>). His remedy for disunion was his doctrine of the One Body, which he brought to bear on their sin of fornication, their difficulty about idol-meats, their jealousy as to spiritual gifts, their profanation of the Lord's Supper. The second epistle opens with an outburst of relief at their return to obedience. Yet at the close he shows that his fears are still alive. What will he find when he comes? 'Strife, jealousy, wraths, factions, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults?' If so, he warns them that he will not spare. He closes with exhortations to unity and peace, and promises the presence of 'the God of love and peace.' Then his final salutation runs at first in its accustomed form, 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ'; but it is expanded to meet the occasion and its needs: 'the God of love' suggests the addition 'the love of God'; and the true sense of membership which the One Spirit gives to the One Body is played for in the words 'the fellowship of the Holy Spirit.' It is clear, then, that the genitive here is subjective and not objective; and this is confirmed by the parallel clauses. 'The grace' which is 'of the Lord Jesus,' and 'the love' which is 'of God,' are parallel with 'the fellowship' which is 'of the Holy Spirit.'

The meaning in this place seems to decide the otherwise doubtful sense of Ph 2<sup>1</sup> 'if there be any fellowship of the Spirit.' Here, again, the context speaks of love and unity. So that it is most natural to interpret the phrase in both places of the sense of unity, or fellowship, which it is the peculiar work of the Holy Spirit to preserve in the Christian Church.

2. Ac 2<sup>42</sup> 'They continued ... the teaching of the apostles and ... the breaking of bread and the prayers.' This is the first description given us of the newly-baptized converts after Pentecost, when they numbered already about 3000. It is expanded in the next verses, in which two at least of its phrases are almost verbally repeated: 'the breaking of bread' is represented by 'breaking bread house by house,' and 'the fellowship' or 'communion' (κοινωνία) is echoed in the words, 'all they that believed together held all things common' (κοινά).

Thus 'the fellowship' seems to refer to the unity of recognized membership, the 'community,' in which the first brethren lived together. The words 'they held all things common' are illustrated by the statement that they sold their goods, and distributed to all 'according as any had need.' No systematic plan of relief for the poorer brethren is implied: the wealthier were moved to supply their needs as they occurred, in a way that must have been reckless had they not looked for a speedy return of Christ. The method was incompatible with the higher κοινωνία of the Body; but it was a striking example of the new spirit of fellowship, the sense of common interest, the realization of oneness. This oneness is again emphasized in 4<sup>32a</sup>: 'Of the whole company of them that believed there was one heart and soul: and not one said that any of his possessions was his own; but they held all things common... nor was there any in need among them: for as many as were owners of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things sold and laid them at the feet of the apostles; and distribution was made to each, as any had need.' Then follows the account of Barnabas, who thus disposed of his estate; and of Ananias and his wife, who sold a possession and offered a part of the price as the whole. St. Peter makes it plain that Ananias need not have parted with his property at all. It was his own, and in his own power. His offence lay, not in niggardliness, but in deceit. This makes it evident that 'community of goods' was not a part of the apostolic teaching; it is the meaning of the term κοινωνία. The events of ch. 6 indicate that a common table for the poorer members was one method of their relief, and so one sign of 'the fellowship' which characterized the Body. This 'daily ministration' led to difficulties which imperilled the sense of unity itself, and so necessitated a more developed organization of the Body.

Turning back to Ac 2<sup>42</sup>, we now see that the words 'the breaking of bread' are not to be regarded as an exhausting meaning of the phrase 'the fellowship,' which precedes them. We have four phrases, which fall into two groups: (1) 'the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship,' (2) 'the breaking of the bread and the prayers.' The 'breaking of bread' took place in the homes of the brethren; 'the prayers' a little later, those which they offered in the temple (2<sup>46</sup>; 3<sup>1</sup>; 4<sup>31</sup>). The 'fellowship' was exemplified, no doubt, in these acts; but it was wider than any of its special manifestations: it was the unity and membership in which the whole Body was constituted and maintained.

3. The third group of passages needing special investigation is that in which the word κοινωνία is used in the limited sense of the 'contribution' or 'distribution' of alms. As a general duty this is enforced in Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, He 13<sup>16</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>18</sup>, in each of which places the radical meaning of the word employed is that of 'fellowship.' Each act of Christian almsgiving was a witness to the central principle of fellowship in the Christian Society. Most conspicuously is this the case with the great collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, upon which St. Paul expended so much labour and anxiety. He regarded this as of supreme importance, as the external pledge of the living fellowship of the whole Christian Church. He insisted on carrying it in person, even though he was aware that the visit to Jerusalem endangered his liberty and his life. The Gentiles had enjoyed fellowship with the spiritual blessings of the Jews; but right that they should offer a return of fellowship such as was in their power (κοινωνίας τινὰ ποιῆσαι, Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, cf. 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>13</sup>). The stress which the apostle lays on this collection is only explained when we regard it as the emblem and the instrument of the corporate fellowship of the locally scattered Christian Society.

4. We come, lastly, to the passage (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 17) in which the word is used in connexion with the Holy Eucharist. To understand this passage, the whole section, commencing at 8<sup>1</sup>, 'Concerning meats offered to idols,' needs to be studied continuously. The more immediate context begins with 9<sup>24</sup>. Just as not all who run receive the victor's crown, so in the history of the Chosen People not all who had spiritual privileges were saved thereby. These privileges are set forth in metaphors borrowed from the Christian Sacraments. They were all 'baptized into Moses,' as when the Cloud overshadowed them, and when they passed through the Sea; they all had 'spiritual drink,' they all ate 'the Manna and the Water of Life'; they all had 'the Rock was the Messiah.' These words are of importance as showing incidentally that St. Paul, like St. John, thought of the Eucharist as 'spiritual food and drink.' This is not the side of it on which he insists. The idolatry into which the Jews fell, in spite of their spiritual privileges, is the starting-point of the warning of 1 Co 10<sup>18</sup>. On two sides the apostle has approached the danger of idolatry—the idolatry of the Jews of his own day, the idolatry of Israel in the past. Worship, whether true or false, implies a fellowship. The Christian fellowship must be recognized and vindicated from contamination.

'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not κοινωνία of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not κοινωνία of the body of Christ? because one bread, one body, we the many are, for all of us partake (μετέχομεν) of the one bread.' What is the meaning of κοινωνία here? The AV renders 'the communion of'; the RV 'a communion of,' with the marg. alternative 'a participation in.' In the Greek the word, being a predicate, does not take the article; but in English the definite article is in such cases usually supplied; so that in this respect syntax makes no demand for altering the AV. Secondly, as to the word itself. It is no doubt tempting to take it in the simple sense of 'partaking of'; but this loses the force of its derivation from κοινός, which implies jointness, or community of some kind. In this very place St. Paul expresses mere 'partaking' by μετέχειν, not κοινωνεῖν. Fellowship is the ruling idea of the word, and we must not lose sight of it. In regard to the second of the clauses, the apostle himself interprets his meaning to us. The single loaf, broken and distributed and eaten, linked all who partook of it into unity. 'We are one loaf, one body, many though we be; for of the one loaf we all partake.' Thus the loaf was nothing less than 'fellowship with the Body of the Christ.'

This interpretation is borne out by the apostle's next words: You are God's new Israel—Israel after the Spirit; look at Israel after the flesh: they bring their sacrifices to the temple, they eat of them, and thereby they are in fellowship with the altar. Then, recurring to the Gentile sacrifices, he points out that to partake of them is to be in fellowship with the demons to whom they are offered. He contrasts 'the cup of the Lord' and 'the cup of the demons,' 'the table of the Lord' (i.e. the Bread) and 'the table of the demons' (i.e. the idol-meat). 'I would not have you to enter into fellowship with the demons (κοινωνῶν τῶν δαιμονίων γίνεσθαι). It is in sharp contrast with such a conception as this that St. Paul declares that to partake of the Eucharistic Cup is to be in fellowship with the Blood of Christ, and to partake of the Eucharistic Bread is to be in fellowship with the Body of Christ. Thus interpreting St. Paul by himself, we see once more the side of the truth on which he peculiarly insisted: fellowship in the New Covenant made by the Death of Christ; fellowship in the Body of Christ, that be filled' (ἀναγκάζω, RV 'constrain'); cf. Earl Rivers (1477), 'Whiche grace . . . hath compelled me to sette a parte alle ingratitude.' Robertson (Charles V. III. xi. 335) says, 'As they could not persuade they tried to compel men to believe'—and this passage in St. Luke was quoted as their authority; but neither the Gr. nor the Eng. sanctions more than 'urging'; cf. RV even of Ac 26<sup>11</sup> 'I strove to make them blasphemous,' where Gr. and AV are the same as in Lk 14<sup>26</sup>.

In Mt 54<sup>1</sup> 'Whosoever shall c. thee to go a mile,' 2732 'him they c<sup>d</sup> to bear his cross,' and Mk 15<sup>21</sup> 'they c. one Simon a Cyrenian . . . to bear his cross,' the Gr. vb. (ἀγγαρεύω) has the technical meaning of pressing into the king's service (RVm always 'impress'). The word is of Pers. origin, the āγγαραι being the public couriers of the kings of Persia, who had authority to press into their service in any emergency whatever horses or men they met. The word was adopted also into Latin angariare, and is used by Vulg. in passages named above.

In Ro 11<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>16</sup> 'conceits' is due to Tindale and Coverdale ('consaytes'), but they probably meant simply 'opinions,' the word used in 12<sup>16</sup> by Tindale, Cranmer, and Geneva. (The plu. 'conceits' is used of more than one person). But in Pr 26<sup>5, 12, 13</sup> 28<sup>11</sup> ('wise in his own c.,' Heb. עַיִן, 'eye') the meaning is no doubt the same as in mod. usage. In Wis 8<sup>11</sup> c. is used in the obsol. sense of 'power of conceiving,' 'no c. : capacity.' 'I . . . will be found of a quick c. in j. . . . : c. . . . CONDUIT (πήληξ, ὑδραγωγός, aqueductus).—A channel for the conveyance of water from the source whence it was derived to the place where it was delivered. It wound round hills, or passed through them by means of tunnels; and crossed valleys upon arches or upon a substructure of solid masonry. The channel, when not itself a tunnel of varying height, was rectangular in form, and either cut out of the solid rock or constructed of masonry. It was covered by slabs of stone to keep the water pure and cool, and its floor had a slight and fairly uniform fall.

The remains of ancient conduits constructed for the conveyance of water to towns, or for purposes of irrigation, are common in Pal., but it will only be necessary here to allude to those connected with the water supply of Jerusalem. Amongst the oldest of the Jerus. conduits are the rock-hewn channel that cut through the mountain from the north, and was cut through the rock that separated Bezetha from the Antonia was excavated; one at a low level, beneath 'Robinson's Arch,' which was destroyed when Herod built the west peribolos wall of the temple; and the well-known tunnel that conveyed water from the Fountain of the Virgin to the Pool of Siloam. An inscription in Phoen. characters in the last conduit carries the date of its construction back to the 8th cent. B.C.

Equally interesting and, perhaps, in part of greater age, is the conduit about 13½ miles long which conveyed water from the 'Pools of Solomon,' beyond Bethlehem, to the temple enclosure at Jerus., and is known as the 'low-level aqueduct.' Tradition, who must have found himself obliged to increase the water supply when the temple services were instituted. The channel, which is about 2 ft. deep and 1½ ft. wide, passes under Bethlehem by a tunnel. It has been conjectured that this conduit was called 'Tannin' by the Jews from its serpentine course, and that the 'Dragon's Well' of Neh 2<sup>13</sup> was an outflow from it in the Valley of Hinnom. At a later date a pool (piscina) was constructed in the Wady Arrûb to collect the water from springs in that valley, and this was connected with the 'low-level aqueduct' by a conduit about 28 miles in length, which, near Tek, was made by Jos. (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2, 3). It has been made by Pontius Pilate with the Corban.

The most remarkable work, however, is the 'high-level' aqueduct, which probably entered Jerus. at the Jaffa Gate. It was apparently constructed by Herod for the supply of the palace and palace which he built on the W. hill, and of the fountains and irrigation channels in his palace gardens (BJ v. iv. 4); and it displays a very high degree of engineering skill. It derived no portion of its supply from the 'Pools of Solomon,' but had its head in Wady Bîar, 'valley of wells,' where it passed through a tunnel about four miles long, which collected the water from several small springs, and had numerous shafts leading to the surface. On its way from the head it passed a piscina, where the water was deposited, and it afterwards passed through a second tunnel 1700 ft. long, which had nine shafts, —one 115 ft. deep. The conduit crossed the valley in which the 'Pools of Solomon' lie, above the upper pool, and at this point its level is 150 ft. above that of the 'low-level aqueduct.' One of its most interesting details is the inverted syphon, composed of perforated limestone blocks, cased in rubble masonry, which crosses the valley between Bethlehem and Mâr Ellâs. No details have come down to us of the manner in which the water conveyed by the numerous conduits was distributed after it reached Jerus.; but there were probably fountains, supplied by small conduits of lead or earthenware, as well as cisterns and pools, to which the public had access.

Amongst the conduits mentioned in the Bible are: 'the conduit of the upper pool,' at the end of which Isaiah was commanded to meet Ahaz (Is 7<sup>3</sup>), and beside which Sennacherib's messengers stood when they spoke to the people on the wall (2 K 18<sup>17</sup>, Is 36<sup>2</sup>); that by which the waters of Gihon were brought straight down to the W. side of the city of David (2 Ch 32<sup>30</sup>); and that connected with the pool made by Hezekiah (2 K 20<sup>20</sup>). The existence of conduits is also implied in Sir 48<sup>27</sup>, Is 22<sup>14</sup>. In Sir 24<sup>30</sup> there is an allusion to a conduit made for irrigating a garden.

CONEY (ἡψή shaphân, χοιρογρύλλος, daśpous, cheerogryllus).—The coney is undoubtedly Hyrax Syriacus. It is known by the S. Arabs as thufn, evidently the same as shaphân. In Pal. it is known as wabr, and in Lebanon as tobsân. The Arabs also call it ghanam-Beni-Israel, the sheep of the Children of Israel. It is a perissodactyl, with dentition and feet strongly resembling those of the rhinoceros. It is as large as a rabbit, has short ears and a very short tail. Its colour is greyish-brown on the back and whitish on the belly. It is declared unclean by the Mosaic law, because it chews the cud, but does not divide the hoof (Lv 11<sup>5</sup>, Dt 14<sup>7</sup>). It is not a ruminant, but has a motion of the jaws similar to that of the ruminants. Bruce the traveller kept a tame one, and supposed, from the motion of its jaws, that it was a ruminant. Cowper made a similar mistake in regard to his tame hares.

The conies (Pr 30<sup>26</sup>) are 'the four 'exceeding wise' animals (Pr 30<sup>26</sup>) are 'but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks,' 'The rocks are a refuge for the conies' (Ps 104<sup>18</sup>). They do not burrow like rabbits, but live in clefts and holes of the rocks. They are gregarious in habit, and strictly herbivorous. They are very shy, and usually come out of their holes towards evening. When feeding, an old male sits as sentry, and, on the approach of danger, gives a whistle or cluck as a warning to his companions, and they immediately take 'refuge' in the rocks. They are found all the way from Ras-Muhammed to Lebanon. The natives esteem their flesh a delicacy.

CONFECTION, CONFECTIONARY.—Confection occurs in AV only Ex 30<sup>35</sup> 'a c. after the art of the apothecary' (ἡτοιμάσας, RV 'perfume'), and Sir 38<sup>3</sup> 'Of such doth the apothecary make a c.' (μύγμα, RV as AV); to which RV adds 1 Ch 9<sup>30</sup> 'the sons of the priests prepared the c. of the spices' (ἡτοιμάσαντες, AV 'made the ointment'). Thus 'c.' is always something made up, a compound, and always of sweet ingredients, never sweetmeats. So confectio, perfumer; only 1 S 8<sup>18</sup> 'he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers' (ἡτοιμάσας, RV 'perfumers'). Cf. Bp. Mountagu (1641), Acts and Mon. 298, 'the woman was an excellent Confectionary, very cunning in poisons.' See MEDICINE, PERFUMES.

J. HASTINGS.

CONFEDERACY in the common sense of league, alliance, is found Ob 7 'All the men of thy c.' (חֲבֵרָה, 1 Mac 8<sup>17, 20, 22</sup> (συμμαχία). In Is 8<sup>12</sup> the meaning is 'conspiracy,' which is nearly obsol., though D'Israeli (Chari's I. ii. 39) has 'in a perpetual state of confederacy and rebellion.' Confederate is both adj. and subst. As adj. Gn 14<sup>13</sup> 'these were c. with Abram'; Ps 83<sup>5</sup> 'they are c. against thee' (RV 'against thee do they make a covenant'); Is 7<sup>2</sup> 'Syria is c. with Ephraim' (RVm after Heb. 'resteth on E.'). As subst. 1 Mac 8<sup>20</sup> 'Your confederates and friends.' J. HASTINGS.

CONFERENCE is what we should now call converse, almost the same as conversation, which is Bacon's meaning in the passage, Essays 'Of Studies' (p. 205, Gold. Treas. ed.), 'Reading maketh a full man; Conference a ready man; and Writing an exact man.' C. occurs Wis 8<sup>18</sup> (δύμιλι, Vulg. iniquitas) and Gal 2<sup>6</sup> 'they who seemed to be more what in c. added nothing to me' (where the word has no proper equivalent in the Greek, RV 'they, I say, who were of repute imparted nothing to me'; but in 1<sup>16</sup> 'conferred not' is the same Greek word as is here trâ 'imparted' (προσανατίθημι). In the Pref. to AV c. is used in the more prim. sense of 'comparison' (con-fero, 'bring together'), 'We cannot be helped by c. of places.' J. HASTINGS.

CONFESSION (ἡτή, ὁμολογεῖν, ὁμολογία).—Both the Heb. and the Gr. words are capable of the same double application as the English. To 'confess' is to acknowledge by either word or deed the existence and authority of a divine power, or the sins and offences of which one has been guilty. The biblical use of the verb and its derivatives is about equally divided between these two—(1) profession or acknowledgment of God as the true God or of Jesus as the Christ, (2) confession or open acknowledgment of sin. (For the distinction cf. further Cic. pro Sestio, 51, 109.)

* This is the meaning of the Heb. (שָׁפַט) also, which Delitzsch in his 4th ed. successfully defends against the substitution of שָׁפַט 'holy thing,' made by Secker, revived by Gratz, and accepted by Cheyne

1. Confession of God as their God, acknowledgment of Him as the true God, was required of the members of the Chosen Family before it became a nation. It was rendered by Abraham when he 'called upon the name of the Lord' (Gn 12<sup>8</sup> etc.), and by him and his descendants when they claimed the covenant relationship through the rite of circumcision. In process of time this outward confession tended to become conventional, and only external. The consciousness of common nationality superseded that of personal relation to God. In the subsequent reaction of individualism, men of special piety, or in special circumstances, felt constrained to make specific confession of their personal adherence to J<sup>h</sup> (cf. Ps 63<sup>1</sup>, Is 44<sup>2</sup>). The passage in Isaiah shows that this confession was accompanied by an open act of self-dedication, if not, as some think, by the cutting of some permanent mark on the head or forehead. At other times, after a period of national apostasy, the general repentance and return was marked by a solemn renewal of the national confession (cf. 1 K 8<sup>35</sup>, 2 Ch 6<sup>36</sup>).

Such confession is the natural result of deep conviction (cf. Jn 4<sup>19</sup>, Mt 12<sup>34</sup>), and when Jesus had brought His disciples to the point of recognizing Him as the Christ, He drew from one of them that confession which is self-evidently known as St. Peter's Confession (Mt 16<sup>13</sup>). He announced that it was on the rock of such conviction and confession that His Church should be built; and He made this open confession of Himself, His dignity and authority a condition of true discipleship (Lk 12<sup>8</sup>).

In the Apostolic Church this confession was insisted upon as a sign of true conversion and a condition of baptism. Its contents were at first very general, varying with the circumstances of the conversion and the experience of the convert, but with a growing tendency to include certain constant elements. From the beginning it must have included the confession of Jesus as 'the Lord' (cf. Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>) and an expression of confidence and hope in Him (cf. He 3<sup>14</sup>). Such general acknowledgment of allegiance to Christ is referred to in 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>, He 3<sup>1</sup>; but even He 4<sup>14</sup>, 'let us hold fast our confession' (AV 'profession') does not involve a formulated confession. An acknowledgment of the Resurrection doubtless found a place both early and often (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>), and prepared the way for a confession including belief of the historical facts of Christianity. Of theological importance there is an early trace in the interpolated confession of the Ethiopian (Ac 8<sup>37</sup>), but the early appearance of false teaching and imperfect views of Christ accentuated the necessity of more dogmatic expression. Signs of this are found in the Epistles of St. John (1 Jn 4<sup>13</sup>, cf. 2<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>2-3</sup>, 2 Jn 7). Here we have the necessary antithesis to gnostic docetism; the deepened consciousness of the Church responded to a fuller confession, involving both the Fatherhood of God and the true Sonship of Jesus.

2. Both in OT and NT, confession of sin before God is recognized as a condition of forgiveness, being the guarantee of genuine repentance and purpose of amendment. Thus Joshua exhorted Achan to make confession unto the Lord (Jos 7<sup>19</sup>); the Psalmist 'confessed his sin' (Ps 32<sup>5</sup>; cf. 51<sup>4</sup>); Pr 28<sup>13</sup> 'who confesseth and forsaketh his sin shall have mercy,' and Jesus exhibits the prodigal son as moved by a natural impulse to confess to his father. Confession, therefore, as at once an instinct of the heart and a principle of God's kingdom, was consistently recognized and inculcated by the Mosaic ritual. It was required of the individual whenever he had committed a trespass (Lv 5<sup>1-5</sup> 26<sup>40</sup>), and its necessity in regard to both individual and national sins was exhibited in the ceremony of the Yom Kippur over whose head the high-priest was to confess: 'the iniquities of the whole people' (Lv 16<sup>21</sup>). Confession became the natural and regular accompaniment of prayer (cf. Ezr 10<sup>4</sup>). At the same time representative men felt themselves to be partakers in national sins of unbelief and disobedience, and bound to confess these as well as their own (Dn 9<sup>20</sup>). The whole prayer in Dn 9 shows the nature and contents of such a confession.

The connexion between repentance and confession was so ingrained in the Jewish conscience that when, under the Baptist's preaching, many were led to repent, open confession accompanied their baptism (Mk 1<sup>5</sup>), and doubtless the Apostolic baptism was prefaced by a confession in this sense as well as the other. Such a confession was understood to be made to God, but commonly it would be made in the hearing of men (cf. Ac 17<sup>4</sup>). It is plain also that Christ taught the necessity of acknowledging, and obtaining forgiveness for, offences committed against other men (Mt 5<sup>24</sup>, Lk 17<sup>4</sup>). As to the mode of confession or the person to receive it, no instruction is given. It is clear, however, from the language of St. John (1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>) and St. James that it was specific, definite, and mutual. In Ja 5<sup>16</sup> the reading of WH (tὰς ἀμαρτίας for TR τὰ παραπτώματα) puts it beyond doubt that reference is made to sins against God; but the ἄλλοις (Chrysostom and others) which is in the text shows that confession was to be made to the Presbyters, involves an inadmissible tautology. Ἀλλήλους can only refer to the relation of individual believers to one another, so that Cajetan from the Roman standpoint rightly admits 'nec hic est sermo de confessione sacramentali.'

C. A. SCOTT.

CONFIRMATION.—The verb 'confirm' is used in a very general sense in the AV, serving as a rendering of no fewer than eleven words in the original languages—seven Heb. (אָמַד, אָמַד, אָמַד, אָמַד, אָמַד, אָמַד, אָמַד), and four Gr. (βεβαιῶ, ἐπιστηρίξω, κυρώ, μεστρεύω). The OT group of words suggests the idea of establishing and strengthening; though in some cases the more technical sense of a legal or authoritative confirmation comes in, esp. when the word אָמַד is used (e.g. Ru 4<sup>7</sup>, Est 9<sup>29</sup>, 31<sup>32</sup>). In the NT βεβαιῶ and ἐπιστηρίξω are used in the general sense of strengthening and establishing, while κυρώ is used in the sense of giving power or validity (2 Co 2<sup>8</sup>, Gal 3<sup>15</sup>), and μεστρεύω is employed in its natural meaning of acting as a mediator (He 6<sup>17</sup>). The substantive 'confirmation' is used in the two senses of 'making firm' (Ph 1<sup>7</sup>), and giving 'validity' (1 Ti 3<sup>10</sup>). It is not used in the Bible to describe an ecclesiastical rite. In the Acts reference is made to St. Paul 'confirming the souls of the disciples' (14<sup>22</sup>), and 'confirming the Churches' (15<sup>42</sup>); and it is stated that 'the apostles and prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them' (15<sup>32</sup>)—forms of ἐπιστηρίξω being used in each case. There is no indication that any ceremony was performed on these occasions; the narrative would rather suggest the general idea of strengthening and establishing spiritually. But although the laying on of hands (ἐπιθεῖς τῶν χειρῶν) is not connected with the word confirmation, it appears in association with the gift of the Holy Spirit to disciples by apostles subsequent to baptism (Ac 8<sup>12-17</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>), and as a rite following baptism, in He 6<sup>2</sup>. This was after the example of the Jewish method of blessing (e.g. Gn 48<sup>13, 24</sup>), which was recognized by the mothers who brought their children to Jesus that He might 'lay his hands on them,' etc. (Mt 19<sup>13</sup>). According to the Talmud, a father laid his hands on his child, after which the elders also blessed him (Buxtorf., Syn. Jud. 138). As late as Tertullian the laying on of hands was closely associated with baptism as almost part of the same rite (de Bap. c. 8; de Resurr. Carn. c. 8).

CONFISCATION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

CONFOUND.—This vb. is used in three senses.

1. Destroy, shatter, Jer 1<sup>17</sup> 'be not dismayed at their faces, lest I c. thee before them.' The Geneva and Bishops' Bibles have 'destroy' here, and it is possible that AV chose a milder word on purpose, as RV has a still milder 'lest I dismay thee before them'; but the Heb. פָּרַחְתִּיךָ, נָחַךְ in hiph.) has the meaning of 'shatter,' as in Is 9<sup>4</sup> 'the yoke of his burden . . . thou hast broken' (RV); and the Eng. word has this meaning also, as Milton, Par. Lost, ii. 380—

But from the auth . . . 'Whence,
So deep a malice,
Of Mankind in one root?'

2. Put to shame. This is the most frequent meaning. RV often changes 'c<sup>d</sup>' into 'ashamed,' but Amer. RV prefers 'put to shame.' Earlier versions sometimes had 'c<sup>d</sup>' where AV has 'ashamed,' as 2 S 10<sup>6</sup> Douay, 'The men were confounded very lowly, and David commanded them, Tary in Jericho, til your beard be grown.' 3. Throws into confusion (stronger than 'confound'). Dr. Murray suggests the colloq. 'to be 11<sup>7</sup>' (see TONGUES, CONFUSION OF), 2 Mac 13<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>28</sup> 'he was much c<sup>d</sup> in himself'; Ac 2<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> (συγχέω, cf. Ac 19<sup>22</sup> 21<sup>31</sup> 'was in confusion' RV).

J. HASTINGS.

CONFUSED.—Confuse and confusion were much stronger words in Elizabethan than in mod. Eng., Ac 19<sup>22</sup> 'the assembly was c<sup>d</sup> (RV 'in confusion'); Is 9<sup>5</sup> 'with c. noise (RV 'in the tumult'). See CONFOUND 3. Confusion: 1. Tumultuous disorder, as Ac 19<sup>22</sup> 'the whole city was filled with c.' (σύνχυσις), 1 Co 14<sup>33</sup>, Ja 3<sup>16</sup> (ἀκαταστασία), 2 Es 16<sup>21</sup>, Lv 18<sup>23</sup> 20<sup>12</sup> (הָפָז), Is 24<sup>10</sup> 34<sup>11</sup> 41<sup>29</sup> (הָפָז). The Oxf. Eng. Dict. quotes Is 34<sup>11</sup> 'he shall stretch out upon it the line of c.' as an example of c. in the sense of destruction (see CONFOUND 1); and that meaning was common in 1611, as Shaks. Mid. Night's Dream, I. i. 149—

'So quick bright things come to confusion.'

But the Heb. (which is the word tr. 'without form,' RV 'waste,' in Gn 1<sup>2</sup>) makes it probable that in all the passages from Isaiah the meaning is disorder. 2. Shame, disgrace, as Ps 35<sup>24</sup> 'brought to c.' (נָחַךְ, RV 'confounded,' Cheyne 'abashed'); Job 10<sup>15</sup> 'I am full of c.' (הָפָז, RV 'confounded'); esp. with Heb. bōsheth, 1 S 20<sup>30</sup> 31<sup>2</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>10</sup>, Jer 7<sup>10</sup>, Dn 9<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>. (Except Ps 70<sup>3</sup>, Is 61<sup>7</sup>, Jer 7<sup>10</sup>, Mic 1<sup>11</sup>, Zeph 3<sup>5, 19</sup>, bōsheth is tr. by ἀλογον in LXX.) See TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

J. HASTINGS.

CONGREGATION is AV rendering of several Heb. terms, esp. עֵדָה, קָהָל, and מִסְעָד. It will be necessary to examine minutely the linguistic usage of OT in regard to each of these.

1. עֵדָה (mō'ed). The root-idea contained in this word is that of a fixed appointed meeting or tryst between God and man. Hence it is frequently employed to mean a 'set time,' or to designate the sacred seasons (mō'ādīm) when all the males in Israel had to present themselves at J<sup>h</sup>'s sanctuary (Hos 9<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>, Lv 23<sup>2</sup> 4 37. 44). It is but a step from this when we find the word used to designate the assembly that celebrated the festival, or indeed as a designation for any assembly. In Job 30<sup>23</sup> we have עֵדָה לְכָל־יָדָי 'the place of assembly for all living,' used of Sheol, while in Is 33<sup>20</sup> Zion is called עֵדָה מִסְעָד 'the city of our assemblies' (cf. Ps 74<sup>4</sup>, La 1<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>24</sup>). In particular, עֵדָה occurs very frequently in the phrase עֹהֶל מוֹעֵד (Ohel mō'ed) the Tent of Meeting (between J<sup>h</sup> and Israel). The familiar AV tabernacle of the congregation fails entirely to suggest the true idea conveyed by the phrase as this is explained in Ex 29<sup>44</sup>. (Cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC 246.) The Sept. ἀσκή τοῦ μαρτυρίου and Vulg. tabernaculum testimonii, as well as Luther's Stiftshutte, have arisen, as Ges. explains, from improperly regarding עֵדָה as synonymous with עֵדָה (see Nu 9<sup>15</sup>, where 'tabernacle of the testimony' is ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ μαρτυρίου). עֹהֶל מוֹעֵד is used with great frequency by 1st 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> and by the Chronicler (1 Ch 6<sup>32</sup> 9<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>32</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>5</sup>), but it is employed also by E (Ex 33<sup>7</sup>, where its meaning is explained; cf. Nu 11<sup>24</sup> 25<sup>1</sup> J), and occurs in at least two passages which belong to JE, viz. Nu 11<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>4</sup>. The source of Dt 31<sup>14</sup> is uncertain, and 1 S 2<sup>23</sup> and 1 K 8<sup>4</sup> can scarcely be taken into consideration, because both contain elements of late date. In Ps 74<sup>8</sup> עֹהֶל מוֹעֵד = all the synagogues of God, and in La 2<sup>6</sup> עֹהֶל מוֹעֵד is employed as a designation for the temple.

It may be worth while to remind the reader that in the expression solemn assembly, which is occasionally used by AV as a rendering of עֹהֶל מוֹעֵד, 'solemn' has its archaic sense of 'fixed' or 'stated,' Lat. solemnis (Driver, Deut. 189).

In Is 14<sup>13</sup> mount of the congregation probably refers to the assembly of the gods, whose dwelling-place, according to Bab. mythology, was located in the far north, upon the 'mountain of the world' (Driver, Isaiah 129 n.; Delitzsch, Isaiah, new ed. i. 310). See BABYLONIA, p. 216<sup>a</sup>.

2. עֵדָה (edāh) and קָהָל (kāhāl). Before examining the linguistic usage of OT it may be well to refer to a distinction between these two words which has been contended for by some. Vitringa (de Synagoga veter. 80, 88), with whom Trench (Synonyms of NT, 3 f.) agrees, expresses the difference thus, 'notat proprie קָהָל universam alicujus populi multitudinem vinculis societatis unitam et rempublicam quandam constituentem; cum vocabulum עֵדָה ex indole et vi significationis suae tantum dicat quomocumque hominum cœtum et conventum sive minorem sive majorem. . . . συναγωγὴ ut et sive semper significat cœtum conjunctum et congregatum etiamsi nullo forte vinculo ligatum, sed ἐκκλησία (קָהָל) designat multitudinem alicujus quæ populum constituit, per leges et vincula inter se junctam, etsi sæpe fiat ut non sit coacta vel cogi possit.' This is certainly far more plausible and reasonable than the famous distinction which Augustine sought to establish between συναγωγὴ and ἐκκλησία, or rather between their Latin equivalents, congregatio and convocatio, the latter being the nobler term, because used of calling together men, while congregatio designated the gathering together of cattle (grex)! Vitringa's distinction comes, in fact, pretty near to that of Schürer, to which we shall advert presently; but it seems a mistake to endeavour to carry such a distinction back to OT. It may fairly be questioned whether in a single instance the contention of Vitringa can be established. Rather are we inclined to see in the choice of the one or the other of these terms a mark of authorship. It is remarkable that עֵדָה finds favour in certain books, while קָהָל is prevailingly, if not exclusively, employed in others.

In the Sept. συναγωγὴ generally answers to קָהָל, and ἐκκλησία to קָהָל. The latter statement holds good uniformly in Jos, Jg, S, K, Ch, Ezr, and Neh, also in Dt (with the exception of 5<sup>22</sup>, where קָהָל is rendered συναγωγὴ). On the other hand, קָהָל is rendered by συναγωγὴ in Ex, Lv, Nu, probably in order to secure uniformity in the Gr., for קָהָל in these books is always συναγωγὴ. Once in the Ps קָהָל is rendered συναγωγὴ (40<sup>10</sup>); elsewhere we find ἐκκλησία, except in 26<sup>5</sup>, where it is συνέδριον.

While we cannot admit that the distinction contended for by Vitringa is traceable in OT, yet a somewhat similar distinction is discovered by Schurer in the usage of the terms by later Judaism. συναγωγὴ was the term applicable to the empirical reality, the actual congregation existing in any one place, while ἐκκλησία designated the ideal, the assembly of those called by God to salvation. It is easy to see how, on this account, ἐκκλησία displaced συναγωγὴ in Christian circles. In classical Greek, as is well known, ἐκκλησία was the name for the body of free citizens summoned by a herald, and in this sense it is used in Ac 19 of the assembly at Ephesus. A statutory meeting was designated κῆρυξ or ἐννομος (the latter in Ac 19<sup>39</sup>), one specially summoned was σύνκλητος. It can hardly be said, however, that classical usage throws much light upon the nature of the ἐκκλησία, or 'congregation,' so often spoken of in OT. The word may be used of an assembly summoned for a definite purpose (1 K 8<sup>5</sup>) or met on a festal occasion (Dt 23<sup>1</sup>), but far more frequently it has in view the community of Israel collectively regarded as a nation. Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex. 205) finds this last usage distinctive of P. The nation is viewed from such a standpoint in JE, or even in D. See ASSEMBLY.

In OT Apoc. ἐκκλησία occurs in the sense of a popular assembly (Jth 6<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>, Sir 15<sup>5</sup>), more rarely as a designation for the people as a whole (1 Mac 4<sup>20</sup>).

In NT ἐκκλησία is applied to the congregation of the people of Isr. in the speech of Stephen (Ac 7<sup>38</sup>), but συναγωγὴ came gradually to be employed to distinguish Isr. from other nations. (It is characteristic of the Ep. of James that in 2<sup>2</sup> συναγωγὴ is used of an assembly of Jewish Christians, and of the Ep. to the Hebrews that in 10<sup>23</sup> ἐπισυναγωγὴ [the word has a different meaning in 2 Th 2<sup>1</sup>] is spoken of a Christian community.) Hence, apart from the reason that it was natural that ἐκκλησία should be chosen as the designation of the Christian Church, owing to the Judaistic associations of συναγωγὴ.

While there is little about OT 'congregation' to recall the popular assembly of a Gr. community (for the elders, or in post-exilic times at Jerus., the high priest and his counsellors, seem to have generally acted alone), there are one or two examples of an opposite kind. In Nu 35<sup>24</sup> (P) it is the 'congregation' that decides the case of the manslayer who has reached a city of refuge, although even here the decision according to D<sup>2</sup> rests with the elders (cf. the above passage with Jos 20<sup>4</sup> [D<sup>2</sup>], or the latter with v. 6<sup>a</sup> [P]). Similar functions are ascribed to the 'congregation' in the late and peculiar narrative of Jg 20, 21, and in Ezr 10, on the latter of which Kuenen (Rel. of Israel, ii. 214) remarks, 'In very weighty matters the decision even rested with the whole community, which was summoned to Jerus. for that purpose.' (All that concerns the OT congregation as a worshipping body will be dealt with under CHURCH, SYNAGOGUE, and TEMPLE.)

For the sake of completeness it may be well to note the usage of some other words of kindred import to the three we have discussed.

(a) קָהָל ('āzereth), from a root containing the idea of enclosing or confining, is frequently applied to the 'congregation' that celebrates the festivals (Jl 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>15</sup>, Am 5<sup>21</sup>, 2 K 10<sup>20</sup>, Is 1<sup>13</sup>, in which last passage it is coupled with קָהָל). The nearest Gr. equivalent is πανήγυρις (by which it is rendered in the Sept. of Am 5<sup>21</sup>, and which occurs in the NT once, He 12<sup>23</sup> 'the general assembly'). קָהָל designates especially such assemblies as were convened on the seventh day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Dt 16<sup>8</sup>), and the eighth day of the F. of Tabernacles (Lv 23<sup>36</sup>, Nu 29<sup>35</sup>, Neh 8<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ch 7<sup>9</sup>).

(b) קָהָל קָדֶשׁ (miqra' kōdesh), which occurs so frequently in the 'holy convocation' of AV, is a favourite expression in the priestly sections of Ex, Lv, and Nu, particularly in H (Lv 17-26). The Sept. usually renders it κλητὴ ἀγία (cf. Sanday, Romans, 12 f.). The simple קָהָל occurs in Nu 10<sup>2</sup> and Is 1<sup>13</sup>. It is hard to discover any difference between this term and קָהָל.

(c) קָהָל (śōd), originally = friendly conversation (δουλία), then on the one hand = friendliness, friendship, and on the other = a body of friends (cf. Driver on Am 3<sup>3</sup>). It is used of a gathering for familiar converse (Jer 6<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>17</sup>, in the latter of which the Sept. has συνέδριον), of a deliberative council (Job 15<sup>3</sup>, Jer 23<sup>18</sup>, Ps 89<sup>7</sup>, in all these used of the Privy Council of the Almighty), of a secret company of wicked men plotting evil (Ps 64<sup>3</sup>), or of the select assembly of the upright (Ps 111<sup>1</sup>, where קָהָל is coupled with קָהָל, as it is in Gn 49<sup>6</sup> with קָהָל).

CONJECTURE.—Only Wis 8<sup>8</sup> '[Wisdom] ceth aright what is to come' (εἰκάτε). RV has 'divineth the things to come,' with 'ceth' in marg. But it is probable that in AV ceth = 'divineth,' as Scot (1584), 'Conjecture unto me by thy familiar spirit.'

CONSCIENCE.—The word is not found in OT; it occurs in Apoc., Wis 17<sup>11</sup> 'wickedness . . . being pressed with c., always forecasteth grievous things' (συνείδησις), Sir 14<sup>2</sup> 'Blessed is he whose c. hath not condemned him' (ψυχή, RV 'soul'), and 2 Mac 6<sup>11</sup> 'they made a c. to help themselves' (εὐλαβὴς ἔχειν, RV 'scrupled'; cf. Purchas [1625], Pilgrimes, ii. 1276, 'They will . . . make more conscience to breake a Fast, than to commit a Murder'). In NT 32 times (RV 30 times, omitting Jn 8<sup>9</sup>, and reading συνθήκη 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>) always for συνείδησις, of which it is the invariable and appropriate tr. But mod. usage would prefer 'consciousness' in 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup> 'some with c. of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol' (RV with edd. reads συνθήκη, hence 'being used until now to the idol'); and in He 10<sup>2</sup> 'no more c. of sins.' Cf. Milton, Par. Lost, viii. 502—

'Her virtue and the conscience of her worth.'

A. HISTORICAL SKETCH.—When man begins to reflect on his experience as a moral agent, two questions emerge. (1) What is the highest good for man? What is the 'chief end' in attainment of which man finds satisfaction? (2) What is the source of moral obligation? What power commands and regulates human action? In the history of thought, these two questions occur in the order stated; and it is not till the second has been asked that a doctrine of conscience is possible.

1. Greek philosophy in its prime is mainly concerned with the first of these. The ethics of Plato and Aristotle are largely occupied with discussing the nature of the Good; and practically their doctrine amounts to this, that man finds his highest welfare in the duties of citizenship. Man is regarded as part of the physical and social world in which he finds himself; and his welfare lies in playing his due part therein. This doctrine was sufficient as long as the Greek State lasted. When this was broken up, however, and there was no longer a life of free and ennobling activity open to men, the moral problem assumed the second form. Man is thrust back on himself. His individuality becomes emphasized over against the world, in which he can now no longer realize himself. Turning in upon himself, he seeks within the gratification of his own mind the life which waited for him without. This type of mind, so characteristic of thoughtful and earnest men under the Roman Empire, finds expression in the philosophical doctrines of the Stoics and Epicureans. These are as intensely subjective as the systems of Plato and Aristotle had been comprehensive and objective. Not, therefore, till man has become aware of himself as an individual, and looks out on life from the standpoint of his subjectivity, does the question of the rule of conduct clearly emerge. In discussing this question, the Stoics found the rule in reason, the Epicureans in sense. The Stoics made wide the opposition between reason and sense. Virtue, according to them, is reasonableness, and is exercised in absolute control of sense, utter indifference to material things, and austere rejection of pleasure. Noble things are said by them in praise of virtue, and eloquent testimony is borne against the views of a corrupt age. But by their own admission the leading principle of their thought and action is sublime but powerless. The moral world needed an active principle which should regenerate character and reconstitute society. This power came with Christianity.

2. In the history of religion as set forth in the Christian Scriptures, we find a similar succession in the order in which the above-mentioned problems emerge. A doctrine of conscience is not found till late in the development of Christian thought, when the consciousness of individuality is strong and full. There are indeed traces of the operations of conscience. Man is always treated as a moral being (so in the prophets, and especially in Ezekiel, whose sense of individual responsibility is new and strong), susceptible of communications from a personal God, and amenable to His judgment. But conscience, or the source of obligation for the individual, is not made a subject of special treatment in the earlier stages of man's spiritual history. Broadly speaking, there is no doctrine of conscience in the OT. The heart is the centre of man's whole spiritual energy, whether intellectual or moral; and no subtle analysis of mental or moral powers is attempted. The characteristic work of conscience, condemning us when we do wrong, is ascribed to the heart, Job 27<sup>6</sup>. The absence of a doctrine of conscience from the OT is to be explained, not by any reference to the alleged disinclination of the Heb. mind for psychology, but by the fact that the stage of moral development at which the Hebrews were under Mosaism, precluded the question to which the doctrine of conscience is an answer. The law may be compared to the systems of Plato and Aristotle, inasmuch as it answers the first of the moral questions which arise on consideration of man's life, viz. What is the Good? The Good is the will of God expressed in this body of legislation. The question of principle of action, or an organ of moral judgment, cannot emerge till the conception of the Good has been made explicit. The law is the conscience of the Heb. community. Hence, as Oehler points out, the idea of a νόμος γραμμένος ἐν καρδίᾳ is wholly alien to the OT. This absence of a doctrine of conscience is to be found also in our Lord's teaching. He never uses the word, and for a similar reason. His teaching is essentially revelation. He is dealing with the highest good for man, stating it in words, exhibiting it in life. His teaching and example are addressed to conscience, and are meant to awaken conscience; and for this very reason He does not and cannot discuss conscience. Many of His sayings apply to conscience, and cast light on it, e.g. 'the lamp of the body,' Mt 6<sup>22, 23</sup>; but conscience itself does not form part of His express teaching.

With Christ's work as Redeemer a new stage of man's history is entered on. The first question is answered; the first need is met. The Good is revealed as truth; it is accomplished in act; it is present as power. What Greek philosopher could do after the revelation of the Kingdom of God, is impossible in the Kingdom of God. The parallel is more fanciful. As the Greek realized the good in the duties of citizenship in the State, the Christian realizes it in the duties of citizenship in the kingdom of God. The virtue of the Greek was narrowed by the limitations of the Gr. State; the obligation and possibility of mankind in the realm of grace, which no political change can restrict or destroy.

Now, accordingly, man as an individual gets his rights, and becomes the subject of special study. The NT, apart from the teaching of our Lord, is largely occupied with the consideration of man in relation to the grace of God which has come with Christ. Human nature is studied as it could not be at an earlier stage. It is true that there is no merely speculative treatment, the interest of the NT being practical and not technical. References, however, to various aspects of man's moral constitution abound. In the NT the question of man's relation to the Good, the will of God receives special treatment, and is answered by an explicit doctrine of conscience. Man is confronted by the revealed will of God, revealed not only in a book, but in a Person. How does this will make itself felt in the sphere of man's individual consciousness? How is man guided and impelled towards the fulfilment of this will? The answer of St. Paul, and other writers in the NT, is conscience. Conscience, therefore, at once becomes the object of special practical interest. It is the great aim of a Christian to have a conscience that shall be 'good,' 'void of offence,' or 'pure'; and it is of paramount importance that conscience should be maintained in a condition of enlightenment and power adequate to the discharge of its great function as the organ of moral apprehension and moral judgment.

3. After the varied Christian life of the early centuries of our era had died away, Christian ethic, like Christian theology, fell under the blight of mediæval scholasticism. Christian truth was stiffened into a system of dogma. Christian morality was elaborated into a legal system more cumbrous and wearisome than ever the Mosaic code had been. Under this double burden the souls of men groaned in bondage. Yet even in the darkest ages there were not wanting symptoms of revolt. Mysticism claimed the power of holding fellowship with God, without the intervention of ecclesiastical machinery; but it failed to base its protest on a sound conception of human nature, and so never rose beyond the position of a secret in possession of a few unique spirits. Final deliverance came in the epoch of the Reformation. The Reformation was in essence a religious revival. The cumbrous ecclesiastical machinery by which the mediæval Church, while professing to unite God and man, had really held them apart, was swept away in a burst of righteous wrath. The relations of God and man came to be re-stated under the inspiration of original Christian ideas. In this process conscience necessarily played an important part. Conscience accentuated the antagonism between man and God, and showed man guilty in a degree for which indulgences and priestly absolutions brought no sound relief. Conscience, in like manner, in view of the complete atonement wrought by Christ, testified, to him who rested on Christ alone for salvation, perfect peace with God. Conscience, accordingly, occupies large space in the writings of the Reformers, as it must do in all Christian teaching. It is not made, however, the subject of special theoretical treatment. Speculative interest in the question of the source of moral judgment has not awakened; and the necessity of its discussion is not yet felt. The Reformation, in fact, was not an individualistic movement. It is a misrepresentation to describe it as such, or to quote such phrases as 'the right of private judgment,' as embodying its characteristic ideas. Those great religious writers who most fully express in their own pure thought the Protestant spirit—Descartes and Spinoza—are by no means individualists. At the same time, there can be no doubt that the Reformation contained the possibility of individualism. The external unity of the Church had been broken up. Before a conception of spiritual unity could be formed and wrought out in moral and political life, it was inevitable that an epoch of individualism should supervene, in which man should seek to find the solution of intellectual and moral problems within his own subjectivity. This movement predominated most largely in England, and obtained almost exclusive sway, till within the present century it has met a counter current of thought. Ethical theory during such a period is largely occupied with the question of the source of moral obligation, and the faculty of moral judgment. British moralists may be distinguished and classified mainly by their views on this topic. At the head of the long line stands Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679), a writer whose fertile suggestiveness, virile force, and daring analysis, made him a paramount influence in the development of ethical doctrine in Britain. His fundamental position is that man's natural tendencies are only and altogether 'self-regarding.' The good for the individual is simply what he desires for himself. The result of each individual seeking the gratification of his own desires is, of course, a state of war, whose miseries

Hobbes depicts to the life. Reason, accordingly, intervenes to stop this intolerable state of matters, and does so by enjoining submission to a sovereign government. Hobbes thus pushes the state of war to an extreme in which it becomes intolerable, and is replaced by an iron rule, under which the individual is practically enslaved. In such a system there is no place for conscience, properly speaking. Hobbes uses the word only in connexion with the analogous phrase 'conscious.' Conscience is no more than opinion shared by various individuals. Any higher sense is mere metaphor. The moral faculty is no other than reason, calculating how best to secure individual advantage, and deciding upon submission to the State as the best means of securing the end aimed at. Such a doctrine was rather the product of a problem than its solution. Some writers find that ethical thought in England is concerned mainly in answers to Hobbes, or rather in answers to the moral problem suggested by him: What is the source of moral obligation? What is the nature of the moral faculty? These answers follow three distinct lines.

(1) Appeal is made to reason. Reason is regarded as the power by which universal truths and principles are perceived and proclaimed. This is, in general, the view of Cudworth (1617-1688), whose Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality, not published till 1731, is directed against the view of Hobbes as destructive of the distinctions of good and evil; and of Clarke (1675-1729). Both these writers claim for man this faculty of recognizing truths, ideas, or relations of things, prior to and apart from the suggestions of sensation. Here we have a real answer to Hobbes, and a most hopeful line of ethical thought. If man have this power, then we are lifted at once above the degrading view of man as a creature of merely selfish instincts, and have morality based, not on conventions, but on eternal fact.

The value of such 'dianoetic ethics,' to use Martineau's designation, depends obviously on the view taken of reason; and in the above-mentioned writers, reason is conceived too much as a mere formal power, limited to the recognition of truths submitted to it. Thus, while phrases in Cudworth, for instance, remind one of Kant, there is no approach to the Kantian doctrine of knowledge, still less to its subsequent idealist development.

(2) A fuller analysis of human instincts is attempted. Hobbes had said man's primary instincts are self-regarding. It was obviously open to reply that they were not, or that they all were not. Accordingly, we have such writers as Shaftesbury (1671-1713) and Hutcheson (1694-1746) laboring to prove that man possesses social as well as selfish instincts, and placing virtue in the proper balance of the two. The perception of this balance or proportion is due to a moral sense, which, like the sense of beauty in things artistic, guides us in things moral. At a first glance it might appear, as no doubt it did to the writers themselves, that they were answering Hobbes, and giving a more dignified conception of human nature. Really, however, they are in substantial agreement with Hobbes, entirely so as to pre-suppositions, and practically so as to result. They also appeal to instincts as providing motives and impulses. Some of these, indeed, they say are not selfish; but if we press them we find that the special power of unselfish instincts is the superior gratification they afford, i.e. they are at bottom selfish still. Selfishness, or, to give it a more refined but more misleading title, Utility, is the spring and standard of action. The psychological and even the ethical principles of Hobbes are really continued in Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, Adam Smith, Hume.

(3) Reference is made to a distinct power of human nature, viz. to Conscience, as supreme arbiter in morals. Butler (1692-1752) is distinguished among British moralists for the emphasis he lays on this faculty. He sees that Shaftesbury's reply to Hobbes is defective in this respect, that his 'moral sense' lacks the quality of supremacy, which is required to face and quell the imperiousness of selfish instincts. He labours, therefore, to establish the supremacy of conscience, and to vindicate for it magisterial position and authority. Of the impressiveness and moral strength of Butler's writings it is impossible to speak too highly. As a practical protest against the immorality of his own age, they are deeply interesting; and as a moral tonic in any age, they are invaluable. As ethical theory, or doctrine of conscience, however, they cannot be said to be final or satisfactory. Butler was, to quote the words of T. H. Green, 'the victim of the current psychology.*' To him, as much as to Hobbes, Shaftesbury, Locke, or Hume, feeling was the source of action, as of knowledge. Objects of desire are given. Then conscience, a power whose origin and nature are unexplained and unaccountable, appears to decide among the competing desires. It speaks with authority, but is unable to make its authority felt. Ultimately, Butler is driven to admit practical supremacy to self-love, and takes refuge in the identity of duty and self-interest. A higher principle does indeed appear in Butler, viz. the love of God. But as he never reconsidered his psychology, this rather contributes additional confusion to his scheme. Human nature remains 'a cross of unreconciled principles,' self-love, benevolence, conscience, the love of God. Plainly, such a view of man cannot provide a sure basis of ethics. The whole moral problem must be reconsidered. What is implied in moral action? If it shall appear that the sensationalist psychology is at fault, if feeling cannot present objects of desire, if in the simplest action there is implied the presence of a Self, making itself its own object, then we are led to a view of man as a being who finds his true good in the good of others, and of conscience as not merely authoritative, but also mighty to carry its precepts into effect, being indeed the presence within the individual consciousness of that Reason, Mind, Spirit, or Personality whose revelation is found in all reality and all good.

It is not needful to pursue the line of British moralists any further. Whoever they happen to be, Paley, Bentham, James Mill, J. S. Mill, or Bain, whatever their minor differences or their special excellences, they unite in retaining the psychology which reigned throughout the eighteenth century. In vain for them did Hume carry the conclusions of that psychology to a scepticism which provoked Kant to a reply, which introduced a new conception of man and the spiritual world. All alike they cling to the conviction that it is possible by dissection to arrive at the living man, and by analyzing his sensations to account for knowledge and morality. They may vary in detail, but they are in substantial agreement as to results. The chief end of man is happiness. The moral faculty is a variously described compound of feelings, whose fluidity is stiffened by the sanctions and punishments of society. This psychology has more recently allied itself with the hypothesis of organic evolution, and made draughts of illimitable time aid in establishing its conclusions. Prolonged experience of pleasure in connexion with actions, which serve social ends, has resulted in certain physiological changes in the brain and nervous system, which render these actions constant. Thus, according to Spencer, is begotten a conscience or moral sense, which gives the name of intuition to the feelings, and, in the history of psychology, thus strengthened by evolution, has called forth various replies.

(a) Intuitionism enters its earnest denial. Dr. Martineau's strictures on evolutionary ethics are powerful, and his general ethical doctrine is most earnest and impressive. His position closely resembles that of Butler in last century. Like Butler, he gives an account of the springs of moral action. But whereas Butler only mentions two, Self-love and Benevolence, Martineau's list is most elaborate, containing no fewer than thirteen passions, propensions, sentiments, or affections. Quite as Butler had done, he gives to conscience a judicial function in respect to these springs of action. Distinctive in Martineau, however, is his doctrine that conscience judges, not of the rightness of acts, but of the rank of motives. Conscience he defines to be 'the critical perception we have of the relative authority of our several principles of action.' Right and wrong he defines thus: 'Every action is right which, in presence of a lower principle, follows a higher; every action is wrong which, in presence of a higher principle, follows a lower.' The doctrine is powerful as Dr. Martineau's exposition, but open to the objection which may be brought against Butler. Whence come these springs of action? Do they simply appear before the consciousness of conscience, without any prior determination by self-consciousness? Then we are thrown back, as we were by Butler, upon current sensational psychology. And whence comes conscience? Does it simply appear, and seat itself in judicial state, a separate, unique faculty, inexplicable and mysterious, owning no other relation to self-consciousness? Then its authority is blind, and, as in Butler's doctrine, is based upon power.

(b) A conclusive answer is reached only through a consideration of the possibility of experience in general, and of moral experience in particular. Such an answer is to be found in Green's Prolegomena to Ethics. Press the analysis of sensation as far back as we please, make our list of feelings and instincts as detailed as possible, we never get a mere sensation or instinct, such as we might suppose it to be in the lower animals, but always the sensation as it is to a self, already modified by its relation to self-consciousness. In the simplest sensation, there is implied the operation of a spiritual principle, which is the basis of the possibility at once of knowledge and of morality. The sensationalist psychology is thus deprived of its whole raison d'être. It exists in order to get personality out of sensations. It can do so, only because personality is therein already implied.

The hypothesis of evolution is of no use to sensationalism, and does not invalidate the argument of idealism. 'That countless generations should have passed during which a transmitted organism was progressively modified by reaction on its surroundings, by struggle for existence or otherwise, till its functions became such that an eternal consciousness could realize or reproduce itself through him'—this might add to the wonder with which our consideration of what we do and are must always fill us, but it could not alter the results of that consideration. If such be discovered to be the case, the discovery cannot affect the analysis of knowledge of what is implied in there being a world to be known, and in our knowing it, on which we found our theory of the action of a free or self-conditioned and eternal mind in man' (Prolegomena, p. 82). Man, therefore, is a self or personality, which is not, however, an incident in a series, but is rooted in an infinite self or personality. Our individual self-consciousness derives from and is maintained by an infinite, eternal, universal, self-consciousness; Green would say, is a 'reproduction' of it,—a phrase open to misconception. Knowledge, therefore, is the gradual discovery of mind or spirit in things, the exhibition of the world as the self-manifestation of an infinite personality, with whom the finite intelligence of man is one. Morality is the progressive discovery of an eternal purpose, with which man is and ought to be at one, whose goal is the perfection of man. The moral faculty in man is the image of the infinite self, and is thus identical with the widest possible range of good for others, and is attained by the profoundest self-surrender. The moral faculty in man, whether reason or conscience, is no special 'endowment,' a vox clamantis in deserto. It is the man himself, conscious in all action of a good, which he either reaches or fails to reach, which in either case stands above his separate impulses, in the one case approving and beckoning him onward and upward, in the other condemning him and binding on him the penalty due to one who has broken the law of his own being. Conscience, thus conceived, may also with equal truth be described as the revelation of infinite good to man, or the voice of God witnessing to eternal right within the individual soul. It is the voice of the man's true self, and his true self is ideally one with God. On such lines alone is the sensationalist attack on absolute right and on conscience successfully met, and room found for Christian ethic, and a Christian doctrine of conscience.

B. OUTLINE OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

i. THE NATURE OF CONSCIENCE. — The locus classicus here is Ro 2<sup>14-15</sup>. The connexion of thought is the responsibility of all men for their actions, their condemnation in sin, their acceptance in righteousness. This applies to Gentiles as well as Jews. It would not apply had Gentiles no revelation of absolute good made to them, as the Jews had in the Law. Such a revelation, however, the Gentiles have. They (v. 14) do by nature, i.e. instinctively, the things which are articulately prescribed in the Law, and accordingly while they have not the Law as a written code, yet they have it in another sense. In what sense is now explained (v. 15). The comparison in the apostle's mind is between Jew and Gentile, in respect of the delivery to each of God's Law. To the Jews, this delivery was made at Sinai, and so in speaking of its delivery to the Gentiles he uses Sinaitic imagery. The apostle's description involves three points. (1) The delivery of the Law in the dictates of natural impulse; 'the work of the law,' i.e. a course of conduct conforming to the will of God, being 'written in their hearts,' as in the case of the Jews it was written on tables of stone. (2) The recognition of the Law in its binding obligations by a moral faculty, just as the Jews heard with bodily ear the proclamation of the Ten Commandments; 'their conscience bearing witness therewith,' i.e. along with the heart, when it speaks and prompts to duty. (3) Judgment passed upon actions in the light of the witness of conscience, some being favourable, others (as the emphasis implies, the greater number) being unfavourable; 'their thoughts one with another, accusing or else excusing them.'

The doctrine of this passage, borne out by other Scripture usage, therefore, is: (a) That man has received a revelation of good, sufficient to make him morally responsible. This revelation comes in different forms to men differently placed in the providential disposition of affairs. Even those who seem least situated have the revelation of good. It is so made that he finds the satisfaction of his true self in moral good only; and towards this the forward impulse of his heart goes forth. The race, charged with the special function of guarding and transmitting the spiritual heritage of humanity, has received a special revelation of good, explicitly stamped of superhuman origin. Finally, when 'the fulness of time' in the moral discipline of mankind is reached, the good finds complete revelation in a person, the man Christ Jesus. 'Nature,' with its few rudimentary facts of moral life, and 'Law,' with its greater articulateness, are summed up in 'Christ,' in whom moral good is perfectly realized. (β) That man possesses a moral faculty, or is possessed by it, that he has a conscience, which is indeed his self-consciousness in respect of moral action, in virtue of which he approves, approves, and binds upon himself the good, in whatever form it is revealed to him, and by the moral law which he pronounces judgment upon. This doctrine obviously rests upon the general scriptural doctrine of man as made in the image of God, of man as spirit even as God is spirit or personality, a conception which we have seen to be the suggestion of its criticism of unphilosophical psychology. God reveals His will to man, partially in Nature and Law, fully in Christ. Man as a spiritual being is susceptible of this revelation; his consciousness of it in things moral is conscience.

This view of conscience greatly simplifies it, and reduces it from the position of an inexplicable faculty, fulminating in impotent majesty above the warring impulses of man's nature. It is simply the faculty, if we must use the term, through which we apprehend the divine will so that it may direct our lives. It is no more a separate faculty, faith, and deserves no more than faith the credit of its operations. As faith lays hold of Christ, and thus saves and sanctifies; so conscience lays hold of the divine will, and thus legislates and judges. It is not an independent source of law and judgment. It voices the will of God.

It is plain, however, that this view, if in one sense it deprives conscience of the proud position which an intuitionist theory would confer upon it, in another confers upon it unique and awful supremacy. When conscience wakes and speaks, it means that man is in spiritual contact with God, that God is making His will felt in the depths of man's constitution. Thus it is that 'to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin'; sin, not error or mistake, nor only shortcoming, but trespass against the law of God, which is recognized as the law of our own being, in keeping which our welfare lies.

The practical result is that conscience claims, and must receive if we are to be true to our very nature, a position of absolute supremacy. Every action must be brought beneath its sway; in popular phrase, we must make conscience of all we do. Actions laid upon us by outward authority, we are to do, not because the authority is supported by force, but because conscience recognizes the good of which this authority is an expression; and so we obey 'for conscience' sake' (Ro 13<sup>5</sup>). Actions which seemingly lie outside the moral judgment, having apparently no relation to moral questions, are to be brought before conscience and carefully scrutinized, so that even in such matters as what we are to eat or refrain from eating, we are still to act 'for conscience' sake' (1 Co 10<sup>28-29</sup>). The whole domain of life is to be brought within the sweep of conscience, and every element in it is to be made subject to that great and just arbitrament.

It may be true that in a society so largely Christianized as ours, the man who acts from conscience will not behave in a manner markedly distinct from the behaviour of those who simply follow the conventions of society. There will, however, be very distinct differences on a closer scrutiny. He will discover new meanings in actions prescribed by convention, and will perform them the better that he does them with conscience. He will be on the outlook for new duties and new means of realizing the good which he apprehends, not as a code, but as an inner spiritual principle. The consequences of his actions cannot but tell in the long run. Perceiving the disparity between his own attainments and that good of which conscience is the witness, and to which it summons him, he has within him a divine discontent which drives him to further efforts, and secures for him greater excellences. The morality of a code is rigid, self-satisfied, pharisaic. The morality of conscience is ever aspiring, humble, dissatisfied with self. A conscience thus kept in its proper place is described as 'good' (Ac 23<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>, Mt 13<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>16, 21</sup>), not in the sense that he who has it has never sinned, but because he has yielded himself to the will of God, and is living in the spirit and aim of his career for the glory of God, while he never permits unforgiven sin to lie upon his heart: 'void of offence toward God and toward man' (Ac 24<sup>18</sup>), because the pleasing of God in all things, and his neighbour in all things for his good unto edification, is the man's constant aim and exercise; 'pure' (1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>8</sup>), because there is no doubleness of mind, or secret alienation from the will of God, but a sincere desire, an unwavering resolution to live so that He may approve.

It is, of course, always open to man as a free agent to disobey conscience, reject its witness, disregard its witness, and defy its voice. But an intuitionist theory, which regards conscience as a part of man, separable from other parts, it would be difficult to vindicate the terrible consequences of such conduct. It is because the conscience is the man himself in his consciousness of the divine will, that the consequences are so injurious, penetrate so deeply, and extend so widely. Conscience disobeyed is: (1) Defiled; and this defilement may be either (a) occasional (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>), or (b) permanent and pervasive (Tit 1<sup>2</sup>). (2) Branded or seared (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>), where the figure is either the branding of a slave with a stamp, or the extinction of faculty by the use of hot iron, in any case expressing the reduction of conscience to a state of moral incapacity. (3) Perverted (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>), so that conscience, the light of the soul, gives, not merely no deliverance, but a deliverance on the wrong side, the man being now, not a servant of the good, but of the evil, having sinned against the Holy Spirit.

That conscience is disobeyed in countless instances is patent fact; and these consequences may be traced in the history of individuals. It is more difficult to see the fact and to trace the consequence in the records of the race. Yet it is certain that sin is not merely an incident in the career of an individual, but a quality inherent in the conduct of man universally, and that the effects of sin are traceable, to what extent it is impossible to define, in the general conscience of mankind.

ii. THE COMPETENCE OF CONSCIENCE.—In all that is said of the supremacy of conscience its competence is, of course, presupposed. This, however, is precisely what is denied by those who desire to explain the phenomena of conscience on the basis of the evolution, and facts are urged in support of the claim of original authority. It must be remembered, however, what it is that is claimed by the Christian doctrine on behalf of conscience. It is not the infallible authority of an independent faculty, but the ability on the part of a being made in God's image to recognize God's will as it is progressively revealed to him.

Much of the sensationalist and evolutionary attack on conscience really applies only to the intuitionist theory of conscience, and does not touch the Christian doctrine or the idealist philosophy, whose criticism of the intuitionist theory we have noticed above. The special difficulties which call for consideration are these—

1. The diversity of moral judgments, as among different nations now, or at different stages of the world's history. The heathen conscience enjoins what the Christian conscience condemns. Jewish feeling rejoiced in deeds at which Christian sentiment shudders. Amid such divergences, is not the supremacy of conscience lost? The answer to this puzzle lies in our general view of man and his conscience of good. If man be a personal being in constant communication with the infinite Person, God, we can understand how his moral history is an education or development, each step in advance being gained through obedience to conscience, which proclaims as absolute the will of God. The stages of the revelation of good are marked by advance up to the full realization of good in Christ. Conscience at each stage is supreme, though its deliverances, compared together, vary according to the stage reached. Combined with this view is the fact of deterioration through disobedience, so that the conscience of a nation or religious community may become perverted, and proclaim as duty a bloody crime or an unnatural offence. Even among races which have formed the most mistaken standard of duty, it is found, as missionary records amply show, that the revelation of higher excellence meets with ready response, and conscience, revived by the light, calls upon man to follow it. In order to prove the supremacy of conscience, we do not need to prove uniformity amid the deliverances of conscience, from age to age. The very divergences set its persistent authority in more vivid light.

2. The alleged conflict of duties, which occasionally arises, reducing conscience to perplexity and silence. This certainly would be a fatal objection, not to the supremacy of conscience only, but to morality as a whole. If there arise circumstances, not due to any human crime or error, in which duty confronts duty in absolute contradiction, so that merely to act is to transgress, not only is conscience proved incompetent, but the moral sphere is shown not to include the whole of life, and righteousness by being demonstrated to be impossible is made unnecessary. The question can be met only by analyses of cases. Those cases must, of course, be excluded which are not, properly speaking, cases of conscience. One case only needs to be stated to be dismissed, that in which a verdict of conscience, in itself clear and distinct, is opposed by strong passion or self-interest which clamorously demands to be obeyed. Here, plainly, there is no question of the competence of conscience, or its claim to be obeyed. Another case is that in which the clear testimony of conscience is confronted by some instinct of the soul, itself true and noble. Here also there is, strictly speaking, no perplexity of conscience, and it is admitted that there is no wavering in its demand to be obeyed. Hesitation arises from the strong appeal of feeling. Sir Walter Scott has presented such a situation in the classic instance of Jeanie Deans, tempted to tell a falsehood in order to save her sister's life. Here the obligation of truth is confronted by sisterly affection. The action of Jeanie Deans unquestionably represents the true solution. Conscience is obeyed, while love goes forth in noblest sacrifice on behalf of the beloved. The difficulty of such cases is not speculative, but practical, and is to be met, not by intellectual discussion on the occasion when the difficulty arises, for which, indeed, there would be no time, but by the life habit of obedience, begetting an insight into the nature of the highest good for others, even our best beloved, as well as for ourselves, which will be available in the sudden emergency as an intuitive judgment.

Cases which do affect conscience and seem to perplex it, are those in which there is a 'conflict between different formulæ for expressing the ideal of good in human conduct, or between different institutions for furthering its realization, which have alike obtained authority over men's minds without being intrinsically entitled to more than a partial and relative obedience,' or an 'incompatibility of some such formula or institution, on the one side, with some moral impulse of the individual on the other, which is really an impulse towards the attainment of human perfection, but cannot adjust itself to recognized rules and established institutions' (Prolegomena, p. 342). In such cases 'the requirements of conscience seem to be in conflict with each other. However disposed to do what his conscience enjoins, the man finds it difficult to decide what its injunction is' (ibid. p. 351). Such cases may, indeed, become peculiarly complicated, and exceedingly painful. But they do not really constitute a conflict of duties. Right seems to be divided against itself, when in reality it is only rising through contest of opposite one-sided views to a fuller conception, or through the break-up of a system to a higher realization than could be contained within its limits. There is no such thing really as a conflict of duties. 'A man's duty under any particular set of circumstances is always one, though the conditions of the case may be so complicated and obscure as to make it difficult to decide what the duty really is' (ibid. p. 355). Here, in like manner, the ability and claim of conscience are not involved. It is true that there is no extant formula which will serve by its mere quotation to settle the case. Conscience is not so formal and unnatural a faculty as such a view would imply. Yet it is not incompetent, because it moves slowly and grows in knowledge and power through the discipline of the practice of obedience. With characteristic caution Butler states the matter, 'Let any plain, honest man, before he engages in any course of action, ask himself, Is this I am going about right, or is it wrong? Is it good, or is it evil? I do not in the least doubt but that this question would be answered agreeably to truth and virtue by almost any fair man in almost any circumstances' (Sermon III). A recent essayist, to the question, 'How am I to know what is right?' makes answer, 'By the atēnis of the phōnēus' (Bradley's Ethical Studies, p. 177). 'If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching,' or system, or institution, or formula, 'whether it be of God' (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>).

iii. THE EDUCATION OF CONSCIENCE.—We thus see that objections, which might be urged against a doctrine which made conscience an infallible oracle, are not valid against the view which regards conscience as man's consciousness of the will of God. It is now to be regarded, not as an inexplicable part of man, but as man himself in relation to the revelation of right. It is the apprehension of God as Righteousness, just as faith is the apprehension of God as Grace; and Luther, as Dorner points out, speaks of faith as the Christian conscience. Conscience, accordingly, is involved in man's moral history. It suffers in his sin and alienation from God, becoming clouded in its insight, feeble in its testimony, and may even come to be grievously perverted in its testimony. But in his restoration through grace, it is clarified, its testimony is strengthened.

The deepest characteristic of conscience is, in truth, the bondage of man's will or personality. The law of grace is a service, which is a law, which is the law of his own being. He is therefore free, self-determining, a person as God is a person. The life of personal life in harmony with God. Conscience shares in this subjection 'which is also emancipation.' The NT everywhere claims for conscience this independence of action, this immediacy and certainty of its deliverances, undetermined by a formal code or the voice of a spiritual director (Ro 14<sup>5, 13-23</sup>, Col 2<sup>16</sup>, Ja 1<sup>6-8</sup>). To the growth of conscience must be added the guidance of special education. This education is twofold.

1. Social.—The highest good for man always involves the relation of man to man. 'Through society,' says Professor Green, 'is personality actualized.' Hence it follows 'that the human spirit can only realize itself, or fulfil its idea, in persons; and that it can only do so through society, since society is the condition of the development' (Prolegomena, pp. 200, 201). Being personality in its relation to right, is also socially conditioned. There is no such thing as a purely individual conscience. Even when a man is alone, as when a reformer rises to protest against the injustice of some institution, its testimony is still on behalf of a good for man, which this institution, founded, no doubt, to further it, now fails to express and does harm. It is plain, therefore, that man can make a conscience for himself. He always needs a society to make it for him' (Prolegomena, p. 351). Conscience is born and cradled in the home, trained and exercised in the Church, in civil society, and the State. The enormous importance of this social education of conscience is thus evident. The ethical functions of parent, teacher, pastor, employer, statesman, are seen to be the highest and most sacred. Under their influence, the conscience of the individual receives its revelation of right, its preparation for the exercise of its moral and judicial vocation.

2. Individual.—Man cannot be merely passive in education. All true education is self-education. The education of conscience, in its individual aspect, must be the work of the individual, who must educate himself for the service in which freedom and life for him lie. The means at his disposal are mainly three.

(a) The institutions of society, the sacred rights of life, honour, property, reputation, with all the detailed obligations to which these give rise. Only the most careful education of the individual can make these obligations clear and strong. Negligence here, even in name of high spirituality, has always produced a terrible Nemesis, and those who have claimed emancipation in name of religion have sunk beneath the load of that bondage, they affected to despise. Hence the NT is remarkable for its abundance of commonplace, and has the homeliest directions to give to children, servants, citizens, to fulfil the duties of their station, while it frequently recalls those who are thrilling with consciousness of new light and life to the rudiments of morality, truth, honesty, purity, industry, etc. The attempt to be religious at the expense of morality is very ancient and is still very prevalent, and requires continually the prophetic rebuke (Mic 6<sup>8-9</sup>).

(b) The literature in which the conscience of humanity has given utterance to itself. The whole field of history, biography, and fiction is opened up for the education of conscience. By diligent study, it becomes more sure of itself. Along with such general literature we may class the Bible. It requires no a priori doctrine of inspiration to establish the authority of biblical ethic. Here we have a light, which has never been seriously questioned, and has commanded the unaffected approval even of unbelievers. The Bible is the touchstone of conscience. Conscience can only be maintained in truth and vigour, according as it is continually refreshed by earnest study of the unveiling of the ideal contained in Scripture and principally in the character of Jesus Christ.

(c) Communion with God. Here we are on the borderland of ethic and religion. The education of books becomes the education of living intercourse. The conscience whose sole sources of information have been natural laws, or the records of literature, fails of the highest light, breaks down in critical instances, and is, in the end, blind and hopeless. The conscience that is obedient to moral law and that is in fellowship with Him who is Truth, becomes clear and full. It is a reliable guide in the perplexities of life. Of course this result is not reached by a leap. It implies a process carried on through life. The growth of conscience will have its periods of weakness, onesidedness, acrid fanaticism, morbid tenderness, all of which must be most patiently borne with, not only by observers, but by the individual himself. Conscience will even pronounce judgments that are needless, foolish, or actually erroneous. The utmost care must be taken not to wound conscience at such times. Specially must it not be overborne by those who rejoice in higher light and claim a larger liberty. Their higher duty, indeed, may be to deny themselves a liberty which is their right (1 Co 9<sup>7-13</sup> 10<sup>23-33</sup>, Ro 15<sup>1-2</sup>). The stage of weakness is, however, in itself an effect of sin, and to continue in it is added sin. Strength and truth of conscience are the aim to be consciously striven after (He 5<sup>14</sup>). The testimony of conscience is meant to be part of our assurance toward God (2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>21</sup>).

iv. THE WITNESS OF CONSCIENCE.—The work of conscience lies, no doubt, within the moral sphere. But in considering the basis of ethics, we are led to see that moral action implies a reference to an infinite Personality as the ground and origin of man's personal being. Morality presupposes religion as the basis of its possibility, and prepares for religion through its incompleteness. Conscience, accordingly, as the supreme moral faculty, points beyond the merely moral sphere, and becomes a witness to the truth of religion. The witness of conscience is not to be regarded as logical demonstration. In point of fact, spiritual realities cannot be reached by logical processes. The only valid argument for religious truth is that which proceeds by consideration of the constitution of man, and discerns in that constitution the necessity of the existence of a Divine Being in whose image man has been made. In that argument, conscience forms an important element. To trace this witness fully belongs to dogmatics. We conclude this article by a bare outline of the direction which this witness takes.

1. God.—Conscience we have seen to be man's consciousness in action of right to be done. This is with equal truth to be described as the revelation of right within us, or the voice of God speaking in the soul of man. In moral action we are dealing with more than the judgments of our fellow-men, with more even than our own judgment upon ourselves. There is present in the court of conscience an invisible Assessor, who is, indeed, the ultimate source and standard of right by which the judgment proceeds. Individual experience presents little proof with an intensity which is best expressed in silence. Biography and history present the demonstration often with tragic articulateness. In conscience, the consciousness of God cannot be got rid of. It haunts the sinner in his revolt as shadow of doom. It accompanies the seeker in his upward movement with ever-growing confirmation. All other arguments for the being of God find their force increased by being combined with this. If the moral argument leads us to a reason or universal self-consciousness, through man's relation to which God is possible; if the argument e converso brings us to an eternal substance in which all things inhere; if the moral argument requires a purpose fulfilling itself, —the moral argument enables us to define that reason, substance, purpose, as a Person whose very nature is righteousness. (See suggestive treatment in Illingworth, Personality, Lect. iv.)

2. Christ.—The constitution of man requires as its root a Personal God, to whom conscience in man ascribes moral perfection. But Personality is inconceivable apart from Self-revelation and Self-communication. An Incarnation of God, therefore, is required. Christ is presented to the mind of man as such an Incarnation. It will scarcely be denied that He used language regarding Himself which implies such a claim. It is certain that the Church with growing fulness has made it on His behalf. Conscience makes in intensest form the demand for a Personal God. It is fair, therefore, to ask if conscience is satisfied with the claim advanced for Christ. Here there is no hesitation in the answer. The conscience of humanity has recognized in Christ, in His teaching and in His life, the final revelation of God. Christ is the conscience of God. The words of J. S. Mill are often and justly as consenting to this dictum. 'Even now it would not be easy, even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete than to endeavour so to live that Christ would approve our life.' Here we have a moral argument, not only for Theism, but for Christianity. Conscience, as Dorner finely says, becomes our 'παῖδαγωγός' (Gal 3<sup>24</sup>), and leads us through obedience into knowledge (Jn 17<sup>17</sup>). Faith in Christ, accordingly, is no longer an act unrelated to our moral life, but is itself a moral obligation.

3. Atonement.—Conscience, especially as enlightened by Christianity, witnesses to infinite perfection. At the same time, it pronounces upon all our actions sentence of failure. Between the absolute good and the individual will there is ever a want of complete harmony. Conscience abates none of its condemnation, when action is largely harmonized with social institutions or codes of moral law. The more fully it wins the mastery, the more it is insatiable to be satisfied. Its demand is for absolute harmony with infinite good. Any breach it treats as infinite; and lays upon the heart the burden, not of shortcoming merely, but of guilt. The question of salvation, therefore, is a moral question. It is stated in Hebrews in this form, How can the conscience be cleansed from dead works to serve the living God? (He 9<sup>14</sup>) How can the incubus of guilt be removed, so that the will of man may act in unhindered harmony with the will of God? Two solutions conscience declines.

First, that of gratuitous forgiveness. God is sometimes represented as saying, in virtue of His bare almighty will, 'I forgive.' But mere sovereignty is mere unreason. And if to this be added, 'at the . . . of His tender heart,' the reply is still, r . . . is mere unreason. In either case, the supreme arbiter of life is represented as mere caprice; and in order to save man from consequences of immoral act, we have confounded the whole moral sphere. To conscience, sin is a moral fact, and not until sin is dealt with can the relations of God and man be adjusted on a permanent, i.e. on a moral, basis.

Second, that of ritual observance. Action that is good, i.e. in absolute moral quality, can spring only from harmony with absolute good. Hence no action of a merely external kind can produce the requisite harmony. The historic demonstration of this incapacity is the Jewish ceremonial law. It did, indeed, cleanse, but the cleansing reached only to the flesh (He 9<sup>13</sup>), and had to be constantly repeated (He 10<sup>1-2</sup>). The practical point is that the most elaborate scheme ever devised—devised, be it observed, by divine wisdom—failed consciously and intentionally to reach the springs of action, i.e. the will, and purge the conscience. Is it likely that any other scheme will succeed, that any morality which human wisdom can devise or individual care execute, will accomplish what the law failed to do? Conscience steadily pronounces against every such attempt, in name, not of arbitrary creed, but of essential righteousness.

A third solution presents itself. Jesus Christ perfectly reveals God to man, because He is Himself true and perfect man. Accordingly, He not only unveils to men the Absolute Good, but as man He Himself fulfils this Good. If, then, He who is thus in immost being one with the Good, that is, God, and perfectly satisfactory to Him, shall in virtue of His humanity take man's place, and bear as a substitute man's burden, offering Himself a sacrifice for sin, will not this meet the requirements of conscience? It is now possible, through faith in the Sin-bearer, to enter into that moral union with God which is the condition of good action. Sin no more interposes its barrier. It has been recognized and dealt with by One competent to do so. The blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without blemish unto God, avails to cleanse the conscience from dead works, and qualifies us to serve the living God (He 9<sup>14</sup>). In the death of Christ the demand of conscience is satisfied through atonement being made for sin. In union to Christ through faith, the ideal to which conscience witnesses is no longer an . . . for ever . . . but an actual realization upon the . . . we are justified, and through the power of which we are enabled to fulfil the will of God (Ro 3<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>9, 10</sup> 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>4-5</sup>). The witness of conscience, which brings us to God and Christ, directs us also to that which is central in Christianity, atonement made by sacrifice.

J. HASTINGS.

CONSENT.—To c. is now no more than to acquiesce; in earlier Eng. it often included approval. Hence (1) to approve of a thing, Ac 8<sup>1</sup> 'Saul was c<sup>ns</sup> unto his death' (συνευδοκέω, so 22<sup>20</sup>; in Lk 11<sup>48</sup> tr<sup>d</sup> 'allow'—'ye allow the deeds of your fathers,' RV 'consent unto'); Ro 7<sup>16</sup> 'I c. unto the law that it is good' (σὺμφωνῶ). Cf. Shaks. 1 Henry VI. l. v. 34—

'You all consented unto Salisbury's death,
For none would strike a stroke in his revenge.

Or (2) to be in sympathy with a person, Ps 50<sup>18</sup> 'When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him' (ᾤκνῃ); Ro 12<sup>2</sup>, AVm, RV ' . . . be the same, but also c. with them that . . . in them' (συνευδοκέω, AV 'have pleasure in them'). Cf. Ford (1633)—

'T had been pity
To sunder hearts so equally consented.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONSIDER.—To c. is either to look carefully at or think carefully about. The former sense is now obsol. or archaic: Pr 31<sup>16</sup> 'She c<sup>eth</sup> a field and buyeth it'; Lv 13<sup>15</sup> 'the priest shall c.' (i.e. examine the leper, רָאָה, RV 'look'); Sir 38<sup>28</sup> 'The smith also sitting by the anvil, and c<sup>ns</sup> the iron work'; He 13<sup>7</sup> 'c<sup>ns</sup> the end of their conversation' (ἀναθεωροῦντες); Gal 6<sup>1</sup> 'c. thyself, lest thou also be tempted' (σκοπέω, RV 'looking to'). So Coverdale's tr. of Neh 2<sup>15</sup> 'Then wente I on in the night . . . and considered the wall' (AV 'viewed'). 'Consider of' is now rare: Jg 19<sup>30</sup> 'c. of it, take advice, and speak'; Ps 64<sup>9</sup>; Pref. to AV '[they] set them forth openly to be c<sup>ed</sup> of and perused by all.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONSIST.—Col 1<sup>17</sup> 'by him all things c.' (συνεστηκε, RVm 'hold together')=mod. 'subsist.' This is the oldest meaning: of the word and the tr. of the Rhemish NT; Tindale gives 'have their being,' and is followed by Cranmer and the Geneva; Wyclif simply 'ben'=are.

J. HASTINGS.

CONSOLATION.—See COMFORT.

CONSORT.—To c. with is to associate with, cast in one's lot with (con together, sors, sortem lot); Ac 17<sup>4</sup> 'some of them believed, and c<sup>ed</sup> with Paul and Silas' (a good idiomatic tr. of the Gr. προσκληρώω, fr. πρός to, κλήρος lot, though the form is pass., lit. 'were allotted to'). Up to the end of the 18th cent. a concert of music was, by a mistaken associa-

* It is used of the consecration of the priest only (except Ezk 43<sup>26</sup> the altar), and the most probable explanation is that the things to be offered were put into the priest's hands, a symbolic act by which he was installed or consecrated. Some (esp. Vatke, Alttest. Theol. p. 2731, and Wellhausen, Prolog p. 180) think that the priest's hand was filled with money as 'earnest' (Scotch ales). See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

tion with this word, συζυγία, 'consort,' though it comes through Fr. concert, concerto from Lat. concertare to contend (or, as Skeat decidedly prefers, conserere to unite). Cf. Rom. and Jul. III. i. 48—

Tybalt—Mercutio, thou consort'st with Romeo,—
Mer—Consort? what! dost thou make us minstrels?

In Sir 32<sup>5</sup> AV 1611 we have 'A consort of musick in a banquet of wine' (συγκρημα μουσικων), but mod. edd. spell 'concert.' See MUSIC. J. HASTINGS.

CONSTANT.—1 Ch 28<sup>7</sup> 'if he be c. to do my commandments' (πυνον=if he be firm). Cf. Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. i. 72—

'For I was constant Clumber should be banish'd,
And constant do remain to keep him so.'

Constantly: Pr 21<sup>28</sup> 'the man that heareth speaketh c., i.e. . . . not 'frequently' (ναι, RV 'unchallenged', R<sup>v</sup>m 'so as to endure'); Ac 12<sup>15</sup> 'she c. affirmed that it was even so' (δυσχυλίζο, RV 'confidently affirmed'); Tit 3<sup>8</sup> 'these things I will that thou affirm c.' (διαβεβαιώσθαι, RV 'affirm confidently'). Cf. the Collect for St. John Baptist's Day, 'After his example c. speak the truth,' i.e. firmly, consistently. J. HASTINGS.

CONSULT.—1. To take counsel, deliberate, used of a single person, as Neh 5<sup>7</sup> 'Then I c<sup>d</sup> with myself'; Lk 14<sup>31</sup> 'Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and cth whether he be able' (RV 'will not . . . take counsel'). 2. To devise, contrive, with a simple object, as Mic 6<sup>5</sup> 'remember now what Balak king of Moab c<sup>d</sup>'; Hab 2<sup>10</sup> 'Thou hast c<sup>d</sup> shame to thy house'; or with an infin., as Ps 62<sup>4</sup> 'They only c. to cast him down from his excellency.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONTAIN.—1 Co 7<sup>9</sup> 'if they cannot c., let them marry' (RV 'if they have not continency,' ἐγκρατεῖσθαι, fr. ἐν, κράτος power='have self-control'; it is tr<sup>d</sup> 'be temperate' 9<sup>28</sup>). Cf. Young, Paraphr. Job (1719), 'Then Job contained no more; but curs'd his fate'; and for the meaning here, Swift, Letters (1710), 'No wonder she married when she was so ill at containing.' Wych's tr. (after the Vulg. si non se continent) is, 'For if thei conteynen not hem self, or ben not chast, weddid be thei.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONTEND.—Generally 'c. with' in the mod. sense of 'fight with,' as Is 49<sup>28</sup> 'I will c. with him that cth with thee'; or 'c. with,' as Ac 11<sup>2</sup> 'they that were of the church . . . c<sup>d</sup> with him, saying.' But in the latter sense c. is also found without 'with,' as Is 57<sup>18</sup> 'I will not c. for ever' (prob.=argue with, accuse, condemn); Job 13<sup>8</sup> 'will ye c. for God?' (=argue with others for God, be an advocate for God), Am 7<sup>4</sup> 'the Lord God called to c. by fire' (=argue, and so Mic 6<sup>1</sup> 'c. thou before the mountains, and let the hills hear thy voice'). In all these passages the Heb. is נִצַּח. In Jude<sup>8</sup> 'ye should earnestly c. for the faith' (ἐπαγωνίζομαι), the meaning passes out of strife or argument into the wider sphere of earnest endeavour; as with the simple ἀγωνίζομαι in Lk 13<sup>24</sup> 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate,' and Col 4<sup>12</sup> 'labouring fervently for you in prayers' (RV 'always striving for you'), and as Bacon, Essays, 'Let a man contend, to excell any Competitors of his in Honour.'

J. HASTINGS.

CONTENT.—When Gehazi in his greed begged of Naaman a talent of silver, Naaman said (2 K 5<sup>23</sup>), 'Be content, take two talents.' Evidently he did not mean 'be satisfied,' but 'be pleased, let it be your pleasure.' So also Ex 22<sup>1</sup>, Jos 7<sup>7</sup>, Jg 17<sup>11</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>, 2 K 6<sup>3</sup>, Job 6<sup>28</sup> (RV 'be pleased') where the Heb. is יָצַח yā'al in hiph. = ' . . . where the Eng. is obsol. except i . . . well c.,' as Stevenson, Underwoods, . . . 'So sits the while at home the mother well content.' Cf. the voting formula 'Content' or 'non-Content' used in the House of Lords. In this sense the vb. content is also used, Wis 16<sup>20</sup> 'bread . . . able to c. every man's delight' (RV ' . . . the virtue of every pleasant savour'), with ναι: cf. Bacon, Essays, 'He that questioneth much, shall learne much, and content much.' J. HASTINGS.

CONTENTMENT.—This is a peculiarly Christian grace, and the form it assumes in the Bible, and esp. in the NT, differentiates it from the allied pagan virtues. It is quite distinct from Oriental apathy, which is pessimistic, while Christian contentment is nearer optimism; and it is almost equally distinct from the calm of Stoicism, because it does not regard external things with absolute more human than Stoicism. While it implies a just estimate of the good and ill of life, it does not dwell on the balance of fortune, but finds its source and its sustenance in the unseen world. The most elementary form of contentment is extolled in the Book of Proverbs as a certain discreet expediency. Here the secret of domestic content is given in the apothegm, 'Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith' (Pr 15<sup>17</sup>), and the superiority of moral to material grounds of content in the saying, 'Better is the poor that walketh in his integrity, than he that is perverse in his lips, and is a fool' (Pr 19<sup>1</sup>). In the Psalms we meet with more indications of the contentment which is derived directly from faith in God. This is seen in two forms. (1) Trust in Providence, which leads to the conviction that the righteous man's life is rightly ordered so that no evil can befall him (e.g. Ps 23). (2) An appreciation of the supreme blessedness of union with God, which is independent of external fortune, God Himself being the portion of the soul (e.g. Ps 73<sup>28</sup>). The prophets concern themselves largely with public affairs, and in so doing never encourage injustice and oppression by preaching an ignoble acquiescence in wrong. In them we see the divine discontent which cannot endure the triumph of the rich and strong over their unhappy victims. Still the essence of the higher contentment is also present in the faith which is assured of God's care for His people and His coming redemption of them, and the promise of the Messianic age, the hope of which should check impatience and prevent despair.

Our Lord's teachings carry the higher forms of contentment up to their supreme excellency. He did not come into contact with those ideas of the prophets which concern the more public treatment of social wrongs, because His method was to work from within, and perhaps because the contemporary condition of the Roman world did not admit of a sudden social revolution. Accordingly He did not contradict the preaching of John the Baptist, who discouraged restless agitation (Lk 3<sup>14</sup>); and He said nothing directly against the institution of slavery. On the other hand, He inculcated principles of justice, charity, and brotherhood, the effect of which must be to sweep away the wrongs which . . . the most reasonable discontent. In . . . His disciples personally He rebuked greed of gain and anxiety about temporal affairs, encouraging contentment, (1) by giving the assurance that our Father knows of our needs, and will provide for them, since He provides even for those of birds and flowers; (2) by directing attention to the true riches, the heavenly treasures, which can alone satisfy the soul of man; and (3) by urging the duty of seeking first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, content being a phase of self-satisfaction, a sin (Lk 12<sup>13-23</sup>). St. Paul inculcates the patient endurance of present sufferings on the grounds of hope, these sufferings not being worthy to be compared with the future glory (Ro 8<sup>18</sup>), and even working for that glory (2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>); and of faith, all things working together for good to them that love God (Ro 8<sup>28</sup>). Towards the end of his life, when a prisoner at Rome, he claims to have learned the secret of contentment, and he implies that this is found in a certain independence of external things—he has learned to be ‘independent’ (ἀνάρκνης), and he has reached this attainment, as also all others to which he has come, because Christ has ‘helped’ him (Ph 4<sup>11-13</sup>). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of contentment by reference to God’s ‘will’ (Heb 12<sup>9</sup>) of His children (12<sup>9-13</sup>). St. James rebukes covetousness and contentiousness, and encourages a humble, restful spirit with especial reference to the efficacy of prayer (Ja 4<sup>1-10</sup> 5<sup>7-18</sup>). St. Peter inculcates patience by dwelling on the example of Christ (1 P 2<sup>18-25</sup>); and St. John endurance of the world’s hatred by considering the love of God (1 Jn 3<sup>1-13</sup>). W. F. ADENEY.

CONTRARY.—1. In the sense of ‘antagonistic,’ c. is now obsol. or dialectic, except in ref. to wind or weather, where the phrase in NT, ‘the wind was c.,’ has kept the meaning alive. This is the rarer sense of c. in Lv 26, where it is used as tr. of רָכַח in its occurrences (26<sup>11, 23, 24, 27, 28, 40, 41</sup>), ‘if ye walk c. unto me,’ lit. ‘in an encounter,’ in hostile meeting and revolt. Kalisch explains. In NT this is ‘opposition,’ whether the Gr. be ἐναντίος, ‘c.,’ as in Mk 6<sup>48</sup>, Ac 27<sup>4</sup>; of Saul’s opposition, Ac 26<sup>9</sup> ‘I verily thought with myself that I had many things c. to the name of Jesus,’ of the opposition of Christianity, 1 Th 2<sup>15</sup> (the Jews), 1 Ti 2<sup>17</sup> ‘he that is of the c. part’; or ἐναντίος, Col 2<sup>14</sup> ‘the handwriting . . . which was c. to us (ὁ ἡμῶν ἐναντίον ἡμῶν describes its active hostility—Light-foot); or ἀνέναντι, Ac 17<sup>7</sup> ‘these all do c. to the decrees of Caesar,’ a charge of treason; or ἀντικείμεναι, Gal 5<sup>17</sup> ‘the Spirit and the flesh . . . are c. the one to the other’; 1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>; or even παρά, Ac 18<sup>13</sup>, Ro 11<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>17</sup>. 2. In 2 Es 11<sup>13, 11</sup> c. is used in the sense of ‘in position or direction,’ ‘out of her place,’ ‘grew other c. feathers.’ Contrariwise (a hybrid, fr. Lat. contrarius and Eng. wise, way) = ‘on the c.,’ occurs 2 Co 2<sup>7</sup>, Gal 2<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>9</sup>.

CONTRITE. (Lat. contritus, bruised, crushed) appears early in Eng. in a fig. sense, ‘bruised in heart,’ prob. through the influence of the Vulg. and the Eng. versions, and always with the meaning of penitent. Thus Wiclif (1380), Select Works, ii. 400, ‘To assoile men that ben contrite’; Milton, Par. Lost, x. 1091—

‘Pardon beg, with tears
Watering the ground, as I wash’d the air
Frequent, g. . . .’

This is the meaning of c. in AV and RV. But popular as the tr. has been, it is inaccurate, for the Heb. (אָפָּן Ps 34<sup>18</sup> 51<sup>17</sup>, יָסַד Is 57<sup>15</sup> 62<sup>2</sup>, יָסַד Is 62<sup>2</sup>) so tr’d never describes penitence, but always humility, abase-* Contritus is never fig. under the influence of the Vulg., while the Heb. word tr’d is never fig. under the influence of the AV is never literal.

ment. Certainly, God will ‘not despise a broken and a penitent heart’; but more than that, He will not despise a broken and a crushed heart: ‘Blessed are the poor in spirit.’ J. HASTINGS.

CONVENIENT, now greatly restricted in meaning, is freely used in AV in the sense of befitting, becoming, seemly, as Eph 5<sup>4</sup> ‘Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not c.’ (RV ‘befitting’); so Pr 30<sup>8</sup> (RV ‘that is needful’), Jer 40<sup>4, 5</sup>, Wis 13<sup>15</sup> ‘a c. room,’ not ‘commodious,’ but ‘befitting’ (ἀξίος, RV ‘worthy’), Sir 10<sup>23</sup> (RV ‘right’), 2 Mac 4<sup>19</sup> (RV ‘fit’), Ro 1<sup>23</sup> (RV ‘befitting’), Philem 8 (RV ‘becoming’). In Merchant of Venice, III. iv. 52, Portia says, ‘Bring them, I pray thee, with . . . speed,’ i.e. quick as thought; to which Shylock replies, ‘Madam, I go with all convenient speed,’ i.e. speed befitting the urgency. In the sense of ‘morally becoming’ (as Ro 1<sup>23</sup>, Eph 5<sup>4</sup>, Philem 8) the word was once quite common, as Trans. of Agrippa’s Van Artes (1684), ‘She sang and danced more exquisitely than was convenient for an honest woman.’

J. HASTINGS.

CONVENT.—Jer 49<sup>19</sup> AVm, ‘who will c. me in judgment?’ and 50<sup>44</sup> AVm, ‘who will c. me to judgment?’—an obsolete vb. = summon (convenire). Cf. Elsing, Debates House of Lords (1621), ‘The Commons have convented Flood, examyned him, and sentenced him.’ J. HASTINGS.

CONVERSATION.—The word never occurs in AV in its modern sense of colloquy, but always in its earlier sense of conduct, behaviour. But as intercourse by speech is a large part of conduct, the word was specialized to its present limited sense at an early date (not much later than the date of AV). See Oxf. Eng. Dict. ‘Conversation’ in AV is probably due to Vulg. conversatio, conversor. These usually stand in Vulg. for NT ἀναστροφή, ἀναστρέφειν, though in two cases, Ph 1<sup>27</sup> and 3<sup>2</sup>, they represent πολιτεύομαι and πολίτευμα. On these latter passages see CITIZENSHIP. In one instance where ἀναστροφή is used by the Vulg. (Eph 2<sup>10</sup>), AV departs from the Vulg. and correctly renders ‘commonwealth.’ In a few other places AV does not render by ‘have our c.’ but by ‘behave,’ ‘live,’ ‘pass the time of.’

The true meaning of ἀναστροφή in mod. Eng. is ‘conduct’; but an unfortunate result of the AV archaism ‘conversation’ that the real prominence of conduct in NT teaching is obscured (see ETHICS). Indeed, the substantive ‘conduct’ nowhere occurs in AV, though RV wisely introduces it in 2 Ti 3<sup>10</sup> to represent ἀγωγή.

There are but two passages in OT where c. occurs (Ps 37<sup>14</sup> and 50<sup>23</sup>). In both it represents ‘way.’ Conduct in OT is thought of under the idea of ‘way,’ and the words describing it are all nouns. In AV abstract nouns to express moral conduct do not occur. Hatch (Essays in Bibl. Gr. p. 9) sees the conditions of Syr. and Gr. life respectively mirrored in the metaphors which the two nations severally used for conduct, viz. περιπατεῖν and πορεύεσθαι. Whereas in Athens and Rome the bustling activity of the streets gave rise to the conception of life as a quick movement to and fro; the constant intercourse on foot between village and village in Syria, and the difficulties of travel on the stony tracks over the hills, gave rise to the metaphors which regard life as a journey. But the OT metaphor naturally runs on into the NT, and in Epp. of St. Paul περιπατεῖν is far more frequent than ἀναστρέφειν. Christianity is ‘the Way.’ Cf. Hort, ‘Way, Truth, and Life,’ Lect. I.

* A good example of conversation in the old as distinguished from the mod. sense, is in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Prog., ‘Your Conversation gives this your Mouth-prophesy, the life.’

The NT words for converse in its modern sense are ὁμιλεῖν (Lk 24<sup>14-15</sup> 'they talked together'), συνομιλεῖν (Ac 10<sup>27</sup>).

E. R. BERNARD.

CONVERSION.—The noun (ἐπιστροφή) occurs only once in Scripture, Ac 15<sup>2</sup> (cf. Sir 49<sup>2</sup>), where it need not denote the definite spiritual change belonging to the word in the verb-form. The verb-form (ἐπιστρέφειν) is frequently found both in OT and NT, answering in the former to such Heb. terms as שׁוּב, שׁוּבָה, and esp. שׁוּב. The point to be noted is that it almost invariably denotes an act of man: 'Turn ye, turn ye (שׁוּבוּ) from your evil ways' (Ezk 33<sup>11</sup>); 'Except ye turn' (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>); 'When thou hast turned again' (Lk 22<sup>32</sup>), etc. It is worth noting also that 'convert' is merely a synonym for 'turn,' and answers to the same originals. In Ps 19<sup>7</sup> 'converting' is a mistransl. of שׁוּבָה (RV correctly 'restoring,' i.e. 'refreshing,' cf. Ps 23<sup>3</sup> and La 1<sup>11</sup>). In Is 1<sup>2</sup> 'her converts' (AVm, RVm 'they that return of her') is too technical a tr<sup>n</sup> of שׁוּבוֹת. Whatever the causes lying behind the act of turning, the act itself is man's. The idea is esp. prominent in OT; and, while in NT it is often brought into connexion with repentance, in OT the term repent seldom occurs in reference to man. Many times it is used to denote an apparent change of purpose on the part of God (Gn 6<sup>8</sup> etc.), but very seldom in the same sense of man (1 K 8<sup>47</sup>, Job 42<sup>5</sup>). It never there becomes a standing term, as in NT. Twice at least in NT, 'turn' is associated with 'repent' (Ac 3<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>20</sup>). We find the term also associated with faith: 'A great number . . . turned to the Lord' (Ac 11<sup>21</sup>). As the very idea of the word implies both a turning from and a turning to something, it is . . . natural to make the former aspect . . . repentance, which is a turning from evil, and the latter coincide with faith, which is a turning to God. In other words, conversion on its negative side is repentance, and on its positive side is faith. In some cases one element will be emphasized, in some the other; and in some both will be included. This interpretation will, we believe, explain all the passages of Scripture. 'Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 20<sup>21</sup>), though the term conversion does not occur, expresses the contents of the idea.

Nor is the divine ground of these acts of man overlooked: 'Unto you first, God, having raised up his Servant, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from your iniquities' (Ac 3<sup>26</sup>; cf. Jn 6<sup>44</sup>). The ancient prophet held the same faith: 'Turn thou me, and I shall be turned' (Jer 31<sup>18</sup>). Sinful man turns, but the power by which he does so is God's, given him for Christ's sake; just as the stretching out of the withered hand was man's act, but the power by which it was done was divine. The prophets are addressing, not the good, but the wicked: the wicked are to turn and live. In like manner the apostolic exhortations are addressed to those who have not yet come to God.

There is thus little difficulty in fixing both the nature of conversion and its place in the order of salvation in biblical teaching. It is man's first act under the leading of divine grace in the process of salvation, the initial step in the transition from evil to good. A universal presence and operation of grace is a necessary corollary of universal atonement; the universal work of the Spirit goes along with the universal work of the Redeemer, always, of course, assuming the necessity of conditions on man's part. The fulfilment of the conditions, divine grace supplying the power, is biblical conversion. Subsequently conversion has been identified with regeneration; and there is less objection to such use, if the term is so defined and accepted.

Scripture recognizes not only divine grace as the efficient cause of conversion, but also human agency in bringing it about. This is the preaching of the truth by prophets and apostles: in other words, the proclamation of God's truth by men who are themselves witnesses to its power. This is not only implied . . . . .ferred to, but is expressly . . . . .e.g. Ac 10<sup>44</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>. The importance of the channel which conveys the water, or of the wire which conveys the force, although secondary, is still great. While recognizing that, as a rule, divine grace works through human means and instruments, we need not doubt that it also can and does often work independently.

CONVERT.—In AV c. is used once intransitively, Is 6<sup>10</sup> 'lest they see with their eyes . . . and convert and be healed' (RV 'turn again'). Cf. Wyclif's tr. of Jn 1<sup>38</sup> (1382) 'Sothli Ihesu convertid and seynge hem suwyng him, seith to hem, What seken ye?' The most frequent meaning of c. in early Eng. (and in AV) is simply to turn (e.g. Is 60<sup>6</sup>); but the mod. use was known, as Shaks. Merch. of Ven. III. v. 37: 'in converting Jews to Christians you raise the price of pork.' In Ps 23<sup>3</sup> for AV 'he restoreth my soul,' Douay reads 'he hath converted my soule,' with the remark, 'which is the first justification.' See CONVERSION. J. HASTINGS.

CONVINCE.—Certainly in most, probably in all the examples of c. in AV, the meaning is to convict. Job 32<sup>12</sup> 'There was none of you that convinced Job' (נִסְּתָהוּ, cf. Ps 50<sup>2</sup>, Pr 30<sup>8</sup> where EV have 'eprove,' but 'convict' would be better); Job's friends did not try to convince him merely, but to convict him, find him in the wrong, and that is probably the . . . both of the Heb. and of the English. I . . . Gr. is either the simple ἐλέγχω Jn 8<sup>46</sup> 'Which of you c<sup>eth</sup> me of sin?'; 1 Co 14<sup>24</sup> 'he is c<sup>ed</sup> of all, he is judged of all'; Tit 1<sup>9</sup> 'to c. the gainsayers' (not merely refute in argument, but convict in conscience); Ja 2<sup>9</sup> 'are c<sup>ed</sup> of the law'; Jude<sup>15</sup> (edd.; TR ἐξελέγχω) 'to c. all that are ungodly among them of their ungodly deeds'; or διακατελέγχωμαι, a compound occurring here only in all Gr. literature, Ac 18<sup>28</sup> 'he mightily c<sup>ed</sup> the Jews' (RV 'powerfully confuted'); but from the analogy of other passages it is prob. that St. Luke means that the apostle brought home moral blame to them, not merely that he refuted their arguments). Cf. Milton, Par. Reg. iii. 3, 'Satan stood . . . confuted, and convinc't'; and Adams, Serm. ii. 38, 'Whatsoever is written is written either for our instruction or destruction; to convert us if we embrace it, to convince us if we despise it.'

CONVOCATION.—See CONGREGATION. COOKING.—See FOOD. COPPER.—See BRASS.

COPTIC VERSION.—See EGYPTIAN VERSIONS. COR.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CORAL (קֶרֶשֶׁת) is twice (or thrice, if we include Pr 24<sup>7</sup> where 'too high' is tr. of same word) mentioned in OT, Job 28<sup>18</sup> and Ezk 27<sup>16</sup>; and as coral is abundant in the waters of the Mediterranean, the reference in the latter to Syria as a 'merchant in coral' is peculiarly appropriate (cf. Dillm. Job 28<sup>18</sup>). Red coral (Corallium rubrum) is probably meant, as being specially suited for ornament; but from the rareness of ornaments of this material, found amongst those of Egypt and Phœnicia, we may conclude that it was not in much request, at least in OT times; on the other hand, the material may have crumbled away, or been dissolved.

* The Heb. is simply 'I will turn' Cf. La 3<sup>34</sup>, where the same passive form is adopted in both AV and EV. This unfortunate mistransl. implies a technical dogmatic sense, which is not in the original. Cf. RV of Ps 51<sup>13</sup>, Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, Lk 22<sup>32</sup>.

The polyps, or animals producing coral, belong to those members of the Actinozoa which secrete a hard, generally calcareous, skeleton. They flourish in the warm waters of the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean, where these are clear and free from sediment, at various depths down to about 80 fathoms or more. The most important fisheries are of the coast of Tunis, Algeria, Naples, Genoa, Sardinia, and Corsica.

COR-ASHAN (AV Chor-ashan, 1 S 30<sup>30</sup>) is the present reading (חֹר־אַשָׁן) of MT, but the orig. text was undoubtedly Bor-ashan (בֹּר־אַשָׁן), as is evident from the LXX (A Βωρᾱσαν, B Βηρᾱσᾱς). Cf. notes of Budde, Driver, and Wellh. ad loc. The place may be the same as Ashan of Jos 15<sup>42</sup> 197.

J. A. SELBIE.

CORBAN (Heb. קָרְבָּן korbân) means (1) an oblation; * (2) a gift. The word occurs Mk 7<sup>11</sup> 'If a man shall say to his father or his mother, That wherewith thou mightest have been profited by me is Corban, that is to say, Given (to God), ye no longer suffer him to do ought for his father or his mother' (cf. Mt 15<sup>5</sup> RV). The Talmudic treatise Nedarim (=vows) discloses that the Jews were much addicted to rash vows; and קָרְבָּן, or its equivalent קֹנָם (= kōnas, which according to Levy is a corruption of קִנְיָם, kīnām), was in constant use; so that it gradually became a mere formula of interdiction, without any intention of making the thing interdicted 'a gift to God.' A man seeing his house on fire says, 'My tallith shall be korban, if it is not burnt,' Ned. iii. 6. In making a vow of abstinence he says, 'Konas be the food (vi. 1) or the wine (viii. 1) which I taste.' When a man resolves not to plough a field, he says, 'Konas be the field, if I plough it,' iv. 7. רָקִיבָא of a wife is thus expressed, 'What מַעֲשֵׂי יָדָאִי וְיָדָאִי are benefitted by me is kōnas (קֹנָם אֲשֶׁר־יַעֲשֶׂה יָדָאִי), because she has stolen my cup' or 'struck my son,' iii. 2; while the precise Heb. formula of our text is קָרְבָּן לַיהוָה qorbân l'YHWH (Lowe's Mishna).

In Nedarim, c. ix., retraction of, and absolution from, vows is considered. The problem was a knotty one. Oblations were needed for the sanctuary, and vows were a fruitful source of income; and besides this, Dt 23<sup>21-23</sup> most rigorously forbade any retraction of vows; and therefore the Rabbis, while they did not encourage vows, ruled that when made they must be kept. Here arises an extreme case. A man in haste or passion has vowed that nothing of his shall ever again go to the maintenance of his parents. Must that vow hold good? 'Certainly,' the Rabbis say. 'It is hard for the parents, but the law is clear, vows must be kept.' Thus, as often, did they allow the literal to override the ethical. Jesus revealed a different 'spirit,' as He ruled that 'duty to parents is a far higher law than fulfilment of a rash vow.'

R. Eliezer ben Hyrkanos (c. A.D. 90), who felt in several ways the influence of Christianity, was an "open door" type: the first Rabbi to advocate retraction of vows. I render Nedarim 9<sup>1</sup> thus: 'R. Eliezer said that when rash vows infringe at all on parental obligations, Rabbis should suggest a retraction (lit. open a door) by appealing to the honour due to parents. The sages dissented. R. Zadok said, instead of appealing to the honour due to parents let them appeal to the honour due to God; then might rash vows cease. The sages at length agreed with R. Eliezer, that if the case be directly between a man and his parents (as in Mt 15<sup>8</sup>), they might suggest retraction by appealing to the honour due to parents.'

CORD.—1. חבל, Arab. hahl, the common name for rope in Syria. It is translated in RV 'cord,' in Jos 2<sup>15</sup>, Job 36<sup>8</sup> etc.; 'line' in Mic 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 S 8<sup>2</sup>, Ps 16<sup>6</sup> 78<sup>53</sup>, Am 7<sup>17</sup>, Zec 2<sup>1</sup>; 'ropes' in 1 K 20<sup>31</sup>; and 'tacklings' in Is 33<sup>23</sup>. In Syria ropes and cords are made of goat's or camel's hair spun into threads, and then plaited or twisted. Sometimes they are made of strips of goat's skins or cow's hide twisted together. In modern times ropes of hemp are more commonly used. 2. רִבּוּי, Arab. ribūi, 'band,' 'fastening.' It is so translated in Ezk 1<sup>1</sup>, Hos 11<sup>4</sup>; but 'ropes' in Jg 15<sup>13, 14</sup>; 'cords' in Ps 118<sup>27, 129<sup>4</sup></sup>; and 'cart rope' in Is 5<sup>18</sup>. The word has the meaning of something interlaced or twisted. See BAND. Besides the common ropes mentioned above, ropes for temporary fastenings are often made from branches of vines interlaced or twisted together, and also from the bark of branches of the mulberry tree. 3. נִיָּר, Arab. atnāb, tent ropes, trans. 'cords' in Ex 35<sup>18, 39<sup>40</sup></sup>, Is 54<sup>2</sup>, and Jer 10<sup>20</sup>. Tent ropes, the Bedawin, are made of goat's or camel's hair. 4. חַיט, Arab. khait, line, tr. 'cord' in Ec 4<sup>12</sup>. 5. חֵט, Arab. hittar, catgut. In Jg 16<sup>7</sup> this word is translated 'withes,' in RVm 'bowstring,' which is correct. In Job 30<sup>11</sup> AV 'my cord' may be 'my bowstring' or the 'rein' of a bridle; in Ps 112<sup>1</sup> Catgut is often made in the village of L. In the NT σχολινες, ropes of rushes, is translated 'cord' in Jn 2<sup>15</sup>, and 'ropes' in Ac 27<sup>32</sup>. W. CARSLAW.

CORIANDER SEED (גז gad, κόριον, coriandrum)

—The fruit of an umbelliferous plant, Coriandrum sativum, L., extensively cultivated in the East. It is an annual, with two kinds of leaves, the lower divided into two to three pairs of ovate-cuneate, dentate segments, the upper much dissected into linear-setaceous lobes. The fruits are ovate-globular, straw-coloured, twice as large as a hemp seed, and striate. They have a warm, aromatic taste, and stomachic, carminative properties. Avicenna recites (i. 198) a long list of virtues attributed to it, in a variety of diseases. The only mention of it in the Bible is in Ex. xvi. 31 with the size and colour of manna (Ex. xvi. 31). The Arabic name of it is kuzbarah. G. E. POST

**CORINTH (Κόρινθος) was in many respects the most important city of Greece (i.e. Achaia, according to the Rom. population, cf. Ac 20<sup>21</sup> with 19<sup>21</sup>) under the Rom. Empire. Whereas Athens was the educational centre, the seat of the greatest university in the world at that time, and the city to which the memories of Greek freedom and older history clung most persistently, C. was the capital of the Rom. province (see ACHAEA), the centre of commerce, of actual life and culture in the country; while its situation, again, on the great central route between Rome and the East, made it one of the knots towards which a large number of subordinate roads. In this sense it was the next stage to Ephesus (wh. see) on this great highway, and must have been in very close and frequent communication with it. The situation of C. qualified it to be the most important centre whence any new movement in thought or society might radiate over the entire province of Achaia; and therefore it became one of the small list of cities (along with Syrian Antioch and Ephesus) which were most closely connected with the early spread of Christianity towards the West.

C. occupied a striking and powerful position.

It was situated at the southern extremity of the narrow isthmus which connected the Peloponnesus with the mainland of Greece, on a slightly raised terrace, sloping up from the low-lying plain to a bold rock, the Acrocorinthus, which rises abruptly on the south side of the city to the height of over 1800 ft. above sea-level. Thus the city was easy of access from both east and west, and at the same time possessed of great military importance, on account of its powerful citadel. Its strength was increased by its fortifications, which not merely surrounded the city, but also connected it by the 'Long Walls' with its harbour Lechæum on the western sea, about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles (12 stadia) distant. Its situation enabled it to command all land communication between central Greece and the Peloponnesus. Along the southern edge of the isthmus stretches a ridge called Oneion from E. to W.; and the Acrocorinthus, which from the north seems to be an isolated rock, is really a spur of Oneion, though separated from the ridge by a deep cleft or ravine. This ridge makes communication with the Peloponnesus difficult, leaving only three passes: the western sea (Corinthian Gulf), Lechæum and the Long Walls, one close under the walls of Corinth, and one along the eastern sea (Saronic Gulf), commanded by the other harbour of Corinth named Cenchreæ (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>, Ro 16<sup>1</sup>), about  $\frac{3}{4}$  miles (70 stadia) distant from the city. The Acrocorinthus commands a wonderful view over both seas, on the E. the Saronic Gulf, and on the W. the Corinthian,\* and over the low lands bordering the two seas, up to the mountains both in the Peloponnesus and in central Greece; the acropolis of Athens, Mount Parnassus, and many other famous points are clearly visible.

Through its two harbours C. bestrode the isthmus with one foot planted on each sea; and hence it is called 'two-sea'd Corinth' (bimaris Corinthi menia, Horace, Od. i. 7); and Philip IV. of Macedon called it one of the 'fetters of Greece'; the other two being Chalcis in Eubœa and Demetrias in Thessaly. But the territory belonging to the city was confined and unproductive: a fertile though narrow strip of soil (between the Corinthian Gulf towards Sicyon); the low ground of the Isthmus was poor and stony; and Oneion was mere rock. Hence the population was at once tempted by two quiet seas, and compelled by the churlish land, to turn to maritime enterprise; and there lay the weakness of C. so long as Greece was free. Only when Greece was enslaved did C. become one of the fetters of the country.

It was customary in ancient times to haul ships across the low and narrow Isthmus by a made route, called Diolkos (διόλκος), between the W. and the E. sea. Owing to the dread entertained by ancient sailors for the voyage round the southern capes of the Peloponnesus (especially Malea), as well as to the saving of time effected on the voyage from Italy to the Asian coast by the Corinthian route, many smaller ships were thus carried bodily across the Isthmus; though the larger ships (such as that in which St. Paul sailed, Ac 27<sup>6-87</sup>) could never have been treated in that way. Many travellers along the great route from Italy to the East came to Lechæum in one ship, and sailed east in another from Cenchreæ, while the merchandise of large ships must have been transhipped; and thus Corinth was thronged with travellers. Under Nero an attempt was made about A.D. 66-67 to cut a ship-road across the Isthmus (after several earlier schemes had been frustrated as an impious interference with the divine will); and traces of the works were observable before the present ship-canal was made.* The canal was intended to be some distance north of the two harbours, and would have damaged their prosperity. In such a city any new movement of thought originating in the East was certain to become known rapidly, in the frequent intercourse that was maintained between Rome and the East. Moreover, Christians travelling for various reasons were often likely to pass through C.; and hence St. Paul calls Gaius of Corinth 'my host and of the whole Church' (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>). In the end of the 1st cent. Clement, writing to the Church at C., alludes several times (§ 1, § 10, § 35), to the frequent occasion which the people had to show

In this situation the leading commercial city, for various reasons, indeed, occasionally endangered its trading supremacy for a time; sometimes the energy of the Athenians, or of some other rivals, challenged it; and at last the Romans destroyed the city in B.C. 146. But the favourable situation which had made it the originator in Greek history of great fleets and of commercial enterprise on a large scale, and enabled it to become the mother-city of many colonies in the central and western parts of the Mediterranean, could not allow it to remain a ruin and a mere historical memory. For a time, indeed, Delos succeeded to its commercial supremacy, and Sicyon to its Isthmian Games; but in B.C. 46

by Julius Cæsar as a Rom. colony, under the name Colonia Laus Julia Corinthia. Hence a considerable proportion of the small number of names in NT connected with C. are Roman: Crispus, Titius Justus (Ac 18<sup>7-8</sup>), Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Quartus (Ro 16<sup>21-23</sup>), Fortunatus, Achaicus (1 Co 16<sup>17</sup>). Since Greece was revived as an independent country in modern times, the claim of C. to be the site of the capital, though mentioned, has been always rejected, partly through the surpassing historical memories that cluster round Athens, and partly through the fact that C. is subject to earthquakes.

The oration of Dion Chrysostom, delivered in C. in the early part of the 2nd cent. (Or. 37), gives a lively idea of the prosperity of C.; he describes it as the most prominent and the richest city of Greece (vol. II. p. 120, ed. Reiske), and alludes to its library, but enlarges chiefly on the historical and mythological associations. Half a century later Aelius Aristides in an oration 'to Poseidon,' delivered at C. in connexion with the Isthmian Games, also draws a picture of the city, enlarging more on the educated and literary spirit manifested there. About the same period Pausanias describes its history and monuments and public buildings (ii. c. 1-4): the old temple of Apollo, on the top of the Acrocorinthus; the sacred fountain Peirene on its side, close under the summit; below this the Sisyphæum; in the lower city the Agora, with its temples and statues, and so on. The coinage of the Rom. colony proves, by the numerous types taken from old Corinthian history and the pride which was felt by the Romans in ancient memories of the city; and at once illustrates and confirms the testimony of Dion and Aristides. This feeling in the colony must be taken into account in estimating its character when St. Paul visited it; and the subject is admirably treated by Imhoof-Blumer and Gardner in their Numismatic Commentary on Pausanias (see Journal of Hellenic Studies, vi. 1885, pp. 69-77). It must, however, be remembered that the colonial coins used by them are generally later than the time of St. Paul, and that this feeling grew stronger in the 2nd cent. as the Rom. blood and spirit died out on a foreign and uncongenial soil. The circumference of the lower city was 40 stadia, and the circumference of the fortifications, including in their circuit the Acrocorinthus, was 85 stadia (about 10 miles), as Pausanias and Strabo agree. Only scanty and unimpressive remains of ancient buildings now remain.

* A bold hill projecting a little distance on the west of the Acrocorinthus seriously interferes with the view on that side; Leake calls it 'the eyecore of Corinth.'

* These traces, which have been entirely obliterated by the modern canal, are described and a map given showing the line intended to be followed by Nero's canal, in Bulletin de Correspond. Hellénique viii (1884) p. 225 f.

The of such a colony as C. would consist descendants of the Rom. coloni, established there in B.C. 46, who would on the whole constitute a sort of local aristocracy; (2) of many resident 'Romans' who came for commercial reasons, in addition to a few resident officials of the government; (3) of a large Greek population, who ranked as incolae; (4) of many other resident strangers of various nationalities, attracted to C. for various reasons, amid the busy intercourse that characterized the Rom. world. The Rom. colonial blood had not yet had time to melt into the Greek stock, as it probably did in the cent. or two following St. Paul's visit. Among the resident strangers it is clear that a considerable colony of Jews existed at C., where they had a synagogue (Ac 18<sup>4</sup>); and in such a commercial centre a Jewish settlement was a matter of course. Among the Corinthian Jews a certain number of converts, including some of the most prominent persons, joined St. Paul (Ac 18<sup>4-8</sup>, Ro 16<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>20</sup>); and this was, doubtless, one of the reasons why the feeling against St. Paul was so strong in the city, leading even to a plot against his life (Ac 20<sup>8</sup>). It is clear, however, both from Ac and from the two letters of St. Paul to the Corinthians, that the Church consisted chiefly of non-Jews (see esp. 1 Co 12<sup>2</sup>). But the presence in the Church of some influential Jews, and probably of a considerable number of Gentiles who had previously been brought under the influence of the synagogue (such as Titus Justus, Ac 18<sup>7</sup>), constituted an element always likely to cause that strong Judaizing tendency which is revealed in St. Paul's letters.

St. Paul visited C. at first without any definite intention of making it a great centre of his work (Ac 18<sup>1</sup>). He was still under the impression that his call to Macedonia (Ac 16<sup>9-10</sup>) was operative; and he was to return to Macedonia, and (1 Th 2<sup>17-18</sup>), but was prevented by various circumstances and hindrances (which he sums up in the expression 'Satan hindered us'). It would appear from the narrative of Ac 17<sup>16</sup>, 18<sup>5</sup> that in Athens, and at first in C., St. Paul was still strongly possessed with the Macedonian scheme, and was only delaying his return thither until the difficulties were cleared away. But a (18<sup>9-10</sup>) and his plan, when in a the Lord directed him to speak freely and boldly in C., 'for I have much people in this city.' St. Paul regarded this as releasing him from the Macedonian duty, and now directed his work entirely towards the new sphere, in which he remained altogether for a year and six months. It is not stated what period had elapsed between his arrival and this revelation; but, in all probability, no very long time intervened. It is at least clear that the new governor Junius Gallio arrived after the revelation, and during the second period of work, which was directed towards the new Achaian sphere. But evidently even during the first period St. Paul had been encouraged by considerable success in C. In the Jewish synagogue, indeed, he had met with strong opposition, and had already found himself obliged to break off his connexion definitely with his own nation, and to go unto the Gentiles (Ac 18<sup>9</sup>) from henceforth (i.e. during the rest of his stay in C.). But even among the Jews, Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, believed with all his house; while among the genera' of C. many were baptized (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>). baptisms in C. were by St. Paul himself, except those of Gaius, and of the household of Stephanas.

It is not certain whether this abstention from personally baptizing was something peculiar in the special case of C., or was commonly practised by St. Paul; but the other apostles seem to have often left the work of baptizing to ministers and subordinates (Ac 10<sup>48</sup> 13<sup>5</sup>), and St. Paul probably did the same. The three exceptions mentioned by him are noteworthy; the circumstances show why St. Paul was likely to attach special importance to them; Stephanas was 'the first-fruits of Achaia' (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>); Gaius was his host on his later visit (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>), and therefore probably a specially beloved friend; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was a convert of uncommon importance.

About five or six weeks, perhaps, after St. Paul's arrival at C., he was rejoined by Silas and Timothy, returning from Macedonia. He had left them at Berea, and they had joined him probably in Athens, and been immediately sent away on a mission to Thessalonica (1 Th 3<sup>1</sup>, Ac 17<sup>15</sup> 18<sup>5</sup>) and probably also to Philippi.* The fact that Timothy alone is quoted as authority for news from Thessalonica (1 Th 3<sup>8</sup>), and as messenger to Thessalonica, shows that Silas had been sent to some other city of Macedonia (doubtless Thessalonica). Immediately on receipt of Timothy's wrote his First Ep. to the Thess. (1 Th 3<sup>6</sup>) from C. The date of the second is not so clearly fixed; but it also was probably composed in the early part of the Corinthian work, immediately on receipt of news about the reception of the first letter in Thessalonica.

During St. Paul's residence in C., Gallio came to govern Achaia as proconsul of praetorian rank. There is no evidence, except what can be derived from the life of St. Paul, to fix the year in which Gallio administered the province; but he may probably have come during the summer of A.D. 52, though some authorities fix the date differently (53, Renan, Lightfoot; see GALLIO's his administration, the Jews—angry at: of at least one patriot, at the manner in which St. Paul away from them with a very exasperating gesture, and at the institution of a rival meeting-house next door to the synagogue, in the house of Titus Justus, a Roman, and a 'God-fearing' (Ac 18<sup>6-8</sup>)—brought an accusation against Paul before the proconsul. In order that such an accusation might be admitted for trial, the Jews must have tried to give to it a colouring of offence against Roman law, for the Jews still possessed the right to try among themselves in their own way any offence against purely Jewish religious observance. But the attempt to give colour to a charge which was essentially religious did not deceive Gallio; he refused to admit the case to trial, and 'drove them from the judgment-seat'. His action was highly important; it amounted to an authoritative decision that St. Paul's preaching could not be construed as an offence against Rom. law, and that, if there was anything wrong in it, the wrong was only in respect of Jewish law, and therefore should come before a Jewish court, and could not be admitted before the proconsular court. This decision by an official of such rank formed a precedent which might be appealed to in later trials; and it is not too much to say that it had practically the force of a declaration of freedom to preach in the province. According to our view, this incident had a marked effect in directing St. Paul's attention to the protection which the Roman state might give him against the Jews. Hitherto his position had been so humble that his relation to the state had probably not entered consciously into his mind, or formed any part of his calculations, but the decision of the first Roman imperial official before whom he had been accused (combined with the favourable memory of the other high imperial official, Sergius Paulus, with whom he had come in contact), was calculated to make a strong impression on his mind.

When St. Paul ceased to preach in the synagogue, he began to use the house of Titus Justus, a proselyte* (evidently Roman from his name), as a centre for teaching. In the following months he was evidently understood by the Corinthian population to be one of those lecturers on philosophy and morals, so common in the Greek world, who often travelled, and settled in new cities where there seemed a good prospect of a teacher; and scornful remarks were made concerning the high fees charged by teachers of established reputation with the gratis lectures of this new aspirant, and an impression was common that St. Paul (like other beginners in the field) was working to obtain a reputation such as would justify him, after a time, in beginning to charge fees, and make a livelihood by his brains instead of by his hands. The effect produced on St. Paul by these remarks is shown in 1 Co.

As was the case in most other cities, the Greek populace of C. disliked the Jews; and the marked reprimand administered to the latter by Gallio, in refusing to entertain the case against St. Paul, seems to have been popular in the city (Ac 18<sup>17</sup>). The Greeks took and beat Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue (who had apparently succeeded Crispus when the latter became a Christian);* and Gallio took no notice of an act which he may probably have considered as a piece of rough justice, and also as a mark of popular approval (which was always grateful to a Rom. official). At this time there can be no doubt that in the popular mind Christianity was looked on merely as an obscure variety of Judaism.

In C. at his first arrival St. Paul became acquainted with two persons who played an important part in subsequent events; these were Priscilla and Aquila (to follow the noteworthy order observed by St. Luke, Ac 18<sup>18-26</sup>,† and by St. Paul himself, Ro 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup>). Aquila, a Jew of the province Pontus, had left Rome in consequence of Claudius' edict (perhaps issued in the latter part of A.D. 50);‡ and the commercial advantages of C. attracted him thither. St. Paul resided in their house during his long stay in C.; and they accompanied him to Ephesus, where they were still residing when he came thither after visiting Pal., Syrian Antioch, and the Galatian churches. Priscilla bears a good Rom. name, and was probably a lady of good family (which would explain why she is so often mentioned before her husband); and Aquila doubtless had acquired a wide knowledge of the Rom. world during his life; and they would therefore be well suited to suggest to St. Paul the central importance of Rome in the development of the Church, and form a medium of communication with the great city. We may fairly associate with this the maturing of St. Paul's plan for the future of Rome and the West, which we find fully arranged a little later (Ac 19<sup>21</sup>, Ro 15<sup>24</sup>). In this respect, also, the Corinthian residence was an epoch in St. Paul's conception of the development of the Church in the Rom. world.

In C. the development of the Church might be expected to move rapidly. East and West met there, where Rom. colonists, Greek residents, and Jewish settlers all dwelt; and thought in the contact of race with race. But the development always implies dissension and conflict of opinions; and hence we find the existence of warring factions mentioned far more emphatically in C. than in any other Church; some were of Paul (the founder), some of Apollos (Paul's eloquent successor), some of Cephas (i.e. the Judaizing party), some of Christ (presumably persons who claimed to be above mere apostolic partisanship), as we read in 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>. Of these parties it is perhaps a permissible conjecture that the Rom. colonists, and the freedmen who naturally followed them, formed the bulk of the first, while the Greek residents had been more attracted by the Alexandrian philosophy, and the mysticism of Apollos; the Jews and the Judaizing adherents of Cephas. St. Paul, when he came to C., seems to have been moved by the want of success that had attended his very philosophic style of address in Athens; and he deliberately adopted a specially simple style of address. As he says (1 Co 2<sup>1-2</sup>, cf. Ac 18<sup>25</sup>), he came not with oratorical power or philosophic subtlety, expounding the mysterious nature of God; he did not declare to the Corinthians, as he had done to the Athenian audience, 'the Divine Nature' (Ac 17<sup>23, 29</sup>); he determined not to know anything among his hearers at C. save Jesus Christ and Him crucified. To the Greeks, who sought after philosophy, he must have seemed uneducated and unimpressive (1 Co 1<sup>22, 23</sup>), and we might conjecture that, as a rule, they would prefer the more simple as delivered by Apollos. But there is no ground to confirm this, and in the only slight description of Paul's preaching in Achaia, he is said to have been specially successful among the Jews (Ac 18<sup>26</sup>). It seems, therefore, not possible to feel any confidence in the details of an hypothesis connecting the parties in the Church with the nationalities that were mingled in the population of C., though we admit the strong probability that the variety of races contributed to cause the variety of parties, and that there would be a tendency for each race to become concentrated in one party.

The preceding paragraphs show that we are justified in attaching great importance to St. Paul's stay in C., as constituting an epoch in his preaching, in his plans, and in his conscious attitude towards the Rom. government, and also as resulting in the formation of a new Church in the track of ready communication alike with the East and with Italy. As to the constitution of this new Church, it is evident that a very considerable congregation had been formed in C. within a few years after St. Paul first entered it, and some of the converts were men of position; on the whole, however, he declares that there were among them not many that were deeply educated in philosophy, not many of official dignity and power, not many of aristocratic birth (1 Co 1<sup>26</sup>); the bulk of the Church was humble, but these words ('not many') may fairly be taken as implying that there were in it some few members of higher position.

St. Paul seems to have departed from C. for the purpose of celebrating the feast at Jerus. (Ac 18<sup>22</sup>, where RV reads words intimating his intention—but probably they are original); we cannot doubt that this was the Passover, which fixes his departure to early spring, and his arrival in C. to

* So in AV; but in RV it seems to be implied that the Jews beat Sosthenes (implying that he was a Christian, as either he or another Sosthenes afterwards was, 1 Co 1<sup>11</sup>); but it seems inconceivable that Gallio should have permitted such an act on the part of those whom he had just rebuffed so emphatically.

† So in RV; but AV has 'and they were still residing'.

‡ The dates assigned vary. Oosterhout, 1884, as the year, and it has been contended that 1 Co 1<sup>10</sup> refers to the year, uniformly one year too early (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, pp. 68, 254). Lightfoot gives the date, Roman St. John, 52.

autumn, acc. to our view Sept. 51-March 53 (52-54 many scholars, 48-50 Harnack). Perhaps his vow, in accordance with which he cut his hair in Cenchreae, when on the point of going on board the ship, was completed and discharged at the Passover in Jerusalem. Doubtless, he performed the voyage on a ship whose special purpose was to carry pilgrims to Jerus. for the feast from Achaia and Asia. In 20<sup>8</sup> he probably again thought of the voyage on such a ship, and found Jews were too incensed against him to make the voyage safe.

The subsequent history of the Corinthian Church is lightly passed over by St. Luke. Apollos was sent over from Ephesus with a letter of recommendation to the brethren in Achaia (Ac 18<sup>27</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup>),* and his influence in C. was powerful (Ac 18<sup>27-28</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>). It is admitted that St. Paul, during the early stay in Ephesus, sent to C. a letter which has not been preserved (1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>); and it may be regarded as highly probable that this is not the only one of his letters that has perished. The view has also been strongly maintained that St. Paul paid a short visit to C. from Ephesus, and returned to Ephesus (2 Co 12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>); but, more probably, such a short visit was paid later from Macedonia (see Drescher in SK, 1897, pp 50 ff.). In the latter part of St. Paul's stay in Ephesus, however, the report that was brought to him from C. by envoys (1 Co 16<sup>17-18</sup>) drew from him the letter which has been preserved, and is commonly cited as 1 Co. It seems probable that this letter was sent by the hands of Titus. at least it is certain that he was sent by St. Paul on a mission to C. about this time (2 Co 7<sup>13-15</sup>); and St. Paul several times refers to the strong interest which Titus took in the Corinthians (2 Co 7<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>10</sup>). Timothy also was sent on a mission to C. from Ephesus (1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>). When St. Paul left Ephesus and came to Macedonia, he met there Titus on his return from C. (1 Co 16<sup>17</sup> at Philippi), after having been disappointed in the hope of finding him at Troas. Evidently, Titus returned from C. by the land route or by a coasting vessel by way of Macedonia and Troas. On this report the second letter to C. was now dispatched; and Titus went on a second mission, accompanied this time by 'the brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the Churches' (identified by an early tradition, which may probably be correct, as St. Luke). Timothy also returned by the land route from C., and met St. Paul in Macedonia (2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>). After spending some months in Macedonia, apparently in several cities (Ac 20<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>, Ro 15<sup>15</sup>), St. Paul entered Greece, where he spent three months, chiefly, no doubt, at C., during the winter of 56-57 (or 57-58 acc. to Lightfoot and many others). During the years 55-56 St. Paul had been much occupied with a scheme for a general contribution from his new Churches in the four provinces Achaia, Macedonia, Galatia, and Asia,† which was to be devoted to the benefit of the poor Christians in Jerusalem. To this scheme St. Paul attached the utmost importance, as marking the solidarity of the new foundations with the original Church; and he pays a high compliment to the Corinthians for the readiness with which they had begun to respond to the call (2 Co 9<sup>2-5</sup>). No envoy from C. is named among the delegates sent in charge of the money to Jerus. (Ac 20<sup>4</sup>); but it seems possible that the Corinthians asked either St. Paul himself or one of the envoys mentioned in 2 Co 8<sup>18-22</sup> to act as their steward.

The development of the Church in C. between A.D. 53 and 57, and the kinds of difficulties that beset the early steps of this young congregation, are closely connected with the letters of St. Paul (which form our sole authority), and will be discussed under the heading of CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO THE; but we must here refer to the probable influence of the character of society in the city on the Church. C. had always been a great seat of the worship of the goddess retained in her seat much of the abominable (and really non-Greek) character of the Asian and esp. Phœnician religion from which she sprang, particularly the system of hierodouloi who lived a life of vice as part of the religious ceremonial of the goddess. Hence the viciousness of C. was proverbial through the Roman world; and we can realize how vile was the society out of which the Corinthian congregation arose, how hard it was for them to shake off the influence of early and long association with vicious surroundings, how deep they were likely to sink in case of any lapse from religion. It is no wonder that St. Paul wrote (1 Co 5<sup>10</sup>) that, if they were to cut themselves off altogether from vicious persons, they 'must needs go out of the world.'

Near C. was the scene of the Isthmian Games, one of the four great athletic contests and festivals of Greece. These games were held at the shrine of Poseidon, a little way N.E. of the city, about the narrowest part of the Isthmus, and close to the shore of the Saronic Gulf. They were of the usual Greek style, including foot-races, chariot-races, boxing, etc., and the victor's prize was a wreath of the foliage of the pine-trees, which grow abundantly on the coast. It is usual to say that St. Paul borrows his imagery in such passages as 1 Co 9<sup>24-26</sup> from these games; but games were universal in all Greek or semi-Greek cities; and St. Paul, who had lived long in such cities as Tarsus and Antioch, and had already visited many others, did not require to visit the Isthmian Games in order to write that 'they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize,' or that 'they do it to receive a corruptible crown.' Such allusions would be as luminous to the inhabitants of every other Greek city in the Mediterranean lands as they were to the Corinthians.

LITERATURE.—Of the literature on the subject of the Corinthian Church, the best are Leake's Morea, iii. 392 ff.; Curtius, Peloponnesos, ii 514 ff.; Clark, Peloponnesos, 42-61. The guide-books, especially Bædeker, are good, and the articles in works of general reference are excellent in regard to Greece. The works of Niebuhr, Leake, and Howson, and a host of others, are, as a rule, very good in their treatment of Corinth. On the coinage, besides Imhoof-Blumer and Gardner already quoted, see the works of Mionnet, Eckhel, and catalogues like that of the British Museum.

* In the passage of 2 Co 3 Paul refers to the Jews who came with letters of recommendation to the Christians in Asia, as well as Apollos with his letter of recommendation to the Christians in Macedonia.

† St. Paul mentions the contribution of Macedonia and Achaia in Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>4-9</sup>, of Galatia and Corinth, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>. He has no occasion to allude to that of Asia, and he alludes to that of Galatia only perhaps as being the first and supplying the model. The Asian contribution is implied in Ac 20<sup>4</sup>, where the envoys who carried it to Jerus. are mentioned (cf Ac 24<sup>29</sup>).

place among the acknowledged writings of St. Paul. These writings, as is well known, formed a recognized group, under the name of 'the Apostle,'* before the date at which we have evidence of a complete NT CANON. The well-known response † of the Scillitan Martyrs (A.D. 180) at once includes and distinguishes the 'letters of Paul a just man' among the 'books' carried about by Christians. That a collection of Pauline letters existed at least as early as the reign of Trajan is a strong inference from the now generally accepted date of the Ignatian letters.‡ Whether or no the whole thirteen letters, already included in the Muratorian list, were part of this collection from the first cannot be discussed here; but it is of special interest for our purpose to note that, although eventually supplanted by the modern order, traceable as far back as Origen, a very ancient order of the thirteen Epp., preserved in Can. Murat. and attested from other quarters, places the Epp. to Corinth at the head of the list. Zahn infers that this order is the primitive one, and that the collection of Pauline Epp. was first made at Corinth.§ In any case, the recognition of our Epistle is coeval with the evidence for any collection of the apostle; in fact it goes back beyond any clear evidence of the kind. The reference in Clement of Rome (xlvii. 1) is, unlike most of the early references to NT books, a formal appeal to our letter. Echoes of the Ep. are too numerous to be quoted here (a fairly full collection is in Charteris' Canonieity, p. 222 ff.); they occur in Clement of Rome (seven), Ignatius (nine), Polycarp (three, or with the Martyrdom, four), Justin (at least five) [Hermas, Sim. v. vii. 2, is doubtful, and the same may be said of Didache x. μαρὰν ἀδελ], and οἱ ἅπαντες from the citations in Hippolytus we know that the Ophites knew our Ep.; the same is true of Basilides as well as of the later Gnostics. It is unnecessary to set out in detail the evidence for an undisputed fact (see below, § 4).

2. The Epistle has been transmitted in the Peshitta, Old Lat., Copt., and other oldest versions of NT as well as in the principal Gr. MSS.

Of the latter, the Epistle is contained entire in NBApsu (1413-22, "manu alia antiqua"), F (cop. of D), I, FG contain all but 82-86, 67-74. C all except 71-74, E all except 71-74-77, 1223-135 1423-36. Fragments are contained in L<sup>a</sup>, H (cf. Robinson, Euthaliana, 501f.), P, K (considerable), M, Q, S 2. Of the reserves, it may be said that U (pp. 3, 4, 5, 27, 37-8) of special interest.

The Old Lat. of our Epistle is transcribed in the Lit. The Epistle then comes down to us with every possible external attestation of genuineness, and its integrity (see on 2 Co, § 8) is equally free from suspicion.

3. But external attestation is hardly enough to determine the authorship of a book in the face of internal evidence. What then does the Epistle tell us of its authorship? We may remark generally that no NT writing bears a more convincing stamp of originality than this letter; it is clearly the reflex of a great and markedly individual personality. Manifest as are its contents, its several parts hang naturally together, and are strongly homogeneous in treatment and style. Moreover, as we shall see presently, the Ep., read in conjunction with our other sources of knowledge, yields a definitely realizable historical situation, without a particle of evidence to suggest that it stands to those sources in a secondary relation. Until quite modern times, and except within a limited area, this has not been questioned. Our Ep., with 2 Co, Ro, and Gal, have, as is well known, formed the nucleus of admitted writings, and have furnished to criticism the standard by which the claims of all other supposed Pauline literature have been estimated. This was conspicuously the case in the period of the Tübingen school. With the exception of the free-lance Bruno Bauer, whose isolated attack is recorded rather as a literary curiosity than as a contribution to historical criticism, the four Epp. were allowed on all sides, even by the most radical criticism, to be the genuine work of St. Paul. This was characteristic of the genuine psychological insight which, in spite of admitted defects of subjective criticism, marks the ablest followers.

4. Of late years, however, the genuineness of the four 'Pauline homologumena' has been called in question by a somewhat more imposing body of opinion.* On the one hand, a somewhat numerous band of Dutch writers (J. J. G. van der Puijntje in Th. T. 1882-1886; J. J. G. van der Puijntje, Verisimilia, 1886; Van Manen in Jahrb. f. Prot. Theol. 1883-1887, and others) have, by subjective criticism of the wildest kind, endeavoured to dissolve the personality of St. Paul and of Jesus Christ, and resolve the teaching of the Ep. into the product of vague and arbitrarily assumed movements of Jewish religious thought. Kuenen, Scholten, and others have thought the arguments by which these views are supported worthy of refutation, but any detailed notice of extravagances, tending only to bring rational historical criticism into discredit, would be out of place in an article like the present. The same must be said of a somewhat less fanciful critic, Rudolf Steck, professor at Bern, who published (Berlin, 1888) Der Galaterbrief nach seiner Echtheit untersucht. His arguments reach our Ep. through that to the Galatians. The latter is condemned, partly on the ground of its discrepancies with Ac (exactly reversing the arguments of Baur and his followers, Steck allows Ac to be superior as a source), partly on that of its literary dependence upon Ro, and 1 and 2 Co. The method to the latter, Steck finds in the signs of dependence on Ro (e.g. the ἀγαπᾶται of 1 Co 4<sup>6</sup> refers to Ro 12<sup>3</sup>), while the latter in turn presupposes the Gospels, and such post-Christian Apoc. as 2 Es and the Assumption of Moses. Accordingly, all the 'Pauline homologumena' fall to the ground. Our Ep. in particular is dependent upon the synoptic Gospels, especially on Lk, as appears from the accounts of the Last Supper (1 Co 11) and of the post-Resurrection appearances of Christ (1 Co 15). Steck appears to have gained a convert in J. Friedrich (Die Unechtheit des Galater-Briefes, 1891).

Those who wish to follow the questions raised by Loman, Steck, and their adherents into further detail, may be referred to the works quoted in the previous notes. A general weakness of all the writers in question appears to be a defective appreciation of personality, carrying with it an inability to distinguish the spontaneous from the artificial. especially 16. That 16<sup>8,9</sup> are anything but natural in the closing period of the Ephesian sojourn, is surely a desperate argument.

The time has not arrived, then, to abandon the year 57, and the latter end of St. Paul's three years' ministry at Ephesus, as the date of 1 Co, unless, indeed, it be held (as Godet and others maintain, but without conclusive reasons) that it must have preceded 2 Co by at least a complete year (see 2 CORINTHIANS, § 6).

7. The history of the Cor. Church after the departure of Apollos for Ephesus is known to us solely from the two Epp. to the Corinthians. That communications passed from time to time between St. Paul and this Church is only what we might expect from our general knowledge of St. Paul's life. In one letter, written not very long before 1 Co, he had had occasion to warn the Corinthians not to allow themselves to associate (συναμικνυσθαι) with fornicators. This warning, in view of the conditions of the place (CORINTH), does not indicate circumstances of special urgency there. But we gather that there was a tendency in Corinth to treat the apostle's command as : : : in its severity (1 Co 5<sup>10a</sup>); the tone or public opinion in the Cor. Church was ominously low (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>12-20</sup>); and when a case of exceptional repulsiveness occurred, it was treated by the community with a tolerance amounting almost to levity (5<sup>1-8</sup>). How St. Paul heard of this, of the litigious recourse to heathen tribunals (6<sup>1a</sup>), and of other matters for blame (11<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>), we do not know. Speaking broadly, these were all anxieties of a kind likely to occur, in a more or less acute form, in any community whose Christianity was recent, while the heathen instincts of its members were bred in the bone and not to be overcome except by time.

It was somewhat different with the οἰκιστὰρ or dissensions which occupy the early chapters of the Epistle. Partly no doubt, and specially as regards the use of the names of St. Paul and Apollos as party watchwords, they are explicable by the frivolous and excitable temper of the people. The Epistle of Clement shows us that forty years later than St. Paul's time, although the party watchwords of the year 57 have disappeared, the tendency to faction is still at work (§§ 1, 47, etc.). In communities of this kind, as Renan observes (St. Paul, p. 373 f.), 'divisions, parties, are a social necessity; life would seem dull without them.' 'The talent of Apollos turned all their heads.' The contrast between the Alexandrian methods of Apollos and the simpler spiritual preaching of St. Paul, would, in fact, furnish this tendency with an irresistible temptation. But in Corinth we are in the presence of a more serious and far-reaching phenomenon. Apart from the : : : of the personal presence there at any : : : of the older apostles (see below), it is clear from the data of our Ep., combined with those of 2 Co (§ 4 [e] there), that Corinth was the scene of an anti-Pauline mission identical in its source and aims, though naturally differing in tactics, with that which troubled the Churches of Galatia. At Corinth the demand for circumcision would appear to have been dropped or held back; the point of attack was the apostolic mission of St. Paul (1 Co 9<sup>1a</sup>), whose conduct and position had become the object of suspicious criticism (ἀνακρίνεν, 1 Co 4<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> etc.). The Judaic movement against St. Paul is probably responsible for the two watchwords ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ: ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ. This is clearly the case with the former (cf. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 96 f.). 'Εγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ must have been, in the first instance, the utterance of a person who knew St. Peter by his Pal. name. Such persons must have found their way to Corinth, and attached to themselves partisans, whether Gentile or Jewish, who were impressed by the prior claim of St. Peter to apostolic rank, or perhaps repelled by the lengths to which emancipation from Jewish prejudices had carried some of the Christians at Corinth (1 Co 8<sup>1a</sup>). It does not follow that, in order to say ἐγὼ δὲ Κηφᾶ, it was necessary to be a personal pupil of St. Peter. The name of Cephas must have become a household word in every Church visited by the Pal. : : : there is nothing in 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>, even : : : 9<sup>5</sup>, to justify us in inferring, as a 2nd cent. bishop of Corinth inferred (Dionys. ap. Euseb. HE ii. 25), that St. Peter had actually visited Corinth and shared with St. Paul the claim to rank as founder of the Church there. St. Paul's silence would in that case suggest a more painful relation between himself and the partisans of Cephas than we need otherwise assume. He blames the partisans of Cephas indeed, but neither more nor less than he blames those of Apollos and of himself; there is nothing to suggest any special hostility between St. Paul and any one of the three. This would equally apply to the fourth party, whose watchword was ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ, had we only our present Ep. to go by. But on them the second Ep. throws a peculiar light, which reduces the other three parties to a comparatively unimportant rank. It is true that the Cephas-party must have been under the influence of the Judaizing propaganda; but the second Ep. shows that it is not among them (cf. 1 Co 3<sup>22</sup>) that we are to look for its extreme and dangerous partisans.

In considering the 'Christ-party,' it will be needless to discuss the endless suggestions that have been made apart from the light derived from 2 Co. That ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ were the words of St. Paul himself, or of Christians who formed a party against : : : reader must consult : : : uen innau der neuen Briefe an die Kor. : : : Christ-party). Quite certainly : : : put forward the name of Christ as a party watchword, as others put forward that of Cephas, Apollos, or St. Paul. It is instructive to note the absolute contrast between the ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ of 3<sup>22</sup> (cf. 15<sup>23</sup> etc.), where the apostle : : : as true of all, and the ἐγὼ δὲ Χ. : : : where he stamps its falsehood (v. 13 'is Christ portioned off' to any) as the exclusive claim of some.

There were, then, those at Corinth who falsely claimed a monopoly of Christ, and the renewed repudiation of this claim in 2 Co 10<sup>7</sup> lets in a flood of light upon their position. The claim stands in the closest connexion with the disparagement of St. Paul's apostolic rank. He had not, like the Twelve, known Christ personally; while his witness of Christ, therefore, was second-hand, theirs was direct; they were, and he was not, appointed to the apostolate by Christ Himself. This contention was due in the first instance, no doubt, to newcomers at Corinth (2 Co 11<sup>13-23</sup>), but appears to have imposed upon some native members of the Church (1 Co 1<sup>12</sup> ἐκαστος ὑμῶν). This view of the matter is clinched by St. Paul's depreciation of a knowledge of Christ 'after the flesh' (2 Co 5<sup>16</sup>). By the time the second Ep. was written, : : : grown to far more alarming : : : we can trace in our present letter (see CORINTHIANS, SECOND EP. TO THE, § 4 [e]).

While fully recognizing the nature and importance of these οἰκιστὰρ, we must not exaggerate their intensity by supposing that they constituted 'schisms' in the modern sense of the word. They were dissensions within the society, not separately organized bodies. Our Ep. pre-supposes throughout a corporate life, impaired indeed, but not destroyed, by these dissensions, and the other burning questions which existed at Corinth seem to have had no party relation to the οἰκιστὰρ— in some cases they may have mitigated their intensity by causing cross-divisions. The attempt has indeed been made to connect each of the several evils touched upon in 1 Co with one or other of the parties (e.g. in the work of Rabiger mentioned above), but this entirely outruns the evidence, and assigns to the parties a too fundamental rôle in the life of the Cor. Church. That the persons, who went too far from prejudice about εἰδωλόθυτα, were not under its influence is no doubt pretty certain; but it is not connect them without more ado with the 'party' of St. Paul or Apollos; that the τινὲς of 15<sup>12</sup> embody a thoroughly Gr. prejudice does not prove that Apollos was their watchword. Nothing in the morbid exaltation of the gift of tongues (14) betrays (even in the light of Ac 2<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>15</sup>) the Petrine partisan.

8. Tidings of the σχίσματα reached St. Paul for the first time through some persons described by him as οἱ Χλόης (11<sup>17</sup>). These were probably, by the analogy of St. Paul's language elsewhere, slaves. Whether their mistress was a Christian, and where she lived, are uncertain points (CHLOE). Stephanas, who had a household of his own (16<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>), can hardly have been one of οἱ Χλόης. Stephanas and his companions must have reached St. Paul after Chloe's people; they to some extent allayed the disquieting impression which the news of the latter had produced (16<sup>18</sup>). Whether they were the carriers of a letter from Corinth is not quite clear. Such a letter, in any case, reached the apostle about this time. He begins to answer it in 7<sup>1</sup>; its contents may be inferred to be unconnected with the matters dealt with in 1-6—even, ἡ ἀποστολή, with the misunderstood injunction of the apostle in 5<sup>9</sup>. The Corinthians consulted him about marriage and its problems (7), probably about εἰδωλόθυτα (8-10), about the veiling of women in public worship (11<sup>24</sup>), and not improbably about πνευματικά; the λογία (16<sup>17</sup>) was very likely another matter upon which they consulted St. Paul—probably in reply to some previous indication of his wish that something should be done for the purpose. Before the receipt of the letter from Corinth, as it would seem, but after the arrival of Chloe's people, St. Paul had instructed Timothy, whom he was employing for a mission to Macedonia (Ac 19<sup>22</sup>), to proceed afterwards to Corinth and endeavour to restore discipline (4<sup>17</sup> 16<sup>10-11</sup>). But the task required a strong man, and St. Paul is evidently anxious as to Timothy's reception. And as an opportunity, probably the Cor. letter and the visit of Stephanas and his party, offered itself shortly after Timothy's departure, for the dispatch of a letter, the apostle penned the Epistle before us. After a preamble of guarded but sincere general commendation (1-9), he deals (10-4), with the more urgent matters for blame: the σχίσματα (1-4), the case of incest (5), litigation before heathen courts (6<sup>1-9</sup>), and immorality generally (6<sup>9-20</sup>). He then takes up the Cor. letter, and answers its inquiries about marriage in general (7<sup>1-7</sup>), the duties of various classes in relation to marriage (8-10), and specially the duty of the unmarried, or rather of the parents of virgins, as regards the question of marrying (25-40). Then follows the difficult question of the εἰδωλόθυτα, which brings out the principle, which is to be exercised only subject to the higher expediency (8-10); to exercise it without regard to this, leads men to overstep its lawful limits (10<sup>14-23</sup>). Next follows a series of matters relating to public worship (11-14): first, the veiling of women (11<sup>2-16</sup>); then the disorders connected with the Eucharist (11<sup>17-34</sup>); then (12-14) the πνευματικά. The principle which emerges here is closely analogous to that which determines the discussion of the εἰδωλόθυτα. Chapter 13 occupies the same place here as does ch. 9 in the former subject, only the principle of forbearance from privilege enforced in 9 is here carried to the higher and of ἀγάπη, itself the greatest of the virtues. We then reach the only properly doctrinal subject dealt with ex professo in the Epistle, that of the Resurrection. Our account of this must be a little more full. The question arises from the denial, on the part of 'some' (15<sup>12</sup>), of the future resurrection of the body. St. Paul's reply is, that if Christ has risen,—if the truth of His resurrection is part of the gospel common to St. Paul and the Twelve (15<sup>1-11</sup>),—then the dead in Christ will rise also. The denial of the τινὲς, 'some,' extended to the latter or consequent proposition, not to its antecedent. St. Paul's argument is (12-19), that their denial of the consequent truth overthrows the antecedent, viz. the resurrection of Christ. On the other hand (20-23), if the latter is a certain truth of the gospel, the resurrection of the dead in Christ, denied by the τινὲς, follows as effect from cause. This is supplemented (24-28) by an explanation which puts the resurrection of the dead into context with the return of Christ and the consummation of all things. Two practical and corroboratory arguments (29-34) complete the refutation. Then follows the answer to the objection, founded on the nature of the resurrection body (35-55), issuing in the triumphant vindication of the hope of a resurrection as the basis of quiet Christian perseverance. St. Paul now turns to purely epistolary matters: directions as to the λογία (16<sup>1-4</sup>) lead to a statement of his journey of travel (5-9). Then follows a message on behalf of Timothy (10, 11), a message on behalf of Apollos (12), a brief general exhortation (13, 14), a commendation of the household, and an expression of his hope for his presence, with Fortunatus and Achaicus, at Ephesus (15-18). Salutations (19-24) form the close, the solemn anathema of v. 21 comes in their midst. That it is directed against Judaizing agitators (cf. 2 Co 11<sup>13-15</sup>) is not improbable, but can hardly be proved.

Such is the general plan of the letter. Its contents can be exhibited more in detail by the aid of a table.

9. Analysis of the Epistle.

I. EPISTOLARY INTRODUCTION (1-9).

A. THE SALVATION (1-3) [α. The writer (1); β. the readers (2); γ. the greeting (3).]

B. PREAMBLE (4-9) α. The apostle's thankfulness for the work of grace at Corinth, especially in regard to λόγος and γνωσις (4-6).

β. The end to which this should tend, and which will not fail for lack of anything on God's part (7-9).

II. URGENT MATTERS FOR BLAME (10-620).

A. PARTICULARS (10-14).

α. The facts stated (10-12).

(1) The facts stated (10-12).

(2) The facts connected (13-17a). [Christ degraded to the leadership of some; Paul exalted as if the saviour of any.]

β. P. The essential nature of the Christ.

(1) The gospel has no room for σοφία (in the lower sense, ε. λόγος) (17b-23).

This shown in (a) the history of the Church; (b) the way in which the apostle reveals it.

(2) The gospel is σοφία in the true sense (ε. θεοῦ) (23-34). (a) This wisdom hidden from the world, but revealed to the saints (23-34).

(b) The Spirit of God the vehicle of its revelation (10-15).

(c) Hence it is revealed to spiritual (25), but not to unspiritual (24-26), nor, except in a rudimentary form, to unripe hearers (31-4).

γ. Party spirit forgets the essential character of the Christian teacher (35-116).

(1) All alike, whatever their position, are to be subject to God, who determines the essential character of the Christian teacher.

- (2) This in no way diminishes their several responsibility (315).
- Paul the planter v.6, father 415 founder, others the water-borders (10), waterers 6, guardians 415).
The Day will test the work of all alike.
- (3) The temple of God destroyed by those who practically deny the above truths by 'glorying in men' (16-21).
- (4) All teachers, like all that enters into the existence and experience of the Christian, are part of God's gift to him, means to the one end, God in Christ (23, 23).
- (5) The Christian teacher to be regarded as an underling (servant) of Christ, to whose judgment alone he is ultimately subject (41-5).
- (6) The Corinthians have only too good cause to look down on the apostles from a higher level (46-13); yet the apostles are not to crush by sarcasm, but to ...

10. IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE.—The above synopsis is enough to show the richness and diversity of the light thrown by our letter upon the spirit and circumstances of the apostolic age. In its fulness of light and shadow it vividly reproduces the life of a typical Gentile-Christian community, seething with the beginnings of that age-long warfare of the highest and lowest in man, which constitutes the history of the Church of Christ from the time when His fire was kindled on the earth down to this day. To do justice to the manifold lessons of the Epistle would require a commentary; but without trespassing beyond the limits of this article, a few salient points may be noted.

Pastoral character.—The two Epistles to the Corinthians are the most pastoral of the Epistles. For details of pastoral work and organization, indeed we go to the letters to Ermon and Titus. But for the deep-seated principles, for the essential things between pastor and people, for the nature of the apostolic office, and the nature of apostolic authority, these Epp. are our primary source. The questions touched upon in our Ep. furnish a fair sample of the difficulties of Church government; and as each is taken up in turn some deep-laying principle springs naturally to the apostle's lips, and is brought to bear with all its power upon the matter in hand. The letter is unique as an object-lesson in the bishopric of souls.

11. Doctrinal importance.—It is impossible within our limits to do more than glance at the main points of interest. (a) The Epistle bears fewer traces than 2 Co of the great controversy of the period to which it belongs. The only express reference to the subject is 15<sup>58</sup> 'the strength of sin is the law' (cf. Ro 7<sup>23</sup>). But the foundation-stone of his '... Corinth, 'Jesus Christ, and that crucifi. '... is the root of the apostle's whole mind and thought on the subject. (b) The doctrine of the Person of Christ, indissolubly correlated with that of His work, is touched upon 8<sup>6</sup>, where the di' oū rā panta anticipates Col 1<sup>15a</sup>. The redelivery of the kingdom (15<sup>24-28</sup>) by the glorified Christ, and His fir '... His Father, is a thought not '... out (but see 1 Co 3<sup>28</sup> 8<sup>6</sup>, Ro 11<sup>25</sup>). '... the pre-existence and human nature of Christ, the passage 15<sup>45-48</sup> is of great importance, and has given rise, from Baur onwards, to startling interpretations (Pfleiderer, Paulinism, Eng. tr. i. 139 ff.; Schmiedel in loc.). (c) The Holy Spirit (2<sup>10a</sup> and 12) is the vehicle of all true '... and receptivity to revealed truth '... the χαρίσματα which enable Christians to live their corporate life. The '... of 12<sup>11</sup> involves the personality of the Spirit, and further the art. on 2 CORINTHIANS, § 7). The Spirit is assumed to be the active power in baptism, and to be present in all baptized persons (12<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>11</sup>); though this is ideally rather than actually true of all (3<sup>1a</sup>). (d) With regard to the sacraments, baptism and its '... touched upon in the passages '... It was administered in the name of Christ (1<sup>13</sup>, cf. Ac 19<sup>5</sup>). An enigmatical practice of baptizing 'for the dead' is referred to (15<sup>29</sup>); the context (ὡς ἐπ' αὐτῶν) forbids us to regard this as merely an aspect of ordinary baptism. On the doctrine of the Eucharist a side-light is thrown in 10<sup>15-17</sup>. The reference is introduced to illustrate the principle that to eat the sacrifice is to take part in the sacrificial act. The sacrifice here is that of the cross, offered by Christ; the Eucharist has a sacrificial character analogous to that of the Jewish or heathen sacrificial meal, and like them has the effect of creating a communion between the worshipper and Christ. The reference involves the belief on St. Paul's part that the body of Christ is eaten (cf. 11<sup>27, 29</sup>). In what sense this is so, St. Paul does not define. (e) With reference to the resurrection (see above, § 8), that of Christ is the premise of St. Paul's argument in 15<sup>1-24</sup>. In vv. 2<sup>2-4</sup> we have the germ of a creed. In vv. 5-7 we have the earliest record of the post-resurrection appearances of the Lord; v. 9 is of special interest. That He rose with a σῶμα πνευματικόν is implied in v. 44<sup>2</sup>. The whole argument is addressed, not to the general resurrection of all men, but to that of οἱ Χριστοὶ, the κεκοιμημένοι, whose rising again is the effect of their being quickened in Christ. From other places we know that St. Paul taught a future life and judgment for all, good and bad; but (except in the hypothetical ἀνάνορτο of v. 15) this chapter has no word applicable to the latter. (f) Eschatology in general the Ep. touches upon 7<sup>26, 29</sup> 15<sup>21</sup>, whence we see that the apostle still expected the early return of Christ, and especially in 15<sup>23-28</sup> (see analysis, § 9). In this latter passage the coming of Christ appears as the last and final act of His reign, immediately ushering in the end. At His coming Christ will, by raising His dead to incorruption, destroy death (v. 54), and thus complete the subjugation of all inimical powers (26). Then all is ready for the redelivery of the kingdom, that God may be all in all. This seems incompatible with the millennial reign after the resurrection of the just, which some commentators (Godet, etc.) would read into our passage from the Apocalypse.

12. The Christian life.—The whole Ep. is 'an inexhaustible mine of Christian thought and life.' Nowhere else in the NT is there a more many-sided embodiment of the imperishable principles and instincts which should inspire each member of the body of Christ for all time. With regard to personal life, it may be noted that the ascetic instinct which has ever asserted itself in the Christian Church finds its first utterance in 7 (1<sup>25</sup> 40 θέλω, νομίζω ὅτι κάλον, etc.); but coupled with a solemn and lofty insistence (οὐκ ἐγὼ ἀλλὰ ὁ κύριος) on the obligations of married life, and founded on the simple ground of the higher expediency. This latter principle (τὸ συμφέρον) is the keynote of the ethics of the Epistle. The whole content of life is to the Christian but means to a supreme end; free in his sole responsibility to God (3<sup>21</sup> 2<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>28</sup>), the spiritual man limits his own freedom (6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>19</sup>) for the building up of others and the discipline of self (9<sup>24</sup> 27). The corporate life of the Church is reflected in our Epistle as nowhere else in NT (see Weizsacker, Ap. Zeit. pp. 567-605, Eng. tr. ii. 246 ff., for a careful and interesting discussion, mainly on the data of our Epistle). With regard to the development of discipline, of . . . of worship. With regard to discipline, the leading passage is 5<sup>12</sup>, where are described, not indeed the actual proceedings against the immoral person, but those which might and ought to have been carried out. St. Paul sees the Corinthian Church assemble; he himself is with them in spirit; the power of the Lord Jesus is in their midst. In the name of the Lord Jesus they expel the offender, 'deliver him to Satan for the destruction of his flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord.' We have here the beginning of ecclesiastical censures, inflicted by the community as a whole, and it is not surprising in the apostolic age (1 Co 11<sup>30</sup>, Ac 5<sup>12</sup>) to find physical suffering associated with the spiritual penalty. Such an assembly as St. Paul here pictures could, a fortiori, dispose of such matters of personal right as should arise (6<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>). The organization of the Cor. Church is evidently in a very early stage. We hear of no bishop, presbyter, or deacon (contrast Ph 1<sup>1</sup>), but of prophets and teachers, as the ranks immediately following the apostles. This is in remarkable conformity with what we hear of at Antioch (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>), and its conformity with the lists given in other Epistles is too close to be accidental. The following list compares the data of 12<sup>28</sup> with those of Ro 12<sup>6-8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup> :—

These lists are evidently not to be regarded as statistical, and their variations are clearly due to the unstudied spontaneity with which each enumeration is made. All the more significant, then, is it that . . . everywhere take rank next after the . . . while 'teachers,' who stand high in . . . sts, are the only other class common to all. In our Epistle these three classes alone are expressly assigned an order, 'first,' 'second,' 'third.' To interpret these facts would take us beyond our limits, but it is worth noting that the prophetic gift is not strictly limited to a class, but potentially belongs to all (14<sup>30-32</sup>). That administrative gifts (κυβερνήσεις) come so low, perhaps implies that they are still voluntary (cf. the προϊστάμενος of Ro). To organize the λαός (16<sup>17</sup>) the presence of Titus was required (2 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). The ἐποικοδομοῦντες or παιδαγωγοί of 3<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>, who, like Apollos (3<sup>6</sup>), carried on the work begun by St. Paul at Corinth, were therefore probably 'prophets and teachers'; but the Ep. makes little reference to them (perhaps 16<sup>16</sup>, cf. 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>). Public worship is the subject of a long section of the Epistle (see analysis, § 9). At some ἐκκλησία, ἰδιώται (possibly unbaptized persons) might be present (14<sup>16</sup> 23); this would not be at the κυριακὸν δεῖπνον. The 'Amen' is in use as the response to prayer or praise (14<sup>16</sup>). The discussion 11<sup>22</sup> would suggest that women might, under certain conditions, pray or prophesy in public; but 14<sup>34</sup> shows that the apostle was merely holding in reserve a total prohibition, at any rate as regards speaking ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ. Otherwise, the liberty of prophesying belonged to all; the utterances were to be tested (14<sup>29</sup>), but the test was simply the character of the utterance (12<sup>12</sup>). Prayer or praise ἐν γλώσσῃ (see TONGUES) was a marked feature of public worship, but St. Paul insists on its inferiority to prophecy. Sunday is mentioned as a day for setting apart alms (16<sup>2</sup>), and was therefore probably a day for common worship; but this is not expressly stated. To come together for common worship constituted an ἐκκλησία (11<sup>18</sup>). It is possible that assemblies for prophecy and teaching (14<sup>26</sup>) were distinct from those held εἰς τὸ φαγεῖν (11<sup>24</sup>). This was the case . . . in Pliny's time (see Weizsacker, Apost. / . . . , p. 568 f.). The purpose of the latter assembly was to break the bread and bless the cup of the Lord. In 11<sup>27-34</sup> we have the locus classicus for the Eucharist of the apostolic age. Two views may be referred to which appear to be erroneous. One, represented, for example, by Beet in his commentary on the passage, is founded on the abuse censured in v. 21 (cf. 3<sup>1</sup>), that 'each one taketh before other his own supper,' thereby destroying the character of the meal as a 'Lord's Supper.' If, it is argued, previous consecration of the bread and wine by the προεστώς, and reception at his hands, had been an essential of the Eucharist then, as we find it to be in the age of Justin (Apol. i. § 65), the abuse in question could not have occurred; and St. Paul's remedy would have been 'wait for the consecration,' not 'wait for each other' (v. 33). This argument assumes, firstly, a departure from the procedure of Christ in instituting the sacrament, which is quite incredible. That . . . His command, τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, the . . . omitted precisely the actions which accompanied His words, and that the presence of those actions in Justin's Eucharist is due to a reversion, not to continuous repetition, is improbable to the last degree. The argument is really due to a second erroneous assumption that 'the Lord's Supper' in v. 20 'can be no other than the bread and the cup of the Lord in v. 27.' This assumption is a reaction from the anachronism of introducing the Agape of later times . . . passage. The 'Lord's Supper' is not . . . proper, still less the Agape, but the entire re-enactment of the Last Supper, with the eucharistic ac . . . in the course of it, as they do in the . . . of the Synoptic Gospels. The name 'Lord's Supper' is not elsewhere used in the NT, but in the Church the 'Lord's Supper' was neither the earliest nor the commonest name for the Eucharist; it primarily, though not exclusively, meant the annual re-enactment of the Last Supper, which survived after the Agape had first been separated from the Eucharist, and then had gradually dropped out of use (see Smith's Dict. Christ. Antig. s.v. 'Lord's Supper'). In any case, then, the 'Lord's Supper' at Corinth would be already in progress when the bread and cup were blessed; St. Paul's censure and remedy (vv. 21, 33) are entirely compatible with the closest adherence to the procedure of the Last Supper. Who presided, we do not know, but it may be taken as certain that someone did. In v.<sup>34</sup> we see the first impulse toward the separation of the Eucharist proper from the common meal in which it was embedded (see Weizsacker, p. 601). St. Paul's account of the words of institution has probably crept into the text of St. Luke's account of the Last Supper (see Hort's critical note). But it has recently been argued by Percy Gardner (The Origin of the Lord's Supper, 1893) that a revelation to St. Paul at Corinth (so he very eloquently understands 11<sup>23</sup>) may have been the sole source of the institution of the Eucharist; and it is suggested further, that this revelation was largely coloured by the neighbouring mysteries of Eleusis. The tradition of the institution in the first two Gospels is enough to refute this view. That they have derived it from Pauline influence is not to be believed for a moment; nor, in view of its thoroughly Palestinian and Jewish antecedents, can great weight be assigned to the fact that they do not expressly record a command to repeat the ordinance (cf. Bickell, Messe und Pascha; Anrich, Antike Mysterienwesen, p. 127). We note the stress laid by the apostle on previous preparation (11<sup>28</sup>). The solemnity of the rite in St. Paul's eyes can hardly be exaggerated.

12. LITERATURE. (For complete commentaries on the NT see NEW TESTAMENT; for commentaries on the Epp. of St. Paul generally, and Introductions to them, see PAUL, ROMANS; for grammatical works, see LANGUAGE OF THE NT.) A very complete list of works on the Epp. to the Cor. will be found in Meyer's Commentary (Eng. tr.), also in Plummer's articles on Corinthians in Smith DB, see also Wald. Schmidt in PRF xi. 869 ff., 873; Reuss, Gesch. der H. Schriften NT, § 88 ff. In a select bibliography we must be content with mentioning a few books of special importance without implying in any way that those omitted are without (often great) value. (a) On both Epistles: The historical situation has been specially discussed (among others) by H. v. S. Nitzsch, *Baur, Theol. 1. The traces of this Epistle in the post-apostolic age are as slight as those of the first Epistle are exceptionally strong. Clement of Rome does not quote it. Where the Epistle would have furnished him with most apposite material (e.g. Clem. ad Cor. v. 6), he makes no use of it. It is not referred to by Ignatius. Polycarp, on the other hand, distinctly quotes 2 Co 4<sup>14</sup> (Polyc. ad Phil. ii. 4, ὁ δὲ ἐρεῖπας . . . καὶ ἡμᾶς ἐρεῖπε), and apparently 8<sup>21</sup> (ad Phil. vi. 1, comparing Pr 3<sup>4</sup>). The letter to Diognetus v.<sup>3</sup> shows a knowledge of 2 Co 6<sup>8-10</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>. The reference of Athenagoras (de Resurr. 18) to v.<sup>10</sup> is fairly clear; two references, at least in Theophilus (ad Autol. i. 2, iii. 4), to 7<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> are quite distinct. The 'Presbyters' quoted by Irenæus (v. v. 1) refer to 12<sup>4</sup>. Moreover, the Epistle was in the canon of Marcion, and appears to have been used by the Sethites, (ap. Hippol. Philos. v. iii. 19, p. 216, Cruice) and by the Ophites, who quoted 2 Co 12<sup>4</sup> (ib. p. 166). The above references fairly cover the period prior to the Muratorian Canon, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, all of which authorities bear full witness to the Epistle. The utmost we can say is that there is no evidence that our Ep. was absent from any list of writings of St. Paul. This would hardly hold good if we were to follow Zahn (Kanon, 2. 833 ff.) in his view that a definitive collection of Pauline Epp. had been compiled before the date of Clemens Romanus. For, as we have seen, his knowledge of our Epistle is more than doubtful.

2. The text of the Epistle has been transmitted by the same versions and MSS as 1 Co (see last art.), with the following exceptions: A lacks 4<sup>13</sup> (-ἐντορεῖται)–12<sup>7</sup> καὶ τ.; C lacks all from 10<sup>8</sup>; it is contained entire in FGKL; H contains 4<sup>2-7</sup>, 10<sup>8-12</sup> 1<sup>8</sup>–11<sup>8</sup> 1<sup>2</sup>–12<sup>2</sup>, the first fragment at St. Petersburg, the rest at Mt. Athos; I<sup>2</sup> contains no part of our Epistle; M contains the first fifteen verses of chapter 1, and 10<sup>13</sup>–12<sup>5</sup> (Brit. Mus.); O has 1<sup>20</sup>–2<sup>12</sup>; P lacks only 2<sup>13-16</sup>; Q has no part of the Ep.; R has 1<sup>9-19</sup>. For the old Latin, r lacks 2<sup>11-318</sup> 5<sup>2-79</sup> 8<sup>13-99</sup> 11<sup>23</sup>–12<sup>13</sup> 13<sup>11a</sup>.

3. Although inferior in its external attestation to the first Epistle, the internal character of 2 Co removes it far above any suspicion as to its authenticity. On whatever ground its integrity may be called in question (see § 1), the several parts of the Epistle are acknowledged as Pauline by all sober criticism (see 1 Cor § 3). In fact, in its individuality of style, intensity of feeling, inimitable expression of the writer's personality, it may be said to stand at the head of all the Pastoral Epistles, Galatians not excepted. Moreover, its historical references are so unstudied, so manifold, so intricate, that difficult as it is to reconstruct with any certainty the historical situation (§§ 4, 5), the difficulty is rather analogous to the 'subtilitas Naturae,' than such as would result from the inconsistencies of a literary fabrication. It is the most personal, least doctrinal, of all the Epistles except Philemon; but at the same time it is saturated with the characteristic theological conceptions of St. Paul. The personal relation of the apostle to the community is viewed in the light of the apostolic office as such, and this in turn in that of the distinctive character of the gospel: the profoundest conceptions of grace, reconciliation, consummation, thus enter into the very fibre of chs. 1-7. This interpenetration of practical detail with first principles of the faith is a characteristic which our Epistle shares with 1 Co. But here it is even more strongly marked. Not only do the relations between the Old and New Covenants (3), the Earthly and the Future Life (4), not only do the doctrines of Redemption and the Incarnation (5, 7, 8) find classical expression, but there is not the smallest matter mentioned in the letter which does not carry us back to the highest and most ultimate laws; the mere organization of the logia is sowing for eternity (9), a carrying out of the principle of the Incarnation (8); 'from the surface of things he everywhere penetrates to the depths.'

The Epistle is a letter of many moods, but all under strong control. 'Joy and heaviness, anxiety and hope, trust and resentment, anger and love, follow one another, the one as intense as the other. Yet there is no touch of contradiction. The apostle justifies it all, and he is master of it all, the same throughout, and always his whole self. An extraordinary susceptibility of feeling and impression, such as only an extraordinary character can hold in control' (Weizsacker, Apost. Zitter, p. 328; cf. the whole section).

In the discussions (art. 1 CORINTHIANS, § 4) raised by the Dutch hypercritical school, and by Steck, on the genuineness of the 'Pamphlet-Epistle,' our Epistle has played a somewhat subordinate part (see Knowling, ubi supra, pp. 192, 174). We may therefore dispense with any discussion on the subject, and postpone the question of Integrity until we have dealt with the difficulties connected with the historical situation.

4. As we have seen above (on 1 COR. § 7), the complete elucidation of the circumstances of 1 Co depends on the recovery of the thread of events connected with and ascertainable from the second Epistle. Here we enter upon what the most accurate of explorers has compared to a 'trackless forest.' The problem is especially tantalizing, because the abundance of material at once stimulates and mocks the attempt at a complete combination.

The broad question, How does the historical situation in 2 Co differ from that in 1 Co? how many letters, how many visits, of St. Paul to Corinth, how many estrangements and reconciliations, are to be traced or assumed? depends for its solution on our success or failure in unravelling several distinct threads. Such are the movements of Timothy, the movements of Titus, the history of the logia (1 Co 16<sup>14</sup>) at Corinth, the sequel of the case of the offender of 1 Co 5<sup>12</sup>, the progress of party spirit and of opposition to St. Paul at Corinth, and, lastly, St. Paul's references to his plans of travel, and to letters and visits of his own.

We will briefly sketch the position of each of these questions, and then consider the possibilities of a satisfactory reconstruction of the history.

(a) As to Timothy, the case is simple. We have seen (on 1 COR. § 7) left St. Paul at Ephesus for Macedonia, probably to receive the dispatch of 1 Co. He was to return eventually (1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>), though St. Paul implies some doubt (ἐὰν ἐλθῇ, 16<sup>10</sup>) as to the prospect of his doing so. St. Paul expected him to return to Ephesus with the bearers of 1 Co (16<sup>11</sup>) by Pentecost (16<sup>12</sup>). His return from Corinth would in that case be by sea direct. The expression of Luke (Ac 19<sup>22</sup> εἰς τὴν Μὰκ. only) is, however, easily understood if he failed to reach Corinth. Lightfoot (Bibl. Ess. 275 ff.), who maintained that he probably did not do so, suggested that Titus might have overtaken him on the way to Corinth, or, if he went thither by sea, have met Timothy on the way back. Certainty on this point is not possible; we have to weigh the total silence of St. Paul in 2 Co (in the face of 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>) as to any result of Timothy's mission to Cor., against the absence from 2 Co of any explanation (in face, again, of 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>) of the non-arrival of a messenger so importantly announced. The latter argument the present writer to be slightly outweighed by the former. 'It is patent that the mission had in some way miscarried' (Waite); but that Timothy had failed to reach Corinth is hardly to be assumed (as by J. J. G. E. Evangel. p. 61) without more proof than we possess. Anyhow, Timothy was with St. Paul when he wrote 2 Co. They may have met either at Ephesus or in Macedonia.

(b) Of Titus (Gal 2<sup>3</sup>) we do not hear by name in 1 Co. From 2 Co we learn that he was the bearer of our letter (8<sup>6, 16-24</sup>), accompanied by two unnamed brethren, one of whom, 'whose praise is in the Gospel,' may or may not have been Luke.

From 2 Co 12<sup>18</sup> we see that Titus had been to Corinth before, as we should also gather from 8<sup>2</sup> καθὼς προεῆρχατο. This also follows independently from 7<sup>6, 12, 23</sup>. Titus, then, paid at any rate two visits to Corinth; and on one of them, previous to 2 Co, he had been accompanied by a (single, unnamed) brother (2 Co 12<sup>18</sup>).

We will come back to Titus after briefly considering the history of the logia at Corinth. The directions given 1 Co 16<sup>1-4</sup> were followed in answer to some inquiry on the part of the Corinthians (supra, 1 COR. § 7). They had offered (2 Co 9<sup>5</sup> προεγγεγυμένην) to contribute, and, acc. to 8<sup>2</sup>, Titus had assisted in the preliminary organization of their efforts (8<sup>10</sup>, cf. v. 6 προεῆρχατο). To this reference appears to be made 2 Co 12<sup>18</sup> (cf. ἐπλεονέκτησεν with 9<sup>5</sup>). Why not, then, identify (as Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. 281) Titus and 'the brother' with 'the brethren' who carried 1 Co? (supra, 1 COR. § 7). This combination seems free from any objection, and the note of time, ἀπὸ πέρσι (8<sup>10, 92</sup>), pushes back this visit of Titus to a date in any case previous to 1 Co (see 1 COR. § 6). Titus visited Corinth, in connexion with the logia on two occasions; on the second occasion he was one of the bearers of 2 Co; on the first, not improbably he was one of the bearers of 1 Co.

(c) The person of Titus (cf. infra, §§ 6, 7) forms the link between the logia and the more painful questions between St. Paul and the Church of Corinth. The question whether Titus paid yet a third visit thither depends upon the consideration of the troubles which threatened to estrange St. Paul and the Corinthians. Firstly, the case of incest (1 Co 5<sup>12</sup>) was dealt with in 1 Co, and the expulsion there ordered would naturally follow upon the arrival of the letter. Did it? It is the prevalent view (the grounds for it are stated with admirable conciseness by Holtzmann, Evangel. p. 255) that 2 Co 2<sup>5-11</sup> (= 7<sup>6-12</sup>) records the sequel. Stung by St. Paul's summons, the Corinthians, by a majority

(2<sup>d</sup>), inflict a punishment which St. Paul pronounces sufficient, and, lest the pain of it should drive the offender to desperation, advises the Corinthians to relax. The punishment had been inflicted in the presence and at the summons (7<sup>15</sup>) of Titus, who reported the contrition, zeal, and loyalty wrought by the letter he had borne. This letter would accordingly be 1 Co, unless we should have, on further consideration, to infer that the inattention or disaffection with which that letter had been received, or some other cause, had necessitated the dispatch by the hand of Titus of a sharper summons (see below, g).

(d) But a closer examination of the case now in question, had been the loyalty of the Corinthians to St. Paul. To have persisted in withholding pardon would have been to give Satan an advantage over them all, St. Paul included; i.e. to have intensified the very evil St. Paul was combating. Moreover, St. Paul is specially careful to depreciate the grief inflicted upon himself (2<sup>d</sup>), which suggests that the ἀδικηθεῖς of 7<sup>12</sup> is also more than himself. The ὁὐκ ἔνεκεν τοῦ ἀδικήσαντος of the latter verse contradicts the ὅτι of 1 Co 5<sup>6</sup> even more sharply than the notion of a personal wrong, the prominent thought in 2 Co 2. 7, contrasts with that of a sin against God, such as the προφύλαξις of 1 Co 5. There are, then, weighty grounds for inferring from these verses any reference to the offender (who may none the less be glanced at among the προσημαρτηκότες of 12<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>), and for referring them to some other individual. Here, again, it is a question of probability; but the view adopted by very many scholars,* that the offender of 2 Co 2. 7 is a personal opponent of St. Paul, who has grossly injured him, and has been recommended to him, is not only in accordance with the view, which is as old as Tertullian, de Pud. xiii. ff., this mission of Titus, and the letter then carried by him, must be quite independent of, and subsequent to, 1 Co. The ἀργούς of 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup> then harmonizes in sense with 1<sup>2</sup>.

(e) The ὀφθαλμοὶ of 1 Co 1-4 have undergone a change of aspect in 2 Co. Of the watchwords Paul, Apollos, Cephas, we hear no more. It is otherwise with the name of Christ. In the section 10-13<sup>10</sup> a distinct group of chapters are in view who arrogate the name of Christ (10<sup>7</sup>). The final consideration of this movement must be deferred (see below, § 7). For our present purpose it is enough to dwell on the marked change of situation. In 1 Co indeed we trace the tendency to arraign (ἀνακρίνειν, 4<sup>15</sup>) the apostle, and to question his apostolic rank (9<sup>15</sup>). But it is disposed of quietly; it is not as in 2 Co the subject of a direct and passionate indictment. The first (1-7) and last (10-13<sup>10</sup>) sections of the Epistle present somewhat different aspects of the case. In the former, we have references to 'the many who traffic in the word of God' (2<sup>17</sup>; cf. 4<sup>2</sup>); to 'certain, who need letters of introduction' to the Corinthians (3<sup>1</sup>); to imputations against the apostle of fleshly motives, of duplicity (12<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>8</sup>). These imputations proceed, it would seem, from ἀπιστοί, men blinded by worldliness to the light of the gospel (4<sup>4</sup>), who yet, as we infer from 5<sup>16</sup>, lay great stress on having known Christ after the flesh. The last two points throw light on the purpose of such passages as 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>14-17</sup>, above all 3<sup>6-18</sup> 5<sup>14-21</sup>. The Judaizing tendencies faintly traceable in 1 Co have assumed a doctrinal character. Still, the polemic of these chapters is not direct; St. Paul assumes that his readers are with him; so far as they are concerned (ἐν τῇ ἐν Χριστῷ, contrast 13<sup>5-6</sup>) 'old things are passed away, and new things have come.' We seem to hear 'not the rumblings of a storm, but the calm of a sea.' But when we turn to the (10-13<sup>10</sup>) the brightness and confidence of tone is gone. The features of the opposition of 1-7 are still there. St. Paul is charged with fleshly motives (10<sup>2</sup>), with lording it over the Church (10<sup>8</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>; cf. 1<sup>24</sup>), with deceit (11<sup>31</sup>). His opponents still come armed with letters of introduction (10<sup>12-13</sup>), they are—not now ἀπιστοί but—ministers of Satan, false apostles (11<sup>13-15</sup>); they preach another Jesus, another gospel (11<sup>4</sup>); they claim to be ministers of Christ, to be 'Christ's' (11<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>7</sup>; cf. 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup>). All the features of the opponents of 1-7 are here, but they are heightened, and the polemic against them is more painfully intense. Their opposition against St. Paul, too, are more direct and audacious,—embezzlement (12<sup>16-18</sup>), bullying by letters (10<sup>10</sup>) in contrast with weakness when face to face, reckless folly (11<sup>18</sup>), are imputed to him; if he refuses direct sustentation, it is because he knows he has no right to it, being no true apostle (11<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>11-18</sup>). But, worse than all, St. Paul is conscious that his readers are not with him: 'their obedience is undermined. Their obedience . . . we look at the outside of things' (10<sup>6</sup> 7). They are in imminent peril of being corrupted, in fact they tolerate another gospel,—yes, gladly tolerate the yoke of 'the fools' who are tyrannizing over them (11<sup>4-18</sup> 20); the inviolable constitution put upon St. Paul's conduct, are prepared to doubt his love for them (11<sup>7-11</sup>; cf. 12<sup>15-18</sup>). They are wavering in faith, Christ can hardly be in them; St. Paul dreads to think of the impenitent state in which he will find them, dreads the humiliation which awaits him at Corinth, dreads the unsparing severity he will have to exercise (12<sup>19-13</sup>),—his last hope is that the letter may pave the way to better things. Note that St. Paul is addressing the community as a whole throughout, not the Judaizing τῶς, not a minority still under their influence; of this the chapters give no hint. There is some hint of that of 1-7, or even that of 8. 9? There is some prima facie, in the severance of 10-13<sup>10</sup> from the rest of the Epistle. But in any case the situation in these chapters is a new one as compared with that in 1 Co; and from its nature can hardly have been revealed to St. Paul by the arrival of Titus in Macedonia, for he brought news of quite a different kind (7<sup>13</sup>).

(f) St. Paul entertained, at different times, two distinct plans of travel. The simpler of the two is that announced in 1 Co 16<sup>5</sup>, and carried out Ac 20<sup>1</sup>, viz. from Ephesus to Macedonia and thence to Corinth. But from 2 Co 1<sup>15-16</sup> we learn that he had at one time entertained, but (v. 23 in order to spare the Corinthians) had abandoned, the more complicated plan of proceeding direct from Asia to Corinth, thence to Macedonia, and thence to Corinth again. This plan had been communicated to the Corinthians, at least in the form of a promise of a prompt visit. This is not satisfied by 1 Co 4<sup>18</sup>; for if so, the withdrawal would be announced in 1 Co 16<sup>5-6</sup>, a passage totally out of correspondence (v. 18) with the situation presupposed in 2 Co 1<sup>13</sup>. Moreover, in defending his change of plan (2 Co 1<sup>15-23</sup>), St. Paul would not have failed to appeal to the clear statement of his intentions in 1 Co 16<sup>5</sup>. The inference seems irresistible that the change of plan was, subsequent to 1 Co, and that the

* It is well put by Dr. Llewelyn Davies in Smith's DB, s. v. PAUL. It had been maintained by Bleek, Credner, Olshausen, Neander, Ewald, and is also adopted by Hilgenfeld, Weiss, Schenke, Jülicher, Godet, etc. Krenkel and Clemen suppose that the ἀνδρῶν was directly a nod, not at St. Paul, but at a fellow-worker. See Schmiedel, Ecc. on 2 Co 2<sup>11</sup>.

Complicated Plan was formed in consequence of something that had transpired after 1 Co was dispatched, and that further events caused St. Paul to fall back upon the original Simple Plan.

(g) We have now to take note of St. Paul's references to letters written by himself to Corinth. That there were three such is certain, viz. the two canonical letters, and the 'pre-canonical' or lost letter referred to in 1 Co 5<sup>8</sup>. But we have seen that the Complicated Plan of travel was communicated to the Corinthians after 1 Co; whether this was by letter or not, depends on the interpretation of 2 Co 12<sup>14</sup>. At any rate the promise of a visit in the confidence (περὸ θησιν) between the apostle and the Corinthians, and the promised visit was looked forward to as a 'joy' (χαρά). It was to upset this confidence, and to demand that the visit, if paid, should be one of stern judgment. St. Paul decided 'to spare' them, and not to return to them in sorrow (2<sup>1</sup>). And this he had stated in a letter (2<sup>3-4</sup>), written in affliction and distress of heart and many tears,—a letter calculated to cause pain, and one which he for a time regretted having written (7<sup>8-9</sup>), but which, aided by the presence of Titus (supra, c. d), produced a happy revolution in the temper of the Corinthians. Two questions arise—(1) Did the letter announce the abandonment of the Complicated Plan, or did the latter merely follow tacitly by way of postponement? This depends on the sense of τοῦτο αὐτό (2<sup>3</sup>), which may merely mean 'for this very cause' (cf. 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>; Winer, III. § xxi. fin.). (2) Can this letter be our 1 Co? Certainly not, if, as we have argued, it arose out of a situation subsequent to that of 1 Co. But, quite independently of this, 1 Co is hardly a letter which St. Paul could even temporarily have repeated writing. Stern passages it contains, but they are relieved by frequent encouragement, calm discussion, quiet practical advice; its emotional tension is not to be compared with that of 2 Co 10-13, or even 1-7; it does not correspond to the description 2 Co 2<sup>4</sup> (see Waite, p. 383). This is a vital point, but it seems hardly doubtful. The one strong counter-argument, the supposed identity of reference in 2 Co 24<sup>2</sup> and 1 Co 5<sup>12</sup>, has already been examined (d), and found to be of very dubious validity.

We must therefore insert a stern and highly painful letter between 1 and 2 Co; and if 2 Co 12<sup>14-15</sup> refers to a letter at all, it is certainly not to 1 Co, and still less to the painful letter just mentioned. St. Paul then, who in any case wrote not fewer than three, can be fairly proved to have written four, and not three as we have seen. Our two canonical Epistles, and the 'pre-canonical' letter, p. 66; and see below, § 8).

(h) Lastly, we consider the references to his visits to Corinth. First of all, in 2 Co 12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> he says, ἰδοὺ τρίτον τοῦτο ἐτοίμως ἔχω ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς . . . τρίτον τοῦτο ἐρχομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς. Taken by themselves, these words would be held by anyone to establish two previous visits. And the more natural interpretation of 2<sup>1</sup> ἐκρίνα . . . τὸ μὴ πάλιν ἐν λύπῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐλθεῖν, connects πάλιν with ἐν λύπῃ rather than with ἐλθεῖν. If so, a previous visit ἐν λύπῃ is implied; the attempt to explain this by 1 Co 2<sup>1</sup> ἐλθὼν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, is unworthy of serious discussion. We are therefore obliged to assume provisionally that, when the painful letter was written, St. Paul had visited Corinth twice, and the second time ἐν λύπῃ. Only if this assumption proves so improbable as to outweigh the more obvious sense of the passages just quoted, shall we be justified in throwing into the scale against them the δευτέρα χαρά of 12<sup>15</sup> the ὡς παρὼν τὸ δεύτερον of 13<sup>2</sup>. As a matter of fact, the assumption of a visit ἐν λύπῃ does encounter hopeless obstacles, whether we seek to place it before or after 1 Co.

Let us consider the latter possibility first. St. Paul abandoned his direct visit (i.e. the Complicated Plan) 'in order to spare' the Corinthians. This excludes at once from consideration the period between the painful letter and 2 Co. Let us suppose then that St. Paul, on receiving from Corinth unfavourable news (probably connected with the offender of 2<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>), after he had received better news; announced an immediate visit (i.e. the Complicated Plan) 'in order to spare' the Corinthians; another estrangement, with the offender of 2<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>, breaks out; St. Paul then visits Corinth, and this time with more permanent success, which he at last learns from Titus in Macedonia. The improbability of this duplication of events condemns the entire hypothesis, and drives us back on the other alternative, that St. Paul's visit ἐν λύπῃ must have preceded 1 Co. But here we are encountered by the total ignorance of such a visit which the text rays. Not only is there 'not a single trace' (see pp. 277, 300); we are compelled to ask, and ask in vain, to what, on the visit ἐν λύπῃ due? Not to the ἐγείστατον, of which only from Chloe's people. Not to the πονηρία nor to the disorders in their assembly, which he knew only by report (5<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>8</sup>). Not to the ἐγείστατον (Co 6) nor to the denial of the Resurrection, of both of which he was indignant surprise. If the distressing second visit, 1 Co, the λύπη which occasioned it was dead and buried when 1 Co was written, it had nothing to do with any of the subjects touched upon in 1 Co, and St. Paul's references to it in 2 Co are inexplicable.

In fact, the main ground on which Weizsäcker, Clemen, and others place it after 1 Co is the inadmissibility of placing it earlier; while Schmiedel follows Neander, Olshausen, Reuss, and others in placing it earlier. The latter hypothesis we cannot expect to harmonize all details of the text, but it is content with certainty when it is questioned the finality of the inferences drawn at first sight from 2 Co 2<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>.

Against the probability of either of the two hypotheses just discussed, we must weigh that of the interpretation of those verses adopted by Paley (Horae Paul.), Baur, de Wette, Renan, Hilgenfeld, Davidson, Farrar, and others, that by τρίτον τοῦτο ἐρχομαι St. Paul means 'this is the third time I am coming' (i.e. meaning to come), while 2<sup>1</sup> simply states his resolve that his new visit (πάλιν ἐλθεῖν) shall not be ἐν λύπῃ. This interpretation is at first sight of inferior probability to the more obvious sense of the words, but it harmonizes well with 13<sup>2</sup> (RVm) and with the ὀκνέτω of 12<sup>15</sup> (RV; AV is against the idiom).

(i) Summary.—Timothy's visit, then, hardly enters into our problem; Titus visits Corinth three times, first (possibly as bearer of 1 Co) to organize the λογία, the second time to cope with the troubles there, thirdly as bearer of 2 Co, and to complete the λογία. The troubles at Corinth were mainly due to events subsequent to the situation of 1 Co, and the offender of 2 Co 2. 7 was more probably an offender against St. Paul, connected with the Judaizing party, than the incestuous person of 1 Co 5. The troubles, however, had taken root and hold in Corinth to a degree far beyond what is traceable in 1 Co. It is not altogether easy to combine the situation presupposed in 2 Co 10-13<sup>10</sup> with that in 2 Co 1-9; it is quite impossible to identify it with the situation of 1 Co. St. Paul, then, dispatched Titus to cope with new troubles at Corinth, the news of which had reached him after the dispatch of 1 Co, and had induced him to abandon an intended visit to Corinth, and to write a painful letter instead. To insert a visit of St. Paul to Corinth in connexion with this crisis is impossible, while the painful letter, and the abandonment of the δευτέρα χαρά, are so closely bound up with the visit ἐν λύπῃ, that the three must rest on a single basis of fact. If so, the visit ἐν λύπῃ was a visit actually paid. Still less can we find a probable place for a second visit anterior to 1 Co and connected with a painful crisis not dealt with in that Epistle. Accordingly, as the language of 2 Co is susceptible of a different though perhaps less prepossessing explanation, we and then on to Macedonia, anxiously awaiting the return of Titus to put an end to his suspense, is the time of intense mental strain of which our Epistle is the outcome. The relief expressed in 1-7 finds its outlet along with much of the pent-up and self-vindication (10-13) which had been all the while accumulating in the apostle's mind. The main purpose of the Epistle turns upon the new troubles at Corinth, which differentiate our Epistle from 1 Co. These have been touched upon above (§ 4, e), but require a little further examination in this connexion.

The difference between the new troubles at Corinth and those connected with 1 Co. is not of kind, but of degree. The agitators (10<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>) on the scene. Can we identify them with any closeness? The ἔκτρον ἐκπαίδευτον of 11<sup>4</sup> links them on to the agitators of Gal 16. At Corinth, this is rather in prospect than actual, but 11<sup>22</sup> shows that we have to do with birth. Were they personal disciples of Christ? This is matter for conjecture rather than proof. The original Twelve seem to be referred to in the twice-recurring phrase ἡμεῖς ἀποστόλοι (11<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>); but to suppose that any of the Twelve were personally concerned is out of the question. St. Paul would not in that case have stigmatized them as ψευδοστόλοι, etc. They claim to represent the Twelve, to

In this connexion, the Letters of Introduction (10<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>) are of importance. As the ἐξ ἑμῶν of 3<sup>1</sup> is meant rather to point the contrast with 3<sup>3</sup> than to posit we must understand that the claims of these letters. These claims would have lost all their danger and authority if the letters came from some well-known name. The agitators used letters of merely personal commendation for their mission beyond the scope of the Epistle (cf. Ac 15<sup>1</sup> 24). At any connexion between the agitators conformity to his side of the Jerusalem Council. The letters are in accordance with the older apostles. Chapters 8, 9 therefore stand in a close relation to the main purpose of the Epistle. The first seven chapters, with their suggestive passages on the relation of the Law to the Gospel, or profound glances into the doctrine of Redemption, all lead up to the same principal purpose (sup. § 3). The ἀποστολὴ τοῦ κυρίου of 11<sup>4</sup> (cf. 5<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>9</sup>) refers to a lower view of the Person of Christ, cannot be regarded as a question of Christology, but of Faith and Works; but this fundamental issue is felt rather than perceived in the NT as a rule. At any rate it was necessary to throw aside all thoughts of compromise, and to endeavour to stamp out from Corinth a movement which bade fair to result in complete apostasy (1<sup>12</sup>). Hence the peculiar transition in the Epistle from the ἀποστολὴ τοῦ κυρίου of 11<sup>4</sup> (10-13), the appeal to the Corinthians to be reconciled to the apostle, to the appeal to work among the Corinthians.

8. We must now, accordingly, endeavour to reach a result with regard to the Integrity of the Epistle. We have seen that the canonical Epp. to the Corinthians are the remains of a correspondence which comprised other letters now lost (§ 4, g), and that possibly not fewer than three lost letters were addressed by St. Paul to the Corinthians. The temptation to rediscover all or part of these in our extant letters, coupled with undeniable difficulties in their sequence of ideas (cf. § 4, e), has naturally been strong. Clemen (whose Einheitlichkeit der Paul. Briefe, 1894, contains the most searching and acute of recent essays in this direction) has redivided our Epistles into five (see 1 CORINTHIANS, § 6), thus providing wholly or in part for each letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians of which we have any trace whatever. As affecting 1 Co, his result consists merely in the relegation to the lost letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup> of certain passages in chs. 3, 7, 9, 14, where the connexion is difficult, and of the whole of 15 (except the rejected v. 56). We venture to think that a little more patience, or exegetical penetration, might have very greatly reduced the compass of these fragments. But with regard to 2 Co the difficulties are more serious. They fall into three main heads—(1) The interjected warning (see below, § 9, A 2, β β) 6<sup>14</sup>-7<sup>1</sup>. The direct continuity of 6<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> is too obviously to be mistaken; the interjected appeal simply breaks the connexion. Accordingly Clemen, following Hilgenfeld and others, refers it to the lost letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, while many other critics (see Heinrich, Das zweite SS. u.s.w. pp. 329-334) agree that it is out of place here. It must be allowed that if this is the case, the insertion was made at a date prior to the first circulation of the Epistle, for textual tradition of any kind is totally silent as to it. Whether this objection is fatal in limine will be considered at the close of this section. Waiving it for the present, the question becomes one (a) of exegesis, which on the whole has hitherto failed to find a clear line of connexion with the context before or after; and (b) of the general analogy of St. Paul's style, and of this Epistle especially. True, 'there is no literary work in which the cross-currents are so violent and so frequent'; but there is no other 'cross-current' in the Epistle which cuts with so clean an edge as this. On the whole, if we may assume an interpolation at all without textual evidence, this is perhaps dignus vindice nodus. Whether, if out of place here, the section is part of the letter of 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, is not so clear; the injunction of 6<sup>14</sup> does not fit so exactly with 1 Co 5<sup>10</sup> as to preclude all doubt. To reject it as un-Pauline (Holsten, etc.) is quite a different matter. The discussions of Whitelaw, Chase, and Sanday in Class. Review, 1890, pp. 12, 150, 248, 317, 359; Schmiedel's Exc. in loc.; Clemen, Einl. 58 f.)

(2) Chapters 8 and 9.—All allow chapter 8 to remain part of our (the 'Fifth') Epistle, but chapter 9 is thrown back to the 'Third.' This divorce, in which Clemen follows Semler and a long series of later critics, is mainly on grounds which are more suitable for discussion in a commentary (see Waite in loc.). That chs. 8 and 9, especially in view of 9<sup>1</sup> (γάρ), are impossible in one and the same letter, is an assumption founded, surely, upon a somewhat narrow view of St. Paul's logic.

(3) The great invective, or 'Vierkapitelbrief.'—The main grounds for relegating this to a different Epistle are given above (§ 4, e). If they have any validity they make for its identification with the 'Fourth' or Painful Letter (§ 4, g). This is the view of Hausrath (Vierkapitelbrief, 1870) and of Schmiedel (in Ersch and Gruber, and in Hand-Kommentar). The arguments are not easy to meet directly—they are not indeed conclusive; we know less of the circumstances than did St. Paul's readers (cf. Jülicher, Einleit. § 7; Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, 314-316). The difficulty is that in 1-9 the Corinthians are reconciled, whereas in 10-13 they are still in a state of hostility, or at best of dubious fidelity. That the apostle is addressing a section only of the Corinthians is against all the evidence. That after the good news brought by Titus, some worse news again arrived to change the apostle's tone, is unproved and improbable. The opening of chapter 10, ἀντὶς δὲ ἐπὶ Παύλῳ, is of importance as bearing on the question. Assuming that the words mark, not the beginning of an interpolated document, but the opening of a new section in the letter, they indicate some change of treatment. Possibly, St. Paul may have sent Timothy (1<sup>1</sup>) away and begun to write, either by his own hand or by a confidential amanuensis, words that had been maturing in his mind (§ 7) in the period of suspense before the arrival of Titus, and which not even the good news brought by Titus could persuade him to leave unwritten. If this view be correct, we can, with Weizsäcker and others, regard these chapters as the final assault, prepared for in the whole previous course of the letter, which is decisively to secure for the apostle the allegiance of the Corinthians, and to drive the interlopers (11<sup>4</sup>), who had gained a partial hold over them, headlong from the field. The Corinthians are already won 'in part' (14), but a leaven of disloyalty exists among them, and the success reported by Titus must be followed up to be lasting, and the disloyal leaven effectually stamped out. Add to this that the identification of these chapters with the Painful Letter (§ 4, g) would seem to demand that they should refer to the (ex hypothesi) still unsettled case of the Offender (chs. 2, 7). But no such reference can be traced; for separating 10-13 from the rest of the letter loses a very strong positive factor.

On the whole, the evidence, though not proved; but it would be going too far to say that it is absolutely disproved. Whether this is so or not must depend on the weight to be attached to the entire lack of external evidence. Can we suppose that interpolations so serious as to amount (if we accept all the three hypotheses discussed above) to the formation of an entire Epistle out of heterogeneous fragments—or even the interpolation of any one of the passages in question—can have taken place without leaving so much as a ripple upon the stream of textual tradition? Certainly, there exist 'primitive corruptions' of the NT text, i.e. changes which occurred so early that the original text has left no documentary traces of itself. But these are small in number and in scale. 'We cannot too strongly express our disbelief in the existence of undetected interpolations of any moment' (Westcott and Hort). The strongest internal evidence might conceivably modify this in an exceptional case; only our witnesses to the text push its history back so very early as to leave very scanty room for the occurrence of such interpolations. But the literary relations of the synoptic Gospels furnish an analogy which warns us against too summary a rejection of any such hypothesis in this case. The question is whether the Second Epistle to the Corinthians passed into general circulation as soon as the first. The latter, formally appealed to within forty years of its origin, was circulated too early to permit us to assume interpolation in it on any large scale unreflected in the textual tradition. But Clement appears to know nothing of 2 Co, and its comparatively late appearance in the stream of attestation (see above, § 1) is perhaps compatible with some process of editing on the part of the Corinthian Church before it was copied for public reading and imparted to other Churches. This would be easier to suppose, if the autographs were written on leaves or tablets rather than on rolls. (See Sir E. M. Thompson, Handbook of Palaeography, pp. 20 ff., 54-61.) We do not therefore regard the absence of textual evidence in this particular case as absolutely fatal in limine to the hypotheses we have been considering; but it must be allowed to weigh heavily against them; and we believe that a patient and circumspect exegesis will gradually dissolve the arguments, at first sight very tempting, for the segregation of chs. 10-13, and even perhaps of 6<sup>14-7</sup>.

9. Contents of the Epistle.—The nature of the Letter (§§ 3, 7) makes it far less readily divisible into well-marked sections than the first Epistle. The order of ideas is emotional rather than logical, a subject is not taken up, dealt with, and disposed of, but, like some strain in a piece of music, occurs, is lost in a maze of crowding harmonies, and recurs again and again. This is especially the case in chs. 10-13. But even in broad lines of division may be recognized, and we shall exhibit these, without pursuing the analysis into its subtler subdivisions.

10. IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE.—The Epistle is far less various in its contents than 1 Co, and throws on the less direct light on the theology and on the life of the apostolic Church. All the more important is its contribution to our personal knowledge of St.

Paul. The most important biographical material is supplied in 112-33. Some of the details (v. 25) are not easy to fit into the otherwise known life of the apostle; but this is only what one would expect from a genuine source. The notice of ARETAS is exceptionally important for chronological reasons.

Whether the same can be said of 12<sup>2</sup> (see Clement's view, referred to in 1 CORINTHIANS, § 6) may be doubted. The attempts to identify the vision with any point of contact in Ac have been various and precarious. The apostle's καὶ ἡμεῖς (1 Co 9<sup>18a</sup>), of taking no sustenance from the Corinthians, is more fully elucidated 2 Co 11<sup>7-13</sup> 12<sup>13a</sup>. Of a more personal kind are the notices of the apostle's miracles 12<sup>12</sup>; of the much-debated σκόλον τῆς ἀρκῆς (12<sup>7</sup>) (see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 183 ff.; Lias, p.

xxiv; Ramsay, Ch. in Rom. Emp. pp. 62-66; St.

Paul<sup>1</sup>, p. 94 f.), and the references to St. Paul's comparative inferiority as a speaker (11<sup>6</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>) and lack of commanding presence (Plummer in DB, p.

658<sup>a</sup>; Ramsay, CRÉ<sup>2</sup>, p. 30 f.). But the interest of such details is far transcended by the Epistle's revelation of the writer's personality. To draw out this in detail is superfluous; let it suffice to say that to this Epistle, more than to any other,

we owe our knowledge of the true 'pectus Paulinum,'—our intimacy with the apostle's inmost self. From this point of view it takes its place side by side with 1 Co as the most pastoral of all Epistles. 'What an admirable Epistle is the second to the Corinthians! how full of affections!

he joys and he is sorry, he grieves and he glories;

never was there such care of a flock expressed, save in the great Shepherd of the Fold, who first shed tears over Jerusalem, and afterwards blood'

(George Herbert; cf. Lightfoot, Galatians, pp.

44, 51). The doctrinal interest of the Epistle must be very briefly indicated. The eschatology of 4<sup>16</sup>-

5<sup>8</sup> is difficult, and involves at any rate a less confident expectation of living until the return of Christ than is expressed 1 Co 15<sup>51</sup> (for a very accurate exegesis of the passage see Waite in loc.). The contrast of the spirit and letter (3<sup>6-18</sup>) leads to the difficult passage 3<sup>7-18</sup>, apparently identifying the 'Lord' with the 'Spirit,' a thought with a long sequel in the history of theology (see Gebhardt and Harnack on Herm. Sim. v. 2; Swete in Dict. Chr. Biog. iii. 115; Bull, Def. Fid. Nic. i. ii. 5, ii. ii. 3; Harnack, Dogmengesch. 2 494 n.; Athan. de Syn. 27 [Anath. 21]); and so to the Christology of St. Paul, which receives striking side-lights from the Epistle. The glory of the exalted Christ is the dominant thought of 3<sup>18-46</sup>, a glory which shines upon and transforms (Ac 9<sup>31</sup>) the Christian, constituting in the life of grace a foretaste of the life of glory (v. 18, see Ro 6<sup>5-11</sup> 8<sup>101. 21-23</sup> etc.). The doctrine of renovation (5<sup>17</sup>) and of the Christian life (4<sup>7-15</sup>) thus rests upon the agency of a living Christ as the sustaining force; but there is a ἡ ἀποκατάστασις, as the fountainhead of union with Christ, the forgiveness of sin (3<sup>9</sup>), founded on the work of the Sinless (5<sup>21</sup>) Christ. The last-mentioned passage is a most important contribution to St. Paul's soteriology. In 8<sup>3</sup> the thought of Ph 2<sup>58</sup> is anticipated. The Epistle is not a doctrinal treatise, but a doctrine of the Holy Trinity, but may fairly be combined with other ἡ ἀποκατάστασις which that doctrine is implicit.

We know the effect this Epistle produced; but from the fact that St. Paul's promised visit was carried out, and that our two Epistles were treasured up at Corinth and thence eventually found their way into the Church's canon, we infer that the Epistle produced the effect of which such a letter was worthy.

II. APOCRYPHAL CORRESPONDENCE OF ST. PAUL AND THE CORINTHIANS.—A letter of the Corinthian Church to St. Paul, and a reply by the apostle, formed part of the NT of the Syrian Church in the time of Aphraates and Ephraim. From the Syrian Church the letters passed over into the Armenian, which retained them to a late date (they are still quoted by a writer of the 7th cent.). The Corinthians ask St. Paul to condemn certain false teachers who have appeared among them, and the apostle duly replies. Ephraim, in his commentary on St. Paul (given in Zahn, Gesch. d. N.T. K. ii. 595 ff.), already noticed that the false doctrine is that taught by the school of Bardesanes, who lived from A.D. 155 to 223. The letters are accordingly in all probability a product of the 3rd cent., and directed against the school in question. They were first made known in Europe by Usher, 1644, (Sylloge Annotat. p. 29), from an imperfect Arm. MS.; then in 1736 Whiston published a Gr. and Lat. transl. from a 10th cent. MS. The Arm. text was printed by Zohrab in 1815. The commentary of Ephraim on St. Paul (where our Epp. follow 2 Co) was printed from an Arm. MS of A.D. 999 at Venice in 1836. At last, in 1890, Berger discovered at Milan a Latin MS of the Bible (saec. x. ut videtur) containing our two Epp. (after He), and a second Lat. MS (saec. xiii.) has been discovered at Laon by Bratke, where the Epp. come after the Apoc. and Cath. Epp. The text of the Milan MS is given in ThL, 1892, p. 7 ff., that of the Laon MS in the same volume, p. 586 ff. The existence in a Latin version of letters known only to Syrian and Armenian tradition, and which have left no trace in Greek Christian literature, is not as yet explained. See Harnack, Gesch. d. altchrist. Lit. i. 37 ff.; Carrière et Berger, Corresp. Apocr. de S. P. et des Corinthiens, 1891; Vetter, D. apokr. 3 Korintherbrief (Tüb.), 1894; also in Th. Quartalschrift (1895) iv.; Zahn (ubi sup.), maintains that the correspondence comes from the lost Acta Pauli, PRE xi. 378; Jülicher in ThL, 1889, p. 164.

pp. 43-111. Other works as quoted in the body of the above article. A. ROBERTSON.

CORMORANT is the rendering of AV for two Heb. words, חֲסִידִים ḥāṣīḏīm (see PELICAN), and שָׂרָף shālāḥ, καρπακρύς, mergulus.

Shālāḥ occurs only in the list of unclean birds (Lv 11<sup>17</sup>, Dt 14<sup>17</sup>), with no context to assist in its association. From its name it should be a plunging bird. The uncertainty of identifying it is enhanced by the uncertainty of the meaning of the LXX rendering καρπακρύς, which is also a plunging bird. Tristram is inclined to the rendering of AV, which is also that of RV, saying that the cormorant, Phalacrocorax carbo, is common along the coast, coming up the Kishon, and visiting the Sea of Galilee. It is likewise abundant along the Jordan. G. E. POST.

CORN.—In Jn 12<sup>34</sup> 'a corn of wheat,' we have a solitary instance of 'corn' used for a particle. The AV went back for it to Wyclif, intermediate versions having 'the wheat corn,' except Rheims, 'the graine of wheat,' which RV ('a grain of wheat') adopts. It is the earliest meaning of the word 'corn.' Cf. Jewel, On Thess. (1611), 'We must understand this authoritie with a corn of salt (cum grano salis), otherwise it may be vnsauorie'; and Hall (1656), Occas. Med. 11, 'He, that cannot make one spire of grass, or corn of sand, will yet be framing of worlds.' The Gr. is κόκκος, everywhere else tr'd 'grain.' J. HASTINGS.

CORN (חֶרֶס ḥēreṣ, σῖτος, fruges).—The generic (?) name for the cereal grains. Those cultivated in Bible lands are: Wheat, חֵטֶף ḥiṭṭāh, the same as the Arab. ḥiṭāh. The Arab., with its usual wealth of names for familiar objects, has also burr and komh for wheat. Barley, שְׂעֹרָה sē'orāh. The Arab. for this grain is sha'ir. Yetch, כִּסְמֶת kussemeth, called in AV (Ex 9<sup>32</sup>, Is 28<sup>25</sup>) rye, (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>) fitches. The kirsenneh of the Arab. is a modified form, with n substituted for m, and r inserted. This grain is Vicia Ervilia, L. It is extensively cultivated in the East. Fitches, חֶזֶק hezah (Is 28<sup>25. 27</sup>), the seeds of the nutmeg flower, Nigella sativa, L., which is known in the E. as el-habbat es-saudā, the black seed, or habbat el-barakat, the seed of blessing. This seed, which has carminative properties, is sprinkled on the top of loaves of bread. Millet, דָּהָן dōhan (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>), which is the same as the Arab. dukhn, Panicum miliaceum, L., also Milium Italicum, L. Beans, פֶּל pōl, Arab. fāl. Lentils, אֲדָשִׁים adāshīm, Arab. adas. Pulse, זֶרֶם zērō'im (Dn 12<sup>16</sup>), probably refers to edible seeds in general, coming to the Arab. kutnīyah, plur. kaṭānī, which includes not only the leguminous seeds which we know as pulse, but millet, etc.; but excludes wheat. Rye, as above stated, is an incorrect rendering for yetch, and is not otherwise mentioned in Scripture, nor cultivated in the Holy Land. Oats, also, are not mentioned nor cultivated.

Corn of all kinds is carried in sheaves from the harvest-fields on asses, mules, horses, or camels. It is threshed by the nauraj or mauraj (Heb. mōraj), and winnowed, and stored in earthen, barrel-shaped receptacles or oblong bins in the houses (2 S 4<sup>8</sup>), or in pits under the floor (2 S 17<sup>19</sup>), or in store-houses (2 Ch 32<sup>28</sup>). It is now often stored in underground chambers, with domed roofs, at the top of which is an opening to introduce the corn and remove it. These chambers, contrary to what might be expected, are dry and free from vermin. They are sometimes excavated in the rock, at other times in a sort of soft marl called huw-wārah.

The corn is liable to mildew, ἡτ' ὑεράκων (the equivalent of the Arab. yerakón, which means jaundice), and blasting, ἡτ' ὑεράκων (1 K 8<sup>27</sup>), caused by the hot and withering east wind (Hos 13<sup>15</sup>, Jon 4<sup>8</sup>). When the corn was burned by carelessness, restitution was enjoined (Ex 22<sup>6</sup>). Also if the corn land was made ἡτ' ὑεράκων locks other than those of the owl (22<sup>5</sup>).

Palestine exported corn in Solomon's time (2 Ch 21<sup>10, 15</sup>) and in Ezekiel's (Ezk 27<sup>17</sup>). Even now it exports some corn, although its imports of grain exceed its exports. See further under BARLEY, WHEAT, etc. G. E. POST.

CORNELIUS (Κορνήλιος).—A centurion in the garrison of Caesarea (Ac 10<sup>1</sup>). He was probably an Italian, the Italian Cohort (cf. Blass ad loc.), being so named to distinguish it from companies locally enrolled, while his name is pure Roman, having been borne by the Scipios and Sulla. In Ac 10 he flits across the line of apostolic history, being brought, in consequence of a series of mutually supplementary visions, into contact with St. Peter, and admitted by baptism into the Church. According to a later tradition he founded a church at Caesarea, while another legend makes him bishop of Scamandros. The baptism of C. has generally been regarded as the first step in the admission of the uncircumcised into the Church; but before this can be definitely maintained, we should have to assume that the events related in Ac 8-11 are narrated chronologically. The eunuch's baptism by Philip (8<sup>38</sup>), that of C. by St. Peter (10<sup>1</sup>), and the admission of the Greeks (RV) at Antioch (11<sup>20</sup>), may all have occurred coincidentally, or in any order; the events are dovetailed into each other without any necessary implication of historical sequence. There is no evidence that the eunuch was circumcised, though he was a proselyte of the wider class (probably of the ἡτ' ὑεράκων); while the Greeks at Antioch may also have belonged to this class. But C., too, is described as φοβούμενος τὸν θεόν, the regular phrase in Ac for such proselytes (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 43), though Renan (The Apostles, ch. xi.) says he was not a proselyte in any degree whatever. Now, if C. was a proselyte, the question regarding the admission of the uncircumcised Gentile still remained, since the apostles could hardly wish to make the door of the Church narrower than that of the Synagogue. Some have therefore held that St. Peter simply gave C. a baptism in the Church similar to that which he had received in the Synagogue (see Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i. 103 f.); others, that his case was passed as an exceptional one (Ramsay). St. Peter, however, according to Ac 11<sup>30</sup>, uses it as a true precedent, though, had it been accepted as such, what was the purpose of the subsequent Council at Jerusalem (Ac 15)? Arguing from this, and from the fact that St. Peter was blamed, not for admitting the Gentile, but for eating with them, Pfeiderer (Urchristentum, Apostelgeschichte) holds that the case of C. is given to show the cessation of ceremonial exclusiveness from the Jewish standpoint. But if so, it is strange to find St. Peter later on (Gal 2<sup>12</sup>) hesitating about this very point. On the whole, it is a priori unlikely that a terse writer like St. Luke would have bestowed such pains upon anything but a matter of prime importance, which the relaxing of Jewish exclusiveness could hardly have appeared to him—a Gentile—to be. We may, therefore, most safely infer that he looked on the baptism of C. as an all-important step in the admission of the Gentiles, while a long advance still remained to be made. A. GRIEVE.

CORNER.—See AGRICULTURE.

CORNER-STONE (in Job 38<sup>6</sup> קִרְיָת הַכֹּנֶס, κίριος γωνίας, in Jer 51 (Gr. 28) קִרְיָת הַכֹּנֶס, κίριος ἐκς γωνίας).—The corner-stones of important buildings, such as palaces or temples, were sometimes of an exceedingly ornate and costly description, and of extraordinary dimensions. With the view of giving greater strength to the two walls which they connected, they were generally arranged lengthways and endways alternately, or a corner-stone might be inserted at the corner (Isaiah, κίριος γωνίας, ii. 254).

There are two passages in the OT where corner-stones are spoken of, which are of importance because of the use made of them in the NT. These are Is 28<sup>16</sup> 'Behold I lay in Zion,' etc., and Ps 118<sup>22</sup> 'The stone which the builders rejected,' etc. The first is quoted in 1 P 2<sup>6</sup> and underlies Eph 2<sup>20</sup>, in both of which κίριος ἀκρογωνιαίος represents קִרְיָת הַכֹּנֶס of Is 28<sup>16</sup>. (On the unusual construction of the latter verse see Davidson's Heb. Syntax, p. 37.) The second is quoted in Mt 21<sup>42</sup>, Mk 12<sup>30</sup>, Lk 20<sup>17</sup>, Ac 4<sup>11</sup>, and 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>. Here instead of קִרְיָת הַכֹּנֶס we find קִרְיָת הַכֹּנֶס, κεφαλὴ γωνίας, 'head of the corner.' In קִרְיָת הַכֹּנֶס a different word occurs, קִרְיָת (Syr. ܩܪܝܬܐ), which in Zec 9<sup>15</sup> is applied to the corners of the altar. It is doubtful whether in the above psalm corner-stones (accepted by both AV and RV) is the correct rendering. The Sept. has simply κεκαλλωπισμέναι, Aq. ὡς ἐπιγώνια, Symm. ὡς γωνίαι κεκοσμημέναι, Vulg. quasi anguli. Gesenius understands the word of 'corner-columns beautifully carved,' or of Caryatides. Kautzsch, who in all the other OT passages offers the rendering Eckstein, has here Ecksäulen. In all the NT κίριος γωνίας Weizsäcker gives Eckstein, rightly κίριος γωνίας corner-stone' and 'head of the corner' as synonymous expressions.

As to Is 28<sup>16</sup>, Driver (Isaiah, p. 52) finds in the prophet's allusion to the huge and costly corner-stones of the temple (1 K 5<sup>17</sup>), the prominent thought of the passage being that of the permanent element in Zion (the theocracy or the Davidic dynasty). It is easy to understand St. Peter's application of the words. (Cf. Delitzsch, Isaiah, new ed. vol. ii. p. 9.) Similarly, the expressions used of Israel in Ps 118<sup>22</sup> were naturally transferred to Christ. The figure of κίριος γωνίας is well explained by Grimm (Clavis, s. ἀκρογωνιαίος). As the corner-stone is inserted at the angle of a building, holding two walls together and supporting the super-structure, so Christ unites Jew and Gentile, and is the support of the Church. The additional thought of 1 P 2<sup>6</sup> can be without violence derived from the same figure. As one recklessly turning the corner of a building may stumble over the corner-stone, so, while some find in Christ their support, others stumble at Him and perish. (Cf. Alford and Ellicott on Eph 2<sup>20</sup>.) For various superstitions and religious rites connected with the corner-stone, comp. Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, 22, 51, 55, and see FOUNDATION.

CORNET.—See MUSIC.

CORONATION. Κορωνήσις Mac 4<sup>21</sup> 'the coronation of king Ptolemy 1st,' AVm 'enthronizing' (Rawlinson in Speaker's Com. 'enthronization'), RV 'enthronement.'

The Greek τὴν πρωτοκρίσιον is found only here, and its meaning is doubtful. It has been identified, as by Bissell in loc., with πρωτοκρίσιον, the 'chief seat' (AV 'highest room') at a feast, which occurs Mt 23<sup>6</sup>, Mk 12<sup>39</sup>, Lk 20<sup>46</sup>, and Lk 14<sup>7</sup>, elsewhere only in eccles. writers. But cod. A (fol<sup>d</sup> by Swete) has πρωτοκρίσιον in our passage, 'a first assembly,' whence Luther's ersten Reichstag. J. HASTINGS.

CORPSE, from Lat. corpus, is in earliest Eng. a body, living* or dead, and is so found as late as 1707. Hence 'dead corpses,' 2 K 19<sup>35</sup> = Is 37<sup>36</sup>, as in Fuller, Holy War, iv. 27, 'the cruditie of a dead corpse.' RV retains 'dead corpses' because of the Heb. (מֵתִים מְרֵזִים) of which it is a literal translation. J. HASTINGS.

CORRECT, CORRECTION.—Both vb. and subst. are used in the (nearly) obsol. sense of chastisement, and it is doubtful if in any other. Thus Jer 10<sup>24</sup> 'O LORD, correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing'; and Sir 16<sup>12</sup> 'As his mercy is great, so is his correction also' (ἐλεγχος). In Job 37<sup>13</sup> the Heb. is 'a rod' (טַבַּח) as it is tr<sup>d</sup> in 21<sup>9</sup>. The Heb., however, is generally מַשְׁכָּר māshkar (or vb. מָשַׁךְ), a word very characteristic of Pr, in AV most freq. tr<sup>d</sup> 'instruction,' but RV prefers 'correction,' though not consistently. In He 12<sup>12</sup> παίδευσις is tr<sup>d</sup> by a verb, AV 'which corrected us,' RV 'to chasten us' (as the vb. παίδεω is tr<sup>d</sup> in v.<sup>10</sup>); but the same word is rendered in Ro 2<sup>20</sup> AV 'an instructor,' RV 'a corrector.' In 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> Scripture is said to be profitable for 'correction.' The Eng. word prob. means 'chastisement' (if not 'chastisement,' Wyclif has 'to correct,' and this is prob. the meaning of the Gr. ἐπιτιμία, which occurs only here in NT, though in the classics it is common for 'amendment.' J. HASTINGS.

CORRUPT.—In older English 'corrupt' (and its derivatives) had the meaning of destroy, consume, and in that sense, not in the sense of taint, it is most freq. in AV. Thus Mt 6<sup>19</sup> 'where moth and rust doth corrupt' (ἀφαιλεῖ, 'causes to disappear,' RV 'doth consume'); Lk 12<sup>33</sup> 'neither moth corrupteth' (διαφθείρει, RV 'destroyeth'); Ja 5<sup>2</sup> 'Your riches are corrupted' (σέσημε). Corrupter: Is 1<sup>4</sup> 'children that are corrupters' (RV 'that deal corruptly'), but the Heb. (בְּנֵי מְרִיבִים) means 'sons that deal or act corruptly.' Corrupt as participial adj.: Job 17<sup>1</sup> 'my soul is corrupt' (RV 'my soul is consumed'); 1 Cor 15<sup>1</sup> 'c. acc. to the deceitful lusts' (ἐκ τῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν—'morally decaying, on the way to final ruin—Moralic'). Corruptible: Wis 19<sup>21</sup> 'the flesh of c. living things' (ἐκφθάρων ζώων); Ro 12<sup>3</sup> 'c. man,' i.e. liable to decay, mortal (φθαρτός); 1 Co 9<sup>25</sup> 'a c. crown,' referring to the garland of bay leaves with which the victors in the games were crowned, and which soon went to decay. Corruption: Ps 16<sup>10</sup> 'Neither wilt thou suffer the righteous to be corrupted' (RVm 'corruptly' the Heb. LXX, whence Ac 2<sup>7</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>); Ro 8<sup>21</sup> 'the bondage of c.' (δουλεία τῆς φθορᾶς, 'the state of subjection or thralldom to dissolution and decay'—Sanday-Headlam, in loc.

There is an old meaning of 'corrupt'—'adulterate,' of which Our Lady Doth Say (1577) has an example: 'Adulterate c. 8, & c. 15, & c. 16, & c. 17, & c. 18, & c. 19, & c. 20, & c. 21, & c. 22, & c. 2nd cent. it was a good deal under the influence of Rhodes, and like it a staunch ally of Rome. It is uncertain whether C. was incorporated in the Rom. province Asia in B.C. 129 along with the rest of Caria (which see); it had always the dignity of a free city (see CHIOS) as a reward for its faithful alliance; and this perhaps implied a position of approximate autonomy until the time of Augustus, when C. became definitely a part of the province (after the death or deposition of the tyrant Nicias). It suffered from earthquakes in B.C. 6, under Pius (A.D. 138-161), and in A.D. 554. Ant. i. p. 98, gives a vivid description of the latter. There is a famous plane tree of great size and age in the square of the modern city, declared by tradition to be over 2000 years old.

From its Syrian and Alexandrian trading connexion, C. was one of the great Jewish centres in the Aegean. In B.C. 139-138 the Romans wrote to its government in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>; see CARIA). The position of C. naturally made it one of the great banking and financial centres of the E. commercial world; and the treasure of Cleopatra, which Mithridates seized in B.C. 87, is thought by Rayet to have been deposited with the Jewish bankers of C., as certainly were the 800 talents (£192,000) belonging to Jews of Asia Minor, which Mithridates also seized there (Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2). In B.C. 49, C. Fannius, governor of the province Asia, wrote to the Coans urging them to observe the decree of the Rom. Senate,* and provide for the safe passage of Jewish pilgrims through C. (which lay on their route) to Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 15). The poet Meleager, who lived in C. in that century, complains that his mistress deserted him for a Jewish lover (Ep. 83, Anthol. Gr. v. 160). Herod the Great was a benefactor of the Coans; and the inscription of a statue to his son Herod the Tetrarch has been found at Cos.

COSMOGONY.—I. Two cosmogonies or narratives of creation confront us in the opening chapters of the Bible. The first, contained in the first chapter of the Book of Genesis, is a part of the document P, belonging to the early post-exilic period; while the second, contained in Gn 2<sup>4b-7</sup>, forms the introduction to the Jahwistic document (J), redacted in the pre-exilic period, and therefore earlier than the first.

(A) THE FIRST CREATION NARRATIVE.—The writer† of the opening chapter of the Book of Genesis (Gn 1<sup>1-24b</sup>) set before himself the task of giving a comprehensive survey of the origins of Israel's history. 'It was his purpose to show that the theocracy which became historically realized in Israel as hierocracy was the end and aim of the creation of the world' (Holzinger). To his consciousness Israel and Israel's sacerdotal institutions stand central to the great movement of history, and he consistently works out this grandiose conception to its ultimate origins. Accordingly, he unfolds the narrative in successive gradations, the scope of which narrows from the universal to the particular as it passes from heaven and earth to Adam, from Adam to Noah, from Noah to Abraham, and, lastly, from Abraham to Israel and his descendants. In this section we find an enumeration of 'generations.' First we have the Tôlêdôth of the universe (heaven and earth) of which God is the Creator, then of man (Adam), then of Noah, then of Abraham. We are here concerned only with the first of the series, which deals with the pre-human stages in the drama of the world.

The following is a brief summary of the First Creation Story. The week of seven days forms a calendar into which the different successive stages of the work of creation are divided. The creation of man forms the climax and conclusion of the work on the sixth day, while the close of the narrative describes the seventh or day of rest, when J<sup>1</sup> ceased from His creation-work.

First day (Gn 1<sup>1-5</sup>). Light created amid the waste and void of Division of day and night

Waters swarm with living creatures—fish, fowls, monsters of the deep, reptiles and birds created.
Second day (vv 6-11). Creation of land animals—cattle, reptiles, wild beasts. Man fashioned in divine image and placed in the Garden of Eden.

(B) THE SECOND CREATION NARRATIVE is the Jahwistic account contained in Gn 2<sup>4b-7</sup>, and follows immediately upon the preceding. It belongs to an earlier document, composed during the national period of Hebrew life, before the became merged in an ecclesiastical polity, and at a time when the traditions of patriarchal story, which clustered around certain sacred spots, were still vivid. The conceptions were then simple and concrete. The conceptions of God were strongly anthropomorphic. The interests of the writer are national and human. Not a priestly system, but a people, is the centre of his universe. Moreover, his thought moves along the lines of prophetic rather than priestly ideas. Accordingly, the creation of man plays a much more important part in the Jahwistic cosmogony. We hear nothing of moon and stars to regulate festival seasons, but of plants and animals. Nor is man's position made so distinct from that of animated nature around him (cf. Wellhausen, Proleg. p. 323).

It is exceedingly doubtful whether we have the Jahwistic cosmogony complete, and the abrupt introduction to v. 5 suggests that something between vv. 4 and 5 has been omitted by the redactor, and perhaps also between 6 and 7, either because it repeated or because it was inconsistent with the preceding creation narrative. The succession of circumstantial clauses in vv. 5 and 6 certainly presents an interesting parallel to Gn 1<sup>2</sup>. But what we actually possess of the Jahwistic cosmogony in the biblical record is in striking contrast to the work of P. Vv. 5 and 6 in external form bear a certain resemblance to the 'New Babylonian version of the creation story,' discovered by Pinches and published in JRAS vol. xxi. (1891) p. 393 ff.

'The sacred house of the gods had not been erected in the Holy Place,
No reed had yet budded, no tree had been formed,' etc.

The dryness of the earth before the growth of plants, the mention of the ascending mist, the creation of man, and the description of Paradise in which man was placed, as well as the creation of woman, of which a special account is given in 2<sup>24a</sup>, stand in remarkable contrast to the preceding post-exilic cosmogony. In language we specially note the use of  $\text{אֶרֶץ}$  (or  $\text{אֶרֶץ}$ ) in place of  $\text{אֶרֶץ}$  in Gn 1. (See Dillmann's commentary for a complete list of divergencies in style.)

II. We shall now proceed to examine in greater detail the first creation account. The narrative in Gn 1<sup>1-24</sup> opens with a reference to a pre-existent dark chaos (tōhu wabōhu). 'In the beginning, when God created the heavens and the earth—now the earth was waste and void, and darkness was over the watery abyss (tēhōm), and the breath of God was brooding over the waters—then God said: Let there be light.' This rendering, which is adopted by Ewald, Dillmann, and Schrader (following Rashi), regards v.<sup>2</sup> as a circumstantial or parenthetical clause. This yields the best construction as well as meaning, and is parallel to the opening of the Jahwistic creation account 2<sup>4b-5,6</sup>, and also of the Bab. creation tablet to be presently cited. All these are curiously similar in the form of the opening, which consists of a series of temporal clauses.

How long the pre-existing waste and emptiness of chaos existed, and how long the darkness prevailed over the primal waters before the quickening spirit or breath of God brooded over its surface, we do not know. The remarkable phrase in the first  $\text{וְהָרוּחַ שֶׁלֹּהֵם}$  'the spirit (or breath) of God was brooding over the waters,' is undoubtedly intended to indicate the ultimate origin of the creative influences that operated during creation as grounded in the divine spiritual activity. That the form, however, in which this conception is conveyed was suggested by ancient Semitic cosmogonies, is a fact which we shall subsequently have occasion to confirm.

The immediate cause of light, in the mind of the writer, is clearly indicated as the divine word which went forth as a fiat, and it is this divine word regarded as an agent that ushers in each succeeding act in the divine drama of creation. The creation of light in itself involves a distinction between light and darkness; but the division between light and darkness in v.<sup>4</sup> implies that this was a division, not in space but in time, as the context immediately shows: 'and God called the light day, and the darkness he called night.' It was therefore through the creation of light that the first creation-day was constituted. What, then, constituted the night and what the daytime? Was it the primal darkness of chaos that constituted the night, to which day succeeded? If so, we might compare the conception of the first day and of the succeeding ones to the ecclesiastical day of Judaism, which begins with the darkness after sunset and continues till the sunset which inaugurates the following day. Some colour is given to this view by the specification of evening before the morning in the concluding formula in describing each stage of creation: 'and there was evening and there was morning. . . . But the difficulties which stand in the way of accepting this view have been clearly set forth in Dillmann's Commentary. He emphasizes the fact that the darkness of chaos lay entirely outside the reckoning of day and night [properly, we might add, outside the actual work of divine creation here recorded]. Evening first arises after light has been created. In fact, the word from its very etymology (ereb, derived from the root  $\text{עָרַב}$ , in Assyrian eribu, 'enter,' 'passunder'\*) implies that 'day' had preceded. Moreover, the fact that we are reading a post-exilic narrative in which the months of the calendar were regulated by the Bab. system, which reckoned from Nisan (a name of Bab. origin), would lead us to the supposition that the Bab. tradition would also affect the reckoning of the day in the creation account. Now, on the testimony of Pliny (HN ii. 79, cited by Del.)

the Babylonians reckoned the day from sunrise to sunrise. We may therefore infer that the creation-day was also reckoned from sunrise to sunrise, according to the tradition of the Jewish civil day.

Vv.<sup>6-8</sup> portray the second day's creation-work, viz. the separation of the upper from the lower waters by the formation of a heavenly firmament (Heb. rāḥiā') which divides them. The Hebrew word  $\text{רָמַח}$  properly signifies something beaten or hammered out,\* fairly represented by LXX, Aq., Symm. σπερέωμα, Vulg. firmamentum. That the ancient Greeks conceived of this vault as consisting of burnished metal is shown by the epitaph οὐρηρος (Od. xv. 329) and χάλκεος (Il. xvii. 425; Pindar, Pyth. x. 42; Nem. vi. 5) occurring in their early literature. And these conceptions have their parallels in the language of the OT. Numerous passages may be cited to prove that the Heb. Semite regarded the sky as a solid vault or arched dome. In Job 37<sup>18</sup> it is compared to a firm molten mirror, the hue of which in Ex 24<sup>10</sup> is described as resembling  $\text{אֲבַרְבָּרִית}$ , while from Am 9<sup>6</sup>, Job 26<sup>10-11</sup>, Pr 8<sup>27-28</sup> we have additional details that this solid compacted vault or arched dome was supported on the loftiest mountains as pillars (Job 26<sup>11</sup>). It was also provided with windows and gates (Gn 7<sup>11</sup> 28<sup>17</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>2-19</sup>, Ps 78<sup>23</sup>). Above this solid rāḥiā' flowed the upper or heavenly waters (v.<sup>7</sup>), which descended in rain through these openings (Ps 104<sup>3</sup> 148<sup>4</sup>, 2 K 7<sup>19</sup>). Dillmann, from whose clear exposition of these conceptions we have borrowed, compares also the language of the Vedas and of the Avesta, where we likewise meet with this conception of an upper or heavenly sea. Similarly, the ancient Egyptians believed that the sun-god Ra daily traverses the celestial waters in his boat. The Assyrians and Babylonians also had their conceptions of a deep which rolled over the firmament of heaven. These we shall illustrate in some measure from their creation-epic. Cf. Sayce, Hib. Lect. p. 374; Jensen, Cosmol. der Bab. p. 254.

Vv.<sup>9-13</sup> portray the work of the third creative day, which involves two separate acts: (1) the creation of dry land and the separation of the waters into seas; (2) the creation of plants. According to the writer of 2 P 3<sup>5</sup> land was created from water by divine command. This is not distinctly stated in the biblical narrative, which simply affirms that the waters were gathered to one place, and that the land thereby appeared. But from subsequent considerations and the parallels from ancient religions which will be cited, it will appear that water was undoubtedly regarded as the primitive element out of which land, including land, emerged, and there can be no question that this conception underlies the first creation narrative, though it is not clearly expressed.

Vv.<sup>14-19</sup> describe the work of the fourth day, the creation of heavenly bodies. Light in a diffused form ( $\text{אֵר}$ ) had been summoned into existence by God's first creative fiat. How it emerged we are not told, but are left to infer that it was the immediate outflow of divine energy. The heavenly bodies are naturally regarded purely from the terrestrial standpoint. To the naive conceptions of antiquity it was necessary that the creation of a firmament should have preceded that of the luminaries. For these luminaries were placed on or attached to the firmament or solid vault, and their courses prescribed thereon. It should be

\* From the Hebrew root  $\text{רָמַח}$  'beat' or 'stamp' (hence extend, or stretch out) we have an interesting derivative  $\text{מִרְמָק}$  preserved in the Phoen. inscriptions meaning plate or dish. Cf. CIS, Pars Prima, Tom. i. p. 107, No 90—

We can only infer from the context what the lost remainder of this tablet contained. Probably, it described how the gods of the depth came into being, and possibly Then must have followed the rebellion of the lower deities, arrayed under deities.

that they 'plan evil' against the gods. Gunkel thinks that the creation of light was the cause of their insurrection, but of this we have not sufficient evidence. The legible portion of the tablet then proceeds to describe the conflict between Tiamat and the gods. In their war against Tiamat and the deities ranged under her leadership, the gods are commanded by Anshar, father of Anu. He is assisted by Enlil, Enki, and Ea, but also by Ea and his son Marduk. Anu brings up the rear. Anshar at first sends Anu and then Ea to conduct the fight. When the gods are in the greatest terror, Marduk undertakes the struggle with Tiamat. He is armed with a net, bow, javelin, and apparently a trident (mitru), and so advances to the conflict. The goddess of the deep is skillfully caught by Marduk in a net, a hurricane is driven into her open throat, and he smites her body with his javelin. Her allies flee, but are overtaken, and their weapons broken.

two parts, 'like that of a' . . . and covered' the heaven.* Bars are placed, and sentinels, so that the waters may not stream through. The arch of heaven is placed opposite the primal waters. After this Marduk created the heavenly bodies; but the fifth tablet of the creation epic on which this is described is very obscure. The first few lines may be rendered—

He erected the station for the great gods

Stars like

$\Pi_1$  ... by three stars.

On another doubtful tablet we read that he created three wild beasts of the field, and creator of the Bab. creation poem is recorded on a tablet, which contains a hymn to the glory of Marduk. 'God of pure life, God of kindly breath, Lord of hearing and grace, creator of fullness, maker of abundance, God of the pure crown, raiser of the dead. . . . May one rejoice over the Lord of Gods, Marduk, cause one's land to abound, himself enjoy peace. Firm abideth His word, His command changeth not. No god hath caused the utterance of His mouth to fail.'

It is impossible to study the features of this epic without noting remarkable parallels to the first biblical cosmogony. What, then, is the actual relation which subsists between them? If the creation account in Gn 1 and this Bab. epic were the only points of contact between Israel and Babylonia, it might be possible to explain the Bab. myth as a development from the simpler and purer tradition contained in the Bible. But such an explanation is untenable in view of the established results—(1) Of a critical examination of the OT literature, which cannot allow an earlier date for the document P* than the period of the Exile. (2) Of Assyriology. The discovery of the Tel el-Amarna tablets in 1887, and of a cuneiform tablet at Lachish belonging to the same period as those of Tel el-Amarna, renders it absolutely certain that Bab. influence widely prevailed in Palestine about B.C. 1500–1400. (3) We have many other remarkable parallels, viz. in the Flood story and other elements in the pre-exilic Jahwistic document, (including the account of Paradise and the story of the Fall) between the Scripture records and those of the cuneiform tablets. All this renders it extremely probable that the biblical form in which these narrations have been preserved, with their unquestionably Palestinian colouring, is the result of many centuries of growth on Palestinian soil.

* How widespread this conception was of a primeval rending asunder of sky and earth into an upper and lower half may be gathered from the New Zealand Maori myth quoted in Tylor, Prim. Culture, i. 322 *. This feature, we are told, is 'a far-spread Polynesian legend.'

(cf. Schrader, COT i. pp. 43 ff., 52-55). This problem of the relation of the Bab. epic to Gn 1 has recently been made the subject of a searching investigation by Gunkel, Schöpf. u. Chaos,* from which quotation has already been made. This writer does full justice to the glaring contrasts. In the Bab. epic we have wild, grotesque, tumultuous mythology expressed in poetic form. In the biblical account we have serene majestic calm and sober prose. In the one, the gods rise into being in the course of the drama. In the other, God pre-exists and remains from the first the creative source whose command summons each new order of created things into existence.

Yet the parallels are as remarkable as the contrasts. For (1) in both the world at the beginning consists of water and darkness. (2) The Têhôm of the 2nd verse is the Babylonian Tiāmtu (Tiāmat). (3) God divides the primal waters by means of the firmament into two parts. This feature corresponds to the episode in the 4th tablet of the creation epic (lines 137ff. in Fried. Delitzsch's version)—

'He cleft her (Tiamat) like a fish . . . in two halves,
From the one half he made and covered the heaven :
He drew a barrier, placed sentinels,
Commanded them not to let its waters through.'

(4) In Gn 1 light arises before the creation of the heavenly bodies. Also in the Bab. myth we may suppose that ' . . . before the coming of Marduk the . . . gods, since light belongs to the . . . upper gods.' (5) The creation of sun, moon, and stars on the fourth day may be placed parallel with the creation of the heavenly bodies by Marduk, recorded in the 5th creation tablet, special mention being made of the moon-god (Nannaru) as ruler of the night (lines 12ff. in Fried. Delitzsch's ed.). (6) God beholds all, and calls it good. Compare the hymn of praise to Marduk (already quoted) at the conclusion of the Bab. epic. (7) Creation of the beasts of the field, wild animals, and creeping things is also found on a fragment (copied in cuneiform by Delitzsch, Assyr. Lesest.<sup>3</sup>), but it is not certain whether it belongs to the same Creation Epic Series above quoted. (8) Lastly, the seventh day, or Sabbath of divine rest, is essentially of Bab. origin. See Schrader, COT i. p. 18 ff.; Sayce, Expos. Times, March 1896, p. 264.

It has been forcibly argued by Gunkel that the Bab. creation myth, involving a conflict between Tiamat, the dragon of chaotic darkness, and Marduk, the god of light and order, had influenced Israel long before the Exile period. It is true that passages like Is 51<sup>9ff.</sup> (where Rahab the dragon is a reminiscence of Tiamat) belong to the Exile period, and Cheyne thinks 'there is sufficient evidence that there was a great revival of the mythologic spirit among the Jews in the Bab. and Pers. periods, and it is very possible that the old myths assumed more definite forms through the direct and indirect influence of Babylonia.'† On the other hand, it must be remembered that Jer 4<sup>23-26</sup> (cf. 5<sup>22</sup>) is a genuine product of the 7th cent. (cf. Cornill's ed. in SBOT), and this passage reflects the same tradition of J's conception of watery chaos (an idea which we also meet in Nah 1<sup>4</sup>), while the reference in Am 9<sup>8</sup> to the serpent at the bottom of the ocean belongs to the 8th cent., and the brazen sea of Solomon's temple (1 K 7<sup>23-25</sup>), with its twelve supporting oxen, carries us back to the 10th. This last was evidently based on the apsi or ocean-abode of the temples of Marduk.† (Cf. Schrader, KTB iii. 1, pp. 13, 143, and footnotes.)

These facts, as well as the features in the Jahwistic narrative above referred to, justify us in seeking a much earlier period than the Exile for the original adoption by primitive Israel of the elements of Bab. tradition. The most probable theory is that these influences found their way into Palestine, together with certain features of Bab. civilization including measures of weight and money) some time before B.C. 1450 (the age of the Tel el-Amarna inscr.), and along this path passed ultimately into the possession of ancient Israel, and became assimilated into their stock of intellectual possessions. It then became, in the course of centuries, gradually modified and stripped of its mythological features. In Gn 1<sup>1</sup> we have it in the purified Judaic form. There is a complete obliteration of the elements of the genesis of the gods, the anomic struggle between Tiamat and Marduk, which preceded the creative process in the Bab. myth. On the other hand, it contains certain features which reveal a primitive Bab. type. Driver (Proc. Soc. Bib. Arch., July 29, 1896) accurately states the true relation of the biblical to the Bab. cosmogony when he says: 'The narrative of Gn 1 comes at the end of a long process of gradual elimination of heathen elements, and is a purification to the purer teachings of Israel, carried on under the spiritual influences of the religion of Israel.'

V. According to the biblical narrative, the world was created by a divine command, and every new stage in the creative process is introduced by the formula 'God said.' Another noteworthy feature to which attention has already been called, is the phrase 'let us make man' (v. 6), wherein we have a point of contact with the conception of subordinate angelic powers ('sons of God'), who co-operated with God in the work of creation (Job 38<sup>4-7</sup>). Here we observe the germ of that belief in intermediate agencies between God and the universe which was destined in later times to become a most important factor in Jewish theology. This conception became developed into the 'Wisdom' which was with God in the beginning, the creation of the cosmos, and the God who established the heavens (Pr 8<sup>22-31</sup>, cf. 3<sup>19, 20</sup>). This 'third cosmogony,' as Cheyne not inaptly calls it,<sup>2</sup> is the product of that growing belief in the transcendent greatness of God which began with Amos, and received a great impulse from the sublime teachings of the Deutero-Isaiah (cf. esp. Is 40). The influence of Greek philosophy—more particularly of Platonism—made itself felt in Judaism, and in proportion as God came to be regarded as transcendent and absolute, a Logos doctrine became a necessary factor of thought. Philo became the representative in Judaism of the Alexandrine philosophy. On one side, from eternity we have God as the absolutely active principle; on the other, matter formless and without qualities, the principle of absolute passivity. God produces first the world of ideas, Logos or kósmos νοητός. This Logos becomes the mediating cause, between the absolute and transcendent Deity and the passive formless matter, in the generation of the world. This is not the place to indicate the transition from this position to that occupied by the writer of the Ep. to the Hebrews or the Logos doctrine of the Fourth Gospel, for this subject belongs to Christology.

In Judaic theology the place of the Logos in the creation of the world is partly occupied by the doctrine of the pre-existent emanation of the Tórah from God, partly by Memra. This principle of the Tórah as a mediating element or occasion in the creation of the world is expressed in Bérèshith Rabba 1, for the Tórah cannot be realized without the creation of man. From the same treatise (c. 9) we learn that a curious inference was drawn from the words, 'God saw all that he had made, and behold it was very good' (Gn 1<sup>31</sup>), viz. that God had previously created worlds, and they did not please Him, and he destroyed them. According to Shemoth Rabba, c. 30, these worlds were the primal Tóhu Wabóhu until the present world was created. Moreover, there are undoubted traces in the Talmud of the influence of the old Bab. traditions. For later Jewish writers held that primal matter exercised certain powers of resistance until God's creative energy coerced them by the limitations it imposed. They believed in the existence of primeval monstrous animal forms, and in a female Leviathan (cf. Tidmat), who was slaughtered in order to prevent the increase of the monstrous brood.

The doctrine respecting the Heavens and the Earth, taught in later Judaism, also possesses its points of contact with ancient Babylonian tradition though founded upon biblical record. To one of these we shall refer presently. Meanwhile it may be observed that while Scripture regards the universe as one, having the earth as its centre, later Judaism did not adhere to this unity. We read of the upper world and the under world, of God's world and man's world. In the Targ. Jerus. 1, Gn 18<sup>30</sup> Abraham calls J<sup>h</sup> 'Lord of all worlds.' Aboda Zara 3<sup>r</sup> reckons 18,000 worlds.

But the most remarkable cosmic doctrine is that of the Seven Heavens. Jewish Rabbis were not quite agreed as to this number. According to Rabbi Jehuda there were only two, but according to the common doctrine there were seven. R. H. Charles has recently contributed two exceedingly instructive papers on this subject to the Expos Times (Nov. and Dec. 1895), in which he draws special attention to the Bab. conception of the sevenfold division of the Lower World. (On this point interesting information may be obtained from Jensen's Die Babylonier Bab. p. 232 ff.) Readers of the Bab. literature, the mythic romance (in the Gilgamesh [Izdubar] series), called the 'Descent of Ishtar to Hades,' will remember that she was obliged to pass through seven gateways in order to reach the interior of the infernal city. Though the inscriptions do not expressly state that the heavens were so divided, it is legitimate to surmise either that the Babylonians themselves conceived of a similar division of the heavens, or that this correlative became subsequently developed. The former is more probable, for not only do we find the doctrine of the Seven Heavens among the Jews, but also among the Parsees. We find the same conception in the recently discovered Slavonic Enoch (translated by Morhill), and also in other apocalyptic literature, as the 'Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs.' This later cosmic conception, which grew up in connexion with the doctrine of God's absolute transcendence, is of some importance in its bearing upon such passages as 2 Co 12<sup>2, 3</sup>, He 4<sup>10, 14</sup>. In reference to the difficult passage Eph 6<sup>12</sup>, Charles most usefully cites from Slavonic Enoch 29<sup>4, 5</sup>. (Further information respecting the Jewish doctrine may be found in Weber, System der Altsynag. Paläst. Theol. p. 197 ff.)

VI. We have now concluded our task of expounding the biblical conceptions respecting cosmogony and the cosmos. It is manifestly beyond the true scope of this article to deal with the cosmogonies of Egypt, Persia, and India, though these also exhibit interesting parallels with the Scripture narrative. Undoubtedly there were points of historic contact, and these of no little importance, between Egypt and ancient Israel, but the course of recent investigation has not strengthened the impression that Egypt exercised any deep or lasting influence on Hebrew cosmogony. It is to Babylonia, the land of the highest and most ancient Sem. culture, we must look for the most fruitful clues to ancient Heb. thought and life.—Nor is it necessary to refer to Persian cosmogonies, for Pers. influence entered into the sphere of Jewish life too late to affect the cosmogonic conceptions of Genesis. It may here be remarked that no chaos exists in the Persian cosmogony as it is presented in the Bundeshesh. A separation is made between the creation of the present world and of the other world. Moreover, in the former we find a distinct creation by the Good and by the Evil deity. But these conceptions have a comparatively late origin. Regarding the creation legends of Egypt, Persia, and India, the reader is referred to Dillmann's introductory remarks to Genesis, ch. i. in his great commentary (6th ed. pp. 5-10), and also to Otto Zöckler's article 'Schöpfung' in Herzog and Plitt, RE, where a comprehensive survey is given of these cosmogonies as well as those of savage races.

Nor have we thought it necessary to describe the various apologetic schemes whereby the statements that are contained in Genesis are brought into supposed harmony with the ascertained results of modern science. A history of these successive attempts, with a succinct classification of them, will be found in the article by Zöckler to which reference has been made. This eminent evangelical scholar and divine concludes his examination of these varied theories with the significant and just remarks: 'The Mosaic account postulates a graduated advance of organic life from plants to animals, and among the latter, from water animals to creeping things and birds, and after that to land animals in the proper sense. But geology regards animals and plants as coming into existence together from the first. These considerations plainly reveal that the first chapter of Genesis is not intended to teach us the elements of geology, but to reveal to us the fundamental ideas of all theology, those ideas being religious in their essence. It is out of place, therefore, to insist on carrying out the parallel between the Bible and geology into every detail. We can only hope to exhibit a concordance of both in their large bearings and main outlines.' A very useful article on the same subject, written in a deeply reverent spirit, will be found in the Lapsitor, Jan. 1886, by Driver ('The Cosmogony of Genesis'), in which the results of geological research are carefully examined and compared with the statements of Scripture.

Probably, the most fatal objection, however, is the creation of the heavenly bodies on the fourth day. The language here clearly shows that in the mind of the writer they had not previously existed. It is obvious, therefore, that day and night were not regarded as standing in any causal connexion with the sun. In fact, the sun is no more regarded as causal than the moon. The sun rules or regulates the day, and the moon regulates the night.

Much as we value the remarkable harmonies that nevertheless exist between science and Scripture, there is clear proof that biblical apologetic is proceeding on false lines when it seeks to construct a biblical narrative into harmony with the results of modern science. The preceding exposition shows that that narrative emerged from a divinely guided history and a divinely moulded process of thought not isolated from the currents of the world of human life around it, but charged with a great mission to garner out of all the efforts of humanity to spell out the awful enigma of the universe, that which was most vital and precious for the good of man, to purify it from all mythologic taint and inform it with the spiritual monotheistic conceptions of Judaism. The supreme value of our biblical cosmogony lies in the fact that it furnishes us with the only key that can solve the dark riddle of life. It sets God at the head of the great complex world-process, and yet closely linked with it, as a personal being, and will that rules victoriously over all that is evil. And as the supreme object of His creative energy, it sets man, fashioned in His divine likeness, to be the ruler of created things. All else is secondary, and it is for scientific investigation to determine the exact details of those intermediate steps in the stupendous ascent whereby God's work advanced along the vistas of past time to the dawn of human existence. But without that clear and sublime attestation at the threshold of the inspired record of the personal source from which all has flowed, and of the unique worth and dignity of man, and his near kinship with that source, surely human life would have been far darker and more hopeless, and its deepest problems would have remained unsolved. Upon this matter, made broad and clear in Genesis, the revelation of the New Covenant of Redemption in Christ Jesus rests. For the mediatorial work of Christ rests on the Fatherhood of the Creator of all things, and on the supreme worth of man, whom Jesus came to save. OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

COTE.—2 Ch 32<sup>28</sup> 'stalls for all manner of beasts, and cotes (1611 'coats' for flocks' (RV 'flocks in folds'). Cf. Milton, Comus, 344—

'Might we but hear

The folded flocks, penned in their wattled cotes ;

which Matthew Arnold borrowed in The Scholar Gipsy—

'Go, shepherd, and untie the wattled cotes.'

The word was orig. used of any small house, like the mod. use of cot (which was the same word in Old Eng. in the neuter, cote being fem.) and cottage (which was perhaps a cote and its appendages—Murray). Thus Langland, Piers Pl. viii. 16—

'Bothe prynces paleyses and pore mennes cotes.'

No doubt the sheep often shared the shepherd's 'cote,' as in the Shep. Calendar, Dec. 77, 78—

'And learned of lighter timber cotes to frame,
Such as might save my sheep and me fro shame.'

In course of time the word was restricted to a slight building for sheltering small animals in, esp. sheep. 'Sheepcote' occurs 1 S 24<sup>6</sup>, 2 S 7<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ch 17<sup>7</sup>.

Cottage is used in the sense of hut in Is 18 (RV 'booth') 24<sup>20</sup> (RV 'hut'), Zeph 2<sup>8</sup> (RVm 'caves'), Sir 29<sup>22</sup> 'a mean cottage' (RV 'a shelter of logs'), much as cote above. J. HASTINGS.

COTTON (כֶּרֶס karpas).—The word karpas (Est 1<sup>6</sup>) is rendered by AV, as also by RV, green, but in the marg. of the latter, cotton. It is certainly either cotton or linen stuff. Karpas is a loan-word. Sansk. karpāsa, 'cotton'; Persian karpas, 'fine linen' (Richardson's Lex.); hence also kapraos and carbasus. Pl. names have been quoted from Arrian and others to prove that it grew and was used for clothing in India. G. E. Post.

COUCH.—See BED. As a verb, 'couch,' which means 'to stoop,' 'to lie down' (or transitively 'to lay down'), and is now used only of beasts, and esp. in the sense of lurking to spring, was formerly used also of persons and things. Thus Shaks. Merry Wives, v. ii. 1: 'Come, come, we'll couch i' the castle-ditch till we see the light of our fairies.' So Dt 33<sup>13</sup> 'the deep that coucheth beneath,' where it is possible, however, as Driver suggests, that the subterranean deep is pictured as a gigantic monster (cf. p. 505 f. above). J. HASTINGS.

COULTER.—'The iron blade fixed in front of the share in a plough; it makes a vertical cut in the soil, which is then sliced horizontally by the share.' The Eng. word occurs 1 S 13<sup>20,21</sup> as tr<sup>n</sup> of Heb. 'eth (אֶת), which is tr<sup>d</sup> 'plowshare,' Is 24 = Mic 4<sup>3</sup>, J1 3<sup>10</sup> [all, but Klost. adds 2 K 6<sup>3</sup> הַמִּשְׁכָּה, taking ng thus for the instrument (=the axe of iron), not as the sign of the accusative]. See AGRICULTURE.

J. HASTINGS.

COUNCIL, COUNSEL.—These words are distinct in origin, council from concilium (con-calere, to call together) 'an assembly'; counsel from consilium (con-sulere, to consult) 'consultation,' 'advice.' And they are now kept distinct in meaning, their meaning nearly the same as the Lat. words from which they come. But from the earliest times they were completely confused in the Eng. lang.; and although efforts were made from the beg. of the 16th cent. to separate them, it took two centuries to effect the separation. In AV of 1611 counsel is once (2 S 17<sup>23</sup>) spelt 'counsel,' elsewhere always 'counsel' (with a cap., Counsel, in Is 11<sup>2</sup>). The plu. is always 'counsels,' except Pr 22<sup>20</sup> 'counsailles.' But council appears in a great variety of forms: Council, Council, Councils, counsell, Counsell, counsel, counsell, Counsell. Subsequent edd. varied these indefinitely, but for the last century or thereby the spelling has been uniformly 'council.'

Council is the tr<sup>n</sup> of—1. קִנְיָה qinyah, Ps 68<sup>27</sup> only, (RVm 'counsell'; see notes in Perc. on Ps 68<sup>27</sup>); 2. βουλή, Mt 12<sup>14</sup>, where it occurs in the AV RV, B, etc. AV and RV 'counsell'; RVm 'counsel'; and 'a deliberating body' (still retained in law as 'counsel for the defence'). 3. Elsewhere συμβουλή, for which see SANHEDRIN.

Counsel.—In OT mostly עֵצָה 'ezah, 'advice,' then (as in Ps 11) 'resolution, bent of will, character,'—Del.; and חֵן, a most interesting word, whose primary meaning is that of 'counsel,'—whereupon the two meanings already mentioned, viz. (1) those who are in confidential communication; and (2) the communication itself, counsel. The most freq. tr<sup>n</sup> in RV is 'secret,' as Ps 25<sup>14</sup> 'the secret of the Lord is for him.' Where AV has 'counsel' RV retains 'him.' RV 'council.' In NT either βουλή (which, as in the tr<sup>n</sup> of 'ezah in LXX, rarely in NT means advice, almost always will), or συμβουλή (which, as in the tr<sup>n</sup> of 'ezah in LXX, rarely in NT means advice, almost always will), or συμβουλή as above.

Counsellor.—This is the only spelling in mod. edd. of AV. It does not, however, occur in AV of 1611, though 'counsellours' is found thrice, Ezr 8<sup>26</sup>, Pr 12<sup>20</sup> 15<sup>22</sup>; there the spelling is always 'counsellor' (or 'Counsellor,' Is 1<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>6</sup>, Dn 6<sup>7</sup>, 1 Es 8<sup>11</sup>). The Oxf. and Camb. Parallel Bibles restore 'counsellor' everywhere except Mk 15<sup>43</sup>, Lk 23<sup>50</sup> (both βουλευτής, used of Joseph of Arimathea as a member of the Sanhedrin, RV 'counsellor') and Ro 11<sup>34</sup> (συμβουλος, the LXX word in Is 40<sup>3</sup>, of which this is a quotation). J. HASTINGS.

COUNTENANCE.—As a subst. frequent, always =face. As a vb. only Ex 23<sup>3</sup> 'Neither shalt thou c. a poor man in his cause,' RV 'favour,' older versions 'esteem.' Cf. Brinsley (1612), 'that the painfull and obedient be . . . countenanced, incouraged, and preferred'; and Shaks. 2 Henry IV. v. i. 41, 'I beseech you, sir, to countenance William Visor of Wincot against Clement Perkes of the hill.'

The Heb. vb. is haddhar, 'honour,' which is used in a bad sense again in Lv 19<sup>15b</sup> 'nor honour the person of the mighty.' Knobel would make Ex 23<sup>3</sup> correspond with Lv 19<sup>15b</sup> by reading לֹא תִהְיֶה 'great,' for לֹא תִהְיֶה 'and a poor man.' But the versions do not support any change (LXX reads καὶ σέβετε), and the statement is parallel to Lv 19<sup>15b</sup> 'thou shalt not respect the person of the poor.' As the Bishops' Bible explains, 'Truth of the matter, and not respect of any person is to be esteemed in judgement.'

J. HASTINGS.

COUNTERFEIT.—Only in Apocr. 1. As adj. Wis 15<sup>9</sup> '[the potter] endeavourereth to do like the workers in brass, and counteth it his glory to make c. things'; Gr. κρίβηλα, things made in imitation of other more valuable things, hence spurious, the mod. meaning of the word. This reference is to earthenware figures made and glazed so as to resemble the precious metals.* 2. As subst. Wis 21<sup>8</sup> 'We are esteemed of him as counterfeits' (εἰς κρίβηλον; Vulg. tamquam nugaces, the only occurrence of nugax in Vulg.); 14<sup>17</sup> 'they took the c. of his visage from far' (τὴν πρόβωθεν ὅψιν ἀνατυπώσαντες, RV 'imagining the likeness from afar'). Here c. is used in the obsol. sense of a representation of any person or thing by painting, sculpture, etc., a likeness, image. Cf. Shaks. Merch. of Venice, III. ii. 115—

'What find I here?
Fair Portia's counterfeit;'

and Holland (1606), Sueton. 39, 'An olde little counterfeit in brasse representing him being a child.' 3. As vb. Sir 38<sup>27</sup> 'They that cut and grave seals . . . give themselves to c. imagery' (ὁμοιωσάμενοι, RV 'to preserve likeness in his portraiture'). Cf. Tindale's Address to the Reader (NT 1525), 'I had no man to counterfet, nether was holpe with englysshe of eny that had interpreted the same.' J. HASTINGS.

COUNTERVAIL.—Est 7<sup>4</sup> 'the enemy could not c. the king's damage' (RV 'the adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage'); and Sir 6<sup>15</sup> 'N., I n. both c. a faithful friend' (RV 'there is no . . . thing can be taken in exchange for a faithful friend'). In Est 7<sup>4</sup> the meaning is 'make an equivalent return for' (Geneva 'recompense'), as Stubbes (1583), Anat. Abus. 63, 'though I be unable with any benefit to countervail your great pains.' In Sir 6<sup>15</sup> c. has the older meaning of 'equal in value'; cf. More, Utopia (Robinson's tr. 1551), 'All the goodes in the worlde are not liable to countervayle man's life.' J. HASTINGS.

COUNTRYMAN.—1. Of the same nation, 2 Co 11<sup>26</sup> 'in perils by mine own countrymen' (ἐκ γένους, Wyclif 'of kyn,' other VSS 'mine own nation'). 2. Of the same tribe, 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup> 'ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen' (τῶν ἰδίων συμφορητῶν, the Jewish inhabitants of Macedonia). The word is only here in eccl. writers; Wyclif, 'lynagis' (= 'lineage,' Rheimis), Tindale 'kynsmen'; Geneva and Bishops' as AV). 3. Of the same city, 2 Es 10<sup>2m</sup> (cives, AV, RV 'neighbours,' RVm 'townsmen'). J. HASTINGS.

COUPLE is now used only of two persons or things having some affinity, or wont to be considered in pairs. But in older Eng. the usage was free, as Steele, Spect. No. 8, 'I shall here communicate to the world a couple of letters.' So in AV, 2 S 13<sup>8</sup> 'make me a c. of cakes.'

J. HASTINGS.

COURAGE ranks as one of the four cardinal virtues (Wis 8<sup>7</sup>) acc. to the classification derived from Gr. philosophers. In the early days of Israel's battles, courage in its simplest sense was naturally rated very highly. Much stress is laid on it in Dt 31 and Jos 1; neither of these passages, however, * Many [counterfeit gems], in the form of beads, have been met with in different parts of Egypt, particularly at Thebes; and so rare did the Egyptians carry this spirit of imitation, that even small figures, sculptures, and objects made of ordinary porcelain, were counterfeited, being composed of still cheaper materials. A figure which was entirely of earthenware, with a glazed exterior, underwent a somewhat more complicated process than when cut out of stone and simply covered with a vitrified coating; this last could therefore be sold at a low price; it offered all the brilliancy of the former, and its weight alone betrayed its inferiority.—Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii 148.

The covenant was an ad hoc bond assumed by Josiah, and differed from a vow; and this sense is even clearer when Hezekiah says, 'It is in mine heart to make a covenant with J' the God of Israel' (2 Ch 29<sup>10</sup>, cf. Ezr 10<sup>3</sup>). From these passages it appears that berith is used, not only when the engagement or obligation is mutual, but also when it is imposed on one party by another, or when one assumes it on himself.

ii. GOD'S COVENANTS WITH MEN.—Some points are common to covenants in berith. (1) Every covenant implies two parties, and the parties are free moral agents, and that, whether the engagement be mutual or not, both parties acquiesce. (2) Every covenant is made in bonum; the relation formed is always friendly, and for the benefit at least of one of the parties. (3) A covenant creates a new relation between the parties, not existing previously. (4) A covenant creates also a jus or right on the side of each party against the other. These general points belong also to divine covenants, though the introduction of God as one of the parties may cause some modification. For example, God always initiates the covenant; and the evil conscience of Israel, as reflected in the prophets, restrains it from claiming the protection of J' as a right. It does go so far as to plead that it is His people (Is 64<sup>9</sup>), and for that reason it claims to be treated differently from the nations, and chastened in measure and with restraint of His anger (Jer 10<sup>24</sup>). But it usually finds its pleas, not in itself, but in God. It beseeches Him to remember His covenant and His grace, and to deal with it for His name's sake—His name of God alone, already begun to be revealed to the world in the acts of Israel's redemptive history. If in Israel's pleadings it pleads its 'righteousness' and invokes God's righteousness in its behalf, this is not a plea of moral righteousness, but of being in the right as against the world—a plea that it has in it the true religion, and represents the cause of God.

In Gn 15 (cf. 22<sup>16a</sup>, 26<sup>32</sup>) J' makes a covenant with Abram. The passage, though perhaps composite, is sufficiently connected, v. 17 having reference to the question who should be Abram's heir, and v. 8a to the question what the inheritance should be. The covenant has reference to the inheritance, the important verses being 8-11, 17, 18. The passage is strongly anthropomorphic, though what occurred may have been of the nature of a vision. Certain animals were slain and divided into their parts, the corresponding parts being placed opposite each other, and the pieces between. At night-fall there passed between the pieces a smoke as of a furnace and a flaming torch. The smoke and flame was a symbol of the Divine Being. The explanation follows: 'In that day J' made a covenant with Abram, saying, 'I have given this land' (cf. 13<sup>16</sup>). Now the covenant is a promise on the part of J'. The promise has the form of an oath or curse symbolized by the act of passing between the pieces of the victims. Among men this would have meant the most solemn invocation of J' as guardian of the covenant, but here it is J' Himself who performs the rite—because He could swear by no greater. He swears by Himself.

Two other covenants of a similar nature are mentioned—the covenant with David, constituting his seed perpetual rulers of the kingdom of God, and that with Levi, bestowing inalienably the priesthood on that family. In 2 S 7 David, because of his purpose to build a house to the Lord, receives through Nathan the promise that J' will build him a house, i.e. establish his dynasty as perpetual rulers in Israel. In 2 S 23<sup>3</sup> this promise is spoken of as 'a covenant ordered in all things,' i.e. constituted with all the due and solemn rites, and therefore 'sure' (cf. Gal 3<sup>15</sup>, 17, He 6<sup>17</sup>, 18). In 23<sup>5</sup> it is called 'eternal' (cf. 7<sup>16</sup>). In later writings this covenant is referred to as an oath (Ps 89<sup>3-33</sup>, 132<sup>11</sup>), and spoken of as the 'sure mercies of David' (Is 55<sup>3</sup>). But it appears to be alluded to as early as Is 16<sup>5</sup>, and the idea of it is what gives meaning to the whole Messianic passage, Is 71-97. The setting apart of the tribe of Levi for priestly service is several times alluded to, Ex 32<sup>29</sup>, Dt 10<sup>6</sup>, 18<sup>5</sup> (cf. Nu 25<sup>12</sup>, 13); and elsewhere this appointment is called a covenant, Dt 33<sup>9</sup>, Jer 33<sup>21</sup>, Mal 2<sup>4</sup>.

These three covenants bear upon three great facts or institutions in OT religious history—the inalienable right of Israel to the possession of Canaan, the perpetual monarchy in the house of David, and the perpetual priesthood in the family of Levi. In the mind of the Israelites far down in the history of Israel in the midst of these established institutions, and of them as due to covenants made in the past by J', one main conception in covenant must have appeared its immutability. This idea of unchangeableness belongs so much to the conception of covenant that any established custom, such as the exhibition of the shewbread, is called 'an everlasting covenant' (Lv 24<sup>8</sup>). Similarly, the observance of the Sabbath is so called (Ex 31<sup>16</sup>, 17), and Jer 33<sup>21</sup> applies the term covenant to the laws of nature, speaking of J's covenant with the day and with the night; and the covenants with David and Levi have the same security as this law of nature. But the conception of J' implied in the idea of such covenants is remarkable. J' is conceived of as a free moral Being, having power to dispose of the world to whom He will (Gn 15), and to select whom He wills for His ends (2 S 7), and acting above men and the world, but entering graciously into their history, and initiating consciously great movements that are to govern all the future.

Some modern writers on OT religion contend that these conceptions regarding J' implied in the notion of covenant cannot have existed so early as the dates assigned to these various covenants. They argue that such covenants as those with Abram, David, and Levi, not to mention the Sinaitic covenant, the basis of which is the Moral Law, are antedated, they all presuppose an established and permanent condition of things, and are merely a religious view taken of existing conditions. The covenant of J' with Abram to give him seed the land of Canaan is just the fact that Israel was now firmly in possession of Canaan brought under the religious idea that all Israel's blessings were due to their God. And the covenant with David is merely a religious view of the fact that his dynasty, unlike those in the northern kingdom, was established and secure. J' is the author of all Israel's blessings, He is self-conscious, and foresees the end from the beginning, and therefore that which is seen to be established has been a determination of His from of old, and His determinations He communicates graciously to those who are the subjects of them (Am 3<sup>7</sup>). But this mode of thinking regarding J', and this mode of interpreting religious facts that have historically arisen, are modes of thinking not quite early in Israel's religious history. The relation of J' to Israel must originally have been similar to that of the god of the heathen to their particular peoples; the relation existed, but it was never formed; it was natural, and not the result of a conscious act or a historical transaction. Even admitting that from the earliest times some ethical elements entered into the conception of J', the idea of a covenant with Israel implying, as it did, a conception of a Divine Being entirely free and unconnected with Israel, and entering into voluntary relation with that people, could not have arisen before the conception of J' was completely ethicized and He was recognized as God over all. And such views of J<sup>n</sup>, it is contended, are to be observed first among the canonical prophets, or at earliest in the age, the times of Elijah and . . . enough to state the question here (its discussion falls under other rubrics, DECALOGUE, GOD, ISRAEL), though a reference to it was necessary in order to indicate what place the idea of covenant holds in the history of OT religion. The question of the covenant runs up into what is the main question of OT religious history, viz., To what date is the covenant of J<sup>n</sup> as an absolutely ethical Being to be assigned?

III. HISTORY OF THE DIVINE COVENANTS.—1. The passage Ex 19-34 (part from 23-31<sup>17</sup>, assigned to P), giving an account of the transactions at Sinai, is extremely, almost hopelessly, complicated (see EXODUS). In Ex 34 (assigned to J) mention is made of a covenant which appears to be constituted on the basis of certain laws, partly moral and partly ritual, and differing considerably from the ordinary Decalogue of Ex 20. Several scholars detect under this passage (Ex 34<sup>10ff.</sup>), now considerably retouched, the Decalogue as given by J (v. 12). The main parts of Ex 19 ff. are usually assigned to E. As the passage now stands, no covenant is connected with the simple Decalogue of Ex 20, but Dt (5<sup>1ff.</sup> 9<sup>5ff.</sup>) affirms that the covenant at Horeb was made on the basis of the Decalogue written on the tables of stone (4<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>). It also appears to say that no laws were promulgated at Horeb beyond the Decalogue (5<sup>1ff.</sup> 9<sup>5ff.</sup>), which he promulgated first in the plains of Moab (4<sup>1-40</sup> 5<sup>1-12</sup>). In Ex 24 mention is made of a covenant and a Book of the Covenant. This covenant seems made (or renewed) when Moses received the second tables of stone. The Book of the Covenant appears to be Ex 20-23, but the testimony of Dt makes it probable that Ex 21 ff. did not originally stand in connexion with the events at Horeb, but with those in the plains of Moab. When Moses told the people the words of J<sup>n</sup> they answered with one voice, 'all the words which J<sup>n</sup> hath spoken will we do'; and the covenant thus formed was followed by a sacrifice and a ceremony with the blood, half of which was sprinkled on the altar and the other half on the people. This rite has been supposed to be an instance of the ancient way of making a covenant by both parties having communion in the same blood (W. R. Smith, JOS 161). This may be; but in the main the sacrifice, being an offering to J<sup>n</sup>, was peculiar, atoning for and consecrating the people on their entering upon their new relation to J<sup>n</sup> (He 9<sup>12ff.</sup>). The words, 'I am J<sup>n</sup> thy God' (Ex 20<sup>2</sup>), form no part of the Decalogue, they rather express the one side of the covenant, the Decalogue proper expressing the other side. In brief, the covenant is, 'I am J<sup>n</sup> thy God, and thou art my people,' and the Decalogue (Ex 20<sup>3-17</sup>) is the expression or the analysis of what this means.

2. The prophets.—The idea of the divine covenant appears very little in the prophets down to Jer and Ezk, two prophets directly under the influence of Dt. The notion of covenant in general is not unfamiliar to them (Am 1<sup>9</sup>, Hos 2<sup>18</sup>, Is 28<sup>15-18</sup> 33<sup>3</sup>), but a covenant of God with men is not referred to except Hos 6<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>. The former of these passages is obscure, and the second is considered by some an interpolation, though mainly just because it does refer to the divine covenant.† It can hardly be because the idea of a divine covenant was as yet little current that the early prophets avoid the use of the term, for later prophets (Zeph, Nah, Hab, Hag, Jon, Jl, Zec 1-8) also fail to use it; the reason must rather be that their thoughts moved on different lines. The prophets have to do with an existing people, and their main conceptions are—(1) that there is a relation between J<sup>n</sup> and Israel; He is their God and they are His people. (2) This relation of J<sup>n</sup> and the people was formed by His act of redeeming them from Egypt: 'I am J<sup>n</sup> thy God from the land of Egypt' (Hos 12<sup>9</sup>). This was the day of Israel's 'birth' (Hos 2<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>), the time when J<sup>n</sup> 'knew' her (Am 3<sup>9</sup>). (3) In this as in all His other acts towards Israel the motive of J<sup>n</sup> was His goodness (Am 2<sup>9ff.</sup>), His 'love' (Hos 11<sup>1</sup>, cf. Is 1<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>1ff.</sup>). (4) The nature of this relation between J<sup>n</sup> and the people is fully well understood. It is given in 'deed and truth', and is purely ethical. What is required of the people is to seek 'good'—civil and moral—and the service of J<sup>n</sup> alone. On the part of the people the prophets do not speak of laws, they speak off their own minds. To themselves their principles are axiomatic, and wherever these principles were learned they coincide with the Moral Law (Hos 4<sup>1-8</sup>). Thus the prophets dealing with an existing people have no occasion to go further back than the Exodus, when the people came into existence. It is doubtful if Isaiah goes back to David and Zion. The 'judges', 'the Lord hath founded Zion' (14<sup>32</sup>); 'He dwelleth in Mount Zion' (8<sup>18</sup>). J<sup>n</sup>, who is universal Sovereign, has founded His kingdom of righteousness in Israel (28<sup>16ff.</sup>). The divine covenant in his mind it is the idea of a Messianic prophecies repose (7<sup>1-9</sup> 11). Thus the prophetic idea differs from the idea of a covenant as real differs from formal; the assurance of redemption reposes, not on the divine promise, but on the divine nature, on God Himself as men have historically found Him in His acts of redemption already done, and as He is known in the heart of man. (5) And the nature of God, as it explains the present, guarantees the future. However Hosea came by his ideas, whether in the course of his domestic trials he discovered in his own heart a love which could not let its object go, however degraded he might become, and rose by inspiration to the intuition that such was God's love,—however this be, he has the idea of a love which is stronger than custom or law, or even than moral duty, a love which nothing can overcome. And this is God's love to Israel. The relation between J<sup>n</sup> and Israel, of God and people, is indissoluble, because J<sup>n</sup> has loved (Hos 2<sup>3</sup> 3).

3. Deuteronomy.—Dt knows of three covenants—that with the fathers, that at Horeb, and that in the plains of Moab. The covenant with the fathers (4<sup>31</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>), specifically Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (1<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>), was a promise to increase their seed (13<sup>16</sup>) and give them the land of Canaan (6<sup>18</sup>). The covenant is called an 'oath' (7<sup>8</sup>), and is often said to have been sworn. The covenant at Horeb was based on the Decalogue (4<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>2ff.</sup> 9<sup>5ff.</sup>, cf. 4<sup>23</sup>). In addition to these Dt mentions a covenant in the plains of Moab, which is expressly distinguished from the covenant at Horeb (29<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>68</sup>), cf. 29<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>21</sup> 26<sup>17-19</sup>). The contents of this covenant are formed by Dt itself (i.e. ch. 12-26, 28), which is called the Book of the Covenant (2 K 23<sup>24</sup>, cf. Jer 11<sup>2-10</sup>). Dt is in the main an expansion of Ex 21 ff., the place of which it is meant to take. The terms of this covenant are given in 26<sup>17-18</sup> 'Thou hast avouched * J<sup>n</sup> this day that he shall be thy God,

* It is doubtful if Ps 50<sup>5</sup> refers to this covenant; the ptp. may have a present sense those that make a covenant, ref. being to the sacrificial worship, which is a continuous making or maintaining of the covenant with J<sup>n</sup>. Cf. § iii (4) end.

† For 'forsaken thy covenant,' 1 K 19<sup>10</sup> LXX reads forsaken thee, and in v. 14 'thy covenant and' seems a duplicate of thee in previous clause, and is wanting in A.

* The word, occurring only here, is very obscure; LXX 'chosen,' so Vulg. and virtually Targ.; Aq. avouché, et and that thou wilt walk in his ways, and keep his statutes and commandments and judgments, and hearken unto his voice. And J<sup>n</sup> has this day avouched thee that thou shalt be his particular people . . . and that he will make thee high above all nations . . . and that thou shalt be an holy people unto J<sup>n</sup> thy God.' It is obvious that the essential thing in the people's . . . is that J<sup>n</sup> shall be their God, and the . . . of His undertaking is that they shall be His peculiar people (cf. Ex 19<sup>6</sup>); all else is but the exposition or analysis of what these terms imply. Like the prophets, Dt greatly insists on the duties of the people, though with surprising inwardness it sums up all duties in love to J<sup>n</sup> their God (6<sup>5</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>). Like the prophets also, it fills up the formal outline of the divine covenant (Gn 15) with contents from the nature of God: J<sup>n</sup> 'loved thy fathers' (4<sup>37</sup>), and this love continues to their descendants (7<sup>8</sup>). The 'covenant and the grace' (10<sup>7</sup>) are coupled; the covenant was an expression of grace (7<sup>12</sup>). Dt also lays great emphasis on the uniformity of the divine mind and the . . . His operations. It was because He . . . that He 'chose' their seed, the people Israel; this 'choice' meaning, not election . . . but the concrete act of separating Israel to Himself from among the nations at the Exodus (4<sup>37</sup> 7<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>). J<sup>n</sup> 'keepeth covenant,' though this again is explained from His nature—'He is the faithful God' (7<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>12</sup>). All Israel's blessings, its deliverance from Egypt, entrance to Canaan, and prosperity there, are but the first covenant (Gn 15) unfolding itself—to uphold His covenant which he swore unto thy fathers' (8<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>). And this first covenant, as it has operated in the past and operates now, will continue operative in the future: Israel may be scattered among the nations, but J<sup>n</sup> will not forget His covenant, for He is merciful (4<sup>31</sup>). The term berith is used in Dt for the terms or contents of the covenant, e.g. the Decalogue or any of its laws (4<sup>23</sup> 17<sup>1, 3</sup>); so Dt speaks of the 'tables of the covenant,' 'the ark of the covenant,' cf. 1 K 8<sup>21</sup> 'the ark wherein is the covenant of the Lord.'—The prophets Jer. and Ezk. follow Dt in their use of the term covenant, though they draw no distinction between the covenant at Horeb and that in the plains of Moab (Jer 11<sup>3</sup> 4<sup>5</sup> 31<sup>31</sup> 7<sup>22, 23</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>8, 59</sup>). It is curious that in his prophecies anterior to the promulgation of Dt (ch. 1-6) Jer., like other prophets, does not make use of the covenant idea . . . however, 31<sup>31</sup>). See § iv.

4. The Priests' Code.—P is a historical account of the rise and completion of Israel's sacra, its religious institutions and rites. When it was written, these sacred institutions had run through their full development, and could be described in their historical succession, e.g. the law in regard to blood (Gn 9), the law of circumcision (Gn 17), the tabernacle as the dwelling-place of God among His people (Ex 25 ff.), and the like. In this history P records two covenants—that with Noah (Gn 9) and that with Abraham (Gn 17). The former was a covenant with man and all . . . of a promise or oath (Is 54<sup>9</sup>) on . . . would no more destroy the world with a flood, and laying on men the obligation of abstaining from human bloodshed and the eating of blood. It is very much a question of words whether this covenant was two-sided. Of course being made with mankind and all creation, it was an absolute promise on God's part in regard to the human race and the world; but in regard to individuals the penalty of violating it was death (9<sup>6, 8</sup>), and in later law even a beast that shed human blood was to be slain (Ex 21<sup>28</sup>). This covenant was a law for mankind (Is 24<sup>5</sup>), and in later times abstinence from blood was imposed . . . and even on Gentiles in the early . . . The covenant of Noah is not referred to in JE, but Is 54<sup>9</sup> is proof that knowledge of it was current before the date usually assigned to P. It is possible that it was the increasing intercourse between Israel and the heathen, and the fact that many of the latter . . . the religion of Israel, which induced . . . P to preserve a record of this covenant. The Abrahamic covenant (Gn 17) was made with Abraham and his seed. It consisted of a promise of God, called also an oath (Ex 6<sup>8</sup>), to multiply Abraham, to give Canaan to him and his seed, and to be their God (Gn 17<sup>4, 7, 8</sup>); and it imposed on him and his seed the obligation of circumcision (v. 10). Circumcision is called the sign of the covenant but also the covenant itself (v. 10, 11, 13), just as the Sabbath is both the covenant and the sign of it (Ex 31<sup>16, 17</sup>). As in Noah's covenant, the promise to Abraham and his seed regarded as a people was absolute (v. 7), but in regard to individuals the penalty of neglecting circumcision was death (v. 14). The OT idea is hardly that Abraham represented his seed; his seed are conceived as existing—as they were when the author wrote (cf. Dt 29<sup>14</sup>). The Decalogue does not now stand in P, neither does it speak of any covenant at Sinai, except in the general reference Lv 26<sup>45</sup> 'the covenant of thy ancestors,' at the Exodus; the only part of the Decalogue . . . of as a covenant is the Sabbath (Ex 31<sup>16, 17</sup>). 'ark of the covenant' becomes 'the ark of the testimony' (אֲרוֹן הָעֵדֻת). P gives an account of the historical revelation of the divine names, Elohim, El-Shaddai, and J<sup>n</sup>. The covenant with Noah was made by Elohim, that with Abraham by El-Shaddai, and a covenant made by J<sup>n</sup> might have been expected. It is wanting; the covenant in Ex 6<sup>4, 8</sup> is the Abrahamic. Thus in P, (1) the only covenant with Israel is the Abrahamic; all Israel's subsequent history, their multiplication in Egypt, and their entrance into Canaan, is but the fulfilment of this covenant (Ex 2<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>4, 8</sup>, cf. Ps 105<sup>9-11</sup>). In P, as everywhere else, the essence of the covenant is, 'I will be their God' (Gn 17<sup>8</sup>), or more fully, 'I will take you to me for people, and I will be to you God' (Ex 6<sup>7</sup>). In the idea of P this promise was realized by God dwelling among the people on the one hand, and accepting their offerings on the other. Hence the need of the tabernacle, God's dwelling-place, offerings, and ministrants. These are all divine institutions, creations and gifts of God, the fulfilment in detail of the covenant to be their God. And (2) the covenant is everlasting (Gn 17<sup>7</sup>); it continues valid in the Exile and at all times, and it will yet prove effectual in the restoration of the people and in their being the people of God in truth (Lv 26<sup>41-45</sup>). Neither in P nor in Ezk are the ritual institutions the means of salvation, they express the state of salvation, which is altogether of God; and their performance merely conserves it. If a different way of thinking ever came to prevail, it arose long after P.

changed, connecting perhaps with אֲרֹן (Jer 21<sup>1</sup>). As v. 17 plainly states what the people undertake, and v. 18 what J<sup>n</sup> undertakes, the rendering, 'thou hast caused J<sup>n</sup> to say,' could only mean that the people by their words or demeanour had caused J<sup>n</sup> to understand and repeat their pledges in regard to Him, while He had caused or enabled them to repeat His pledges to them—a strangely roundabout form of thought. The passage is difficult in other ways, the exact bearing of the subordinate clauses being in some cases obscure. See A TOUCH.

* As the history of creation (Gn 1-24) is written mainly to introduce the rest of the Sabbath, in which creation issued, the Sabbath might have been expected to be a covenant with creation and Adam. This is not the case, nor does OT speak of a covenant with Adam (Hos 6<sup>7</sup> is obscure). In Sir 14<sup>17</sup> 'the covenant from the beginning was, thou shalt die the death,' covenant appears=appointment, ordinance; and death, being universal, is regarded as the destiny of man from the beginning.

iv. THE NEW COVENANT.—As an idea in the history of Israel the new covenant means: the renewal of Israel's national existence and all her institutions, civil and sacred, shall be dissolved (Hos 3<sup>21</sup>); J<sup>h</sup> shall say of her, 'She is not my people, neither am I hers' (Hos 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>). And secondly, that this divorce of Israel shall be but temporary; for, in fact, the new covenant (Is 40<sup>1</sup> 49<sup>1</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>1</sup>); the relation between her and J<sup>h</sup> shall be renewed: 'I will say unto them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God' (Hos 2<sup>23</sup> 1<sup>10</sup>). This is the faith and prediction of all the prophets, of Dt and of P (above in § iii.). The Exile was the dissolution of the relation between Israel and J<sup>h</sup>, the rupture of the old covenant (Jer 31<sup>32</sup>); the Restoration shall be the renewal of the relation, the establishment of a new covenant. But around the renewal of the relation gather all the religious ideals and aspirations of the prophets, the forgiveness of sin, the peace, and everlasting joy—the new covenant renewed amidst the tumultuous jubilation of creation (Is 42<sup>10</sup> 44<sup>21-23</sup>). In its visions of the new covenant OT becomes Christian. Jer. is the first to use the word new, but the term adds nothing to what had been already said in the words spoken by J<sup>h</sup> to her who had been cast off: 'I will betroth thee unto me for ever' (Hos 2<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). In terms the new covenant is nothing but the old: 'I will be their God, and they shall be my people' (Jer 31<sup>33</sup>); its novelty (apart from the reference to the future) lies in its subjective reality; its terms are realized in their deepest sense. It is in this view only that its promises are 'better' (He 8<sup>6</sup>). The prophets and Dt insist greatly on the duties of the people, and assume that they are able to perform them. But when Jer. and Ezk. review the people's history, which has been one long act of unfaithfulness, they despair of the people (Jer 13<sup>23</sup>). To Jeremiah's expostulations the reply seems to come back, 'It is hopeless' (2<sup>25</sup>). Hope is now only in God. J<sup>h</sup> will make a new covenant with Israel, that is, forgive their sins and write His law on their hearts—the one in His free grace, the other by His creative act; and thus the covenant idea shall be realized, 'I will be their God,' etc. The second part of the promise is developed in Deutero-Is. 'This is my covenant, saith J<sup>h</sup>, my spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth' (59<sup>21</sup>); and even more fully in Ezk 36<sup>26-27</sup>, cf. 11<sup>19</sup>. In 20<sup>34-35</sup> Ezk. describes the act of making the new covenant, which is a repetition of that at the Exodus. This new, everlasting covenant is due to God's remembrance of His former covenant (16<sup>59-60</sup>). Both Jer. and Ezk. bring the new covenant into connexion with the Davidic or Messianic covenant (Jer 33<sup>14-16</sup>, Ezk 37<sup>21-28</sup>, cf. 17<sup>22-23</sup>).

In Deutero-Is. (40 ff.) the assurance of a new covenant reposes on two great conceptions—the universalistic conception of J<sup>h</sup> as God, and that of the invincible power of the knowledge of the true God once implanted in the heart of mankind. J<sup>h</sup> is God alone, Creator, He that giveth breath unto the people, and in this all is said: He shall yet be acknowledged by all, 'By myself have I sworn that to me every knee shall bow' (45<sup>23</sup> 42<sup>8</sup>). And Israel is His witness (43<sup>12</sup>). There is no mention of former covenants with the fathers or Israel. J<sup>h</sup> called Israel (41<sup>9</sup> 42<sup>6</sup> 49<sup>1-6</sup> 51<sup>2</sup>), and in the act of calling He planted in Israel the consciousness of its meaning in the moral history of mankind—'I said unto thee, Thou art my servant' (41<sup>9</sup>). There is no God but J<sup>h</sup>, and Israel is His servant, to bring forth judgment to the nations, to be the light of the Gentiles, that the salvation of J<sup>h</sup> may be to the end of the earth (49<sup>6</sup>). The knowledge of the true God has been given to mankind once for all in Israel; and this idea of the true knowledge or word of the true God implanted in Israel, incarnated in the seed of Abraham—this is the true covenant. It is not the Servant of the Lord, who might not be able anywhere or at any time to lay his finger on this Being, but he was there, had always been there since Israel's call and the creation of its consciousness (49<sup>1-6</sup>). And the religious history of mankind was a Process at Law, the conduct of the great Cause of the Servant against the nations, their wrongs and idolatries. In this cause he was righteous, that is, in the right: his cause was that of J<sup>h</sup>, and though he stood contra mundum he would surely prevail: 'I know that I shall not be put to shame' (50<sup>4-9</sup>). So the Servant becomes a covenant of the people, to restore the tribes of Jacob (42<sup>6</sup> 49<sup>6</sup>). And this is too light a thing, he shall also be the light of the nations. The new covenant is one of peace (54<sup>10</sup>), is everlasting (55<sup>3</sup> 61<sup>8</sup>), and the Gentiles may take hold of it (56<sup>1-3</sup> 44<sup>5</sup>).

In the above and all late writings berith is used in a general way, not of the act of agreement, but of its conditions or any one of them, and thus of the religion of Israel as a whole (Is 56<sup>4</sup>, Ps 103<sup>18</sup>). So it is used of the relation created by the covenant; the new covenant is not thought of as a formal act of agreement, but as the realizing in history of the true covenant idea. The term berith had a charm and power, and was clung to, partly because it expressed the most solemn and unalterable assurance on God's part that He would be the people's salvation, and partly, perhaps, because it suggested that He acted with men after the manner of men, graciously entering into their life, and entering into their life. The covenant thus took form in their heart, awakening hopes and ideals towards which, kindled and elevated by the divine fellowship, they might strive. And thus the covenants were not only promises of redemption, but stages in its attainment. For God's covenants were not isolated and unmotivated, but attached themselves to lofty ideas of men's minds,—to the 'faith' of Abraham, to David's absorbing purpose to prepare an house for J<sup>h</sup> (2 S 7, Ps 132), to the 'zeal' of Levi and Phinehas, and to the elevated religious mind of Israel in the hour of its redemption.

By the time of the LXX translation berith had become a religious term in the sense of a onesided engagement on the part of God, as in P and late writings; and to this may be due the use of the word διαθήκη, disposition or appointment, though the term was then somewhat inappropriately applied to reciprocal engagements among men. In the Ep. to the Hebrews the word is used both for covenant and testament, the idea of covenant as a onesided disposition naturally sliding into that of testament when the other ideas of inheritance and death are involved (9<sup>15-17</sup>). The Ep. develops in detail Jer 31<sup>34</sup>, particularly the promise, 'I will remember their sins no more.' The Day of Atonement (Lv 16), in which the peculiar rites of OT culminated, is used as a frame into which to insert the work of Christ; and the rites and actions of the high priest on that day, which could never realize the idea they embodied, serve as a foil to the sacrifice and high priesthood of Christ, which 'for ever perfected the sanctified.' The other half of the promise, 'In their hearts I will write my law,' is not developed in the Ep. (cf. ref. to the Spirit, Is 59<sup>21</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>26-27</sup>). St. Paul employs the term διαθήκη (Gal 3<sup>15</sup>), but in the sense of an engagement on the part of God, which is, as he calls it, a promise. In the main he follows P, e.g. (1) in assuming that there is but one covenant, the * Aristoph. Av. 439, is quoted as an ex. of the meaning 'convention, mutual engagement. Had this sense established itself in the 'common' dialect of the 3rd cent. B.C.?

Abrahamic (Gn 17); (2) in as the sign of it; and (3) in revelation as subordinate to a means of realizing it—though in a different sense from P. The revelation at Sinai was not the making of a covenant, but of a law. With Gn 17, however, he made a covenant with him, and the wider promise that all nations should be blessed in the seed of Abraham. The covenant with Abraham was a purely spiritual deed, and contemplated only spiritual ends. The promise of heirship of the world was given to Abraham and to his seed, which seed is Christ, in whom the promise has been fulfilled. Further, the promise was given to Abraham, the believer, and to his seed, which seed all believers are, who are heirs according to the promise, being, as one with Christ, with Him. In the institution of the term διαθήκη is also used, and combined with the sacrificial idea as in Ex 24<sup>5ff</sup>, cf. He 9<sup>15ff</sup>.

PHRASEOLOGY.—The usual phrase to make a covenant is 'to cut' (קָטַץ); in 2 S 23<sup>5</sup> 'to appoint' (נָתַן). In P 'to give' (תָּן) Gn 9<sup>12</sup> 17<sup>2</sup>, and 'to set up a covenant' (קָבַץ), are common. The latter word often means 'to uphold,' but the sense 'set up' or 'make' is undoubted; the determination of 'covenant' by pron. occurs also with קָבַץ and קָבַץ (2 S 3<sup>12</sup>). Of both parties it is said, 'they made a covenant' (Gn 21<sup>7</sup> 31<sup>44</sup>), the superior, or whoever takes the initiative, makes a covenant with (אֵת, עִם) the other (2 S 3<sup>12</sup>, Gn 26<sup>28</sup>). To make a covenant to or for (לְ) may mean to 'submit a covenant to,' i.e. for approval (Jos 24<sup>25</sup>), or to 'make a covenant with' (Ex 23<sup>32</sup> 34<sup>12</sup> 16, Dt 7<sup>2</sup>, Jg 2<sup>2</sup>), and becomes very common in later style in conformity with the extended usage of prep. to. COVER.—1. Following Sa'adya, Talm., and most Eng. VSS, AV gives 'covers' . . . to cover withal,' as one of the vessels used in the temple. Ex 25<sup>29</sup> 37<sup>16</sup>, Nu 4<sup>7</sup>. RV (after LXX, Vulg., Targ., Luther) gives 'flagons' . . . to pour out withal. The same word (מִזְבֵּן) is used in 1 Ch 28<sup>17</sup> of one kind of vessels given by David to Solomon for the temple; EV 'cups.' 2. In Jg 3<sup>24</sup>, 1 S 24<sup>3</sup> 'to cover one's feet' is a literal tr. of the Heb. (רָכַץ רַגְלֵי) euphemistically used for performing the offices of nature (so LXX, Jg 3<sup>24</sup> ἀποκενοῦν τοὺς πόδας, but 1 S 24<sup>3</sup> παρασκεύασθαι; Vulg. purgare alvum, and p. ventrem; Luther in Jg, zu Stuhl gegangen, but in 1 S, Fusse zu decken). On the scrupulous regard for decency among Orientals, see Ges. Lex. s.v. רַכַּץ. J. HASTINGS.

COVERT.—Scarcely now in use, except for game, and then generally spelt cover, 'covert' is used in AV for—1. 'A covered place,' 2 K 16<sup>18</sup>; 'the c. for the sabbath that they had built in the house' (Heb. Kth. כִּסֵּי, kerē כִּסֵּי, LXX τὸν θεμέλιον τῆς καθέρας, RV 'the covered way for the sabbath,' RVm 'covered place'). 2. Any shelter, as Is 4<sup>6</sup> 'a c. from storm and from rain'; or hiding place, as Job 33<sup>40</sup> 'the young lions' . . . abide in the c. to lie in wait'; 1 S 25<sup>30</sup> 'she [Abigail] came down by the c. of the hill,' that is, where the hill hid her from view; cf. 1 Mac 9<sup>38</sup> 'hid themselves under the c. of the mountain.' J. HASTINGS.

COVET.—The law had said, Thou shalt not covet' (Ro 7<sup>7</sup>); 'Covet earnestly the best gifts' (1 Co 12<sup>31</sup>), and 'covet to prophesy' (14<sup>39</sup>). It is not St. Paul that offers this startling contradiction; he uses two different words, ἐπιθυμέω in Ro, ζηλώω in 1 Co; it is AV only. The older Eng. VSS have generally 'lust' in quoting the commandment, or where they have 'covet' they give some other word in 1 Co, as 1 Co 12<sup>31</sup> Wyclif 'sue,' Rheims 'pursue'; 14<sup>39</sup> W. 'love,' R. 'be earnest.' RV has 'desire earnestly' in 1 Co. 'Covet' (from Fr. convoiter, Lat. cupere, cupiditare), scarcely used now in a good sense, was at first quite common; desire, as Caxton (1483), 'She ever coveyted the pees and love of her lord.' 'Covet after,' as 1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>, is obsolete. (The Gr. in this place is ὀρέγω, and RV gives 'reach after,' a happy change, ὀρέγω and 'reach' being phonetically as well as idiomatically identical.) J. HASTINGS.

COVETOUSNESS.—The verb covet and its parts are used in a wider sense in the Scriptures than the noun covetousness, which has always a reference to property, and is a rendering of the Heb. נָאָץ and the Gr. πλεονεξία. In OT there are found frequent denunciations of this sin, which is brought into close connexion on the one hand with violence (Jer 22<sup>17</sup>, Hab 2<sup>9</sup>), and on the other with fraud (Jer 8<sup>10</sup>); and this connexion shows that action as well as desire to get another's goods is meant (Mic 2<sup>2</sup>). The forms of the sin singled out for rebuke are usury, seizing the land of the weak and poor, selling debtors into slavery, and taking bribes to pervert justice. The judges to be chosen by Moses were to be men 'hating unjust gain' (Ex 18<sup>21</sup>). Covetousness brought ruin on Achan and his house (Jos 7<sup>21</sup>). Samuel in laying down office asserted his innocence of this sin (1 S 12<sup>3</sup>).

Turning to NT, we find that Jesus warned men against covetousness, wherewith His opponents the Pharisees were charged (Lk 16<sup>14</sup>), and enforced His warning with the parable of the Rich Fool (Lk 12<sup>13-21</sup>). St. Paul in several of his letters includes covetousness, which he calls idolatry (Col 3<sup>5</sup>), among the very worst sins (Ro 1<sup>23</sup>, Eph 5<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>10</sup>). He had to denounce himself as free of covetousness in connexion with the poor at Jerus. (1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 8; cf. Ac 20<sup>33</sup>). There were some teachers in the Church whose aim was worldly gain (2 P 2<sup>3</sup>); and accordingly one of the necessary qualifications of a bishop was freedom from the love of money (1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>). The remedy for covetousness as for the love of food and raiment, which hinders us in our service (Mt 6<sup>19-24</sup>), is trust in God's fatherly care and abiding faithfulness (He 13<sup>6</sup>). Regarding the sense of 'covet' in the tenth commandment (Ex 20<sup>17</sup>), it is held by some that it includes not only the desire to have another's property, but also the effort to make it one's own (Schultz, O.T. Theol., Eng. tr. ii. p. 52). In Dt 5<sup>21</sup> with its more inward morality, only the desire may be referred to. In St. Paul's tolerance the inwardness of the law is asserted (Ro 7<sup>7</sup>). He might claim to be blameless in outward acts, but this commandment convicted him of sinfulness in his wishes, not for gain simply, but also for other unlawful objects. A. E. GARVIE.

COW.—See CATTLE.

COZBI (קֹזִי 'deceitful,' Χασβί).—The Midianite slain by Phinehas (Nu 25<sup>15, 18</sup> P).

COZEBA (1 Ch 4<sup>22</sup>).—See ACHIZIB.

CRACKNELS.—Only 1 K 14<sup>3</sup> 'take with thee ten loaves and cracknels.' The Heb. ḥametz is elsewhere only Jos 9<sup>6</sup>, of the 'bread' carried with them on their pretended long journey. It is supposed to mean bread that crumbles easily, hence the Eng. tr., 'cracknel' being a dialectic variety of crackling. See BREAD.

J. HASTINGS.

CRAFT.—In the mod. sense of guile, Dn 8<sup>25</sup>, 2 Mac 12<sup>24</sup>, Mk 14<sup>1</sup>; for already by 1611 the word had lost its orig. sense of 'power,' 'strength,' when it could be . . . against 'cunning,' as Caxton (1474), . . . hast vaynquissed them . . . by subtilnes. . . But I that am a romayn shal vaynquisse them by craft and strength of armes.' Elsewhere in AV 'c.' means 'trade,' an early application of the word (=that to which a man gives his strength). So 'Craftsman' = 'tradesman,' as Rev 18<sup>22</sup> 'no craftsman of whatsoever craft he be.' In Rich. II. i. iv. 28, Shaks. plays upon the double sense of 'craft'—

'Wooping poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles.'

Crafty and Craftiness are always used in the modern degenerated sense. J. HASTINGS.

CRANE.—The word כִּס שָׁס, or כִּס שִׁס, tr. in AV crane, should be tr. swallow (so RV). The first of these words occurs in Hezekiah's prayer (Is 38<sup>14</sup>). Here (כָּסִים עֹנֵי כִן מְצַחֲקִים) śūs is a swallow, and 'agur' possibly an adjective which means twittering. The passage would then be tr. 'as a twittering swallow I chatter.' In the second passage (Jer 8<sup>7</sup>) occurs the second form (כָּסִים עֹנֵי), and here śūs is again a swallow, and 'agur' the twitterer (?). If the passage be tr. 'as a swallow and a twitterer,' the latter כָּסִים עֹנֵי refers to another species of swallow, or . . . twittering birds of passage, of which there are many in the Holy Land. In the passage in Jer. the allusion is to the migratory habits of the bird, and its note; in Isaiah to its note alone. Some of the swallows, as the swift or martin, are known to the Arabs by the name śūs or śis, and utter a piercing shriek as they fly, but the allusion here is to the twittering of the birds in nesting time. By no stretch of imagination could the whoop or trumpeting of the crane be called twittering. Some have supposed . . . (Lv 11<sup>17</sup>, Dt 14<sup>16</sup>), tr. in AV and L . . . yanshōph (Is 34<sup>11</sup>), tr. in both owl, are the crane. But, in the absence of evidence in its favour, we must drop the crane from the fauna of the Bible.

CRATES (Κράτης), a deputy left in charge of the citadel at Jerusalem (Acra) when the regular governor, Sostratus, was summoned to Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of a dispute with the high priest Menelaus (2 Mac 4<sup>28</sup>). Crates is termed the governor of the Cyprians (τὸν ἐπὶ τῶν Κυπρίων, RV 'who was over the Cyprians'); probably he was sent to Cyprus shortly afterwards, when, in 168 B.C., Antiochus obtained possession of the island. Some MSS read here Σόστρατος δὲ κρατῆρας τῶν ἐπὶ τ. Κυπ.; so Vulg. Sostratus prælatus est Cypriis.

CREATION.—See COSMOGONY, CREATURE.

CREATURE is the somewhat loose rendering of nephesh (נֶפֶשׁ), breathing being, in Gn and Lv (once in Gn—12<sup>2</sup>—of shezeq (שִׁזְקָה), swarming being, or, as it is there put, moving creature), and, in Ezk, of hai (חַי), living being (rendered, in each case, living creature). In NT, quite accurately, it represents κτίσμα, and shares with creatum the representation of κτίσις. Neither κτίσμα nor κτίσις is ever employed by the LXX as a tr. of nephesh, shezeq, or hai, the favourite equivalents for these words respectively being ψυχή, ἐπερὶόν, and ζῶν. In Gn the verb bārā' (בָּרָא, 'create') is tr. solely by ποιεῖν: κρίσειν represents it first in Dt 4<sup>22</sup>, and afterwards more usually than ποιεῖν; while both stand for it, sometimes side by side, in Deutero-Isaiah (e.g. 45<sup>7</sup>). Since ποιεῖν is simply to make, while κρίσειν is (classically) to found (a city, a colony), and so to make from the beginning, originally, for the first time (not necessarily out of nothing), κρίσειν is especially fitted to express God's creative activity not only in the physical (Ec 12<sup>1</sup>, Ro 12<sup>2</sup>), but also in the spiritual sphere (Col 3<sup>10</sup>). For an OT piemontion of the spiritual sense, see Ps 51<sup>12</sup>, where create, κρίσειν, and renew, ἐκκαλῆσειν, recall together the καὶν κτίσις, new creature, of 2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>). The use of the subst. κτίσις exactly corresponds. In contradistinction to κτίσμα, which points to the creative act completed and embodied, it denotes sometimes the creative act in process (Ro 12<sup>2</sup>), at other times the thing created, regard being paid to the process of its production. It is used (1) physically (a) of the whole creation (so invariably in OT and Apoc.; in NT, Ro 8<sup>22</sup>), often with special reference to mankind as the creation (Mk 16<sup>15</sup>, Col 1<sup>22</sup>); (b) of the individual creation, the creature (like . . . physical κτίσμα of the Apoc. and NT), . . . actually, of the new creature (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>), . . . the new creation (Ro 8<sup>22-23</sup>) in Christ Jesus, the original and originator of the new race, and the renovator of nature as a whole. Cf. the rabbinical expressions beriyah hādāshāh, 'new creation,' of a man converted to Judaism; and hiddūsh ha'olām, 'the new age' (lit. newness of the age) to be ushered in by the Messiah; also Isaiah's 'new heavens and new earth' (65<sup>17</sup>), the ἀναγγελλομένη, regeneration (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>), and the ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, restitution of all things (Ac 3<sup>21</sup>). The classical sense of κρίσειν, to found, occurs only in 1 Es 4<sup>63</sup>, but is traceable in the meaning of κτίσις in 1 P 2<sup>13</sup>, πᾶσι ἀνθρωπίνῃς κτίσει, 'every institution, i.e. ordinance, of man.'

CREDITOR.—See DEBT.

CREED.—A creed is an authorized statement or definition of religious beliefs. The name is usually limited in its application to the three formulas known as the Apostles', the Nicene (or Constantinopolitan), and the Athanasian. The history of these documents has been the subject of minute and elaborate investigation. The most convenient collection of the materials for study is to be found in Hahn's Biblioth. d. Symb. u. Glaubensreg. d. alt. Kirche, 1897. The earliest traces of the Apostles' Creed are investigated in vol. i. pt. 2, of Gebhardt, Harnack, and Zahn's Patr. Apost. Op., and Harnack, Anhang to Hahn (ed. 2); and the recent controversy as to its original meaning, and the source of certain clauses, is accessible in Harnack, Apost. Glaubensbek., and Swete, Apostles' Creed. As Swainson has observed, it is necessary to remark that until the tenth century the name 'apostles' or 'apostolic' was applied to the Nicene as well as to the Western symbol to which it is now appropriated; both were regarded as embodying the apostolic teaching, and the epithet 'apostolic' does not always entitle us to say that the Laun symbol is the one meant. But the purpose of this article is not to enter on the origin and history of the creeds, but to indicate their biblical suggestions or anticipations.

Pagan religion was a rite rather than a doctrine; if the ceremonial were duly performed, the worshipper was at liberty to interpret it, or leave it unexplained, as he pleased. The myths which in a certain sense rationalize ritual do not amount to a doctrine; there is nothing in them binding the reason or faith of the worshipper; and pagan religion has no theology or creed. Neither has it a historical basis, which might be exhibited and guarded by a solemn recital of sacred facts. In both respects it is distinguished from the religion of revelation. This rests upon facts, which have to be made visible, and upon an interpretation of these facts, without which they lose their value and power as a basis for religion. This is true both of OT and NT stages in revelation, but it is in the latter only that we can be said to see the first formation of a creed. The Ten Commandments, their demand for monolatry, if not their proclamation of monotheism, might be symbol of the ancient religion: O Israel, J<sup>h</sup> our God is one J<sup>h</sup>—in Dt 6<sup>4</sup> is the nearest approach to the enunciation of a doctrine. In NT there are various more distinct indications, sometimes of the existence, sometimes of the contents, of what would now be called a creed. The emphasis which Jesus lays upon faith in Himself makes Him, naturally, the principal subject in these. The Christian creed is a confession of faith in Him; there is nothing in it which is not a more or less immediate result from what He is, or teaches, or does. The early confession of Nathanael (Jn 1<sup>49</sup>), 'Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel,' is the germ of a creed. There is probably more, though not in Peter's confession at Caesarea Phila. (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>), 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' The exclamation of Thomas in Jn 20<sup>28</sup> goes further still. We may infer from such passages as 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup> ('Jesus is Lord') and Ro 10<sup>9</sup> ('If thou shalt confess with thy mouth that Jesus is Lord, and believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead'), that a confession of the exaltation of the crucified Jesus was the earliest form of Christian creed. Cf. Ac 2<sup>36</sup>. Some such confession seems to have been connected from the beginning with the administration of baptism. This appears from the ancient interpolation in Ac 8<sup>37</sup> in which the eunuch is made, before his baptism, to say, 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God'; but still more from Mt 28<sup>19</sup>. The formula, 'into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit,' which is here prescribed for baptism, is undoubtedly the outline on which both the Western (Apostolic) and the Eastern (Nicene) symbols were moulded; and candidates for baptism were at a very early date required to profess their faith, sometimes in the very words of those symbols, sometimes in forms virtually equivalent to them. (See BAPTISM.) It has indeed been pointed out that where baptism is mentioned historically in NT, it is 'into the name of the Lord Jesus' (Ac 8<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>5</sup> etc.), not into the triune name of Mt 28<sup>19</sup>; but the surprise of St. Paul in Ac 19<sup>3</sup> that any one could have been baptized 'without hearing of the Holy Spirit' is that the Holy Spirit was mentioned whenever Christian baptism was dispensed (observe the force of oñ in Ac 19<sup>3</sup>). Expansions of this trinitarian formula constituted what Irenæus calls 'the canon of the truth which one receives at baptism' (Iren. Hær. I. x. 1, and the note in Harvey's ed. vol. i. p. 87 f.). Such expansions, however, are hardly to be found in NT. The brief summaries of Christian fundamentals are usually of a different character. Thus St. Paul mentions, as the elements of his gospel in 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup> Christ's death for sins, His burial, and His resurrection. In 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> there is what is usually considered a liturgical fragment, defining at least for devotional purposes the contents of 'the mystery of godliness,' the open secret of the true religion. There the first emphasis is laid on the Incarnation—He who was manifested in the flesh; and the last on the Ascension—He who was received up in glory. As in the individual confessions mentioned above, Christ is the subject throughout. It is difficult to say whether the summaries of his gospel in which

St. Paul delights, sometimes objective as in Ro 1<sup>8</sup>, sometimes subjective as in 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>, Tit 3<sup>4-7</sup>, influenced the formulation of Christian truth for catechetical purposes, or were themselves due to the need for it; but it is obvious that outlines of gospel teaching, such as the apostles delivered everywhere, must soon have been required and formed. An outline may be referred to in ἡσιν ἔχε ὑγιαίνοντων λόγων—though it may well be the case that something is denoted much more copious than anything we call a creed. A catechist's manual, for instance, such as might contain the bulk of one of our gospels. It is usual to assume that by παράθεκη or παρακαταθήκη (1 Ti 6<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>) is meant 'the faith once delivered to the saints,' in the sense of a creed or deposit of doctrine; and though good scholars dispute this, and suppose the ref. to be to Timothy's vocation as a minister of the gospel, the assumption is probably correct. For in the first passage the παράθεκη is opposed to 'profane babblings about knowledge falsely so called, which have erred concerning the faith'; and it is evidently parallel to the 'form' or 'outline of sound words.' There are several passages in which St. Paul uses the word κήρυγμα to denote the contents of his gospel (Ro 16<sup>25</sup>, Tit 1<sup>3</sup> κήρυγμα δ' ἐπιστεύθην ἐγὼ) in a way which suggests that idea of the gospel which would naturally find embodiment in a creed. The τύπος διδασχῆς of Ro 6<sup>17</sup> is evidently wider than anything we mean by creed. There is one passage in NT (He 6<sup>14</sup>) in which the elementary doctrines of the Christian religion are enumerated, partly from a subjective point of view (faith and faith), partly more objectively (and judgment). In one place the reality of the Incarnation is expressly asserted as the foundation of the Christian religion, and as a test of all 'spirits,' in a tone which had immense influence on early Christian dogma (1 Jn 4<sup>2</sup>). The creeds of Christendom go back to these small beginnings. The tendency to produce them is plainly as old as the work of Christian preaching and teaching; and their legitimate use, as all these NT passages suggest, is to exhibit and guard the truth as it has been revealed in and by Jesus. If it be true that the dogma of Christianity is the Trinity, and that this is the central content of the creeds, it must be remembered that the trinitarian conception of God depends upon the revelation of the Father, and the gift of the Spirit, both of which are dependent on the knowledge of the Son. In other words, it is truth 'as truth is in Jesus.' But on this view of the content of the creeds, we should have to refer for the Scripture basis of them to such passages (besides those quoted above) as 1 Co 12<sup>4-6</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, Jude 20-21, Jn 14-16. Apart from the authenticity of Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, these are sufficient to show how instinctive is the combination of Father, Son, and Spirit in the thought of NT writers, and how completely the problem is set in Christian experience to which the Church doctrine of the Trinity, as embodied in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed, is an answer. The historical, as opposed to theological, statements in the creeds claim to rest on direct Scripture authority.

**CREEPING THINGS.—Much confusion is sometimes occasioned by the fact that two distinct Heb. terms are (frequently) represented by this expression in the EV.

(1) The term which is most correctly so represented is rēmes (רָמַס), from rāmas, to glide or creep:

under this term 'creeping things' are mentioned Gn 1<sup>24, 25</sup> (as created, 'cattle,' and 'beasts of the earth' [i.e. speaking generally, herbivora and carnivora], on the sixth day); 1<sup>26</sup> (as given into the dominion of man, together with the 'fish of the sea,' the 'fowl of the air,' the 'cattle and all beasts' [Pesh.] of the earth'), 6<sup>7, 20</sup> 7<sup>14, 23</sup> 8<sup>17, 19</sup> (as spared, usually together with 'cattle' and 'fowl,' on occasion of the Flood); in other allusions to the animal kingdom, often by the side of 'beasts,' 'cattle,' 'fowl,' or 'fishes,' 1 K 4<sup>33</sup> (5<sup>18</sup>) 'He spake also of cattle, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes,' Hos 2<sup>18</sup> (20); Hab 1<sup>14</sup> (the Chaldean makes men to be 'as the fishes of the sea, as the creeping things, over whom is no ruler'), Ezk 8<sup>10</sup> (figures of the world, ruled by Israelites), 38<sup>20</sup>, Ps 148<sup>10</sup>. In Gn 1: 'RV [RV moving thing], where the term stands by itself, it is used more generally of all creeping things (cf. the verb in Gn 1<sup>28</sup> 'RV moveth, moved'; Ps 104<sup>20</sup>); and in Ps 104<sup>25</sup> of gliding aquatic creatures (cf. the verb in Gn 1<sup>21</sup>, Lv 11<sup>40</sup>, Ps 89<sup>34</sup> (35) [RV moveth]); so also perhaps note the context, esp. v. 15) in Hab 1<sup>14</sup>. The cognate verb is often found closely joined to it, Gn 1<sup>17, 18</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>, Ezk 38<sup>20</sup>; or used synonymously, Gn 1<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>8, 9</sup> (RV teemeth), Lv 20<sup>25</sup> (RV id.), Dt 4<sup>18</sup> (by the side of cattle, fowl, and fish), cf. Lv 11<sup>44</sup> (RV moveth). These are all the occurrences of either the subst. or the verb. From a survey of the passages in which rèmes occurs, especially those (as Gn 1<sup>26</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>3</sup>) in which it stands beside 'beasts,' 'fowls,' and 'fishes,' in popular classifications of the animal kingdom, it is evident that it is the most general term including reptiles, which, especially in the East, would be the most conspicuous and characteristic of living species, when beasts, fowls, and fishes had been excluded. Dillm. and Keil (on Gn 1<sup>24</sup>) both define it as denoting creatures moving on the ground 'either without feet, or with imperfect feet.' It is often defined more precisely by the addition of 'that creepeth upon the earth,' or (Gn 1<sup>25</sup> 6<sup>20</sup>, Hos 2<sup>18</sup>) 'upon the ground.' The term not being a scientific one, it included also, perforce, insects, and possibly even very small quadrupeds, but the limitation of rèmes to the 'smaller quadrupeds of the earth' (to the exclusion of reptiles), which has been devised (Dawson, Modern Science, p. 77, f. 32, v. 25) for the purpose of reconciling the biblical teachings of palæontology, is arbitrary, and cannot be sustained.

(2) The other term, also sometimes unfortunately rendered 'creeping things,' is shêrez (שֶׂרֶץ); this is applied to creatures, whether terrestrial or aquatic, which appear in swarms, and is accordingly best represented by swarming things. It occurs (sometimes with the cognate verb) Gn 1<sup>20</sup> 'let the water swarm with swarming things,' cf. v. 21 'every living soul [see SOUL] that creepeth, wherewith the waters swarmed'; 7<sup>21</sup> (beside fowl and cattle and beast) 'every swarming thing that swarmed upon the earth'; Lv 5<sup>2</sup> 'the carcasses of unclean swarming things'; 11<sup>10</sup> 'of all the swarming things of the waters'; v. 20 (= Dt 14<sup>19</sup>), vv. 21, 23 'winged swarming things' (i.e. flying insects: locusts are instanced); v. 23 'swarming things, that swarm upon the earth' (the weasel, the mouse, and various kinds of lizards are instanced), cf. v. 31 'among all swarming things'; vv. 41, 42, 43 'every swarming thing that swarmeth upon the earth'—including (v. 42) insects with more than four feet, v. 44 'any swarming thing that creepeth upon the earth'; v. 46 'every living soul that glideth (cf. above, No. 1) in the water, and every living soul that swarmeth upon the earth'; 22<sup>5</sup> 'whoso toucheth any swarming thing by which he may become unclean.' The cognate verb shāraz occurs also Ex 8<sup>8</sup> (7<sup>28</sup>) 'the river shall swarm with frogs' (cf.

Ps 105<sup>30</sup>); Ezk 47<sup>9</sup> 'every living soul that swarmeth' (viz. in a river); and fig., of animals generally, Gn 8<sup>17</sup> (RV breed abundantly), and of men, 9<sup>7</sup> (RV id.) Ex 17 (of the Israelites multiplying in Egypt: RV increased abundantly). Shêrez thus denotes creatures that appear in swarms, whether such as teem in the water, or those which swarm on the ground or in the air, i.e. creeping and flying insects, small reptiles, such as lizards, and small quadrupeds, as the weasel and the mouse. Shêrez is not co-extensive; for, though particular animals, as small reptiles, would no doubt be included under either designation, rèmes would not be applied to flying insects, or (at least properly) to aquatic creatures, nor is it certain that it was applied to small quadrupeds, or even to creeping insects; while shêrez would not probably be used of large reptiles, or of any, in fact, which did not usually appear in swarms.

~ CREMATION.—It is sometimes stated that burning was the ordinary mode of disposing of the dead among all ancient nations, except the Egyptians, who embalmed them; the Chinese, who buried them in the earth; and the Jews, who buried them in the sepulchres. This statement requires a good deal of qualification. Lucian tells us that the Greeks burned their dead while the Persians buried them (De Luctu, xxi.); and it is certain that among the Greeks bodies were often buried without being burned (Thuc. i. 134. 6; Plat. Phædo, 115 E; Plut. Lyc. xxvii.). Among the Romans both methods were in use; and Cicero believed that burial was the more ancient (De Legibus, ii. 22. 56). So that Persians, Greeks, and Romans must be added as, at any rate, partial exceptions. Whether religious, or sanitary, or practical reasons were uppermost in deciding between the different methods is uncertain. Where fuel was scarce, cremation would be difficult or impossible.

That the Jews' preference for sepulchres was determined by a belief in the resurrection of the body is very doubtful. The doctrine itself seems to have been of late origin, and modern Jews, who accept the doctrine, do not object to cremation. Nevertheless, their forefathers rarely practised it, and perhaps then only as an alternative to what would be more distasteful. The bodies of Saul and his sons were burned by the men of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 31<sup>12</sup>), perhaps to secure them from further insult by the Philistines, and to make it more easy to conceal the bones. Am 6<sup>10</sup> gives a horrible picture of a whole household having died, and a man's uncle and a servant being the only survivors left to burn the last body. But we are not to understand a plague, or something of the kind. That bodies were burned in the valley of Hinn in times of pestilence is an assertion which lacks support. However large the number of the dead, burial was the manner of disposing of them (Ezk 39<sup>11-16</sup>). The 'very great burning' made for Asa at his burial (2 Ch 16<sup>14</sup>) is not a case of cremation, but of burning spices and furniture in his honour (comp. Jer 34<sup>5</sup>). 'When R. Gamaliel the elder died, Onkelos the proselyte burned in his honour the worth of seventy minæ of Tyrian money' (T. B. Aboda Zara 11a). Comp. 2 Ch 21<sup>19</sup>. Nor is 1 K 13<sup>2</sup> an allusion to cremation. Bones of men previously buried are to be burned on the altar to pollute it and render it abominable.

In the NT there is no instance of cremation, whether Jewish, Christian, or heathen; and there is abundant evidence that the early Christians followed the Jewish practice of burial, with or without embalming (Minuc. Felix, Octav. xxxix.; Tert. Apol. xlii.; Aug. De Civ. Dei, i. 12, 13). It was to outrage this well-known Christian sentiment that persecutors sometimes burned the bodies of the martyrs and scattered their ashes in mockery of the resurrection (Eus. H.E. v. 1. 62, 63; comp. Lact. Inst. vi. 12). The example of the Jews, the fact that Christ was buried, the association of burning with heathen practices, and perhaps rather material views respecting the resurrection, have contributed to make cremation unpopular among Christians. But there is nothing essentially anti-Christian in it: and charity requires us to adopt any reverent manner of disposing of the dead which science may prove to be least injurious to the living.

CRESCENS.—A companion of St. Paul in his final imprisonment, sent by him to Galatia (2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>), i.e. either to Asiatic Galatia,—a view supported by St. Paul's usage elsewhere, and by the context, in which all the other places mentioned lie east of Rome (so Const. Apost. vii. 46; Tillemont, Mémoires sur St. Paul, Note 81, Smith, DB<sup>2</sup> s.v.); or possibly to Gaul (so κ C, reading Γαλλίαν; Euseb. HE iii. 4; Epiph. Hær. 51. 11, Theodore and Theodoret ad 2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>; Lightfoot, Gal. pp 3 and 30). A late Western tradition treats him as the founder of the Churches of Vienne and of Mayence (Gams. Series Episc.). His memory is honoured in the Roman calendar on June 27, in the Greek Menologion . . . and there he is treated as one of the seventy disciples, and a bishop of Chalcedon. [Acta Sanctorum, June 27; Menologion, May 30.] The name is Latin, and is found among the freedmen of Nero (Tac. Hist. i. 76), the centurions (Ann. xv. 11), and the priests of Phœbus (Inscr. Græcæ, Sic. et Ital. 1020).

CRESCENTS.—RV tr. of צִפְרִיִּים Jg 8<sup>21, 26</sup> (AV 'ornaments'), Is 3<sup>18</sup> (AV 'round tires like the moon'). As clearly indicated by its etym. (from Aram. sahrâ, 'moon,' with ôn as diminutive termination,—for which see Barth, Nominalbildg § 212),—the sahrôn was a crescent or moon-shaped ornament of gold (Jg 8<sup>26</sup>), introduced presumably by Syrian traders from Babylonia. In OT we find these crescents worn by Midianite chiefs (Jg 8<sup>26</sup>), by the ladies of Jerus. (Is 3<sup>18</sup>), and hung by the former on the necks of their camels (Jg 8<sup>21</sup>). They were in all probability worn on the breast by a chain round the neck, like the crescents (hilâlât) of a modern Arab. belle (see Del. and Dillm. on Is 3<sup>18</sup>; Kell, Bibl. Archæol. Eng. tr. ii. 149; Nowack, Heb. Arch. i. 129; cf. Jg 8<sup>26</sup>, where the crescents seem to be . . . from the chains by which they were . . . Others (e.g. Moore, Comm. in loc.) consider the latter to have been 'necklaces or collars, the elements of which were little golden crescents.' Originally the crescents were amulets or charms (W. R. Smith in Journ. of Philology, xiv. 122–123; * Wellh. Skizzen, iii. 144), although by Isaiah's time they may have become more purely ornamental.

CRETE.—Crete, the modern Candia, is an island in the Mediterranean, 60 miles to the S. of Greece. Its greatest length from E. to W. is 156 miles, while its width varies from 30 to 7 miles. The orig. inhabitants were prob. a kindred race with those of Asia Minor. C. plays a prominent part in the legendary, as well as in the early historical period. Lying as a convenient stepping-stone between the continents of the Old World, the island was probably colonised by the Dorians in the 3rd generation after their conquest of the Peloponnesus. Homer numbers them together with the Achæans and Pelasgians among the inhabitants. Some striking points of resemblance are noticed by Aristotle (Politics, ii. 10) between the institutions of Sparta and those . . . among them being the military . . . system of common meals. The mythical king Minos, round whom so many legends cluster, is alluded to as a historical person by Thucyd. (i. 4. 8) and Aristotle. He was the first to gain command of the sea; he insured the payment of tribute by the suppression of piracy, and finally failed in an attempt to conquer Sicily. C. was mountainous, fertile, and thickly . . . Its cities were said to be 100 in number (Hom. Il. ii. 649, Virg. Aen. iii. 106), and elsewhere 90 (Hom. Od. xix. 174), the most importa . . . Gortyna (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>), Cydonia, . . . The warlike spirit of the inhabitants, due to their position and training, was fostered by their internal disputes and their fondness for service as mercenaries. Tacitus (Hist. v. 2) says that the Jews were fugitives from C., and connects their name, 'Ιουδαῖοι, with the mountain in the island called Ida. This probably arose from a confusion between the Jews and Philistines, the latter of whom are called Caphtorim, from Caphtor (Dt 2<sup>23</sup>, Am. 9<sup>7</sup>), the country from which they migrated to Pal., and . . . be identified with the Cherethites . . . 30<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 25<sup>16</sup>. In Jer 47<sup>4</sup> the passage

'the Philistines, the remnant of the isle of Caphtor,' has marginal alternative in RV 'of the sea-coast' for 'isle'; and in the LXX (Zeph 2<sup>5</sup>) πάρκοι Κρητῶν is found and is tr. 'inhabitants of the sea-coast, the nation of the Cherethites' (RV), and Κρητῆν (Zeph 2<sup>5</sup>) = 'the sea-coast.' Caphtor may have been a part of Crete, possibly Cydonia on the N. coast, which contained a river, Jardanus (cf. Jordan), Hom. Od. iii. 292. In any case C. was prob. a primitive settlement of the Caphtorim, and the Cretan character resembles in some respects what we know that of the Philistines to have been. The capture of Jerus. by Ptolemy Soter, and the forced emigration of the Jews, B.C. 320, drove many doubtless to C. as well as to Egypt. C. is mentioned in 1 Mac 10<sup>67</sup>. Demetrius Soter, an enemy of the Jews, had retired to a life of self-indulgence in Antioch, and was defeated and killed by the usurper Balas. The latter was in turn attacked by Demetrius Nikator, the son of Soter, who invaded Cilicia from C., and, though joined by Apollonius, the Rom. governor of Coele-Syria, was defeated by Jonathan Maccabæus near Azotus, B.C. 148.

In B.C. 141 Simon Maccabæus, to renew the . . . of his authority, renewed the . . . the Romans, and obtained from . . . the promise of protection for the Jews from the inhabitants of Gortyna in C. (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>). There is no doubt that, after this date, the number of Jews in the island increased greatly. Internal quarrels among the Cretans led to the invitation to Philip IV. of Macedon to act as mediator, but the effects of his intervention were not lasting. C. was taken by the Romans under Metellus, B.C. 67, and joined to Cyrene and made a Roman province. Under Augustus, Creta-Cyrene became a senatorial province governed by a proprætor and a legatus.

Cretans are mentioned (Ac 2<sup>11</sup>) among the strangers present at Jerus. at the Feast of Pentecost.

St. Paul touched at C. in the course of his disastrous voyage to Rome. Starting from Myra in Lycia, in the charge of a centurion, on board a corn ship of Alexandria, since the winds prevented a straight course, he sailed under the lee of C., i.e. S. instead of N. of the island. Skirting the promontory of Salmone (Ac 27<sup>7</sup>), on the E. side, and coasting along the S., the vessel reached an anchorage called Fair Havens, a little to the E. of Cape Matala. Five miles to the E. some ruins have been discovered which may be those of Lasea. This harbour was not considered safe for wintering in, though St. Paul recommended keeping to it. It was not wintering in the year. The Fast, i.e. the great fast, was on the 10th day of the 7th month Ismi, about the time of the autumnal equinox, had passed, and the ancients did not usually sail after the setting of the Pleiades, Oct. 20 (Hesiod, Works and Days, 314, etc.). Nov. The centurion, however, preferred the advice of the master and the owner of the vessel, who wished to reach the shelter of Phoenix on the S.W. of the island. This has usually been identified with Lutro, said to have been called by the ancients Phoenix, the only secure harbour on the S. coast which faced E. (RV). There is no harbour existing at that spot now, but one is marked in some Admiralty charts of the middle of the last cent., and called Lutro. In order to identify Phoenix (Ac 27<sup>12</sup>) with this roadstead, the forced interpretation of the words κατὰ λῆσα καὶ κατὰ πύλον, 'down the S.W. wind and down the N.W. wind,' found in the RVm is adopted. It is better, however, to take the words as in AV in their usual sense, 'lying toward S.W. and N.W.,' esp. as there is a harbour opposite Lutro called Phineka in that position.

On a gentle S. wind springing up, the attempt was made to reach Phoenix, and the vessel coasted along the S. shore of C. There suddenly, however, blew down from the island (κατ' αὐτῆς) a wind, Euragilo E.N.E., in the teeth of which it was found impossible to sail, so it was allowed to scud before the gale to the κεῖρα (or Claudia, AV), 20 miles S. of Cape Matala, the southernmost promontory of the island. Fourteen days later the vessel was wrecked on the coast of Melita.

It is not known who planted Christianity in C. If St. Paul did so, it must have been before his first imprisonment, for it is in the course of a visit while he was κατὰ τὴν πόλιν at Corinth or Ephesus. Perhaps the Church at Melita had been founded by Christian converts. St. Paul seems to imply from his words to Titus (Tit 1<sup>5</sup>), 'For this cause left I thee in C.,' that he had been to the island. The fact that Titus was left to supply all omissions and appoint elders in every city, shows that the Church had been established long enough to admit the presence of irregularities, and had been imperfectly organised.

The untrustworthy character of the Cretans (Κρήτες, Ac 2<sup>1</sup> AV Cretes, Tit 1<sup>2</sup> AV Cretians) was proverbial. St. Paul quotes from one of their own poets, Epimenides (Tit 1<sup>2</sup>), who lived about B.C. 600, and is called by Plato 'a divine man,' that 'they were always liars, evil beasts, idle gluttons.' Witness to their avarice is also borne by Livy (xliv. 45) and Plutarch Æmilius (§23), 'the Cretans are as eager for riches as bees for honey'; to their ferocity and fraud by Polybius and Strabo; and to their mendacity by Callimachus, Hymn in Jov. 8, who begins a line Κρήτες δὲ ψεύδοι with the same words as Epimenides.

CRIB (צִיב).—The earliest meaning of the Eng. word (of which the origin is unknown) is 'a barred receptacle for fodder used in cowsheds and fold-yards; also in fields, for beasts lying out during the winter.' And that is precisely the meaning of the Heb. word 'ebhās (fr. צָבַע to feed), which is used Is 1<sup>3</sup> of a crib for the ass, Pr 14<sup>7</sup> for the ox, Job 39<sup>9</sup> for the 'unicorn,' i.e. wild ox.

J. HASTINGS.

CRICKET.—See LOCUST.

CRIER.—In this form the word is not found in the Bible, but the verb from which it is derived (קָרָא, qadaw) is sometimes used in the sense of crying aloud, or proclaiming. Of Wisdom it is said that she 'crieth in the chief place of concourse,' Pr 1<sup>21</sup>; and in answer to the question of the Jews, 'Who art thou?' the Baptist calls himself 'the voice of one crying in the wilderness,' Jn 1<sup>23</sup>. In ancient times, when men were illiterate, and could not read written mandates, public criers proclaimed the orders of the king or men of authority. In the Middle Ages heralds, preceded by trumpeters who announced their mission, made public proclamations. This custom is still carried out in the E. In every town and village a public crier, distinguished for his loud voice, is appointed to give notice on the part of the authorities of some fresh order. When standing in the streets, or standing on some height, he announces the loss of some article,—sometimes the straying of a young child,—giving a description of the lost object, offering sometimes a reward, and always concluding with a reminder of the divine promise of a 'reward in heaven.' Of this class of public criers is the muezzin among Moslems, who at the five appointed times of prayer mounts the minaret, and, after proclaiming the unity and greatness of God, calls men to 'prayer and eternal happiness.' In the quiet watches of the night this cry, heard from many a minaret, is often very impressive.

J. WORTABET.

CRIME.—About 1611 and earlier, 'crime' was used, like Lat. crimen, in the sense of charge or accusation; as Grafton (1568), Chron. ii. 92, 'The common people rayssed a great crime upon the Archbishop,' and Milton, Par. Lost, ix. 1181—

'But I rue

That error now, which is become my crime
And thou th' accuser.'

In three out of the four occurrences of c. in AV, this is the meaning. In Job 31<sup>12</sup> (קָרָא) the Heb., and presumably the Eng., is crime in the mod. sense. But in Ezk 7<sup>23</sup> 'the land is full of crimes,' the Heb. (רַעוּת וְדָמָא) is 'bloodshed,' or as RVm, 'judgment of blood.' In Ac 25<sup>18</sup> 'the c. (RV 'matter') laid against him,' the Gr. ἐγκλημα means an accusation, and is so used distinctly in the only other occurrence in NT, Ac 23<sup>29</sup> (AV and RV 'charge'). Lastly, in Ac 25<sup>27</sup> 'to signify the crimes laid against him,' the Gr. αἰτία certainly means 'accusation' (RV 'charge') as always in class. Greek. Cf. Ac 25<sup>18</sup> Geneva, 'Against whom when the accusers stood up, they brought no crime of such things as I supposed.'

CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.—A. CRIMES.

—The term occurs in the Scriptures as a tr. of the foll. words:—עָוֶן, Ezk 7<sup>2</sup>; חַטָּא, Job 31<sup>12</sup>; פָּשָׁע, Gn 26<sup>10</sup>; אִרְיָא, Ac 25<sup>27</sup>, changed in RV to 'charges,' and 'fault' in AV Jn 18<sup>38</sup> 19<sup>4</sup> to 'crime'; ἐγκλημα, Ac 25<sup>18</sup>, changed in RV to 'matter.' Crime is an act that subjects the doer to legal punishment: a grave offence, a legal offence, iniquity. If such an act is committed against (1) God or (2) man. It cannot always be maintained, for an injury to the creature is obnoxious to the Creator. For convenience of reference the list appears in alphabetical order.

Adultery in general terms was forbidden in the seventh commandment (Ex 20<sup>14</sup>). It usually denotes sexual intercourse of a married woman with any other man than her husband, or of a married man with any other than his wife. More specifically in the Isr. as well as Rom. law, the term was confined to illicit intercourse of a married or betrothed woman with any other man than her husband. Other unchaste relations were disapproved, but they were described by different words. It was deemed an outrageous crime, striking at the laws of inheritance and inflicting a spurious curse on the husband, and was to be punished leviticus 20<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>20-22</sup>, Ezekiel 16<sup>38, 40</sup>, by the act of stoning, John 8<sup>9</sup>. It has been seriously doubted whether the extreme penalty was executed, Lightfoot failing to find the record of a single instance, except of a priest's daughter who was burnt according to the order, but she was unmarried. A bondmaid was only scourged (Leviticus 19<sup>20</sup>). Mutilation of nose and ears is mentioned (Ezekiel 23<sup>29</sup>). See Mutilation. Divorce became a substitute for severer penalties. The word is used to describe the unfaithfulness of the covenant people who dissolved their relation with God (Jeremiah 2<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>27</sup> 31<sup>32</sup>, Hosea 8<sup>9</sup>), and those who rejected Christ are described as an 'adulterous generation' (Mattew 12<sup>29</sup> 16<sup>1</sup>, Mark 8<sup>33</sup>).

Affray.—He who inflicted an injury was required to pay for loss of time and the medical expenses, and an especial consideration for a pregnant woman indirectly injured (Exodus 21<sup>18, 19, 20-22</sup>). A certain form of vicious attempt was to be summarily and pitilessly punished (Deuteronomy 27<sup>11, 12</sup>).

Murder.—The penalty of retaliation. The ger as well as the home-born was protected (Leviticus 24<sup>17-22</sup>).

Bestiality, treated as a rank and mortal offence (Exodus 22<sup>19</sup>, Leviticus 18<sup>23</sup> 20<sup>15, 16</sup>). The Talm. gives as a reason for slaughter of the beast, that all memory of the low transaction might be obliterated. The crime was charged on the Canaanites, and was said to exist in Egypt.

Blasphemy.—An irreverent use of the name of God, accompanied with cursing (Leviticus 24<sup>10-14</sup>); a presumptuous deed, or, RV, an act done 'with a high hand' (Nu 15<sup>30</sup>); contempt towards God. See separate article.

Breach of Covenant.—In this term are included: (1) A failure to observe the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 23<sup>29</sup>); work on that day (Leviticus 23<sup>28</sup>). (2) The Sacrifice of Children to Molech (Leviticus 20<sup>9</sup>). (3) Neglect to Circumcise the holy seed (Gen 17<sup>14</sup>, Ex 4<sup>24</sup>). (4) An unauthorized manufacture of the holy Oil (Ex 30<sup>25</sup>), and (5) Anointing a stranger therewith (Ex 30<sup>23</sup>). (6) Neglect of the Passover (Nu 9<sup>14</sup>).

Breach of Ritual.—(1) Eating Blood, whether of fowl or beast (Leviticus 7<sup>27</sup> 17<sup>14</sup>); because God has sanctified the life to Himself. (2) Eating Fat of the beast of sacrifice (Leviticus 7<sup>25</sup>); regarded as insanitary. (3) Eating Leavened Bread during the passover (Ex 12<sup>15, 17</sup>). (4) Offering a sacrifice after the appointed time (Leviticus 19<sup>8</sup>). See 7<sup>15-18</sup>. (5) Failure to bring an Offering when an animal is slaughtered for food (Leviticus 17<sup>4</sup>). The notion that such was dedicated to a deity existed even in Egypt. (6) Offering a sacrifice while the worshipper is in an Unclean condition (Leviticus 7<sup>20, 21</sup> 22<sup>3, 4, 9</sup>). (7) Manufacturing holy Ointment for private use (Ex 30<sup>12, 34</sup>). Perfume was regarded by the Semites as a holy thing (Pliny, xii. 54; see W. R. Smith, JS p. 433). (8) Using the same for Perfume (Ex 30<sup>28</sup>). (9) Neglect of Purification in general (Nu 19<sup>13, 20</sup>). The offering 'defileth the tabernacle of the Lord.' Cf. 1 Cor 3<sup>17</sup>. (10) Slaughtering an animal for food away from the door of the Tabernacle (Leviticus 17<sup>4, 9</sup>). The order was designed to enforce religious proprieties in eating, and to prevent formal worship elsewhere. Even the ger must comply. (11) Touching holy things (RV the sanctuary) illegally (Nu 4<sup>15, 18-20</sup>). See 2 S 6<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 26<sup>11</sup>.

Breach or Betrayal of Trust, including false dealing 'in a matter of deposit, or of bargain, or of robbery, or oppression,' and involving the concealment of stolen goods, was regarded as a crime to which not only a penalty was attached, but a sacrificial service was required for expiation (Leviticus 6<sup>2-7</sup>). In this may be included breach of contract, which was also severely condemned in the religion of the ancient Persians (Zend. Farg. iv.). The removal of landmarks as set by God is an offence that exposes to the divine curse, Dt 19<sup>14</sup> 27<sup>17</sup> (Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 18.). It was wrong to move them when set by the fathers (Pr 22<sup>28</sup> 23<sup>10</sup>).

Bribery in general was forbidden, Ex 23<sup>8</sup>, Dt 16<sup>19</sup>, and condemned, 2 Ch 19<sup>7</sup>, Job 15<sup>34</sup>, Ps 26<sup>10</sup>, Pr 6<sup>35</sup> 17<sup>23</sup>, Is 1<sup>23</sup> 33<sup>15</sup>, Ezk 22<sup>12</sup>. It was a vice to which rulers seem to have been addicted (1 S 8<sup>3</sup> 12<sup>8</sup> Am 5<sup>12</sup>).

Burglary.—See Robbery.

Debt, while it might be a misfortune, could be incurred so as to expose to penalty where the insolvency was the result of fraud or neglect (Mt 5<sup>28</sup> 18<sup>28-34</sup>). Perhaps it was inflicted to deter others, rather than to act against the offender. In Egypt he was subjected to the bastinado (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 1854, ii. 211). See separate article.

Divination.—See MAGIC and sep. art.

Drunkenness, a vice which, in view of its consequences, may be regarded as a crime (Is 28<sup>1, 2, 7</sup> 56<sup>12</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>32</sup> RV). Religious abstinence from strong drink was viewed in the same light as abstaining from unclean meats (W. R. Smith, JS p. 465). Abstinence was required of a Nazirite, Jg 13<sup>4</sup>, and commanded, Jer 35<sup>5</sup>. Inebriety is forbidden in the Koran. See STRONG DRINK and DRUNKENNESS.

Fornication, a sexual vice that was common before the time of Moses, being grossly prevalent in Egypt, as shown in Gn 39<sup>7</sup> and the evidence of the monuments; also in Babylonia (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, iii. 30). Prostitution, a heinous crime (Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 9), was not tolerated by the Sin. code, being an abomination in the sight of God (Lev 19<sup>29</sup>, Dt 23<sup>17-18</sup>). Its price could not be accepted in the sanctuary, Mic 1<sup>7</sup>, and death by stoning was the penalty for an unmarried woman who had concealed her crime, Dt 22<sup>20, 21</sup>. It would seem from the term 'strange woman,' in Pr 2<sup>16</sup>, that harlots were procured from foreigners. By the Koran a courtesan was not allowed to testify, and, according to the Zendavesta, she might be killed without warrant, like a snake. Her vile methods and their terrible effects are severely portrayed in Pr 2<sup>16-19</sup> 5<sup>3-6</sup> 7<sup>5-27</sup>, and as arousing the displeasure of God, Jer 5<sup>7</sup>, Am 2<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>. Such excesses were very common among the heathen in the time of the apostles (1 Co 5<sup>1-5, 10</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>, Gal 5<sup>19</sup>, Eph 5<sup>3</sup>). Terms for this vice are frequently used in a symbolical sense, the chosen nation being represented as a harlot or adulteress (Is 1<sup>21</sup>, Jer 2<sup>20</sup>, Ezk 16, Hos 1<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). Idolatry itself is so designated (Jer 3<sup>8, 9</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>25, 29</sup> 23<sup>37</sup>). Fornication is a type of unholy alliances in the Bk. of Rev, especially in chs. 17, 18, and 19.

Homicide, which consists in taking human life without hatred or thirst of blood, or by mistake or accident, included cases like that of the owner of an ox which gored a man when it was not known to be vicious (Ex 21<sup>28</sup>); the slaying of a thief overtaken in the night (Ex 22<sup>2, 3</sup>); taking life without premeditation, or by casting a stone or missile at random (Nu 35<sup>22-29</sup>), or by the slipping of an axe-head from its helve (Dt 19<sup>5</sup>). See Dt 22<sup>2</sup> and art. GOEL.

Idolatry.—See separate article.

Incest.—Carnal intercourse is treated as criminal when between a man and his mother, step-mother, half-sister, grand-daughter, step-sister, aunt, wife of an uncle, daughter-in-law, sister-in-law, step-daughter, step-grand-daughter (Lev 18<sup>8-18</sup>); or his mother-in-law (Dt 27<sup>20, 22</sup>). Mention of an own sister is omitted as too gross to consider.

Infanticide.—See Murder.

to deceive by speaking an untruth, was forbidden in the Mosaic law (Lv 19:11), and included in the category of sins against God. It was a common evil among Oriental people, but contrasted with the prophets especially fulminated against the effort to lead the people astray by false teaching (Is 9:15 28:15, 17, Jer 14:14 27:10, 14, 15, 18, Ezk 21:29, Mic 1:4, Zec 13:3, and many other passages). Falsehood is severely rebuked in Ps 62:119<sup>69</sup>, Pr 14:25 19:2. In NT it is regarded as a sin odious to God (Ac 5:3-4); contrary to the essence of the gospel (1 Jn 1:6 2:21-27); and justifying the perpetrator for the new order (Rm 21:1-22:15). It is associated with perjury (1 Ti 1:10). See OATH, WITNESS, and LYING.

Malice, that was made apparent in tale-bearing, lying in wait for blood, secret hatred, and bearing a grudge, is condemned (Lv 19:16-18).

Murder, according to the divine word, is a crime against which all nature revolts (Gn 4:10, 23, 24). The sanctity of human life is founded on the fact that man was made in the image of God (Gn 9:6). Murder may be instigated by hatred (Nu 35:20, 21); or by thirst for blood, prompted by premeditated design (Dt 19:11); or accomplished by devilish stratagem (Ex 21:14). Assassination is an aggravated form in which life is destroyed by surprise or unexpected assault and treacherous violence (2 S 4:7-12), and the following instances occur: Egion, Jg 3:20-22; Ishbosheth, 2 S 4:5-6; Nadab, 1 K 15:27, 28; Sennacherib, 2 K 19:17, 2 Ch 32:21; Gedaliah, Jer 41:2. In the times of Felix and Festus there appeared a fanatical faction of Jewish patriots known as Sicarii, armed with daggers, who, about unobserved among the people, in seasons, removed opponents by assassination, and then feigned deep sorrow to avert suspicion. See Ac 21:38 (Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 5, Wars, ii. xii. 3, ii. xvii. 6, iv. vii. 2, ix. 5, vii. viii. 1, x. i. xi. 1; Schürer, HJP i. ii. 178, 185). There is no mention of parricide and infanticide in the Mosaic code, as if these crimes were not known to exist or be possible. In Egypt the parent was doomed to embrace the corpse of the child for three days (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii. 209); and while the Koran condemned prenatal murder as well, E. H. Palmer states in a note to Koran vi. 137, that female children were buried alive in Arabia. The following cases of suicide appear: Saul and his armour-bearer, 1 S 31:4-5; Ahithophel, 2 S 17:23; Zimri, 1 K 16:18; Judas Iscariot, Mt 27; also Ptolemy Macron, 2 Mac 10:18, and Razis, 2 Mac 14:42-46. It could be treated as a crime by the Jews (Jos. Wars, iii. viii. 5), but there is no mention of penalty in the Scriptures. Murder in all its forms is forbidden in Ex 20:13, Dt 5:17. No sanctuary was to be allowed to the criminal (Ex 21:12, Lv 24:17, 21, Nu 35:16, 18, Dt 19:13, 1 K 2:28-34). In poetic thought the voice of blood shed cried for vengeance until the murderer was punished (Gn 4:10). A woe is pronounced on the city that is regarded as guilty (Ezk 24:6-8); and when unsuccessful at the most diligent efforts, in detecting the criminal (Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 16), it must by an elaborate and impressive ceremony exonerate itself (Dt 21:9). So sacred was the regard for human life, that the owner of an ox known to be vicious and causing death was held guilty of a capital crime, and the ox was stoned (Ex 21:28). In Egypt, he who witnessed a murder without giving information of it was considered particeps criminis.

Irreverence and Unkindness to Parents.—The command to honour father and mother (Ex 20:12), also inculcated in the Koran (xvii. 24, 25), rests on a sacred relation corresponding to that of the divine creation. God's majesty is violated when parents are dishonoured (Ex 22:14). Hence the following are prohibited: (1) Cursing father or mother (Ex 21:17, Lv 20:9). This offence in practice are condemned (Mk 7:9-12). (2) Striking (Ex 21:15). This was a capital crime (Dt 21:15-21). It is possible that insolence to parents was condonable by reformation, and there are evidences that the laws were not invariably executed with extreme rigour. Jos. (Ant. xvi. xi. 2) recounts an ineffectual attempt of Herod at Berytus to get rid of his sons on this charge.

Prophesying Falsely.—See PSEPHECY.

Prostitution.

Rape, a foul crime that demanded capital punishment (Dt 22:25). See Seduction.

Robbery, when the act is accompanied with violence, as burglary, placed the offender beyond protection (Ex 22:2). The Egypt. law was similar. Various degrees of the crime were recognized, it being a capital offence to take the 'devoted thing' (Jos 7:23), or to steal a man (Ex 21:16, Dt 24:7). See Kidnapping.

Sabbath-Breaking.—See SABBATH.

Seduction consisted in the enticement of an unbetrothed virgin, for which restitution was to be made by subsequent marriage, unless the father interposed an obstacle, but then the usual dowry was exacted (Ex 22:15). In Dt 22:28 it is stated that a fine of 50 shekels was required, and there is no hint of possible compromise. Selden (Heb. Laws) states that the Sanhedrin added other mulcts, because this was so important one for the shame and dishonour; and the loss of virginity and the vitiating of the body, and still another if force had been used; and some account was taken of the quality and station of the person injured (see W. R. Smith, RS 276). An offending bondmaid was scourged, and her enticer, besides paying the fine, must make a trespass-offering (Lv 19:20-22).

Slander was prohibited, though no punishment is named (Ex 23:1) except when a wife's chastity was falsified (Ex 23:18). See separate article.

Swearing.—but positively condemned in Ex 23:1. It was regarded as an abomination (Lv 18:22 20:10). On this crime the Koran and Zendavesta likewise are very severe. The Israelites were not always innocent. It was an evil practised in the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem, and in the temple of the Lord at Heliopolis, which shows that both males and females were set apart for such flagitious uses; but if allowed in heathen temples, it was never to be permitted in the worship of J', Dt 23:17, 1 K 14:24 15:12 22:26, 2 K 23:7, Job 36:14, Hos 4:14 (W. R. Smith, RS 133).

Speaking Evil of Rulers.—In the theocracy rulers are regarded as standing in the place of God, and so all reproachful words are prohibited. In Ex 22:28, Jg 5:3, 1 S 2:25, Ps 82:2-6 the term עֲלֵי is used so as to imply that judges or legal officers are divine representatives.

Swearing Falsely was never excusable even on behalf of the poor (Ex 20:16 23:1-3); but when it was directed against the innocent, it was so aggravated a crime as to permit of no reprieve or pity (Dt 19:16-21). See LYING and OATH.

Theft involved the culprit, when convicted, in fines of varying grades, and it has been thought, from Pr 6:30, 31 compared with Ex 22:1, that the evil was more prevalent in the later history of the people. Harmer (Observations, ii. 194) shows that it was shameful to steal in a caravanserai (Sir 41:19). In later times it was not considered a crime to steal from a Samaritan or another thief.

Uncleanliness as the result of incontinence, lack of restraint, or self-abuse, was forbidden directly (Lv 18:19 20:15); marked with the divine displeasure (Gn 38:10); and indirectly disapproved (Lv 15:1-18). The Zendavesta pronounces a similar condemnation.

and allows of no atonement for the last-named. See separate article.

Usury might not be taken from Isr. brethren, although the foreigner (nokhri) was expressly excluded from this and amman (Ex 22<sup>25</sup>, Dt 23<sup>20, 21</sup>). The practice was forbidden by Egypt. laws, and is reprobated in the Koran (xxx. 38). In various passages those who abstain from the evil are commended (Dt 15<sup>7-11</sup> 24<sup>13</sup>, Ps 15<sup>5</sup> 37<sup>21, 26</sup> 112<sup>5</sup>, Pr 19<sup>17</sup>, Ezk 18<sup>17</sup>). Extortionate and amman dealing is condemned (Job 22<sup>6</sup> 24<sup>3, 7</sup>). S

B. PUNISHMENTS.—Punishment is defined as 'pain or any other penalty on a person for a crime or offence by an authority to which the offender is subject; any pain or detriment suffered in consequence of wrong-doing' (Standard Dict.). This article will describe some forms of suffering inflicted on victims who might not be guilty of legal offences. Various words in OT are tr. by 'punishment,' but the Heb. word that most frequently represents the idea is yaḥ, in the sense of 'visit.' In NT epitima (as a tr. of kólasis and epitima; 1 Co 11<sup>19</sup>, epitima (2 Co 2<sup>6</sup>), ekdiknōis (1 P 2<sup>14</sup>). Its purpose is not so much to execute vengeance as to deter from further violations, so that the offender will hear and fear and do no more presumptuously' (Dt 17<sup>13</sup> 19<sup>30</sup>). It was the belief of the Israelites that crimes were encouraged by indulgence (Jos. Ant. vi. vii. 4). The ancient Parsees taught that crime was punished in the next as well as in this world (Darmesteter, Sac. Bks. E. p. xvi). The term is properly restricted to penalty for violation of law; but suffering has often been imposed on the innocent and weak, as if these had transgressed order, when it meant no more than the arbitrary will of one in superior authority. Punishment may extend to the forfeiture of life, and is then known in common law as Capital. In the Bible one thus liable is described as having committed a sin of death (Dt 22<sup>20</sup>); a sin worthy of death (Dt 21<sup>21</sup>). Such as he are said to be 'sons of death' (1 S 20<sup>31</sup> 26<sup>16</sup>, 2 S 12<sup>5</sup>), or 'men of death' (19<sup>28</sup>). 'He shall be put to death for his own sin' (Dt 24<sup>16</sup>, 2 K 14<sup>9</sup>). See also Jn 8<sup>21, 24</sup>: 'Ye shall die in your sin.' Various modes of inflicting the penalty are mentioned, some of them as legally authorized among the chosen people, and others as administered by other nations or without regular warrant. The larger class of penalties was of secondary grade, and various means were devised to punish the offender and deter others from amman.

are either alluded to or mentioned in the Bible and the historical or literary works of the people of Israel:—

Anathema (ἀνάθεμα).—See sep. art. CURSE.

Banishment.—There was no provision in the Mosaic code for exile, unless it is to be understood that in some instances he who was cut off from the congregation was expelled from his country as well as from his people. Temporary exclusion was ordered in the case of Miriam (Nu 12<sup>15</sup>). In the Pers. period it appears as a possible amman (Ezr 7<sup>28</sup> (Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iii. 194). In the authority resorted to this measure in the case of John, the author of the Apoc. (1<sup>9</sup>), and it was much dreaded by the Jews (Jos. Ant. xvi. i. 1). A wholesale deportation, as a military measure, was made by Sargon, king of Assyria (2 K 18<sup>11</sup>). The flight of Absalom to Geshur to escape his father's displeasure after Amnon's assassination (2 S 13<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>13, 14</sup>), and of Jeroboam to Egypt to avoid king Solomon (1 K 11<sup>40</sup>), are cases of voluntary exile, but not formal punishment.

Beating (τυπαινισμός, He 11<sup>38</sup>).—The bastinado was in common use among the Egyptians for thefts, petty frauds, and breach of trust. With it the male adulterer was punished. In minor offences a stick was used. A debtor was often beaten (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 210 ff.). In Assyria a mace was used to crush the skull (Layard, Nim. and Bab. 458). Though designed as a chastisement for slaves by the Greeks, a amman was beaten to death (2 Mac 6<sup>19, 23, 29</sup>).

Beheading.—A capital punishment not sanctioned in Mosaic law, but frequently practised among the Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, and others. A cut in Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies shows the victim while the executioner seizes him by the hair in despatching him. In this way the chief baker who incurred Pharaoh's displeasure may have suffered (Gn 40<sup>19</sup>), the subsequent amman of the body being an added reproach. It is doubtful whether the seven sons of Gideon were thus slain, Jg 9<sup>5</sup> (see Slaying with Spear or Sword). Ahab's seventy sons lost their heads by command of Jehu (2 K 10<sup>6-8</sup>). The head of John the Baptist was severed by order of Herod (Mt 14<sup>10</sup>, Mk 6<sup>27</sup>). Thus also suffered James the Apostle (Ac 12<sup>2</sup>). Many of the early Christians were beheaded (Rev 20<sup>4</sup>). The head of amman was removed after death (2 S 4<sup>9</sup>). Whether Sheba was slain before he was beheaded is not stated (2 S 20<sup>21-22</sup>).

Blinding.—The only legal authority for putting out the eyes under the Mosaic dispensation would be found indirectly in the law of retaliation 'an eye for an eye' (Ex 21<sup>24</sup>, Lv 24<sup>20</sup>, Dt 19<sup>15-20</sup>), and therefore the punishment would be seldom inflicted. There is an indistinct reference to something of this sort in boring out the eyes of the spies (Nu 16<sup>14</sup>). As practised by the Assyrians, the Assyrians and Babylonians sometimes used hot irons for the purpose, it was rather designed to incapacitate the victim from rebellion, revolt, or the power of doing further harm. Thus Samson suffered (Jg 16<sup>21</sup>). Zedekiah lost his eyes partly as a vindictive visitation, but more to effectually unfit him for rulership (2 K 25<sup>7</sup> and Jer 52<sup>11</sup>). In Persia it was inflicted for rascality, thieving, and rebellion. Criminals were not permitted to look on the face of the king (Est 7<sup>8</sup>). Nahash the Ammonite threatened that he would thrust out the right eyes of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead as a reproach on Israel, 1 S 11<sup>2</sup> (Rawlinson, Anc. Mon.; Harmer, Observations).

Branding and Burning.—It has been surmised that in some cases where burning was inflicted as the amman for unchastity, it meant branding on the forehead as a mark of shame. If, however, the extreme penalty is intended, it is represented as of pre-Mosaic authority, and was proposed for Tamar (Gn 38<sup>24</sup>). The Sinaitic law directs that a priest's daughter shall be burned for fornication (Lv 21<sup>9</sup>); and that this shall be the form of punishment for incest with a wife's mother (Lv 20<sup>14</sup>). Fire from the Lord slew Nadab and Abihu (Lv 10<sup>1-3</sup>). Branding alive or scorching was practised by the Egyptians, and associated with a sort of confiscation (12<sup>9</sup>); also by the Babylonians and Chaldeans (Jer 29<sup>22</sup>). Esarhaddon burned a king alive (G. Smith, Assyr. Discover.), and burning was attempted on Shadrach and his companions (Dn 3). There is an allusion to the amman in 2 Mac 7<sup>5</sup>. Tradition states that Abraham was cast into the fiery furnace for refusing to worship Chald. gods (Targum, Bab. and Aram.; Koran xxi. 68, xxxvii. 95). Cf. Gn 11<sup>31</sup> with Neh 9<sup>7</sup>, where amman, may be pointed as light (of a flame). The pouring of molten lead down the throat (Jahn, Bibl. Arch.) has no other authority than that of Rabbin. statement. Slaves were sometimes branded on the hand (Is 44<sup>5</sup>), but such disfigurement was forbidden by Jewish law (Lv 19<sup>28</sup>; cf. Gal 6<sup>7</sup>). Branding accompanied deportation by the Persians (Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iii. 194).

Braying or Pounding in a Mortar.—This act is mentioned in Ps. 135 as the cure of a fool. RV 'be bruised as with a pestle among corn' (see Nestle, Cheyne, etc.). Tennant (1885, etc.) it still remains as have been charged with such cruelty, and a king of Canday is said to have compelled a wife to pound her infant child to death. There is probable allusion to this form of punishment in He 11<sup>35, 36</sup>, where the faithful are said to have been tortured or beaten (ἐρτυπασθησαν), and to have had trial of scourgings. It is said that Eleazar was beaten on an instrument like a drum (2 Mac 6<sup>20</sup>), and Jos. (De. Macc. 5, 9) mentions a wheel (τροχός) as an instrument of torture. Hazael put men under sledges with iron spikes (2 K 8<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>32, 33</sup>, with Am 1<sup>8, 4</sup>), to which also the Ammonites were probably subjected (2 S 12<sup>31</sup>, 1 Ch 20<sup>3</sup>). The Talm. is quoted by Lightfoot as saying that Nebuzaradan used iron rakes on some of his captives (Jer 39<sup>9</sup> 52<sup>23-30</sup>).

Confiscation.—An act for which נָחַץ is made in the Mosaic economy, but it is a modified form by Pers. rule, so that a residence might be destroyed; but no mention is made of the forfeiture of property for the benefit of the State (Ezr 6<sup>11</sup>, Dn 3<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>2</sup>). The act described in Ezr 7<sup>26</sup> seems to convey the idea of modern confiscation.

Cutting off from the People (כָּטַף מִן הָעָם, LXX ἐξολοθρεύω).—A term used in Gn 17<sup>14</sup> as penalty for neglect of circumcision, and in the law to be employed as a punishment for certain breaches (1) in morals, (2) in the Abrahamic covenant, and (3) in the Levitical ritual. For immorality such as filial irreverence, incest, and unclean connexions, the offender, in at least seven cases, was exposed to death (Lv 18<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>9-21</sup>). In the latter he who does aught presumptuously (RV 'with a high hand'), that is, wilful sin in general, was liable (Nu 15<sup>30-31</sup>). In the breach of the covenant it may be doubted whether the extreme penalty of death was inflicted, as in Ex 30<sup>33</sup>, Lv 23<sup>20, 30</sup>, are instances where the punishment for offences that were kindred to such as are expressly designated as a breach of ritual, meant death. Such are the cases of (1) Nadab and Abihu (Lv 10<sup>1-2</sup>); (2) Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16<sup>33</sup>). These 'perished from the congregation' (see Nu 12<sup>12</sup>, in which it is stated that Miriam, for leprosy, was 'as one dead' in her temporary exclusion). The punishment in general seems so severe that it has been suggested that it was possibly voidable either by an elaborate atonement on the offender's part (Nu 15<sup>27-31</sup>), or by a divine commutation, the penalty being recorded but not executed. In some instances it meant, perhaps, only deprivation of certain civil and social privileges. There are two such cases: (1) when the people ate of the blood in one of Saul's campaigns (1 S 14<sup>32</sup>); (2) when king Uzziah offered incense (2 Ch 26<sup>19, 20</sup>). On the other hand, in Ex 31<sup>14</sup> the meaning of the penalty as attached to Sabbath-breaking is interpreted as death.†

* The plural קָטַף apparently means 'kinsfolk,' 'relatives,' so that 'cut off from his (their) people' is a better rendering than 'from the people.'

† It may be questioned whether, when 'cut off from his people' stands alone, anything more is intended than to express strongly the divine disapproval under threat of excommunication. Cf. I will cut off, Lv 17<sup>10</sup> 20<sup>9</sup> [all H], and see Nowack, Heb. Arch. i. 883 f. and Dilim. on Gn 17<sup>14</sup>.

Divine Visitation.—In the theocratic economy there were certain sins for which the nation at large suffered. The punishment was considered as inflicted by the divine hand, the visitation itself being manifestly due to no human instrumentality, though man was sometimes the executioner of God's will. Divine condemnation was executed against idolatry, oppression of the poor, covetousness, which betokened a rebellious or unholy spirit, or for which an individual could not obtain redress. Human agencies might be employed in the administration of the penalty, but God Himself was regarded as the avenger of the wrong. He it was who led the people, for their wickedness, into captivity (Ezr 9<sup>7</sup>, Jer 15<sup>2</sup>, Am 9<sup>4</sup>), threatened them with the curse (Dt 28<sup>15-20</sup>, Jer 24<sup>9</sup>), with consumption and fever (Lv 26<sup>16</sup>), and inflammation and fiery heat (Dt 28<sup>22</sup>), caused the drought (Dt 11<sup>17</sup> 28<sup>23, 24</sup>, Is 5<sup>8</sup>, Jer 14<sup>1-7</sup> 50<sup>38</sup>, Hag 1<sup>10, 11</sup>), and famine (Lv 26<sup>26</sup>, Jer 24<sup>10</sup> 34<sup>17</sup>, Rev 6<sup>8</sup>), kindled a consuming fire (Dt 4<sup>24</sup>, Is 66<sup>16</sup>, He 12<sup>29</sup>), showed His indignation by hail and tempest (Is 30<sup>30</sup>, Hag 2<sup>17</sup>), inflicted pestilence and plague (Ezk 6<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>15</sup>), exposed to the taunt of proverb and reproach (Dt 28<sup>37</sup>, 2 Ch 7<sup>20</sup>, Jer 24<sup>9</sup>), smote with scourge (Is 10<sup>28</sup> 28<sup>15, 18</sup>), and with the sword in the hands of enemies, as shown in so many passages that the reader may consult a concordance for a complete view of these and all other providential punishments named. His displeasure at Korah was shown by the earthquake (Nu 16<sup>30</sup>). Idolatry was punished by captivity. Perjury invited drought and famine (Schurer, HJP II. ii. 91).

Drowning was not distinctively a Jewish punishment. It was the penalty in Babylonia for the wife who repudiated her husband (Encyc. Brit. art. 'Babylonia'). Jerome, however, says that offenders were thus sometimes put to death among the Jews as well as among the Romans. There is an allusion to this mode of dying in Mt 18<sup>6</sup>, Mk 9<sup>42</sup>. Jos. (Ant. XIV. xv. 10) states that some Galileans revolted and drowned the partisans of Herod.

Exposure to Wild Beasts.—Daniel and his enemies were cast into a den of lions (Dn 6), and the practice of exposing offenders is said to be still in vogue in the East. In the use of a strong figure in Mic 4<sup>13</sup> human beings are represented as being gored or trodden by beasts. The lion from whom St. Paul was said to be delivered (2 Ti 4<sup>17</sup>) undoubtedly means Nero. No conclusive exegesis has been given of 1 Co 15<sup>32</sup>. Many are of the opinion that human foes are described, but there is some plausible argument in favour of the literal view. The inroads of wild animals, as by an act of God, are to be regarded as a punishment of Israel for unfaithfulness (Lv 26<sup>22</sup>, Dt 32<sup>24</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>26</sup>). The disobedient prophet, named Jadon according to Jos. (Ant. VIII. ix. 1), met death from God by a lion (1 K 13<sup>26</sup>). Contrariwise, the righteous are protected (Job 5<sup>23</sup>, Hos 2<sup>13</sup>).

Fines were permitted as the option of the injured party as a special privilege to freedmen (slaves being punished), and in earliest times the money was presented to the priest or at the sanctuary. It was not in accordance with Sem. doctrine to compel the aggrieved to accept material compensation (W. R. Smith, RS 329, 378). In the case of a mortal result, the mulct which might be in lieu of corporal penalty was called 'ransom' (RV 'redemption of life' Lv 21<sup>30</sup>), but was never allowed for wilful murder (Nu 35<sup>31, 32</sup>). The specific amount was generally left to be determined by the judicial tribunal (Ex 21<sup>22, 30</sup>), but the sum for fatal injury by an ox to a servant was fixed at 30 shekels (Ex 21<sup>32</sup>), for humbling an unbetrothed virgin at 50 shekels (Dt 22<sup>29</sup>), and the highest amount named is for slander and for a woman's chastity, 100 shekels (Dt 22<sup>19</sup>). See Lev. 24:10-11.

Flaying is mentioned (fig.) Mic 3<sup>2-3</sup>. It was a practice in Assyria the victim may have previously died. Anc. Mon. i. 478; Layard, Nin. and Bab.; Mon. of Nin. The Persians would flay and then crucify (Rawlinson, iii. 246; also recognized in the Zendavesta). Herodotus (iv. 64, v. 25) states that Persians and Scythians used the skins so obtained.

Hanging consisted usually in the suspension of the lifeless form as a mark of reproach. By this David showed his disapproval of the slaughter of Ishbosheth (2 S 4<sup>12</sup>). The person whose body was so exposed was 'accursed of God' (Dt 21<sup>23</sup>, Gal 3<sup>13</sup>), and for this reason it might not remain in view over night (Jos 8<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>26</sup>). This word is used for the act of impaling (ἀνασκολοπιῆν, Ezr 6<sup>11</sup>), a common custom in Assyria. A sharp-pointed stake in a perpendicular position penetrated the body just below the breast-bone (Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. i. 477). It was frequent in Persia. Darius impaled (Layard, Nin. and Bab. 295 n.; Mon. of Nin. 3). The Philistines gibbeted (on crosses, Jos. Ant. vi. xiv. 8) the dead bodies of Saul and Jonathan (1 S 31<sup>10</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>12-13</sup>). Other Greek words used to represent this act are ἐξηλίδειν and παράδειγματίζειν, for which the Vulg. uses crucifigere (see CROSS); and so St. Paul, 1 Cor. 10:17 to the accepted exegesis of the time, 1 Cor. 10:17 to the ignominy of Jesus. Execution on the gallows was not prescribed for any crime in the Mosaic code. There is a difference of opinion whether the chief baker (Gn 41<sup>18</sup>) lost his life by being hanged by the neck (see Lev. 24:10-11), or whether he was executed by the sword (see Lev. 24:10-11, ii. 213). In later history offenders were hanged by the hands (La 5<sup>12</sup>, Targ. 12), and in 1 Mac 1<sup>61</sup> it is stated that dead children were hanged to the necks of their mothers. Ahithophel (2 S 17<sup>23</sup>) and Judas (Mt 27, Ac 1<sup>18</sup>) voluntarily, in chagrin and remorse, took their lives by hanging. There is an apparent allusion to this form of punishment in 1 K 20<sup>34</sup>. The Gibeonites may have adopted this method of vengeance on the sons of Saul (2 S 21<sup>9</sup>), because it was in vogue among the aboriginal nations of the land. Stanley (Hist. Jew. Ch. ii. 37) says the victims were first crucified, then suspended. Under the Persian rule there was resort to the gallows (py, but called 'tree' in Gn 40<sup>13</sup>, Dt 21<sup>22</sup>) for punishing the conspirators against Ahasuerus (Est 2<sup>3</sup>, Haiman (7<sup>10</sup>) and his ten sons (9<sup>14</sup>); possibly the same as impalement.

Imprisonment.—Offenders were confined by the Israelites as well as other nations. The prison was often used merely for a place of confinement until the pleasure of the court was known. So Joseph by Potiphar (Gn 39<sup>20-21</sup>); the son of Shelomith, for blasphemy (Lv 24<sup>12</sup>); the man who gathered sticks on the Sabbath (Nu 15<sup>34</sup>); the apostles after healing the lame man (Ac 4<sup>3</sup>); St. Peter, by order of Herod, till a convenient time for his execution (Ac 12<sup>4</sup>). Incarceration was often accompanied with other punishments (cf. Samson grinding for the Philistines, Jg 16<sup>21</sup>), or it was regarded as an alternative (Ezr 7<sup>20</sup>). Jeremiah was smitten as well as imprisoned (Jer 37<sup>15</sup>). The murderer and debtor might be delivered both to prison and the tormentors (Mt 18<sup>30</sup>). Zedekiah used the prison for the protection of Jeremiah from his enemies (Jer 37<sup>21</sup>). He was then transferred to the princes, who cast him into the dungeon or pit (Jer 38<sup>6</sup>). For the Eng. word 'dungeon' or 'prison' in Gn 40<sup>15</sup> 39<sup>20</sup>, 1 K 22<sup>27</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>10</sup>, Ps 142<sup>7</sup>, Ec 4<sup>14</sup>, Is 24<sup>22</sup> 42<sup>7</sup>, Jer 37<sup>15</sup> 52<sup>11</sup>, there are eight different roots in the Heb. which would imply that detention of those under accusation or in disfavour was regular and quite common, the confinement itself being for the purpose of punishment. Confinement in jail was inflicted as a preliminary punishment by Ahab on Micaiah, accompanied with spare bread and water diet (1 K 22<sup>27</sup>); by Asa on Hanani (2 Ch 16<sup>10</sup>). The motive of Herod in Mt. 4<sup>11</sup>; John the Baptist is uncertain (Mt 4<sup>11</sup>). Barabab was committed for insurrection, and it would appear as if this were intended to be final (Lk 23<sup>19</sup>). In the prison-house, which might contain cells (Jer 37<sup>16</sup>), there was sometimes a pit with or without water (Jer 38<sup>6</sup>, Zec 9<sup>11</sup>), and the court of the prison is mentioned in Jer 37, 38, 39, and elsewhere. In some prisons there were stocks (Jer 20<sup>2</sup> 29<sup>26</sup>, Ac 16<sup>24</sup>). To the Rom. prison there were three parts: communiora, ulteriora, where Paul and Silas were kept, and the Tullianum or dungeon, the place of execution (Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i. 304 n.). There is an allusion to prisoners at labour in Job 3<sup>18</sup>, and they might be held in chains (Ps 105<sup>18</sup> 107<sup>10</sup>, Jer 40<sup>4</sup>).

Indignities.—There was resort to various means of heaping contumely on an offender; such as 1 K. 18:27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. Some victims were slain and left in the street or cast behind the walls (Ps 79<sup>2-3</sup>, To 2<sup>3</sup>). Heads of the slain were removed and carried in triumph (1 S 17<sup>57</sup> 31<sup>9</sup>). Dead bodies were burned (Jos 7<sup>15-25</sup>, Lv 20<sup>14</sup>, Am 2<sup>1</sup>. See Burning) or hanged (2 S 4<sup>12</sup>, Gn 40<sup>17-19</sup> [see Hanging], Nu 25<sup>4-5</sup>, Dt 21<sup>22-23</sup>). Stones were thrown on the corpse, as on that of Achan (Jos 7<sup>25-26</sup>), the king of Ai (Jos 8<sup>29</sup>), and on the tomb of Absalom (2 S 18<sup>17</sup>). Mohammedans still maintain the custom when passing by its supposed site (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 61); but Harmer plausibly suggests that the 'heap of stones' was erected in honour. Some forms of execution were 1 K. 18:27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. Egypt a calumniator of the dead was subject to severe punishment (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt).

Mutilation was practised, but not under direct sanction of the covenant law. The thumbs and great toes of Adonibezek were severed (Jg 1<sup>7</sup>). The slayers of Ishbosheth (2 S 4<sup>12</sup>) lost their hands, but possibly after death. Nebuchadrezzar threatened to cut in pieces his offending counsellors (Dn 2<sup>5</sup>). At the command of Antiochus Epiphanes (acc. to 2 Mac 7<sup>40</sup>), seven brothers suffered horrible outrages, among others that of tearing out the tongue, a very common cruelty among the Assyrians. In Egypt robbers were sometimes deprived of the right hand for the first offence, the left foot for the second, and the left hand for the third; though the theft of food was quickly punishable was not so severely punished (see 1 K. 18:27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. To this act our Saviour's statement in Mt 24<sup>51</sup>, Lk 12<sup>48</sup>, seems to allude. An Egyptian victor was known to display severed hands as proof of the number of his trophies (see 1 S 18<sup>27</sup>). The town of Rhinocolura was said to be peopled by robbers who had lost their noses. The nose and ears of an adulterer were cut off (Diod. Sic. i. 78), and from Ezk 23<sup>25</sup> it appears that the usage was in vogue among the Babylonians. (On the horrible mutilations of Assyrian captives, recorded on his cylinder, see RP iii. 39-51.) Rings were put in the lips or noses of captives (2 Ch 33<sup>11</sup> 'among the thorns,' RV 'in chains,' Is 37<sup>29</sup>, Ezk 19<sup>4-9</sup>; Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iii. 7; and see Am 4<sup>3</sup>).

Plucking off the Hair was a punishment inflicted on Jews who had indulged in mixed marriages (Neh 13<sup>25</sup>). It may have been intended simply for disfigurement. The prophet in Is 50<sup>6</sup> alludes to the judicial practice as common in his time. The effort was so vicious as described in 2 Mac 7<sup>7</sup>, that the skin was torn off with the hair; but in scalping, as practised by the N. American Indians, a knife was used. As an insult to David's servants, half of the beard was shaven off (2 S 10<sup>4</sup>). The head was subjected to other indignities (Job 30<sup>10</sup>, Mt 27<sup>30</sup>, Mk 12<sup>4</sup>).

Precipitation.—It is stated in 2 Ch 25<sup>12</sup> that 10,000 Edomites were cast from a rock by the children of Judah. So two Jewish women are said to have suffered (2 Mac 6<sup>10</sup>). Of the same sort are the acts mentioned in 2 K 8<sup>12</sup>, Hos 10<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>18</sup>. On column iv. 100, 101 of Assurbanipal (G. Smith), it is stated that certain persons were thrown on the stone lions and bulls in a quarry, the fall designed to be fatal. Calmet is of opinion, with Jerome as author, that this was the fate of Oreb and Zeeb (Jg 7<sup>25</sup>). An attempt after this manner was made on the life of Jesus (Lk 4<sup>29</sup>).

Restitution.—There was enacted an elaborate system for compensating an injured party under the sanction of Mosaism. As far as possible the restoration was identical with, or equivalent to, the loss of time or power (Ex 21<sup>18-38</sup>, et 19<sup>21</sup>). He who stole and then slew or sold a live ox had to restore fivefold; if it was a live sheep fourfold. The penalty was designed in part to be prohibitory, because sheep were more exposed in the desert, while oxen were necessary and not so easily taken. In later history it appears as if sevenfold might be exacted (Pr 6<sup>31</sup>. See also the LXX tr. of 2 S 12<sup>9</sup>, where seven is substituted for four). If the identical animal was restored, another of equal value was all that the law required besides. Burglary doomed the culprit to unequipped death or to slavery. For breach of trust or for trespass, twenty per cent. additional to the original sum was demanded (Lv 6<sup>1-5</sup>, Nu 5<sup>5-10</sup>). He who was detected in the theft of a pledge, or was found guilty in the matter of trespass while the property was in his hand, must pay double. Pecuniary compensation must be furnished for damages by an animal, when not on its own ground (Ex 22<sup>9</sup>); and when a fatality occurred in the case of a servant, thirty shekels must be paid to the loser (Ex 21<sup>32</sup>; see Dt 22<sup>19</sup>). One case only is mentioned of permitted commutation for bull-goring (Ex 21<sup>28-32</sup>). In case a married woman was killed, the fine was paid to her father's (instead of her own) family (Lewis, Heb. Ant.). Akin to restoration is redemption, referred to in Lv 25<sup>27-28</sup>, Ezk 18<sup>7-12</sup>. Remuneration was expected for loss by fire, through negligence, of a standing grain field; or for the loss or damage of a pledge (Ex 22<sup>6, 12-13</sup>). Under Rom. law a jailer losing his prisoner was liable to the punishment which was to be inflicted for the crime on which the arrest had been made (Ac 12<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>). In NT morals it was taught that the guilt of theft could not be compounded by restitution. 'Let him that stole steal no more' (Eph 4<sup>28</sup>); but Zacchæus, on the occasion of his pardon, proposed to restore fourfold (Lk 19<sup>8</sup>).

Retaliation was authorized in the code of Ex 21<sup>24-25</sup>. It was in use among other nations, esp. the Egyptians (cf. the lex talionis of the Romans). It was not unequivocally approved by ancient authors, because it was apt to degenerate into mere revenge and would often be unfair in its operation. The possibility of its baneful consequences is shown by Thomson (Land and Book, i. 447, 449). Diodorus Siculus instances a one-eyed man as suffering more than the victim with two eyes. Favorinus shows the injustice of this principle in operation as contained in one of the Twelve Tables, in that the same member may be worth more to one man than to another, as the right hand of a scribe or painter compared with that of a singer. Hence it had to be administered with certain modifications. Thus Heb. law adopted the principle, but lodged the application with the judge (Ex 21<sup>22</sup>, Lv 24<sup>19-22</sup>); and an aggressor, by the payment of a ransom, could compound with the aggrieved and be relieved from the full penalty of the law. A false accuser was required to suffer the same penalty that he proposed against the accused (Dt 19<sup>16</sup>). Heb. law was milder in spirit of each other (Dt 24<sup>16</sup>). This equitable exemption was by the Chaldeans (Dn 6<sup>24</sup>), or even Israel (1 K 21<sup>21</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>26</sup>).

Sawing Asunder.—In He 11<sup>37</sup> the term is used to describe an ancient form of punishment, which was possibly a crushing under instruments of iron (Am 1<sup>3</sup>); and it is said, on the authority of Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho), to have been practised on Isaiah. There is an allusion to this sort in Pr 20<sup>28</sup> (RV) 'He bringeth wheel over them' (cf. Is 25<sup>12</sup>). Saws are mentioned in 2 S 12<sup>31</sup>, 1 Ch 20<sup>8</sup>; and while it is painful to admit that David may have been guilty of such severity, the literal interpretation is the most plausible and accords with the usages of the times. (See, however, Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. 226 ff.). In Shaw's Travels a case is described where the victim was between two boards and dis- severed (Smith, DB), and another case is mentioned by Harmer (Observations) as occurring on Stewart's journey to Mequinez.

Scourging with Thorns (see also Stripes).—In the marginal reading of Jg 8<sup>7</sup>, Gideon is represented as threatening to thresh the men of Succoth with thorns and briers, and in the margin to 8<sup>16</sup> it is stated that they were thus punished, as Stanley (Hist. Jew. Ch.) suggests, with the acacia. The scorpions (שְׂרָפִים) mentioned in 1 K 12<sup>11</sup> may have been knotted sticks, or ropes into which wire was plaited, or iron points or nails or cutting pieces of lead were inserted. Calmet guesses that David so treated the Moabites (2 S 8<sup>2</sup>). Some attempt to solve the much-mooted difficulties of 2 S 12<sup>31</sup> by a reference to this mode of punishment.

Slavery.—In Heb. law it was possible for a person to fall into servitude for a limited time. A thief, when unable to make restitution, was sold with wife and children (Ex 22<sup>3</sup>). The misfortune of debt led to the same result (2 K 4<sup>1</sup>, Neh 5<sup>5</sup>). The statute of limitations mercifully provided against oppressive usage and permanent enslavement (Lv 25<sup>39-43</sup>, Dt 15<sup>12</sup>, Jer 34<sup>14</sup>). The Rabbins say a woman could not be sold for theft. Joseph proposed, as an Egyptian procedure, to make a slave of the detected pilferer of his cup (Gn 44<sup>17</sup>). See

Slaying by Spear or Sword.—This was an expeditious method, sometimes adopted in an emergency. The spear, javelin, or dart (He 12<sup>20</sup>) was to be used on trespassers at the foot of Sinai (Ex 19<sup>13</sup>). Phinehas went so armed in eager and immediate punishment of the man found with a Midianitish woman (Nu 25<sup>7-8</sup>). The sword was taken by the Levites against the worshippers of the golden calf (Ex 32<sup>27</sup>), and in Dt 13<sup>13-15</sup> authority is given for its use in the wholesale slaughter of a city for idolatry. Some cutting instrument was employed by Abimelech in the murder of his brethren (Jg 9<sup>6</sup>). Samuel hewed Agag to pieces with the sword (1 S 15<sup>33</sup>), and with the same Doeg massacred the priests in Nob (1 S 22<sup>18-19</sup>). According to the lex talionis, the young Amalekite who claimed that he drew the sword to kill Saul was put to death with the same kind of implement (2 S 1<sup>15</sup>), with which or the spear Ishbosheth was assassinated (2 S 4<sup>6-7</sup>). The sword was used in the summary executions ordered by Solomon (1 K 22<sup>28, 31, 34</sup>). By it Ehjah slew the prophets of Baal (1 K 19<sup>1</sup>), and it was common in regal and martial proceedings, becoming still more prominent in post-Bab. times. The sword or axe was employed to carry out the order of Jehu on Ahab's sons (2 K 10<sup>7</sup>) (see Beheading). Thus Jehoram murdered his brethren (2 Ch 21<sup>4</sup>), and Jehoiakim despatched Urijah (Jer 26<sup>23</sup>). The sword as an instrument of punishment is specifically mentioned in Job 19<sup>29</sup>. See also Divine Visitation.

The Stocks (αἰματήρ, ξυλὸν πεντησύριγγον). This machine, though probably of Egypt. origin, is not described in the Bible, but it is mentioned in Hanani, the seer, was bound in stocks (Jer 29), and Jeremiah was punished (Jer 20<sup>2</sup>). In Jer 27<sup>2</sup> RV uses 'bars' for AV 'yokes,' and in Jer 29<sup>26</sup> changes 'prison' to 'stocks,' and 'stocks' to 'shackles,' that is, the pillory. It usually contained five holes for the neck, arms, and legs, which sometimes were inserted crosswise. One form (77) was designed for the legs only. The word 'stocks' is employed in Job 13<sup>7</sup> 33<sup>11</sup> and Pr 7<sup>22</sup>, and this form of torture was probably in mind when Ps 105<sup>18</sup> was written. It was an infliction among the Romans as indicated by Ac 16<sup>24</sup>.

Stoning was the ordinary formal and legal mode of inflicting punishment in the earlier history of the children of Israel, and was in vogue before the departure from Egypt (Ex 8<sup>28</sup>). Even beasts might be the victims of this mode of execution, as a spectacular example (Ex 19<sup>13-21</sup>). Death by stoning was the penalty for taking 'the accursed thing' (Jos 7<sup>25</sup>); for adultery (Lev 24<sup>10-15</sup>); for blasphemy (Lev 24<sup>16</sup>); for pronouncing curses (Dt 21<sup>21</sup>); for the murder of a man (Dt 22<sup>21-24</sup>), Jn 8<sup>5-7</sup>; for incest (Lv 24<sup>10-24</sup>), and on this specious charge (Ex 31<sup>14</sup> Lk 21<sup>10</sup>) and Stephen (Ac 7<sup>58</sup>) suffered, and an effort was made to show Jesus guilty by a feint to stone Him (Jn 10<sup>31</sup>); for blasphemy (Lv 24<sup>16-27</sup>), idolatry (Dt 13<sup>10</sup>), dishonour to parents (Dt 21<sup>21</sup>), and for false witness (Dt 19<sup>15-16</sup>), and Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31<sup>14</sup> 35<sup>2</sup>, Nu 15<sup>35-36</sup>). Doubtless other capital crimes would thus be punished, and the city of Jerusalem was so threatened as if it were an individual culprit (Ezk 16<sup>40</sup>). In an orderly proceeding the witness was to cast the first stone (Dt 17, Jn 8<sup>7</sup>), and as the Rabbins say, on the chest; and if others were necessary to produce death, the bystanders hurled them. Lawless movements are mentioned or suggested, like that to which Moses thought himself exposed (Ex 17), the assault on Adoram (1 K 12<sup>18</sup>) and Zechariah (Lk 11), in the danger dreaded by the priests on account of their estimate of the Baptist (Lk 20<sup>6</sup>), and the assault on St. Paul in Iconium (Ac 14<sup>8</sup>). Poisoners among the Persians were laid on one stone and crushed by another (Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iii. 247; see Mt 21<sup>44</sup>, Lk 20<sup>18</sup>).

Strangling was a later form of capital punishment among the Jews (W. R. Smith, DS 398), but there is no scriptural authority for it. The convict was immersed in clay or mud, and a cloth was twisted around the neck and drawn in opposite directions by two lictors, so as to take the breath. During the operation molten lead might be poured down the throat (Sanhedr. 10. 3). The proposed humiliation of the Syrians before Israel (1 K 20<sup>31</sup>) may hint at the practice. See Hanging.

Stripes.—The Mosaic economy ordained that an offender might be punished with stripes (Lv 19<sup>20</sup>, Dt 22<sup>18</sup>), not exceeding forty (Dt 25<sup>3</sup>); and this limit was carefully observed, as on St. Paul (2 Co 11<sup>24</sup>), for a single stroke in excess subjected the executioner to punishment. The scourge was composed of three thongs, of which 39 was the largest multiple within the limit. It was the most common mode of secondary punishment, and the idea of disgrace did not seem to attach to it (but see Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 21). No station of life was exempt (see from Pr 17<sup>26</sup>), indicating that the noble may be smitten, and 10<sup>13</sup> that a rod is proper for the vacant-minded. The bastinado may have been used on Jeremiah (20<sup>2</sup> 37<sup>15</sup>). Scourging was inflicted on a bondmaid overtaken in illegal intercourse (Lv 19<sup>20</sup>), on a husband who falsely accused his wife, on a person who used abusive language (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6), on ecclesiastical offenders in the synagogue (Mt 10<sup>17</sup>, Ac 26<sup>11</sup>), and it might be used on the debtor (Mt 5<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>34</sup>). As to the method: the culprit lay on the ground while under castigation, in the presence of the judge, who during the infliction proclaimed the words in Dt 28<sup>58</sup>.<sup>59</sup> and concluded with those in Ps 75<sup>38</sup>. In later times an adult male was stripped to the waist and in a bending posture lashed to a pillar; a female received the stripes while sitting with head and shoulders bent forward; and a boy was punished with his hands tied behind him. The Mosaic regulations were in pleasing contrast with those of the Zendavesta, which required 10,000 stripes for the murder of a water dog (Darmesteter, Intro.). The Porcian law forbade the scourging of Rom. citizens (Cic. in Verr. v. 53, Ac 16<sup>37</sup> 22<sup>25</sup>). Nevertheless, it was regarded as a wholesome punishment, and is zealously advocated in Pr 13<sup>24</sup> 23<sup>13</sup>.<sup>14</sup>; see also Sir 30<sup>1-18</sup>. It is a symbol of divine correction (Ps 89<sup>32</sup>), and is regarded as a purifier (Pr 20<sup>30</sup>). The Moslems have a proverb that the stick is from heaven, a blessing from God.

Satanic and other evil powers, mode of dealing with offenders. A case is described (2 Mac 13<sup>4-8</sup>): Menelaus was fastened to a revolving wheel in a standpipe 50 cubits high, filled with ashes, in which he was immersed, until death ensued. Another account attributes a similar method to the Maccabees, the victim being placed on a beam, under which the ashes were constantly stirred until he was overcome with heat and dust (see Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iii. 246).

CRIMSON.—Two words are tr. 'crimson' in both AV and RV, תִּלְאָה tôlâ' (Is 1<sup>18</sup>), LXX κόκκινος, and כַּרְמִיל karmîl (2 Ch 27-1<sup>34</sup>). Karmîl is a later word used in place of the earlier שָׁנִי shânî. Shânî is rendered once (Jer 4<sup>30</sup> AV) crimson. In the same passage in RV, and in all other passages where it occurs in both VSS, it is rendered scarlet. In Is 1<sup>18</sup> שָׁנִי is rendered scarlet, LXX φοινικεύον, and שָׁנִי crimson, LXX κόκκινον. It is probable that the distinction of these two colours was not accurately made at that time, as indeed it has not been preserved in the VSS. See COLOURS; and for the insect producing both these colours see SCARLET.

CRIPPLE.—See MEDICINE.

CRISPING PINS (כרספ, Is 3<sup>2</sup>, RV 'satchels,' and 2 K 5<sup>3</sup>, AV and RV 'bags'; see BAG 3b).—To 'crisp' is in mod. language to 'crimp,' that is, curl in short wavy folds. The word is often used in Shaks., Milton, and others, of the curl a breeze makes on the water, as Par. Lost, iv. 237, 'the crisped brooks'; cf. Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 211, 'I would not their vile breath should crisp the stream.' But the earliest ref. is to the hair; and a 'crisping pin' is an instrument for crimping the hair. Cf. Pocklington (1637), 'Fetch me my Crisping pinnes to curl me my lockes.'

J. HASTINGS.

CRISPUS (Κρίσπος).—The chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>). Convinced by the reasonings of St. Paul that Jesus was the Messiah, he believed with all his house. The apostle mentions him (1 Co 1<sup>14</sup>) as one of the few persons whom he himself had baptized. Tradition represents him as having afterwards become bishop of Ægina (Const. Apost. vii. 46). R. M. BOYD.

CROCODILE (RVm Job 41<sup>1</sup>).—The crocodile is doubtless meant by leviathan in the above passage and Job 3<sup>8</sup>. In Ps 74<sup>14</sup> leviathan refers to Pharaoh, under the simile of a crocodile. Cf Ezk 29<sup>3</sup>, where Pharaoh is called 'the great dragon (tannim, for the usual tannin) that lieth in the midst of his rivers,' and 32<sup>2</sup>, where he is compared to a 'whale (also tannim AVm, RV text 'dragon') in the seas,' the reference being to the crocodile of the river (Arab. bahr = sea, the usual Arab. way of speaking of their great river the Nile). See LEVIATHAN, DRAGON. The crocodile is a saurian, sometimes attaining a length of 20 feet. His back and sides are covered with an . . . ; swords, slingstones, . . . ; not to be injured by clubs (RV for AV 'darts' v. 29), or even spherical bullets. The scales of which this armour is composed are beautifully marked. His jaws are set . . . (v. 14). His neck is . . . all is also very muscular, and a blow from it will crush a man. His legs are short. The toes of the fore feet are five, and of the hind feet only four. The inner two toes of the fore feet and the inner one of the hind feet are destitute of claws. The rest have strong claws (v. 30). The crocodile is well characterized as 'a king over all the children of pride' (v. 34). In one other passage (Jer 14<sup>6</sup>) RVm gives 'crocodile' for tannim, AV . . .

The Land Crocodile (Lv 11<sup>30</sup> RV) is not a crocodile, but probably the MONITOR (see CHAMELEON). G. E. POST.

CROOKBACKT (Amer. RV 'crook-backed'), Lv 21<sup>20</sup>. See MEDICINE.

**CROSS is the tr. of the Gr. σταυρός, the name applied in NT to the instrument upon which Jesus Christ suffered death. Owing to the variety of the methods in which crucifixion might be inflicted, and the indefiniteness of the . . . is impossible to determine v . . . exact nature of the cross used in His case. σταυρός means properly a stake, and is the tr. not merely of the Lat. crux (cross), but of palus (stake) as well. As used in NT, however, it refers evidently not to the simple stake used for impaling, of which widespread punishment crucifixion was a refinement, but to the more elaborate cross used by the Romans in the time of Christ. Besides the crux simplex, or simple stake, we may exclude from consideration the so-called cross of St. Andrew, shaped like an X, the origin of which is much later, and concerning the actual use of which there is much doubt. There remain of the four varieties of cross usually enumerated only two, between which the choice must lie—the crux commissa or St. Anthony's cross, shaped like a T, and consisting of a single upright post, across the top of which is fastened a horizontal cross-bar; and the crux immissa or Lat. cross, in which the top of the upright shaft projects above the cross-bar, as in the form with which we are most familiar. In favour of the latter is not only the testimony of the oldest tradition, which in such a matter is entitled to great weight, but also the statements of the . . . the title nailed to the cross (Mt 27<sup>37</sup>, Mk 15<sup>26</sup>, Lk 23<sup>38</sup>, Jn 19<sup>19-22</sup>).

The upright post to which alone the name properly belongs, was usually a piece of some strong, cheap wood, olive or oak, of such length that when firmly planted in the ground the top was from 7½ to 9 ft. high. Most modern illustrations err in making the upright much too high.

It was erected on some spot outside the city, convenient for the execution, and remained there as a permanent fixture, only the cross-bar or patibulum being carried to the spot, usually by the person who was to suffer death. This consisted sometimes of a single piece of wood, more often of two parallel bars joined at one end, between which the head of the victim passed, and to the ends of which his hands were fastened. The cross which Jesus carried was doubtless simply the cross-bar in one of these two forms. Keim argues in favour of the simpler, partly because Jesus is represented as clothed, which would hardly have been the case had He carried the double . . . : partly because of the carrying of . . . which he her as a rude joke of the soldiers than . . . necessary by the weight of the cross-bar, which could in no case have been very heavy (Jesu von Nazara, iii. 398, Eng. tr. vi. 125). Besides the patibulum, the cross was furnished with a support for the body called the sedile. This was a small piece of wood . . . at right angles from the . . . upon which the victim sat as upon a . . . was designed to bear part of the weight of the body, which would otherwise have been too great to be supported by the hands alone. Whether there was also a support for the feet, the so-called ὑποπόδιον, is still in dispute.

The origin of crucifixion must be sought in the E., . . . among the Phoen., from whom it passed to . . . and Romans. The long list of peoples given by Winer (RWB i. 680), and often copied, includes many cases which prove no more than impaling (so the Persians, Egyptians, Indians). For the practice among the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, and Numidians we have good authority. We hear of Alexander on one occasion crucifying as many as 2000 Tyrians. Among the Romans this was a very common punishment. At first they confined it to slaves and seditious persons, but gradually extended . . . e pro . . . Ver . . . citizens. The same was done by Galba in Spain. But these were rare exceptions, and excited universal indignation. In Judaea the punishment was frequently used. Thus Vespasian crucified 2000 Jews after the death of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvii. x. 10). Under Claudius and Nero, various governors, Tiberius Alexander, Quadratus, Felix, Florus, crucified robbers and rioters of political and religious character, including two sons of Judas Galilee (Ant. xx. v. 2; BJ ii. xii. 6, ii. xiii. 2), and even respectable citizens and Roman knights (BJ ii. xiv. 9). Titus crucified so many after the destruction of Jerus. that there was neither wood for the crosses nor place to set them up (BJ v. xi. 1). Especially under Tiberius, who held that simple death was escape, was this method of punishment frequent.

The Jews did not . . . crucifixion of living persons. The case . . . referred to by Jos. (BJ i. iv. 6), was an exception which called forth universal reprobation. But the hanging of dead bodies meets us frequently in O.T. See Jos 10<sup>26</sup> (the five kings), 2 S 4<sup>12</sup> (the murderers of Ish-bosheth), 1 S 31<sup>10</sup> (the Philistines and Saul, cf. 2 S 21<sup>12</sup>), Ezr 6<sup>11</sup> (the decree of Darius), and is distinctly authorized in the law (Dt 21<sup>22</sup>, cf. Nu 25<sup>4</sup>, where J' commands this punishment in the case of the men who have led the people away to Baal-peor). In such cases the dead body became accursed, and must be buried before nightfall, that the land might not suffer pollution (Dt 21<sup>23</sup>). Those who suffered crucifixion came under this curse, and hence the passage in Dt is applied to Jesus not only in the Talm., but also by NT writers. This explains the frequent reference to the cross in NT as the tree (ξύλον), that being the LXX tr. of the brevity of the description in Ex has occasioned differences of opinion among archaeologists as to both its position. Some imagine it a rim to prevent objects from falling off. But the border which passed round the table of shewbread, as well as the table itself, had a crown; nor would the ark need a rim for the purpose suggested. The crown therefore was ornamental. As to its position, Bahr (Symbolik, i. 377, 378) regards the crown of the ark as an ornamental design placed round its middle, but his arguments are not conclusive; and since the crown is said to be 'upon' (על) the ark, we should doubtless imagine it as placed round the top of the sacred chest as it was round the top of the table of shewbread (see Neumann, Die Sif. d. T., p. 127). Bahr, however, also denies that 'the crown of a handbreadth round about' the table (Ex 25<sup>23</sup>) had a crown of its own (Symb. i. 409, citing also the Rabbins Jarchi and Aben-Ezra; so Keil, Archaeol. § 19, but not in his Comm.; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 60), but the language of Exodus seems clearly to state that it had (Jahn, Archaeol. p. 421; Abarbanal cited by Bahr; Neumann, p. 96; Bissell, Bibl. Antiq. p. 292). The crown of the altar of incense likewise is placed by some round its top (Appar. Crit. p. 273; Neumann, p. 120), but round its middle (Bahr, i. 378, 419). But, whatever their positions, these crowns were evidently golden wreaths intended for decoration. Assyrian monuments afford examples of similar ornamentations (Neumann, p. 27; Layard, Nineveh, ii. 236, 354).

2. Another word tr. Crown (קִרְיָה) means consecration, and is applied to the symbolic ornament worn by the high priest upon his forehead over the mitre (Ex 29<sup>6</sup> 39<sup>30</sup>, Lv 8<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>12</sup>); and to that worn upon the head by the Heb. monarch (2 S 1<sup>10</sup>, 2 K 11<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ch 23<sup>11</sup>, Ps 89<sup>39</sup> 132<sup>18</sup>, so also Zec 9<sup>16</sup>). It is also used figuratively for dignity or honour (Pr 27<sup>24</sup>, Nah 3<sup>17</sup> 'crowned ones'). The high priest's crown (LXX τὸ πέταλον, Vulg. lamina) was a narrow plate (πύς) of pure gold, on which was engraved 'Holy to J<sup>h</sup>'. Tradition represents it as about two fingers broad. It was fastened 'upon the mitre above' by a piece of blue lace (Ex 28<sup>37</sup> 39<sup>31</sup>). The Rabbin commentators suppose three ribbons of lace—two from the ends and one from the top of the front of the crown—all tied together at the back of the head. Jos. (Ant. iii. vii. 6) describes the high priest's crown as of three rows, one above another, upon which were carved cups of gold like the calyx of the plant Hyoscyamus, while the plate with the inscription covered the forehead; but he probably refers to an ornamentation introduced at a late period. Acc. to 1 Mac 10<sup>20</sup> a crown was given to the high priest Jonathan by Alex. Epiphanes. Braunius (De Vestitu Sacerd. Heb. ch. xxii.) admits that Ex gives no support to Josephus' description. The crown was the symbol of the high priest's special consecration, as the people's representative to make atonement for sin (Ex 28<sup>38</sup>). The same term is also applied to the symbolic headtire of the Heb. king, but no description of it is given (LXX τὸ βασιλευσίου, ἑξέρ, ἑξέρ, τὸ ἀγίασμα). It was prob. a light, narrow fillet of silk, perhaps studded with jewels, like the early diadems of E. kings (see DIADEM). It was light enough to be worn in battle (2 S 1<sup>10</sup>). The term indicates that the king, as well as the priest, was divinely consecrated to his office. Hence it is attributed to the ideal Davidic King (Ps 89<sup>39</sup> 132<sup>18</sup>), and His people are called the stones of their Saviour's Crown (Zec 9<sup>16</sup>).

3. The commonest use of Crown in OT (generally as tr. of קִרְיָה, LXX στέφανος, but in Est of קִרְיָה, Gr. κίραρος or κίραρος, LXX διδάγμα) corresponds with the use of the word in mod. times. It is applied to crowns worn by kings (2 S 12<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ch 20<sup>2</sup>, the crown of the king of Rabbah, which weighed a talent of gold; Est 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>15</sup>, the tiaras of the king and queen of Persia, probably high, jewelled turbans; see also Is 62<sup>3</sup>, Jer 13<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>36</sup>); to wreaths worn at banquets (Ca 3<sup>11</sup>, Is 28<sup>1, 3, 5</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>42</sup>); and fig. as a sign of honour or victory (Job 19<sup>9</sup> 31<sup>36</sup>, Ps 8<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>3</sup> 65<sup>11</sup> 103<sup>4</sup>, Pr 4<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>18</sup> [75] 24<sup>16</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>, La 5<sup>16</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>12</sup>). In Is 23<sup>8</sup> Tyre is called 'the crown of the sea' because ruling over kingdoms and islands. Some have supposed that the king of Tyre had two crowns—the light diadem above, and a heavier one for state occasions. It has also been inferred from 2 S 12<sup>30</sup> that the crown taken by David from the king of Rabbah became the state crown, and Jos. (Ant. vii. vii. 5) enlarges the biblical account by stating that 'this crown David ever after wore on his own head.' But there is no positive evidence for this, and only the term קִרְיָה is used in the Bible for the crown of the Heb. kings. In Zec 6<sup>11, 14</sup> a crown (קִרְיָה) is represented as placed on Joshua, the high priest, to indicate the union of the royal and priestly offices; but the usual word for the kingly crown of Israel is in this instance apparently avoided because it described also, as has been stated, that of the high priest. The crowns used at banquets were doubtless wreaths of flowers (see Is 28<sup>3</sup>, also Wis 2<sup>8</sup>, 3 Mac 4<sup>8</sup> 7<sup>19</sup>). Heroes were also received with them (Jth 3<sup>6</sup>), and dwellings decorated (1 Mac 4<sup>57</sup>).

4. In 1 Mac 10<sup>20</sup> 11<sup>35</sup> 13<sup>38</sup> allusion is made to crowns due from the Jews to the Syrian kings, by which are meant, not coins so named, but money tribute, which represented allegiance as formerly the presentation of a crown had done (1 Mac 13<sup>37</sup>, 2 Mac 14<sup>4</sup>; Jos. Ant. xii. iii. 3, στέφανος φόρος; see Levy, Gesch. der Jud. Münzen; Madden, Jewish Coinage).

The Heb. has other words synonymous with those mentioned (as קִרְיָה head-dress; קִרְיָה turban; קִרְיָה diadem; קִרְיָה garland), but their consideration does not fall here. The later Jews spoke of three crowns, of the law, the קִרְיָה of the king, and added 'the crown of the law' as the best of all (Carpov, Appar. Crit. i. 1; De Vestitu, p. 634). The word is also used in AV for the top of the head (Gn 49<sup>28</sup>, Dt 33<sup>20</sup>, 2 S 14<sup>25</sup>, Is 3<sup>17</sup>, Jer 2<sup>18</sup> 48<sup>45</sup>; tr. pate Ps 7<sup>18</sup>, head [RV 'crown of the head'] Dt 33<sup>16</sup>, scalp Ps 68<sup>22</sup>).

In NT the AV gives 'Crown' for two words (στέφανος and διδάγμα) which RV properly distinguishes. Στέφανος was not applied by the Greeks to a king's crown. 'It is the crown of victory in the games, of civic worth, of military valour, of nuptial joy, of festal gladness . . . the wreath in fact, or the garland . . . but never, any more than corona in Latin, the emblem and sign of royalty' (Trench, Syn. of NT, xxiii.; see, too, Lightfoot on Ph 4<sup>1</sup>). Roman law likewise regulated the bestowment of special coronæ as rewards of military valour and civic service; and while it was customary to use crowns on ceremonial and festive occasions, they never symbolized royalty. The word for the latter was diadema (see DIADEM). This distinction is observed in NT, though not always in the LXX (see 2 S 12<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ch 20<sup>2</sup>, Ps 21(20)<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>28</sup>, Zec 6<sup>11, 14</sup>). In NT a crown is an emblem of victory or reward. It describes the Christian's final recompense (1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Rev 3<sup>11</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>), specifically called a crown of righteousness (2 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>), of life (Ja 1<sup>12</sup>, Rev 2<sup>10</sup>), of glory (1 P 5<sup>4</sup>). St. Paul applies it to his converts as being his reward (Ph 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>19</sup>). Hence in the Apoc. a crown is represented on the conquering Christ (Rev 6<sup>2</sup> 14<sup>14</sup>), on the symbolic locusts (Rev 9<sup>7</sup>), and on the 'woman' of ch. 12, as a sign of victory. In 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>19, 12</sup> on the other hand, the 'dragon' and the 'beast' and the kingly Christ have diadems, the 'many diadems' signifying Christ's universal empire (see v. 18). Thus Crown in NT is the emblem of attainment, the reward of service. Even the 'crown of thorns' was probably a mock symbol of victory, suggested to the soldiers by the coronæ of military or civic service; though Trench remarks that 'woven of such materials as it was, δαδρημα could not be applied to it.'

While the use of crowns among the Greeks and Romans seems to have originated with the athletic games,—allusions to which are made by St. Paul in the places cited above,—and while the crown does not appear in Homer as an emblem of victory, later traditions attributed its invention to one or other of the gods. Those traditions are collected by Tertullian in his tract De Corona, in which he violently inveighs against the use of crowns by Christians.

CRUELTY.—The habits and sentiments of Gentiles and average Israelites, both in OT and NT, are often tainted with gross cruelty. Even acts of divinely appointed leaders of Israel, utterances of the psalmists and prophets, and ordinances of the inspired Law, sometimes seem inhuman when judged by the highest standards of modern Christianity. These standards require the righteous man to treat human life as sacred, and to refrain scrupulously from inflicting unnecessary pain. But Christianity has only recently secured any widespread practical recognition of these principles, and even now they are followed only with minorities in a few of the most advanced communities. Moreover, civilization has developed a sensitiveness which often renders the punishment of a criminal really as severe as in ancient times; the mitigation of physical cruelty has been compensated for by the refinement of mental torture. The constant tendency of inspired teaching is towards humanity, and ordinances which seem inhuman often mitigate prevailing barbarity.

The facts are as follows. The extermination of enemies is frequently commanded, Dt 20<sup>7</sup> etc., and such extermination is described with apparent approval, Jo 6<sup>21</sup> etc. David massacred the Ammonites with great barbarity, 2 S 12<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ch 20<sup>8</sup>, cf. 2 K 15<sup>25</sup>. Amongst the Israelites themselves the Law ventures to impose only a moderate limitation of blood-revenge. Ex 21<sup>20, 21</sup> (JE) forbids the actual beating to death of a male or female slave, but does not feel it possible to deal with cases in which the victim survives a day or two. Death is to be inflicted for a large number of offences, some of them slight, e.g. sabbath-breaking, Ex 35<sup>2</sup> (P). An incestuous person, Lv 20<sup>14</sup> (H), and an unchaste woman of the priestly clan, Lv 21<sup>9</sup> (H), were to be burnt to death. The OT records great cruelty on the part of Gentiles, barbarous outrages on women and children, 2 K 8<sup>12</sup>, Hos 13<sup>16</sup>, Am 1<sup>12</sup>, and cruel mutilation, 2 K 25<sup>7</sup>. These are more than borne out by the sculptures of the Assyrians, who delighted to depict flaying alive and other tortures inflicted upon their enemies, e.g. upon the Elamite prisoners on slabs 48–50 in the Kouyunjik Gallery of the British Museum. In the NT we meet with the barbarous Roman punishments of scourging and crucifixion. W. H. BENNETT.

GRUSE.—See FOOD. The English word, now archaic though not quite obsolete, is apparently of Scandinavian origin, and means an earthenware jar for holding liquids; less freq. for drinking from, as Skelton (1526), 'Then he may drink out of a stone cruyse.' In AV it holds water (1 S 26<sup>11, 12, 16</sup>, 1 K 19<sup>5</sup>), oil (1 K 17<sup>12, 14, 19</sup>), honey (1 K 14<sup>2</sup>), and salt (2 K 2<sup>20</sup>). J. HASTINGS.

CRYSTAL.—1. In Job 28<sup>7</sup> קְרִישׁ is rendered in AV 'crystal' קְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים וְקְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים; and as it occurs in a passage קְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים וְקְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים treasures of mines, this is probably to be accepted as correct. (See, however, Oxf. Heb. Lex. and RV which tr. 'glass'). 2. In Ezk 1<sup>25</sup> another word קְרִישׁ is also tr. 'crystal' (RVm 'ice'), and, in this case, there is no certainty whether rock-crystal or ice is referred to (cf. Davidson, ad loc.); the same remark applies to קְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים in Rev 4<sup>6</sup> 21<sup>11</sup> 22<sup>1</sup>; but this is immaterial in the case of poetic imagery, as the two substances are similar as regards transparency and absence of colour; hence the Greeks applied the same word (κρυσταλλος) to both. 3. In Job 28<sup>18</sup> RV substitutes 'crystal' for 'pearls' of AV as tr. of קְרִישׁ.

Rock-crystal is pure quartz, crystallizing in hexagonal prisms with pyramidal faces, and is abundant in veins amongst the rocks in nearly all countries. It was used in ancient times for ornamental purposes, and being softer, could be cut by the diamond or corundum. It is possible that the Heb. word (קְרִישׁ) tr. 'diamond' as one of the stones on the breastplate of the high priest was really a corruption of קְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים, with the name of קְרִישׁ אֲבִירִים, however, art. STONES (PRECIOUS), and Oxf. Heb. Lex., where the jasper or the onyx are suggested as equivalents of קְרִישׁ.] E. HULL.

CUB (כּוּב, AV Chub), in Ezk 30<sup>5</sup>, is almost certainly a corruption of כּוּבִי (i.e. Lybia) as was read by LXX. The 'Lybia' of AV is a mistranslation of Put (see RV). Cf. Nah 3<sup>9</sup>, where Lybians are mentioned along with Cush (Ethiopia), Egypt, and Put, as here; also 2 Ch 12<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>8</sup>. Identifications which assume the correctness of the text lead to no satisfactory result, and hardly deserve notice. J. SKINNER.

CUBIT.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CUCKOW (קִישׁ shahaph, λάρος, larus).—The Heb. word is from a root signifying leanness. It occurs only in Lv 11<sup>16</sup> and Dt 14<sup>15</sup>, in the list of unclean birds. No scholar now renders it by cuckoo (cuckoo). Various slender birds have been proposed, as the stormy petrel, the shearwater, the tern, and the gull or seamew. The RV, following the LXX and the Vulg., has seamew. It is probably to be understood generically for birds of the Laridae, the gull family. G. E. POST.

CUCUMBER (קִישׁ kishshu'tm, σκουός, cucumeres).—Cucumbers are universally cultivated in the E., and are a favourite article of food. Two species or varieties are common, Cucumis sativus, L., which is the ordinary green or whitish cucumber, and C. Chate, L., which is originally an Egyptian plant. The former is called in Arab. khiyār. It has a very delicate flavour, and is more wholesome than the European variety. The latter is known by the name kiththā or miktī, which is a modification of the Heb. קִישׁ, and is doubtless the vegetable referred to as one of the good things of Egypt (Nu 11<sup>5</sup>). It is longer and more slender than the common cucumber, being often more than a foot long, and sometimes less than an inch thick, and pointed at both ends. It has a thick, hairy, mottled or striped green rind, with a less juicy pulp than the khiyār, but a similar, though less delicate, flavour. Although originating in Egypt, it is everywhere cultivated in the East. It is esteemed coarser than the khiyâr, and sold cheaper.

A cardinal difference between the kiththâ and the khiyâr is that the latter cannot be cultivated without constant irrigation. The kiththâ, while often cultivated on watered soil, and then attaining a large size, grows on perfectly dry soil also, without a drop of water through the hot summer months, during which it flourishes. The word khiyâr is said to be of Persian origin.

A 'LODGE IN A GARDEN OF CUCUMBERS.'

The expression 'garden of cucumbers' (Is 1<sup>6</sup>) is מִקְשָׁשׁ mikshshâh, a noun of place, meaning the place of kishshu, and is exactly reproduced in the Arab. mikthâ'at. The lodge is the booth of the man who watches the patch. This booth is made of four upright poles, 6 or 8 ft. high, planted in the ground, and tied by withes of flexible bark to four horizontal poles at their tip. Over the frame made by these horizontal poles are laid cross poles, and, over all, branches of trees. Sometimes a floor is made by tying four other horizontal poles at a few inches or feet above the ground, and laying over them a flooring of cross poles. Walls are sometimes made of wattled branches, more or less enclosing the frail tenement. Such booths are to be seen in all the cucumber and melon patches, and in vineyards and other cultivated land which requires watching. They are fitting emblems of instability, as the withes with which they are tied together give way before the winds of autumn, the branches are scattered, and the whole structure soon drops into a shapeless heap of poles and wattles, themselves soon to be carried off and used as firewood, or left to rot on the ground.

G. E. POST.

CULTURE.—Only 2 Es 8<sup>6</sup> AV and RV, 'give us seed unto our heart, and culture to our understanding, that there may come fruit of it.' The Eng. word is a direct and accurate tr. of the Lat. (cultura), and is used in its own earliest sense of the cultivation or tillage of the soil. Coverdale, Matthew, and the Bishops have 'build,' Geneva 'prepare,' but Douay 'give tillage to' the understanding. J. HASTINGS.

CUMBER (from old Fr. combrer, 'to hinder,' which is from low Lat. cumbrus, i.e. cumulus, 'a heap'; thus c. = 'put a heap in the way').—1. To harass, worry, Lk 10<sup>40</sup> 'Martha was cumbered about much serving.' Cf. Coverdale's tr. of 1 K 21<sup>5</sup> 'What is ye matter that thy sprete is so combred?' The usual prep. is 'with'; here 'about' is a lit. tr. of the Gr. περί (periespâto perî πολλὴν διακονίαν). RVm gives 'distracted,' like Ostervald's distracte, and as 1 Co 7<sup>35</sup> 'without distraction,' AV and RV (ἀπερίσπαστος). 'Cumbered' is Tindale's; Wyclif has 'martha bisied aboute the oft seruyse'; Coverdale, 'Martha made hir self moch to do to serue him.' 2. To 'block up,' 'burden,' Lk 13<sup>7</sup> 'Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?' again from Tindale (and scarcely obsolete in this sense); Wyclif 'ocupieth,' fr. Vulg. occupat; Geneva, 'why kepeth it the ground baren?' a better tr. of the Gr. here (καταργέω, a favourite word with St. Paul, elsewhere only in this passage and He 2<sup>14</sup>, AV 'destroy,' RV 'bring to nought'). Cf. Bunyan, Holy War (Clar. Press ed. p. 47), 'Thou hast been a Cumber-ground long already.' Cumbrance, only Dt 1<sup>2</sup> 'your c.' (צַמְרָר), and Is 1<sup>14</sup> RVm 'your new moons . . . are a c. unto me' (חֲמִשָּׁה יָמִים, AV and RV 'trouble'). The mod. forms 'encumber,' etc., are not quite equivalent, being too wholly passive. As Davies (Bible Eng. p. 211) remarks, Spenser's 'cumbrous gnatges' (F. Q. i. i. 23) seems now a singularly inappropriate epithet. J. HASTINGS.

CUMI.—See TALITHA.

CUMMIN (צֶמֶח kammôn, κύμινον, cuminum).—The seed of Cuminum cyminum, L., an umbelliferous plant cultivated in Bible lands. It is known in Arab. by the same name as in Heb., kammôn, and is used in cookery as a condiment, esp. in the dishes prepared during the fasts, which, being made without meat, require more seasoning to make them palatable. It has also carminative properties, and is used in poultices for the dissipation of swellings. It has a penetrating odour and savour, not over-agreeable to most Europeans. It is twice mentioned in Scripture. Once the reference is to the mode of threshing it (Is 23<sup>26, 27</sup>) by a rod instead of the môrag. This is still practised with this and other seeds of plants cultivated in small quantities. It is also mentioned as subject to tithe (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>).

G. E. POST.

CUN (צָן), 1 Ch 18<sup>6</sup>.—See BEROETHAL.

CUNNING.—The Anglo-Saxon cunnan meant both 'to know' and 'to be able,' whence both can, which Bacon uses as a finite verb, Essays (Gold Treas. ed. p. 40), 'In Evill, the best condition is, not to will; The Second, not to Can'; and also cunning, which is really the pres. ptp. of the A.-S. cunnan as it appears in its Middle-Eng. form cunnen, to know. 'Cunning,' then, up to and after 1611, is generally knowledge, skill. Cf. Purvey's Preface to the Wycliffite Version of 1388, 'the Holy Spyrít author of all wisdom and cunnyng and truth'; Bp. Barlowe's translation of Ja 3<sup>13</sup> (Dialogue [1531], ed. of 1897, p. 34), 'Who that among you is wyse ended with cunnyng'; and Shaks. Othello, III. iii. 50, 'That errs in ignorance, and not in cunning.' In AV the subst. 'cunning' occurs only Ps 137<sup>5</sup>, 'If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.' The adj. is common, applied to men who are skilful in some work, or to the work they do skilfully. Thus Ex 35<sup>35</sup> 'the c. workman . . . and . . . those that devise c. work.' Once to women, Jer 9<sup>17</sup>, in ref. to their skill as hired mourners (on which see Thomson, Land and Book, iii. 403). But in Eph 4<sup>14</sup> 'c. craftiness,' 2 P 1<sup>16</sup> 'cunningly devised fables,' the meaning is probably 'wily,' 'deceitful.' Amer. B<sup>19</sup> reads 'skilful' where cunning has that meaning (except Is 3<sup>8</sup> 'expert'). J. HASTINGS.

CUP.—1. In OT the rendering of various words, the precise distinction between which, either as to form or use, is unknown to us. The usual word is כֶּסֶךְ (kōs (porhion, calice), the ordinary drinking-vessel of rich (Gn 40<sup>11, 13, 21</sup>) and poor (2 S 12<sup>3</sup>) alike, the material of which varied, no doubt, with the rank and wealth of the owner. Numerous illustrations are found on the reliefs of the Assyrian palaces, such, e.g., as the cups in the hands of Assurbanipal and his queen, in a scene often reproduced. With these compare the specimens of pottery actually found on Jewish soil, in Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, Nos. 174, 181, etc., and the illustration cited below.

Joseph's divining cup (Gn 44<sup>20</sup>) was of silver, and, we may infer, of decorative ornamentation, since the same word is used for the bowl (AV) or cups (RV), i.e. the flower-shaped ornamentation, on the candlestick of the tabernacle (which see for details, also BOWL). That the כֶּסֶךְ was larger than the kōs is clear from Jer 35<sup>5</sup>. The נִיפֶן kēsāvōth, of 1 Ch 28<sup>17</sup> (Phoen. נִיפֶן, see Bloch's Phoen. Glossar, sub voce), were more probably flagons, as RV in Ex 25<sup>29</sup> 37<sup>16</sup> (but Nu 4<sup>7</sup> RV cups). The aggān (נִיפֶן Is 22<sup>24</sup>) was rather a basin, as Ex 24<sup>6</sup>, than a cup (EV).

In NT ποτήριον is the same of the ordinary drinking-cup (e.g., wine 23<sup>28</sup> etc.). The 'cup of blessing' (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>) is so named from the כֶּסֶךְ (which see, also LORD'S SUPPER). The cup represented on the obverse of the so-called Maccabean shekels may be a cup such as was used on this occasion.

2. The word cup has received an extended figurative application in both OT and NT. (a) As in various other literatures, 'cup' stands, esp. in Psalms, for the happy fortune or experience of one's earthly lot, mankind being thought of as receiving this lot from the hand of God, as the guest the wine-cup from the hand of his host, Ps 16<sup>5</sup> 23<sup>5</sup> 73<sup>10</sup> etc. But also conversely for the bitter lot of the wicked, Ps 11<sup>6</sup> (cf. c. below), and in particular for the sufferings of Jesus Christ, Mt 20<sup>22, 23</sup>, Mk 10<sup>38, 39</sup> 14<sup>36</sup>, Lk 22<sup>42</sup>, Jn 18<sup>11</sup>. (b) Another figure is the 'cup of salvation' (lit. 'of deliverances'), Ps 116<sup>13</sup>. The reference is to the wine of the thank-offerings (תִּשְׁבָּחָה), part of the ritual of which was the festal meal before J<sup>n</sup> (cf. vv. 14a. 17a). A striking parallel is found in the inscription of חֲבִילִי of Gebal (גִּבְלִי), who is figured on his stele in the act of presenting such a cup of wine to the local deity (see his inscription in loc. cit.). (c) By a still bolder figure the punitive wrath of the offended Deity is spoken of as a cup which the guilty, Israelites and heathen alike, must drain to the dregs. So Jer 25<sup>10a</sup> (the 'cup of wrath'), Ezk 23<sup>32-34</sup>, Is 51<sup>17a</sup> ('the cup . . . RV 'staggering'), Zec 12<sup>2</sup> (RV 'c. . . Ps 75<sup>8</sup>, Rev 16<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>6</sup>, for all which see the commentaries. (d) Lastly, we have 'the cup of consolation (ποτήριον εἰς παράκλησιν)' offered to the mourners after the funeral-rites were performed, Jer 16<sup>7</sup> (cf. Pr 31<sup>6</sup> and see Commentaries in loc. and Schwalli, Das Leben nach d. Tode, § 8).

* The Heb. is simply 'let my right hand forget' (יְמִינִי נִשְׁכַּח), which may be dealt with in three ways. 1. As a passive: so LXX, ἐπιλήσεται ἡ δεξιὰ μου; Vulg., oblivioni detur dextera mea; Luth., so werde meiner Rechten vergessen; Ostervald, que ma droite s'oublie elle-même; Coverdale, 'let my right hand be forgotten.' But the Heb. as it stands cannot be tr'd passively. 2. As a corrupt text. The simplest emendation is proposed by Delitzsch, נִשְׁכַּח, which gives the pass. at once, and with which may be compared Jer 23<sup>40</sup>. Other suggested emendations will be found in Cheyne, Book of Psalms, crit. n. in loc. But Wellhausen (in Haupt) leaves the Heb. untouched and unnoticed. 3. As an ellipsis. So Del. as an alternative, 'let my right hand show itself forgetful' (cf. Wyclif's tr. 'my right hand be gounn [given] to forgetting'; Cheyne, 'let my right hand deny its service' (but in parchment ed. 1884, 'let the strength of my right hand dry up'); Geneva, 'forget to play'; Bishops' Bible, AV, and RV 'forget her cunning.'

CUPBEARER (נִשְׁבָּחָה).—An officer of considerable importance at Oriental courts, whose duty it was to serve the wine at the table of the king. The first mention of this officer is in the story of Joseph (Gn 40<sup>1-15</sup>), where the term rendered 'butler' (wh. see) in EV is the Heb. word above, rendered in other passages cupbearer (Arabic es-sāḥi). The holder of this office was brought into confidential relations with the king, and must have been thoroughly trustworthy, as part of his duty was to guard against poison in the king's cup. In some cases he was required to taste the wine before presenting it. The position of Nehemiah as cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus was evidently high. Herodotus (iii. 34) speaks of the officer at the court of Cambyses, king of Persia, as 'an honour of no small account,' and the narrative of Neh. shows the high esteem of the king for him, who is so solicitous for his welfare that he asks the cause of his sadness (2<sup>2</sup>). The cupbearers among the officers of king Solomon's household (1 K 10<sup>5</sup>) impressed the queen of Sheba, and they are mentioned among other indications of the grandeur of his court, which was modelled upon courts of other Oriental kings. The Rabshakeh, who was sent to Hezekiah (2 K 18<sup>17</sup>), was formerly supposed to have been cupbearer to Sennacherib, but the word (נִשְׁבָּחָה) means chief of the princes (see Del. on Is 36<sup>2</sup>, and Sayce, HCM p. 441). Among the Assyrians, the cupbearers, like other attendants of the king, were commonly eunuchs, as may be seen from the monuments; and such was the case generally at Oriental courts. The Persians, however, did not so uniformly employ eunuchs, and probably never so degraded their own people or the Jews who served them. Nehemiah was not a eunuch. Herod the Great had a cupbearer who was a eunuch (Jos. Ant. xvi. viii. 1).

H. PORTER.

CUPBOARD (κυλίκιον, 1 Mac 15<sup>20</sup>).—A sideboard used for the display of gold and silver plate. This is the earliest meaning of cupboard, a board or table for displaying cups and other vessels; cf. Greene (1592), 'Her mistress . . . set all her plate on the cubboorde for shewe.' J. HASTINGS.

CURIOUS.—Of the many meanings which once belonged to this word only two now remain, inquisitive and peculiar. Of these the first is found in Apocr., 2 Es 4<sup>23</sup> (interrogare) 9<sup>18</sup> (curiosus esse), Sir 3<sup>23</sup> (μη περιεργάζου, RV 'Be not over busy'), 2 Mac 2<sup>30</sup> (πολυπραγμονεῖν). In OT curious occurs as a description of 'the girdle of the ephod' in Ex 28<sup>37, 28, 29</sup> 29<sup>5</sup> 39<sup>5, 20, 21</sup>, Lv 8<sup>7</sup>, for which RV substitutes 'cunningly woven,' Amer. RV 'skilfully woven.' 'Curious girdle' (AV) or 'cunningly woven band' (RV) represents one word in Heb., חֲשֵׁבֶה hēshebh, which comes from חָשַׁב hāshabbh, to think, devise, invent ingenious or artistic things; whence also חֲשֵׁבֶה hēshebh, tr'd 'cunning workman'; and חֲשֵׁבֶה mahāshābbah, device, invention, tr'd 'curious works,' Ex 35<sup>32</sup> (RV 'cunning works').

'Crafty,' 'cunning,' and 'curious' were all used formerly in the sense of clever, ingenious; cf. Barbour (1375), Bruce, x. 359—

'A crafty man and a curious'; and as a good parallel to the passages in Ex, Shaks. Cymb. v. v. 361—

'He, sir, was lapp'd
In a most curious mantle, wrought by the hand
Of his queen mother.'

The same thought is found in Ps 139<sup>15</sup> 'I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.' The Heb. here (קקק) means 'variegated'; 'the body or the foetus is described as woven together of so many different-coloured threads, like a cunning and beautiful network or tapestry'—Perowne.

The only other occurrence of 'curious' is in Ac 19<sup>19</sup> 'c. arts,' meaning 'magical arts,' as RVm (Gr. τὰ τέλεμα, lit. 'superfluous things,' 'things better left alone' (Page); cf. Sir 3<sup>23</sup> above, and see BUSYBODY). 'Curious' here is due to Wyclif, 'curious things,' a literal tr. of Vulg. curiosa; Tindale, 'c. crafts'; Geneva, 'c. artes' (Vulg. marg. curiosas artes). From this place it has passed into English literature, as Bacon, Essays, 35, 'the Q. Mother, who was given to Curious Arts, caused the King her Husbands Nativitie, to be Calculated, under a false Name.' J. HASTINGS.

CURSE.—Under this title an account is given of the ideas connected with the Heb. words קקק and קקק (anathema), and with the Gr. word ἀνάθεμα (anathema), so far as it is representative of the latter. The Heb. words are variously rendered in AV: 'the accursed thing' in Jos 7<sup>11</sup> etc.; 'everything devoted' in Nu 18<sup>14</sup>; 'every dedicated' thing in Ezk 44<sup>22</sup>; 'and I will consecrate their spoil' in Mic 4<sup>13</sup>. RV has in all these places 'devote' or 'devoted thing'; where the object is personal, it has usually 'utterly destroy' (see Driver on Dt 2<sup>24</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> or Sam. p. 100 f.). A thing which is קקק is irrevocably withdrawn from common use. This may be done in two ways, or at least may have two kinds of result. In the one case, the devoted thing becomes God's; it falls irredeemably to Him, or to His sanctuary or His priests. In this sense, as has been pointed out, to 'devote' a thing is to make a peculiar kind of vow concerning it. The most instructive passage, in illustration of this sense, is Lv 27<sup>28</sup>. 'No devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, whether of man or beast, or of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted, which shall be devoted from among men, shall be ransomed; he shall surely be put to death.' In the second and third of the passages quoted above (Nu 18<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>22</sup>), it is said expressly that every devoted thing in Israel is the priest's: this might include the spoil of conquered nations, carried into the temple treasury, as perhaps in Mic 4<sup>13</sup>, or property of any other description which a man irrevocably alienated. But the last words in Lv 27<sup>28</sup> (he shall surely be put to death) point to the second, and much the commoner, use of the words קקק and קקק. To 'devote' a thing means to put it under the ban, to make and to execute a vow of extermination, so far as that thing is concerned. It is this meaning that has occasioned the Eng. rendering for קקק—the accursed thing. Whatever is devoted to utter destruction is regarded as under a curse. Things which are so devoted are in a sense inviolable; in the old, morally neutral sense of holiness, it may be said that a peculiar degree of holiness attaches to them. The thing called קקק is at the same time קקק (compare the seemingly opp. meanings of sacer in Latin, and the idea of taboo). It was common in ancient warfare to 'devote,' or put under the ban, everything which belonged to him. All wars were holy wars; warriors were consecrated (Is 13<sup>2</sup>); and the ban, which seemed natural in the circumstances, might be of greater or less extent. In Dt 2<sup>34</sup>, which speaks of the conquest of Sihon's kingdom, we are told that Israel 'utterly destroyed (devoted) every inhabited city, with the women and the little ones,' and the same terrible account is given in Dt 3<sup>6</sup> of Og and Bashan. In Dt 7<sup>2</sup> this is even laid down as the law for the conduct of the sacred war against the Canaanites. But it is only human beings that are here put under the ban: 'The cattle we took for a prey unto ourselves, with the spoil of the cities which we had taken.' In some cases the ban was more stringent. In Dt 7<sup>25</sup> it is specially extended to the precious metal on the images of the Canaanites: this is an abomination to J'; and 'thou shalt not bring an abomination into thy house, and become a devoted thing (קקק) like it . . . for it is a devoted thing.' It was a ban, or curse, of this stringent type which Achan violated at the conquest of Jericho, and Hiel the Bethelite, long afterwards, when he rebuilt the town. He who appropriates what is קקק, as Achan did, becomes himself (Dt 7<sup>25</sup>, Jos 6<sup>18</sup>) קקק: the ban, or sentence of extermination, is extended to him, and he is ruthlessly destroyed, with all the persons and property that attach to him. It was a similar ban which Saul violated, or allowed the people to violate, in the war with Amalek; and his action is represented as equally serious, though not followed on the instant by such tragical results. In point of fact, it was not practicable for the Israelites to 'devote' the Canaanites wholesale (1 K 9<sup>21</sup>); and the proclamation of ruthless warfare, under the auspices of a devoted thing, was not always followed. The same thing is done in the case of Mesha on the Moabite stone. It is more interesting to note that God Himself is sometimes the subject who proclaims this war, or pronounces this sentence of destruction. Thus in Is 34<sup>1</sup> 'The Lord hath declared against all the nations . . . He hath devoted them (קקק), He hath given them up to the slaughter.' So in v. 5 Edom is קקק the people whom I have devoted. And in Mal 4<sup>6</sup> God threatens to come and lay the earth under a ban.

It is usual to point to Ezr 10<sup>8</sup> as an instance marking the transition between the ancient and awful use of קקק, and that post-biblical use in which it is equivalent to Excommunication. We are told here that all the substance of a man who did not answer a certain summons should be forfeited (קקק), and he himself separated (קקק) from the congregation. Probably this is the first trace of Jewish ecclesiastical usages, of which hints are to be found in NT in such passages as Mt 18<sup>17</sup>, Jn 9<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>4</sup> 16<sup>2</sup>, Lk 6<sup>22</sup>. Though such usages, no doubt, would influence the practice of the Christian Church, it is not likely that they have anything to do with that 'delivering' of offenders 'to Satan,' of which we read in 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup>. The suggestion in both these cases, and especially in the first, which has been interpreted of a sentence of death, is rather of a severity resembling that of the ancient 'ban'; but with the significant difference, that in both the purpose of this solemn exclusion from the Christian community is remedial. Both the incestuous person at Corinth, and Hymenæus and Alexander in Asia, are to profit eventually by their discipline.

The true succession to קקק is represented in NT by those passages in which ἀνάθεμα (Anathema) is found. This is the usual LXX rendering of the word. Thus in Dt 7<sup>26</sup> referred to above, the Gr. is ἀνάθεμα ἕως ἔσπερ καὶ τοῦτο: thou shalt be 'accursed' like the accursed thing which thou takest. Cf. Jos 6<sup>17</sup>, Zec 14<sup>21</sup>,

Even the place-name Hormah (Nu 21<sup>9</sup>) is rendered ἀνάθεμα; a variant is ἐξολέθρευσις. In NT the word is used only by St. Luke and St. Paul (Rev 22<sup>3</sup> quotes Zec 14<sup>1</sup>, but with the form κατάθεμα). In Ac 23<sup>12-14, 21</sup> we read of men who ἀναθέματι ἀνεθεματίσαμεν ἑαυτούς—bound themselves with imprecations on their own heads—neither to eat nor to drink till they had killed Paul. The same verb is used in Mk 14<sup>21</sup> with ὀμνῆσαι to describe Peter's profane denial of Christ: he wished he might be cursed or damned if he knew the man. But the serious passages are in St. Paul. In 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup> we have, No man speaking in the spirit of God says, Jesus is ἀνάθεμα. This may mean that no man speaking in the spirit of God can do what Paul once tried to get Christians to do—blaspheme Christ, i.e. speak profanely of Him, ὡς εἰς τὸν Θεόν; more precisely how (Ac 26<sup>11</sup>). Or it may mean that no one speaking in the spirit of God can speak of Christ as an object of hatred to God, as Jews with the cross in their minds might do. For illustrations of the passage, see Edwards, ad loc. (Com. on 1 Cor.), and Harnack's note on Didache, xvi. 5 (ὅτι αὐτοῦ τοῦ καταθέματος). In Ro 9<sup>3</sup> St. Paul says he could wish himself to be ἀνάθεμα from Christ for his brethren's sake. This is exactly the type of OT: he could wish to perish that they might be saved—a spark from the fire of Christ's substitutionary love.* It is only the other side of ἀνάθεμα which is seen in the other passages where the word is used: 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8</sup>. 'If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be ἀνάθεμα': the apostle assents to God's will that no part in bliss, but only utter perdition, can be his who does not love the Saviour. So again, when he says, and says deliberately and repeatedly, of the man or the angel who preaches another gospel than he has preached, 'let him be ἀνάθεμα,' he expresses in the strongest possible style his assurance that the gospel he preaches is the one way of salvation, that to preach another is to make the grace of God vain, to bring about the death of Christ and to delude men, and that for such sins there can be nothing but a final irremediable judgment, to which he assents. The vehemence is like that with which Christ says, 'It is better than a man should make one of these, that he should stumble would it be for that man to have a millstone hanged about his neck, and be cast into the depths of the sea. In both cases the passion of indignation is the passion of sympathy with the love of God, and with the weak, to whom an irreparable injury is being done.

The word 'curse' is also used in the English Bible as the tr. of ἔρα and κατάρα. The interest of this centres in the passage Gal 3<sup>10-13</sup>, and in the ref. there to Dt 21<sup>23</sup>. The non-observance of the law, St. Paul teaches, puts men (some limit it to the Jews) under a curse; from this curse Christ redeems them by becoming Himself a curse (κατάρα) on their behalf. The proof that Christ did become a curse is given in the form of a reference to the Crucifixion: it is written, 'cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree' (Dt 21<sup>23</sup>). The Heb. is עֲרֵךְ עֲרֵךְ, the LXX κεκατηραμένος ὑπὸ θεοῦ; and it has been often remarked that St. Paul does not introduce 'by God' into his quotation. Some seem to think that he shrank from doing it, as if it would have been equivalent to saying ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦς. But he does not shrink from saying that God made Christ to be sin for us (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>), which, in its identification of Christ with, or its substitution of Christ for, the sinner, is exactly the same as His becoming a curse in Gal 3<sup>13</sup>. The important thing is not that St. Paul omits the ὑπὸ θεοῦ, but that, as Cremer remarks, he avoids the personal κεκατηραμένος of the LXX, and employs the abstract κατάρα. In His death on the cross He was identified under God's dispensation with the doom of sin: He became curse for us; and it is on this our redemption depends. See CROSS.

CURTAIN.—1. The ordinary tent of the Semitic nomad, in modern times, is made by sewing together a number of narrow lengths of a water-resisting material, as a rule cloth woven from yarn of goats' and camels' hair mixed with sheeps' wool. And so it must have been in ancient times.* Hence we read of a Heb. country maid being 'black as the tents of Kedar' (Ca 1<sup>5</sup>). The name of these lengths of tent-cloth was in the Heb. קוֹרֵי (AV and RV 'curtains'). The weaving of them, as well as the previous spinning of the yarn, was and is one of the chief occupations of the women of the tribe (Ex 35<sup>25, 26</sup>; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, i. pp. 81, 125; Doughty, see footnote). With a more advanced civilization men also took to weaving as a trade (1 Ch 4<sup>21</sup>); indeed this particular branch, the weaving of goats' hair cloth, is well known to have been one of the staple industries of Tarsus, which has led many scholars to interpret σκηνοποιός (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>) as 'a weaver of tent-cloth' (see art. 'Paulus' in PREE xi. 359).† In OT we find that ten of these yēri'ōth or curtains, of special width and workmanship, were to be 'coupled together,' in two sets of five, to form the innermost covering of the tabernacle proper (the Mishkān), as given in detail Ex 26<sup>12</sup>. Above this was a more ordinary covering, composed of eleven curtains of the usual goats' hair, and constituting the ḥān or tent of the tabernacle (Ex 26<sup>17</sup>). For further particulars about these curtains see TABERNACLE. Yēri'ōth is also used in OT of the curtains or tent-cloth of ordinary nomad tents (Jer 49<sup>26</sup>) and of the gila-tents of king Solomon (Cal<sup>5</sup>), and often stands in poetic parallelism with ḥān 'tent,' Is 54<sup>2</sup>, Jer 42<sup>10</sup>, Hab 3<sup>7</sup>. The ḥān-ing. ḥān is even used of the tent erected by David for the ark on Mt. Zion, 2 S 7<sup>2</sup> (LXX ἐν μέσῳ τῆς σκηνῆς, but 1 Ch 17<sup>1</sup> ḥān, plur.).

2. In AV the portière (קַנֹּפִי) which closed the entrance to the Holy Place of the tabernacle, and is elsewhere in AV tr<sup>d</sup> 'hanging,' is once rendered curtain (Nu 3<sup>26</sup>). The same Heb. word is also applied to the similar curtain at the entrance of the court of the tabernacle. The uniform tr<sup>d</sup> in RV is 'screen,' even when the name is applied to the 'veil of the screen' which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies, cf. Ex 26<sup>36</sup> 35<sup>12</sup> etc. See further TABERNACLE.

3. Is 40<sup>22</sup> the word tr<sup>d</sup> curtain (קַנֹּפִי) seems from its etymology to denote some fine material such as gauze (so RVm, Dillm., Duhm).

4. In the Book of Judith we read of Holofernes possessing a very ḥān קַנֹּפִי קַנֹּפִי קַנֹּפִי (EV 'canopy,' Jth 10<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>), 'purple and gold and emerald and precious stones inwoven.' This, as the name and the context of 10<sup>21</sup> imply, must have been a mosquito-curtain. See CANOPY.

CUSH (כּוּשׁ).—1. In the hieroglyphs Kash, Kaish, Kish, Keshi, Kesh, or Keshu, a nation to which frequent reference is made in the Bible. Its

* 'The tent-stuff is seamed of narrow lengths of the housewives' rude worsted weaving; the yarn is their own spinning, of the mingled wool of the sheep and camels' and goats' hair together. Thus it is that the cloth is blackish,' Doughty, Arabia Deserta, i. p. 225.

† σκηνοποιός, loc. cit., is more probably a synonym of σκηνοδόχος, one who prepared and put together the lengths supplied by the weavers. See Ramsay and Nestle in Expos. Times, vii. (1897) 109, 153, 286.

founder is given in the ethnological tables of Gn (10<sup>6</sup>) as son of Ham, and brother of Mizraim (Egypt), Put, and Canaan. Though the form Kush is not found in the Bible, there is no doubt of the identity of the name referred to in the Bible, and located by . . . of Egypt, with the Kesh, whose home was in Ethiopia, but who were known to the Hebrews through the prominent part in Egypt. affairs. This country, . . . of Egypt originally . . . tribes called Nahs. u' (Brugsch, Geographie der Nachbarländer Egyptens, p. 4), and extending S. from the first cataract, though repeatedly invaded by Egypt. kings of the early dynasties, was formally enrolled in Egypt by Tahutmes I. of the 18th dynasty, and put under a governor called the prince of Kesh (Egypt. seten-si en Kesh, king's-son of Cush), who from the 18th dynasty regularly figures in the records of the king of Egypt. . . . B.C., during the wars between the high priests of Amon (descendants of Hrihor) and the Tanites, the Upper Nile was lost to Egypt, and it is probable that descendants of Hrihor, . . . Napata, on Mt. Barkal (according to some authorities, the Heb. q), which is more probably to be identified with Memphis . . . title . . . the end of the reign of Sheshonk II., they occupied Thebes; and about 775, under the king Pi'anchi, they had spread as far S. as Hermopolis, while all important towns had Eth. garrisons. An attempt made by Tefnaht of Sais (whose name survives in Gr. authors under the form Τεφναχθος) to unite the petty princes under whose rule Lower Egypt had now fallen, in resisting them, was defeated at Memphis, (the great stele of Pi'anchi, edited by Mariette, Monuments Divers, and tr. by . . . 682-707, in which this event . . . the most important of the . . . although for reasons not known Pi'anchi afterwards made terms with Tefnaht, whose son Bokenranf, or Bocchoris, is represented by Manetho as the founder of the 24th dynasty. During the reign of this king (about B.C. 728), a successor of Pi'anchi (probably after some intermediate reigns), Shabaka, son of Kashtu, called in the Bible so' (2 K 17), which should rather be read Sava, representing the name without the definite article), himself on the mother's side a descendant of Osorkon III. of the 23rd dynasty, invaded Lower Egypt, defeated Bocchoris, and put him to death; and, unlike his predecessor Pi'anchi, succeeded in obtaining a permanent hold on the country, whose two successors are regarded as constituting a 25th, or Eth. dynasty. The conspiracy between this king and Hosen of Isr. against the Assyrs. led to the defeat of the former at Raphia in 721, and to the captivity of the ten tribes; and the identification of Egypt with Ethiopia at this time is alluded to in Is 7<sup>18</sup>, where the 'fly that is in the uttermost part of the river of Egypt,' i.e. Ethiopia, is made co-ordinate with Assyria as a first-rate power; and in Is 20<sup>4</sup> the names Cush and Mizraim are used as synonyms. (See especially Lenormant, 'Mémoire sur l'époque Eth.' Rev. Archéologique, 1870). Under Shabaka's son Shabataka, or Sebichos (perhaps the Sabteca of Gn 10<sup>7</sup>), it is probable that anarchy again broke out in the Delta, a state of things reflected in the prophecy of Is 19. The king Shabataka, who . . . in 716, was followed in 704 by Taharka (the תהקה of the Bible, 2 K 19<sup>9</sup>), who is said to have murdered his predecessor and to have married Shabaka's widow, acknowledging her son as co-regent. As in 2 K 19<sup>9</sup> he is officially described as king of Cush only, it is probable that his authority was not at first recognized in Egypt. During his reign occurred the famous conspiracy which led to Sennacherib's invasion of Pal., terminating most probably in the defeat of the Egypt. forces at Altaku, although, as the Assyrs. were unable to follow up their victory, peace was made between the two powers, giving Taharka time to consolidate his authority; until in 671 a fresh quarrel with the Assyrs. led to the invasion of Egypt by Esarhaddon, who conquered the country as far S. as Thebes; and a fresh attempt of Taharka to turn out the Assyrs. at the accession of Assurbanipal in 668 led only to a fresh invasion and renewed disasters in . . . rka's son and successor T . . . who acceded in 664, would seem to have made one more attempt to free the country from the Assyrs., but without more success than his predecessors, and in the following year the Eth. rule came . . . Their own country was invaded by . . . B.C. 525, whence in the lists of Darius the Cushiya figure as a subject race. Though the Persians could not permanently occupy the country, they would seem to have destroyed Napata, the chief town after this time being Meroë or Barua, slightly N. of Shendi on the Upper Nile, which Herodotus regards as the chief city, although Napata was . . . the sacred city. The ancients tel . . . elective nature of the Eth. monarchy. their statements being, in part, confirmed by the monuments of Napata; and it would seem that the kings were chosen out of certain families by the god, i.e. by the priests, who also had the right to command the king to put an end to his life if they thought fit—a right which was finally abolished by king Erkamou, or Ergamenes, early in the 3rd cent. B.C. This custom, which has been illustrated from the practice of tribes still existing in Africa, may be regarded as specifically Eth., as also the female rule, which at most periods of Eth. history seems to have had theoretical or practical recognition; in Rom. times they were governed by queens, called always Candace (cf. Ac 8<sup>27</sup>), . . . with their sons; but even in . . . the important position given to the kings' mothers and sisters anticipates this practice. Otherwise, Eth. culture, art, and religion, as well as the official language, would seem to have been directly borrowed from Egypt; and while the idea that Egypt. culture was Eth. in origin must be distinctly rejected, the theory of Lepsius, that the Cush were the nation who circulated that culture through the ancient world, would seem to rest on no secure foundation. 2. The fact that Cush in Gn 10<sup>8</sup> is represented as the father of Nimrod, probably comes from the confusion of the Kesh with the Cossai, or Kashshu, a tribe who had possession of Babylonia between the 16th and 13th cent. B.C.* 3. For the names of the sons of Cush in Gn 10<sup>7</sup>, see SEBA, HAVILAH, SABTAH, RAAMAH, and SBTACA.

CUSH (כּוּשׁ, LXX Χουσι).—Mentioned only in the title of Ps 7. The older translators appear to have read כּוּשׁ (Aq. Symm. Theod. Jer.). 'As the name of a person, the word is of uncertain meaning' (Delitzsch). Cush is described as a Benjamite, and was probably a follower of Saul who opposed David. The seventh psalm sheds no light on name, person, or character. W. T. DAVIDSON.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM (כּוּשָׁן רִישָׁתַּיִם, Χουσαν-ρῑσῑθαιμ, AV Chushan-rishathaim), king of Mesopo-* Hommel however (Expositor Times [1897], viii. 378) would regard the tribe mentioned here as one existing in Central Arabia, to which he finds further reference in 2 Ch 14<sup>9</sup>, where Zerah the Cushite is said to have invaded Judah in the days of Asa (cf. LXX both here and in 2 Ch 21<sup>16</sup>, where he finds the Arab tribe Μαζωνιαι, Mazin, mentioned). The name Zerah (or Dirrih) is found as a title of early Sabean kings. It may be doubted, however, if the LXX had not really preserved the original text or an ancient trans. on respecting its meaning.

tamia or Aram-naharaim, was the first of those into whose hands God delivered Israel for apostasy in the days of the Judges (Jg 3<sup>8-10</sup>). For eight years they were in bondage to this king, till they were delivered by Caleb's younger brother Othniel. Of Cushan-rishathaim nothing more is known directly, and his name has not yet been found on the monuments. The country over which he ruled, 'Aram of the Two Rivers,' was an extensive territory lying between the Tigris and the Euphrates, the last of the tribute (See Aram-naharaim in art. ARAM, p. 138<sup>b</sup>). Its two cities mentioned in Scripture are Haran (Gn 28<sup>10</sup>) and Pethor (Dt 23<sup>4</sup>, Nu 22<sup>5</sup>). It is known as Nahrina on the Egyptian monuments, and Nahrina in the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, the native name of its people being Mitanni. Sayce (the soundness of whose argument, however, is denied by Moore and Driver) finds a connection between the notice of the notice of the reign of Ramses III. 'The eight years,' he says, 'during which the king of Aram-naharam oppressed Israel would exactly agree with the interval between the Libyan attack upon Egypt and the Pharaoh against Syria. We know from the Egyptian records that Mitanni of Aram-naharam took part in the invasion of Egypt; we also know from them that the king of Mitanni was not among those who actually marched into the Delta. He participated in the southward movement of the peoples of the north, and nevertheless lingered on the way. What is more probable than that he again sought to secure that dominion in Canaan which had belonged to some of his predecessors?' See further OTHNIEL.

CUSHI, CUSHITE (כּוּשִׁי, כּוּשִׁיָּתָא).—The word occurs with the article in Nu 12<sup>1</sup>, 2 S 18<sup>21</sup>; without the article in Jer 36<sup>14</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>1</sup>. 1. With the article it is probably merely an expression of nationality, 'the Cushite' (see CUSH). That in both instances it was a sufficient designation of the person in question, seems to show that there were but few Cushites among the Israelites. In both, the foreign character of the person intended is indicated by the narrative. It was looked upon as a disgrace that Moses should have married a Cushite. In 2 S 18<sup>21</sup> the stranger is unacquainted with the short-cut made use of by Ahimelech. 2. Without the article the word is used merely as a proper name. It is borne by (1) the great-grandfather of Jehudi, the latter one of Jehoiakim's counsellors (Jer 36<sup>14</sup>); (2) the father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1<sup>1</sup>).

CUSTOM (τέλος, Mt 17<sup>25</sup>, Ro 13<sup>7</sup>, comp. 1 Mac 10<sup>31</sup> 11<sup>35</sup>), toll, tax upon goods, generally ad valorem, as distinguished from κῆνος and φῶρος, tribute, an annual tax on houses, lands, and persons. Custom ordinarily went into the treasury of the native government. Thus in Palestine the Herods in Galilee and Peræa received the custom, whereas in Judæa it was paid to the procurator for behoof of the Roman government. The custom (τέλος) was collected by the tax-gatherer (τελώνης). For full details see PUBLICAN and TAXES.

CUTH, CUTHAH (כּוּתָּא, כּוּתָּה; B Χουθᾶ, Χουθ; A Χουᾶ).—One of the cities from which Sargon brought colonists to take the place of the Israelites whom he had deported from Samaria, B.C. 722 (2 K 17<sup>24, 30</sup>). These colonists intermingled with the Israelite inhabitants who were left by Sargon; and their descendants, the Samaritans, were in consequence termed by the Jews Cuthæans (כּוּתָּא). The old Arabic geographers, Cuthah is not far from Babylon, and there seem to have been two cities of the same name close to each other (de Sacy, Chrest. Arab. i. 331). This view as to the site of Cuthah is borne out by the Assyrian inscriptions, from which we learn that Kuti (or Kutû) was a city of Middle-Babylonia. It has now been identified with the modern Tell-Ibrâhîm, N.E. of Babylon, where remains of the temple of Nergal (cf. v. 30) have been discovered (see Schrader, COT, i. 270 f.). Cuthah has also been identified as the name of a country near Kurdistan, possibly = Ur Kasdim (Gn 11<sup>31</sup>)—Neubauer, Geogr. p. 379; while others consider 'Cuthæans' to be another form of 'Cossæans,' a tribe dwelling in the Persian province Jutipa, the modern Khuzistan, E. of the mouth of the Tigris.

CUTHA (A Κουθᾶ, B om., AV Coutha), 1 Es 5<sup>32</sup>.—His sons were among the temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. There is no name in the lists of Ezra and Neh. to be taken from the Babylonian town (2 K 17<sup>24, 30</sup>).

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH.—i. In the legislation of Dt (D) and in the corpus known as the 'Law of Holiness' (H), the Hebrews are forbidden to 'cut themselves' (קָטְעוּ אֶתְּמֵתָם Dt 14<sup>1</sup>) or to 'make any cutting' (lit. an incision קָטַע Lv 19<sup>28</sup>, קָטַע Lv 21<sup>5</sup>, LXX ἐντομίσ) in their flesh 'for the dead.' The prohibition in question is aimed at one of the most widely-spread tokens of grief at the loss of relatives or friends. To scratch and beat one's self to the effusion of blood, nay, to gash and hack one's self of set purpose, may be said to be an all but universal custom among uncivilized and semi-civilized races at the present day. It must suffice to refer to such well-known works as Waitz's Anthropologie der Naturvölker (passim), and H. Spencer's Principles of Sociology, 3rd ed. vol. i. pp. 163 ff., 277, 292, etc. (see also authorities named at the close of this art.). The prevalence of the custom is equally attested for nearly all the nations of antiquity, the Egyptians being the most notable exception (Herod. bk. ii. 61, 85; W. Smith, Dict. Egypt. 1851 vol. i. p. 374). Thus Herodotus tells us that the Scythians of his time on the death of their king 'cut off their ears, shear their hair, and make incisions all over (περιτέμνονται) their arms' (iv. 71). Xenophon gives a similar account of the Armenians and Assyrians (Cyrop. iii. 1. 13). The legislation of Solon, acc. to Plutarch, forbade the women of Athens to beat themselves to the effusion of blood (ἀμυχὰς κοττομένην . . . ἀπέλειν, Sol. 21), and the same is affirmed of the laws of the Twelve Tables ('mulieres genas ne radunto'—quoted by Cicero, de Leg. ii. 23). Among the ancient Arabs, further, the practice forbidden at Athens and Rome was associated, as it was among the Heb. (see below), with the cutting off of the hair (Kitâb al-Aghânî, xiv. 101, 23—this and other reff. in Wellh. Skizzen, iii. 160 f.). Thus the poet Lebid 'says to his daughters, When I die, do not scratch your faces or shave off your hair,' xxi. 4 [ed. Huber and Brockelmann].* The earliest reference to this custom of making cuttings in the flesh among the Hebrews is in what appears to be the orig. reading in Hos 7<sup>14</sup> (see RVm), where several MSS (see De Rossi, Var. Lectt. Vet. Test. in loc.) have קָטְעוּ, which was also the reading of the Greek translators (κατατέμνονται). It was widely prevalent in the time of Jeremiah, not only among his countrymen of the South (16<sup>6</sup>) and those of the central and north-

ii. When we inquire as to the raison d'être of these prohibitions we find considerable difference of opinion. We may, however, at once set aside as entirely inadequate the view that their purpose was to restrain that exuberance of emotion which the Hebrews shared with other Oriental peoples; in other words, to prohibit certain extravagant manifestations of grief as such. To say, for example, that 'the practices here (Dt 14<sup>1</sup>) named seem to be forbidden . . . because such excesses of grief would be inconsistent in those who as children of a heavenly Father had prospects beyond this world' (Speaker's Comm. on Dt 14<sup>1</sup>), is quite unscientific, inasmuch as considerations are here introduced altogether foreign to this stage of revelation. Nor yet is it sufficient to regard these prohibitions—for we must remember that artificial baldness and tattooing the skin (see below) stand in the same category with . . . flesh—as primarily . . . of the human body which is God's handiwork. It cannot be denied that both the explanations just adduced have a certain amount of force and truth, but they do not seem to reach the original significance of the prohibitions in question.

In our search for the real origin of the latter, two points have to be kept in mind: both the cuttings and the baldness are expressly stated to be 'for the dead,' and, not less explicitly, to be incompatible with Israel's unique relation to J', a relation at once of sonship (Dt 41<sup>1</sup>) and of consecration ('קדש' 14<sup>2</sup>). Now it is admitted on all hands (1) that such mutilations of the body as are here condemned have in almost all countries formed part of the religious rites of heathenism. And, in particular, they must have been familiar enough in the Pal. of those days where such self-inflicted bloodshed formed part of the everyday ritual of the Canaanite Baal (see 1 K 18<sup>28</sup>, the only passage not already cited where the Heb. word has this signification, and note 'after their manner'). (2) Both the 'shedding of the blood and the dedication of the hair are found, as we have seen, in the most intimate connexion with the ritual of heathen burial and the belief in the necessity of propitiating the spirit of the deceased. Thus (to give but a single example) we are told that 'a Samoan ceremony, on the occasion of a decease, was "beating the head with stones till the blood runs"; and this they called "an offering of blood" for the dead' (quoted from Turner's Samoa by Spencer, Princip. of Sociol. p. 166).

In view of the facts now stated, we are led to the conclusion that both the tokens of grief prohibited by the Heb. legislation were so prohibited because they carried with them associations of a character incompatible with the pure religion of J'. Whether we hold with Stade and others that a developed ancestor-worship was practised by the primitive Semites or not, there can be no doubt that the gashing of the body and the shaving of the head as practised by the Semitic peoples generally must, in the last resort, be traced to the desire to propitiate the manes of the departed, and 'to make an enduring covenant with the dead' (W. R. Smith, ES p. 395). But while we are forced by the evidence to this conclusion as to the ultimate origin of the practices in question, we would not have it supposed that any such animistic conception was present to the minds of the contemporaries of Isaiah and Jeremiah. In nothing is mankind so conservative as in all that concerns the respect due to the dead, and so, to the spiritually-minded at least, the practices prohibited were but the wonted outward signs of excessive grief. All excesses, then—so we conclude—such as making incisions in the hand (Jer 48<sup>37</sup>) or other part of the body to the effusion of blood, and shaving the head in whole or in part, were strictly forbidden by the legislation of D and of H, not merely or even chiefly quod excesses, but as being alike in origin and association unworthy of those who had attained to the dignity of the sons of J'.

iii. Under the head of 'cuttings in the flesh' falls to be considered also the particular practice forbidden in Lv 19<sup>28</sup> [Ye shall not] 'print any marks (עֲקֻמָּה עָקֻמָּה, LXX ὑράμματα στίγματα, Vulg. stigmata) upon you'. The expression does not occur elsewhere, but we may be sure that the reference is to the ancient and . . . custom of tattooing or branding. . . . The two modes of marking is to be understood here it is impossible to say with absolute certainty, the verbal stem, עֲקֻמָּה, having both meanings in post-biblical Heb., while the same . . . refers to stigma and its derivatives, stigma, etc. In favour of tattooing, however, the following may be urged: (1) the exegetical tradition; Rashi, for example, explains the marks in question as made with a needle (Comm. in loc.); (2) the probable origin of the custom, as advocated by the acute author of RS. 'In Lv 19<sup>28</sup>, where . . . is . . . as a heathenish practice, it is immediately associated with incisions in the flesh made in mourning or in honour of the dead, and this suggests that in their ultimate origin the stigmata are nothing more than the permanent scars of punctures made to draw blood for a ceremony of self-dedication to the deity' (p. 316, note 1).

The best-known illustration of the prevalence of the practice of tattooing or making stigmata in Syria is supplied by the priests of 'the Syrian goddess' in Lucian's treatise of that name, who were tattooed on wrist and neck (ch. 59—on which cf. the classical work of John Spencer, below). Philo (De Monarch. i.) refers to the allied practice of branding, familiar to us in the case of slaves and criminals, as practised by certain misguided idol-worshippers in his own time. In 3 Mac, also, Ptolemy IV. (Philopator) is . . . as having the contumacious Jews . . . the ivy-leaf, the symbol of Dionysus (2<sup>28</sup>). These . . . then, show that it was not an unusual . . . have tattooed or branded in one's flesh the name or symbol of the deity to whom one was specially devoted—a practice which at once gives us the true explanation of the interesting passage, Is 44<sup>5</sup> (another shall mark on his hand 'Yahweh's,' cf. RVm, also Gal 6<sup>17</sup> στίγματα Ἰησοῦ). Jewish tradition, we may add, has it that the obscure phrase of the Chronicler with regard to Jehoiaquim, 'that which was found in him' (2 Ch 36<sup>5</sup>), refers to his breach of the command in Lv 19<sup>28</sup>, letters having been discovered tattooed on his flesh, presumably the name of some heathen deity (Midrash Levit. Rabba 19—quoted by Strack, Comm. in loc.; Jerome, Quæst. Heb. in Paralipom. l.c.).

Here, then, we have another heathen custom forbidden to the worshippers of J<sup>n</sup>; and the unmistakable evidence of its being the cause of its being in itself a thing indifferent (Dillm. Theol. d. A.T. p. 428)—strengthens the view above advanced as to the historical raison d'être of the ancient custom, here (Lv 9<sup>28a</sup>) forbidden along with it, as alike incompatible with whole-hearted loyalty to J<sup>n</sup>.

CYMBAL.—See MUSIC.

CYPRESS (תירזח tirzāh, ilex).—As in the case of the box tree (tēashshūr), there is nothing in the philology to indicate what tree is signified. The root, which is obsolete in Heb., signifies in Arab. to be strong or hard. The tree is mentioned (Is 44<sup>14</sup>) in connexion with the cedar and the oak. It might be any of the numerous coniferous or cupuliferous trees of Bible lands, but there is no means of telling which. The LXX gives us no help, the sentence being confused, and not a tr. of the Hebrew. The cypress, Cupressus sempervirens, L., is abundant, and suitable as to hardness, but we have no certainty that it is intended. Furthermore, it is probable that Cupressus sempervirens is the fir. See FR. Under these circumstances, the best way would be to transliterate, as in the case of the algum and almug, and call the tree tirzāh.

G. E. POST.

CYPRUS lies in the N.E. corner of the Levant (34° 33'—35° 41' N. lat., 32° 17'—34° 36' E. long.), between the coast of Asia Minor and Syria. (On the N. coast, the distance is 100 Eng. miles from Cape Gata to the extreme point of the island, Cape Andrea, only 60 (miles) from Larnaka on the Syrian coast. Consequently, the whole line of the Cilician coast is easily visible from the sea-level in C., and vice versa, while the Lebanon can be seen at sunrise even from Stavrovúni near Larnaka (2260 ft.).* Its greatest breadth, from Cape Gata to Cape Kormakíti, is 60 Eng. miles, and its extreme length, from Cape Drepano to Cape Andrea, is 145; but the latter includes the Karpass promontory, which, though 45 miles long, is nowhere more than 10 miles across. The nearly straight N. coast from Cape Kormakíti to Cape Andrea measures about 100 miles. The area of C. is 3707 square miles, or about equal to that of Norfolk and Suffolk; it is larger than Corsica or Crete, but smaller than Sicily or Sardinia.

C. consists of two mountain masses, separated by a broad low-lying plain: (1) The S.W. half of the island is occupied by a range composed of crystalline and metalliferous rocks, which in its western and highest section is called Tróodos (6406 ft.), and is continued through Mádhari (5305 ft.), Papúsa (5124 ft.), and the Mákhaera range (4674 ft.) to the almost isolated Stavrovúni (2260 ft.), about 12 miles from Larnaka. The same rocks reappear in the plateau of limestone and gypsum beds between Larnaka and Famagústa, but never rise to more than 300 ft. (2) The Messaoriá or 'midland' plain extends along the N. and N.E. side of Mákhaera from the Bay of Mórphu to that of Tróodos. A very low watershed divides the waters of the Serákhis, flowing towards Mórphu, from that of the Pedías (Πεδίαιος) and Yaliás, which rise from the N. side of Mákhaera and reach the sea in the extensive marshes. (3) The mountain range of the Pámbulos, and abrupt ridge from Cape Kormakíti to Cape Andrea. Its highest peak is Buffavénto (3135 ft.), crowned by a Byzantine fortress. H. Elias or Kórnos (3106 ft.) and Trýpa Vunó (3085 ft.) are conspicuous peaks in the West. Pentedáktylo, farther E., rises to 2405 ft., and Olymbos to 2431 ft.; but in the N. E. is higher than Sina Oros (238 ft.). The fortress of Kantára (161 ft.). Pámbulos, near Rhizokárpaso, reaches only 1194 ft. The northern coastland E. and W. of Keryniá is narrow, but well watered and very fertile.

* Cf. Is 23<sup>1</sup>, where the homeward-bound merchantmen first see the smoke of burning Tyre from their last anchorage at Kition: 'from the land of Kitim it is revealed to them.'

The only accurate map of C. is the Government Trigonometrical Survey (Stanford, 1885), incorporated in the subsequent editions of the Admiralty Chart of Cyprus (No. 2074).

The principal resources of C. in ancient and mediæval times were copper and timber. The former, which in fact derives its name from that of the island, was worked in great abundance on the N. side of Tróodos and Mákhaera, from Límni near the Bay of Khrýsokhu, to Frángissa (Tamassós) and Lithrodóna; and in less quantity near Tremithushá (Tremithus). The principal centres of export were Soloi (Karavostási) and Marion (Pólis Khrýsokhu). The supply was finally exhausted some time in the Middle Ages. Iron was worked from the 9th cent. B.C. onwards in the country about Mákhaera, though it never rivalled copper in commercial importance. Pliny (xxxiv. 2) says that only inferior qualities were worked in his time. Much glass was made in Roman times at Tamassós and elsewhere (Pliny, xxxvi. 193).

The forests of C. had not wholly disappeared even in imperial times, though they were already very much reduced in area by the continuous export of timber (Strabo, xiv. 5). The cypress (AV 'fir') or Karamanian pine is the principal forest tree; and the juniper (? the 'cypress' [tirzāh] of Is 44<sup>14</sup>) probably formerly attained great size in C., and still grows freely between Larnaka and Famagústa. Besides these, C. has always produced much wine and oil; and carobs, anise, and madder are considerable crops. It grew enough corn for its own population in the time of Augustus (Strabo, xiv. 5), and exports it now. Ladanum and resin were exported under the Roman Empire (Pliny, xii. 74, xiv. 123, xxiv. 34). Both Pliny (xxvii. 23, 58, 121, etc.) and Strabo (iii. 15) record the occurrence of precious stones; and the former, mines of alum and gypsum (xxxvi. 183). Salt is made in lagoons near Larnaka (Kition), and Pliny records the manufacture here (xxxi. 75) and at Salamis (xxxii. 84).

HISTORY.—The copper and the timber of C., so long as the supply lasted, gave the island an importance in commerce and civilization out of all proportion to its size. From the earlier part of the Bronze Age, when it had a large population and was in many respects highly developed, and exported copper to Syria, Cilicia, and probably to Egypt, to the farther parts of Asia Minor, and even to Central Europe. The influence also of Cypriote pottery was felt in Syria, and widely in Asia Minor; some of the finer varieties have been found in Egypt, South Palestine, Thera, Athens, and the Troad.

C. was invaded by Tahutmes III. of the 18th dynasty of Egypt (B.C. 1503-1449), and appears to have remained tributary to Egypt for some time.

Alexandria, was the capital of a small province in the modern Tripoli. Although a Greek city, dating from B.C. 631. It was famous for its beauty of situation, its commerce, and its culture. Alexander the Great granted the rights of citizenship in it to Jews on equal terms with Greeks, and it became an important centre of the Jews of the Dispersion, the fourth of the diapoli, being Jewish according to Josephus. In the reign of Manasseh, Psammitichus, king of Egypt, carried off many Jews and settled them in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, while one of the Ptolemies transported 100,000 Jews to Pentapolis in the same district. Like other communities of the Hel. Jews, the Cyrenians had a synagogue of their own in Jerus., and seem to have been more Jewish than the Jews themselves (Ac 6<sup>9</sup>). There were Cyrenians among the first preachers of the gospel, associated with the great forward movement of preaching it for the first time to the Gentiles (Ac 13<sup>29-31</sup>).

Lucius of C. (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>) is said by tradition to have been the first bishop of his native district. Tradition also connects St. Mark with the first establishment of Christianity in this part of Africa. An interesting speculation gathers round the name of Simon of Cyrene (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>). He is referred to as the father of Alexander and Rufus, evidently well known to Mark's readers (Mk 15<sup>21</sup>); while St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans refers to one Rufus as holding an honourable position among the brethren there, 'Salute Rufus, chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine' (Ro 16<sup>13</sup>). From this it has been conjectured that while St. Paul was studying at Jerus. he enjoyed the motherly care of Simon's wife.

After Alexander's death, the district of which C. was capital became a part of Egypt. Under the Rom. rule it was a provincia, and was politically connected with Crete. In the 4th cent. the city was destroyed by the Saracens, and is now desolate.

Cyrenian (Κυρηναῖος).—Two Cyrenians are mentioned in Scripture: Simon who bore our Lord's cross (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>), and Lucius a Christian teacher (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>).

W. MUIR.

CYRENIUS.—See QUIRINIUS.

CYRUS (𐎤𐎠𐎼𐎿, Kūros).—The name of Cyrus is written Kuras in Bab. cuneiform, Kurush in Old Persian. Ctesias stated on the authority of Parysatis, the wife of the Persian king Ochus, that her younger son was named Cyrus from the sun, as 'the Persians call the sun Kūros' (Epit. Phot. 80; Plut. Artax. 1). In Zend, however, the 'sun' is hware, which could not take the form Kūros in Old Persian, though in modern Persian it is khur, and in certain Aram. dialects of the Pamir it is khir and kher. According to Strabo (xv. 3), the original name of Cyrus was Agradates, his later name being adopted from that of the river Cyrus. But this is contrary to the fact that his grandfather's name was also Cyrus.

The classical writers have given contradictory accounts of his birth and rise to power. Herodotus (i. 95) says that he knew of three accounts different from the one he himself adopted, which was that Cyrus was the son of a Persian nobleman named Cambyses and Mandanê, a daughter of the Median king Astyages, who had caused her to marry beneath her station in consequence of a dream which the magi interpreted as predicting danger to himself from her son. A second dream induced him to order his relative Harpagus to kill the child. Harpagus gave it to the herdsman Mithridates to expose, but he and his wife Spako brought it up as their own. Subsequently Cyrus was recognized by Astyages, who, in consequence of the advice of the magi, sent him back to his parents, but punished

Harpagus by giving him the mutilated limbs of his own son to eat. Harpagus therefore persuaded Cyrus to lead the Persians into revolt; after which the infatuated Astyages appointed him the general of the Median army. The result was an easy victory on the part of Cyrus; Astyages, however, impaled the magi who had advised him to let his adversary go, raised another army, and himself led it into the field. But he was defeated and captured, though his life was spared, and Cyrus became king of Media as well as of Persia.

Xenophon, in the romance of the Cyropædia, gives a wholly different account. He makes Cambyses, the father of Cyrus, king of Persia. Cyrus is educated first in Persia and then by his grandfather Astyages; and when the latter is succeeded by his son Cyaxares, Cyrus acts as his general, subduing the Lydians, Babylonians, and other nations, and finally succeeding him in the natural course of things. His first victory over the Babylonians was when he was sixteen years old, when Evil-Merodach wantonly invaded Media; the second when he defeated the Median Neriglissar, the ally of Croesus of Lydia, Cyaxares. His final conquest of Babylonia took place before the death of the king of Media.

Nicolaus of Damascus (vii. fr. 66) asserts that Cyrus was the son of a Mardian bandit named Atradates, whose wife Argostê tended goats. He began his career as a servant in the palace of Astyages. Here he was adopted by Artembares, the cupbearer, and recommended to Astyages, who raised him to power and wealth. Cyrus now made his father Atradates satrap of Persia, and urged by a 'Chaldean' began to plot against Astyages, with the help of Ebare, a Persian. Eventually, after obtaining leave to visit Persia, where everything had been prepared for a revolt, he defeated at Hyrba the troops which had been sent against him. In a battle before Pasargadæ, however, he and his general Ebare were driven within the walls, and his father was captured and soon afterwards died. The Persians now fled to the precipitous mountain-peak where Cyrus had been reared, and there, excited by the taunts of their wives, they utterly overthrew their Median assailants and destroyed the kingdom of Astyages.

Ctesias calls Astyages Astyigas, and states that after his defeat by Cyrus he fled to Ecbatana, where he was concealed in the palace by his daughter Amytis and her husband Smerdis, whom Cyrus ordered to be tortured, and their children Spitakes and Megabarnes, to make them confess where he was. Smerdis was put into fetters by Cambyses, her brother-in-law, Cyrus, who married Amytis after putting her husband to death.

All these versions have been shown to be unhistorical by contemporaneous cuneiform inscriptions. The most important of these are—(1) a cylinder inscription of Nabonidus, the last king of the Bab. empire, from Abu Habba (Sippara); (2) an annalistic tablet written shortly after the conquest of Babylonia by Cyrus; (3) a proclamation of Cyrus of the same date.

The inscription of Nabonidus was composed soon after the conquest of Astyages by Cyrus in B.C. 549. Nabonidus calls Astyages (Istuvigu) king of the Manda or 'Nandê', whom the Assy. texts identify with the Gimirra or Cimmerians. He states that the temple of the moon-god at Harran had been destroyed by the Manda, but that Merodach had ordered him in a dream to restore it, assuring him that within three years 'Cyrus the king of Anzan, their little servant, with his small army, shall overthrow the widespread people of the Manda; Istuvigu, the king of the people of the Manda, he shall capture, and bring him a prisoner to his own country.'

D

D.—In critical notes on the text of the Gospels and Acts this symbol is used to indicate the readings of Codex Bezae, a Græco-Latin MS of the 6th cent. preserved in the Cambridge University Library. The text, both Greek and Latin, is written stichometrically, i.e. in lines of unequal length, divided to the sense—the Greek on the left, the Latin on the right hand page of each opening.

The Gospels are arranged in the order, Mt, Jn, Lk, Mk—an order found also in many old Latin MSS, the Gothic version, and in Const. Apost. ii. 57.

Between Mk and Ac there is a gap which, according to the original numbering of the quires, must have contained 67 leaves (8 quires and 3 leaves). It closes with a fragment of a Latin version of 3 Jn 11-16. Clearly, therefore, the Epp. of Jn occupied part of the vacant space (14 or 15 leaves). What else the missing leaves contained it is impossible to say. The other Catholic Epistles, if they were all present, would require about 36 leaves. This would leave 16 leaves (=2 quires) unaccounted for; and it is possible, though not very likely, that, as Scrivener suggests, the scribe had made a mistake of 2 in numbering his quires at this point in the MS.

About 37 leaves are missing in the parts of the MS, and 12 are more or less mutilated at the end. The following passages are in consequence wanting in the Greek Text—Mt 11-20 [37-15], 620-92 272-12, Jn 116, 326 [1814-2012], [Mk 1615-20], Ac 822-1014 2115-18 2210-20 2222 end. The gaps in the Latin are Mt 11-11 68-827 2685-271, Jn 11-318 [182-201], [Mk 166-20]. The passages in square brackets have been supplied by a 9th cent. hand.

The MS was written in all probability in Gaul, and Rendel Harris has given good reason for believing that it did not travel far from its birth-place for the first 1000 years of its existence. During this period it was corrected at various times by eight or nine different hands.

Its modern history begins with the Council of Trent, whither apparently it was taken in 1546 by the Bishop of Clermont in Auvergne. Stephens, in his 1550 edition, published readings from it derived from collations made for him by his friends in France, perhaps during this visit to the Council. When it was presented the MS to the University of Cambridge in 1581, he stated that it had been taken from the Abbey of St. Irenæus in Lyons at the sack of that city in 1562. It is for the most part the only witness among Greek MSS to a type of text which we know from the evidence of patristic quotations and the earliest versions to have been widely current as early as the 2nd cent. It has in consequence, especially in recent years, received a great deal of attention, notably in a most ingenious work by J. Rendel Harris, A Study of Codex Bezae ('Texts and Studies'), 1891, and in two careful but not altogether convincing volumes, The Old Syriac Element in Codex Bezae, 1893, and The Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, by F. H. Chase, 1895. The problems raised by these writers will require fuller treatment in connexion with the whole subject of the Textual Criticism of the New Testament.

An excellent edition of the MS, including a complete transcription of the text and a full introduction, was published by Scrivener in 1864, and this year (1897) the University of Cambridge has undertaken to bring out an edition in photographic facsimile.

D<sub>2</sub>.—In the Epistles of St. Paul the same symbol—written more properly D<sub>2</sub> to avoid confusion—is used to denote the readings of the MS in the National Library at Paris, the Codex Claromontanus. This is also a Græco-Latin MS of the 6th cent. written stichometrically. It seems clear that it was the work of a Greek scribe, and that it remained for some time in scholarly Greek hands; but there seems no decisive evidence to fix either the place where it was written or its first home. The remarkable list of the canonical books of OT and NT inserted between Philemon and Hebrews—known as the Claromontane stichometry—points on the whole to a Western origin,—Carthage, Rome, or Gaul. The Latin version is of great importance throughout. In Hebrews it is the main representative of the old Latin version of the epistle.

It contains all the Pauline epistles virtually complete, and the Epistle to the Hebrews. It has been most carefully collated both by Tischendorf and Tregelles, and sumptuously edited by Tischendorf, 1852.

D.—The symbol ordinarily used in criticism of Hex. to signify the work of the Deuteronomist; often so as to include also his school, although this creates confusion, which may be avoided by using for this sense D<sup>2</sup>, D<sup>3</sup>, and similar symbols. See HEXATEUCH.

F. H. WOODS.

DABBESHETH (דבשֶׁת), Jos 19<sup>11</sup>.—A place on the borders of Zebulun. The line is difficult to follow, but the extreme limits on N. and S. seem to be defined by the names Dabbesheth and Jokneam. In this case the ruin Dabshek, on the hills E. of Acco, may be intended, the only place where this name (meaning 'hump,' cf. Is 30<sup>6</sup>) occurs. See SWP, vol. i. sheet iii.

C. R. CONDER.

DABERATH (דברֶת), Jos 19<sup>12</sup> 21<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>72</sup>.—A city of Zebulun given to the Levites, noticed as the extreme point on the S.E. border; now the village Debúrieh at the foot of Tabor on the W. In the record of the conquests of Ramses II. (Brugsch, Hist. ii. p. 64) we learn that, about 1325 B.C., he attacked places in the Amorite country, named Dapur, S. of Naphtali, and Meirun, and Betha Antha (Beth Anath); and of these places Shunem was in Lower Galilee, and Beth Anath and Meirun in Upper Galilee. Dapur is thought to be Tabor or Daberath, and is represented as a walled town. But in Egyptian the letters L and R are not distinguished, and the name may have been Dapur. In the latter case Dapur in Upper Galilee would be the site. See DIBLAH. The site of Daberath on Tabor was known in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Dabira), but wrongly identified with Debir. See SWP vol. i. sheet vi.

C. R. CONDER.

DABRIA.—One of the five scribes who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14<sup>24</sup>).

DACUBI (Α Δακουβί, B om., AV Dacobi) = AKKUB, Ezr 2<sup>2</sup>, Neh 7<sup>45</sup>.

DAGGER (Jg 3<sup>16</sup> AV, 'sword' RV, Heb. דָּגֶר herebh).—The Heb. word means in most cases a short weapon used for stabbing (cf. 2 S 20<sup>8, 10</sup>). The Arab 'khanjar,' still in use E. of Jordan, has a curved blade, and inflicts by a downward stab just such a horrible wound as is described in 2 S 20<sup>10</sup>. See SWORD. W. E. BARNES.

DAGON (דַּגּוֹן, Δαγών).—The principal deity of the Philistines, whose worship, however, seems to have extended beyond the Phil. country, as is proved by the geographical name Beth-dagon (which see), and perhaps by the later name Dagon (Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 1; Wars, I. ii. 3).

It has commonly been held by scholars that the name is a den. m. l., and so a term of endearment, from dag, which signifies fish, and hence that D. was worshipped under the form of a fish. He has been generally identified with a Bab. god who is represented on seals and elsewhere as having in part that form. And though there is nothing in the biblical account to confirm this view, there is also nothing to contradict it. D. had face and hands, and, according to the Sept., feet also (1 S 5<sup>4</sup>); but this is not inconsistent with his having in part the shape of a fish. The pictures of the Bab. fish-god show face and hands, and in some instances feet. Indeed, one is strongly tempted to find in the phrase 'only D. remained,' the meaning 'only little fish remained,' the point being that, as of the head and hands of D. were cut off, nothing was left of him save the fish-shaped part. Nevertheless, Sayce and others now insist that D. was not a fish-god, and that the resemblance of name is a mere coincidence. The Bab. fish-god was Ea, the patron god of the city of Eridu, the god of the ocean, of water, of wisdom. In some sense Ea was god of the sea, Anu of the sky, and Bel (Baal) of the earth and the under-world. Bel is closely associated with Anu, but not with Ea. And D. appears in the inscriptions as one of the names or one of the forms of Bel.

The name and worship of D. were upon either theory imported into Pal. from Bab. lands. The name is held to have been of den. m. l. origin, but a Semitic derivation was suggested by a connection with its use in the Heb. word for corn, dagan, the Heb. word for corn, when corn is thought of as an agricultural product.

Presumably D. was worshipped in Phœnicia as well as in Philistia. There is a Phœn. cylindrical seal of crystal now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, on which, according to Sayce, the name Baal-dagon is written in Phœn. letters, with an ear of corn engraved near it, and other symbols, such as the winged solar disc, a gazelle, and several stars, but no figure of a fish. Eusebius (Præp. Evang. i. 6) quotes Philo Byblius of the 2nd cent. A.D. as citing the ancient Phœn. legends that go under the name of Sanchoniathon, to the effect that Ouranos (Anu) married his sister the earth, 'and by her had four sons, Ilus (El), who is called Kronos, and Betylus, and D., which signifies "corn," and Atlas.' 'D., after he had discovered bread-corn and the plough, was called Zeus Aotrios.'

The Phœn. Dagon, then, like the Bab. dag, is 'Zeus of the plough.' With this agree all the notices found in OT in regard to the Phil. Dagon. He had temples in Gaza and Ashdod (Jg 16<sup>23</sup>, 1 S 5<sup>4</sup>), and presumably in the other Phil. cities. His worship among the Philistines was national, and not merely local (1 Ch 10<sup>10</sup>, 1 S 5<sup>8-618</sup>). His worship did not exclude that of other Baals (2 K 12<sup>3</sup>). The Philistines regarded him as giving them victory over their enemies, rejoicing before him when Samson was in their power, and placing Saul's head in his temple (Jg 16<sup>23</sup>, 1 Ch 10<sup>10</sup>). But he was eminently the god of agriculture; they acknowledged J<sup>g</sup>'s victory over him through the mice that marred their fields, and offered golden mice in token of the acknowledgment (1 S 6<sup>4-5</sup>).

Apparently, the worship of D. among the Philistines was conducted with a highly developed and technical ritual. We may infer this from the elaborate discussions and arrangements for returning the ark, as described in 1 S 5. 6, the golden mice and golden tumours as a guilt-offering, the new cart, the new milch kine with their calves shut up at home. The worship of D. at Gaza continued to a late period. During the Maccabæan wars Jonathan destroyed the temple of D. there (1 Mac 10<sup>83, 84</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>; Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 4, 5).

DAISAN (Β Δαισαν, Α Δασ), 1 Es 5<sup>31</sup>.—Called REZIN, Ezr 2<sup>48</sup>, Neh 7<sup>50</sup>. The form in 1 Es is due to confusion of ד and ר.

DALAN (Α Δαλαν, Β Δασν, AV Ladan), 1 Es 5<sup>97</sup> = DELAIAH, Ezr 2<sup>60</sup>.

DALE.—See KING'S DALE.

DALETH (ד).—Fourth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 4th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

DALLY.—Only Wis 12<sup>26</sup> 'correction, wherein he dallied with them.' By a bold . . . . . God is described as only . . . . . Egyptians in the lighter play . . . . . The Gr. is παρρησιας ἐπιτιμήσεις, lit. 'play-games of correction'; Vulg. iudibris et increpationibus, Cov. 'scornes and rebukes,' Geneva 'scornful rebukes,' RV 'a mocking correction as of children.' 'Dally' has now chiefly the sense of 'delay,' which easily arose from the older sense of 'sport,' as in Milton, Of Reformation (Prose Works, II. 410), 'Let us not dally with God when he offers us a full blessing'; and Bunyan, Heavenly Footman (Clar. Press ed. p. 270), 'it is not good dallying with . . . great concernment, as the Salvation of . . . of thy Soul.' J. HASTINGS.

DALMANUTHA (Δαλμανουθά) is mentioned only in Mk 8<sup>10</sup>. The corresponding statement of Mt (15<sup>39</sup> RV) gives Magadan. In Tatian, Diatessaron (Hill's ed. p. 134), it is Magheda. Rendel Harris (Study of Codex Bezae, p. 178) suggests that Dalmanutha may be simply a corruption from the Syriac; but see Chase, Bezan Text of the Acts, p. 145 n<sup>2</sup>. On the variants in Mk see Chase, Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 97 f. The common reading Magdala is probably a substitution of a better for a less-known place. Evelyn suggested that Magadan = Magdala for Magdala; but Eusebius says the Magdala was near Tiberias. Thomson places Dalmanutha at Ed-Delemiyeh, one mile N. of the Jordan, at the S.E. corner of the Sea of Galilee. As the scene of the second Feeding of the Multitude is uncertain, and as there is nothing said to indicate in what direction the boat into which our Lord went was steered, the site of Dalmanutha cannot be determined with certainty. Tristram suggests a site 1½ mile from Migdal 'Magdala', and Sir C. Wilson thinks it was not far from thence.

LITERATURE.—Besides the works mentioned above, consult Keim, Jesus of Nazareth (1875, Tr.) IV. 238 n, Idem, Jesus the Messiah (1887), II. 61 f.; Andrews, Life of our Lord, ed. 1892, p. 338; Herz and Nestle in Expos. Times, VII. 563, ix. 45, 95. A. HENDERSON.

DALMATIA (Δαλματία) in apostolic times was an ill-defined mountainous district on the E. coast of the Adriatic, stretching towards Macedonia. In its more exact use, the name, which is not known to the earlier Greek writers, was used of the S. portion of the Rom. province Illyricum, between the Drinus and the sea. In its more indefinite use it was practically another name for Illyricum. St. Paul preached the gospel in the district, or, at any rate, in its neighbourhood (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>), and during his last imprisonment in Rome it was visited by Titus (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>). In the place where the apostle was not determine either the exact time when Titus was sent to D. or the reason why he was sent; but it has been conjectured that, having failed to find St. Paul at Neapolis as he expected (Ti 3<sup>12</sup>), he went on to Dalmatia.

W. MUIR.

DALPHON (דלפון, Est 9<sup>7</sup>), the second son of Haman, put to death by the Jews. In the LXX Δελφών.

DAMARIS (Δάμαρις). — The name of a woman who, with Dionysius the Areopagite and certain others, is mentioned as having been converted by St. Paul at Athens (Ac 17<sup>34</sup>). Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. p. 252) points out that it is not stated that she was of good birth (in contrast with 17<sup>12</sup> and 13<sup>50</sup>); that this arose from the fact that women of social position in Athens would certainly not have the opportunity of hearing St. Paul; and that her name suggests that she was a foreigner, perhaps 'one of the class of educated Hetairai.' This suggestion seems to go rather beyond the evidence. The name is said to be a corruption of δαμαλῖς, a heifer, which is the reading of one Lat. MS (et mulier nomine Damalis, Flor.). Chrys. (ad loc.) suggests quite erroneously that she was the wife of Dionysius; this could not be the tr. of καὶ γυνὴ δούλου Δ. These words and all mention of this woman are omitted by Codex Bezae. Ramsay (Church in Rom. Emp. p. 161) quotes this in proof of his assertion that the reviser to whom we owe the Western text was a Catholic who objected to the prominent position assigned to women in the Acts; 'this was, firstly, pagan rather than Christian; and, secondly, heretical rather than Catholic.' (See also 17<sup>12</sup> and the variation there.)

DAMASCUS (דמשק, Δαμασκός).

This city is the contemporary of all history. Its origin is lost in antiquity. Jos. (Ant. i. vi. 4) says it was founded by Uz, grandson of Shem. It is first mentioned in connexion with Abraham's pursuit of the defeated Chedorlaomer (Gn 14<sup>15</sup>). Then (Gn 15<sup>2</sup>) his servant is called Dammesek Eliezer, where both the Chaldee and the Syr. have 'Eliezer the Damascene.' It occurs in 2 S 8<sup>6</sup> as דמשק דרם, Aram Dammesek, which suggests comparison with the modern Arabic name, Dimashk el-Shām. As it was the capital of Aram, so it is the chief city of esh-Shām, the modern Syria. Esh-Shām = 'the left,' i.e. the country on the left; as el-Yemen, Arabia Felix, is on the right of the Arabian looking northward. A Moslem tradition makes Eliezer the founder of the city, and Abraham king for some years before he went south to Palestine. So also Nicolaus of D., quoted by Jos. (Ant. i. vi. 2). He mentions a village called 'the Habitation of Abraham,' which may be identical with el-Hirzeh, 3 miles N. of the city, where there is a wel sacred to the patriarch.

i. HISTORY.—The history of D. really begins for us with its capture by David. Coming to succour Hadadezer, king of Zobah, the Damascenes were themselves overthrown. David smote of the Syrians 22,000 men, took and garrisoned the city, and 'the Syrians became servants to David, and brought presents' (2 S 8<sup>3-6</sup>). Nicolaus of Damascus says the battle was fought on the Euphrates. Rezon, son of Eliada, a follower of Hadadezer, escaped, gathered a company around him, possibly fugitives like himself, and obtained possession of Damascus. 'He was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon.' His experience on the Euphrates possibly led him to abhor Israel (1 K 11<sup>23-25</sup>). But soon again the sceptre passed to the family of Hadad. Syria and Israel were in league against Judah. Hard pressed by the king of Israel, Asa bought the friendship of Benhadad with costly presents, and induced him to break with Baasha and invade his territory. A successful raid into the northern dominions of Israel called off Baasha and relieved Judah (1 K 15<sup>18-21</sup>). Benhadad seems to have followed up his advantage in the reign of Omri. Retaining the captured cities, he held the right to 'make streets' in the new capital, Samaria (1 K 20<sup>34</sup>). 'Streets' may have meant quarters for a permanent embassy, or simply accommodation for Syrian merchants, who, like the Jews in Memphis, would congregate in one place. It was a concession to a power which it if necessary. Benhadad, son of this monarch, led a great expedition against Samaria. There were with him thirty-two subject kings, with horses and chariots. Conducting the siege with a contemptuous carelessness, born of a sense of absolute superiority, he was surprised by a sudden attack, and his army routed, he himself escaping with difficulty on horseback. Meeting Israel again at Aphek, he was defeated and his army destroyed. Taken by Ahab, his freedom was granted on most humiliating terms (1 K 20). In about three years' time we find them again at war, fighting for possession of Ramoth Gilead; and there Ahab was slain (1 K 22). Naaman, to be healed of leprosy (2 K 5). Again the Syrians invaded Israel, and a company sent to arrest Elisha at Dothan was led by him, blinded, into Samaria (2 K 6<sup>8-23</sup>). Unaffected by their chivalrous treatment, we find Benhadad directly again besieging Samaria. The city was reduced to the most appalling straits by famine, when, by a miraculous discomfiture of the Syrians, it was delivered, and plentiful supplies provided (2 K 6<sup>24-72</sup>). From these accounts we learn that the Assyrians were not yet strong, and were too strong for him and his allies. His reputation suffered heavily from these disasters, making it easier for a strong man to usurp his place. Falling sick, he sent a messenger laden with gifts to consult Elisha. To this man, Hazael, the prophet promised the kingdom. On his return he secured the swift fulfilment of the promise by the murder of his master (2 K 8<sup>15</sup>). In his encounters with the great Assyrian power, the new king was not more fortunate than his predecessor; but elsewhere success waited upon his standards. Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah attacked Ramoth-gilead. Hazael repulsed them, the former being seriously wounded (2 K 8<sup>28, 29</sup>). He then laid waste the whole country east of the Jordan (2 K 10<sup>22, 23</sup>). He captured Gath (ib. 12<sup>17</sup>), and threatened Jerusalem. Jehoash purchased immunity from attack, 'stripping the temple and the palace of all valuables for this purpose' (ib. 12<sup>18</sup>). Hazael also prevailed against Israel, and superiority was maintained by his son Benhadad (ib. 13<sup>3</sup>). Ultimately Jehon-h, son of Jehoahaz, asserted his independence, and recovered the cities Hazael had taken (ib. 13<sup>5</sup>). Jeroboam II., son of Jehoash, the great warrior-king of the northern monarchy, extended the borders of Israel, recovering D. and Hamath, probably making their kings tributary to Israel (ib. 14<sup>8</sup>). D. and Samaria next appear in league against Jerusalem (2 K 15<sup>27, 16</sup>). Rezin of D. reconquered Elath, driving out 'the Jews.' Meantime the Assyrians, under Tiglath-pileser III., whose Bab. name was Pul or Pulu (2 K 15<sup>19</sup>), were rapidly extending their sway, threatening the independence of D. and Samaria alike. To consolidate their power against Assyria, Rezin and Pekah sought to attack Judah to their cause by dethroning Ahaz, and setting up 'a king in the midst of it, the son of Tabeel' (Is 7<sup>9</sup>). The attempt not only failed: it hastened the disaster they wished to avert. Ahaz appealed to Tiglath-pileser, who at once 'went up against D. and took it, and carried the people of it captive to Kir,' Rezin himself being slain (2 K 16<sup>9</sup>); and Assyrian colonists were placed in it (Jos. Ant. ix. xii. 3). This was the heaviest blow the city had yet received, and for a time she seems to have been crushed by it. To this period probably refer the prophecies of Isaiah and Amos, 'The riches of D. . . shall be carried away before the king of Assyria' (Is 8<sup>4</sup>), 'Behold, D. is taken away from being a city, and it shall be a ruinous heap; thus saith the Lord' (Am 1<sup>4-5</sup>; see also Jer 49<sup>23-27</sup>). Ahaz came to D. to do homage to Tiglath-pileser. Here he saw the great altar, of which, at his order, a duplicate was made by Urijah the priest, and put in the temple to supplant the brazen altar (2 K 16<sup>10-12</sup>). For the important issues of this act see W. R. Smith, OTJC<sup>2</sup> 265, 443, RS 359, 466 ff.

A city occupying the position of D. could not be permanently overwhelmed. During the Persian period she displayed afresh her perennial vigour, playing a distinguished part (Strabo, xvi. 2. 9). When Darius advanced against Alexander at Issus, he sent his harem and treasures to D. for safety. After his defeat and inglorious flight, the city was treacherously surrendered to Alexander's general, Parmenio (Arrian, Exped. Al. ii. 11). During the Greek occupation D. yielded to Antioch on the Orontes the rank of first city in Syria. In the course of the wars with Egypt, D., with Palestine and Coele Syria, fell at times into the hands of the Ptolemies. On the division of Syria (B.C. 111) between Antiochus Grypus and Antiochus Cyzicenus, D. fell to the latter. Against this prince Hyrcanus made a successful stand (Jos. Ant. xiii. x. 1-3). The next king was Demetrius Eucærus, who, assisted by Ptolemy Lathyrus, established himself in D., and divided the rule of Syria with his brother Philip (Ant. xiii. xiii. 4). Invited by discontented Jews, he marched against Alexander Jannæus, and defeated that prince near Shechem, returning immediately to war with Philip. The latter, assisted by Antiochus and Paphlagonians, was victorious. Demetrius was sent to Mithridates, king of Parthia, and remained with him till his death. A younger brother, Antiochus Dionysus, now seized the throne of Damascus. He fell in an encounter with Aretas, king of Arabia; and this monarch, invited by the inhabitants, entered D. and assumed the reins of government. Against Ptolemy Mennæus, 'who was such a bad neighbour to the city,' Alexandra, widow of Jannæus, sent an expedition to D., under her son Aristobulus, which achieved nothing (Ant. xiii. xvi. 3). Tigranes, king of Armenia, obtained temporary possession. The Romans under Metellus took the city, and here, B.C. 64, Pompey received ambassadors from his neighbouring kings, who brought him presents: among others, a golden vine from Aristobulus, valued at 500 talents. In B.C. 63 the whole of Syria became a Roman province; and, while the proconsul usually resided in Antioch, D. began to assume her old ascendancy. Herod, while still a young man, escaping judgment from the Sanhedrin, came here to visit Sextus Cæsar, and was made by him general of the army of Coele Syria (Ant. xiv. ix. 5). Later, according to Jos. (BJ i. xxi. 11), he showed his magnanimity by adorning many cities, not only within but also beyond his own dominions. To D. he added the attractions of a gymnasium and a theatre. It was on the way to D. that the miraculous event occurred 'through which Saul of Tarsus was converted to Christianity; and in this city he first testified for Christ (Ac 9<sup>2-27</sup>). It was then under the Arabian Aretas, and governed by an ethnarch, whose vigilance Paul escaped, being let down over the wall in a basket (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>). Hither the apostle returned, after his sojourn in Arabia (Gal 1<sup>17</sup>). It was reckoned to the Decapolis (Pliny, HN v. 16). Josephus curiously remarks that 'D. . . was the greatest of these cities. After that time he says little of D.; but there must have been a strong Jewish colony there: at one time some 10,000 of these were slain by the populace (BJ ii. xx. 2). Under Trajan, D. attained the rank of a Roman provincial city. Since that time, although she has often changed hands, her character of a city has hardly been interrupted, save perhaps when she fell before the ferocious Tamerlane (1399). D. is still the chief city in Syria, with a population of not less than 150,000. Christians have always been fairly numerous in the city. Theodosius transformed the great temple into a Christian church. On the advent of Islam it was changed into a Moslem mosque. D. was . . . subordinate to Antioch, which was the . . . patriarch; but this official, still taking his title from Antioch, now resides in Damascus. The darkest blot on the history of the city is the massacre of some 6000 Christians in the summer of 1860.

ii. GEOGRAPHY.—One of the most beautiful and fertile plains in the world is that which lies to the east of the Anti-Lebanon range, at an elevation of about 2200 ft. above sea-level. Great Hermon, Jebel esh-Sheikh, a vast snowy bank filling all the horizon, forms the western boundary. A chain of hills, thrown off to eastward from Anti-Lebanus, runs along the northern edge. Jebel el-Aswad and Jebel Mânî shut it in on the south. Three marshy lakes mark the eastern frontier of fertility; and away beyond them rises a range of low hills, which definitely cuts off this district from the sandy wastes of the Arabian desert. These surrounding hills, all bare and forbidding, save in the deeper and shadier wadies, enclose within their rocky arms a broad expanse of rich waving green.

This plain owes its fertility almost entirely to the river el-Barada, 'the cool,' which bursts through the limestone ramparts on the north, to fling itself in many a refreshing stream over its surface; and to the waters of el-A'waj, 'the crooked,' which, coming down from the eastern slopes of Gt. Hermon, flows through the southern meadows. Something is also due to the protection of the desert hills in the east, which in a measure bar the way against the drifting sand-storms from the wilderness. In the plain the natives distinguish five districts. The western portion, extending about two hours east of the gorge of the Barada, is divided by that river into the northern and southern Gharatak. To the east is the Merj, also divided by the Barada into north and south; while all lying between these districts and Jebel el-Aswad and the valley of el-A'waj, is known as Wady el-Ayam. Scattered over this tract are some 140 villages. A population of about 50,000 are engaged almost exclusively in agricultural pursuits. Clumps of olives, and many varieties of fruit trees pleasantly diversify the landscape, while between them, in season, far and wide, wave seas of golden grain. On the edge of the plain, east of el-Barada, just under Jebel Qasiân, which rises some 1700 ft., lie the famous orchards, some 30 miles in circumference, which encircle with luxuriant foliage the ancient city of Damascus. From afar are seen the white roofs, domes, and minarets, in striking relief against the green. The scene of rich beauty here presented, with the shade of fruitful trees, and on every hand the music of water, has ever inspired the Arab with joy; and when he dreamed of Paradise—"the garden" par excellence—his imagery was drawn from the gardens and streams of Damascus. Nor need we wonder if, coming from the dreary monotony of the burning desert, the Bedawi, fascinated by its delights, thinks himself in the midst of an earthly Paradise. Even for the eye accustomed to the fresh beauty and fruitfulness of the West, it has a charm, although the descriptive of the Arab may appear somewhat exaggerated. There are few places where so rich a variety of fruits is brought to maturity within a similar area. In the vicinity of the city are large vegetable gardens; and in the fields beyond different kinds of grain, tobacco, cotton, flax, hemp, madder-roots, and vicinus are grown. The olive is plentiful, and much of the oil used in the city is made in the neighbourhood. Tall, graceful poplars line the banks of the streams, yielding excellent timber for building purposes. Firewood is mostly made of the olive and the apricot. There are also the cypress, the plane tree, and the stately palm. But the charm of D. is felt chiefly in her gardens, and under the shadow of her far-stretching thickets of fruit trees. There, in generous rivalry, are found the orange, the lemon, and the citron; the apple, the pear, and the quince; plums and prunes, grapes and figs, pomegranate and mulberry, almonds and walnuts, hazel-nuts and pistachios.

D. is situated about 60 miles from the coast. Its exact position is 33° 30' N. lat., 36° 18' E. long. It is now most easily approached by the magnificent French diligence road from Beirût, which scales Mount Lebanon, crosses el-Beka', and then follows the easy passes through Anti-Lebanon to the plain of Damascus. The routes by which of old she communicated with the seaboard varied with political conditions. The way to Tripoli lay past Ba'albek and Beshreh. That to Beirût followed closely the line of the present road; while the great height of the two Lebanons lay also between D. and Tyre and Sidon. When the way was clear, she found the most convenient outlet at Acre. This road led to the south-west past Sa'sa' and Kuneiterah over the Jedâr uplands, crossed the Jordan below lake Hûleh by Jisr Benât Ya'kûb, traversed the rolling downs of the upper Jordan valley, and splitting towards the west, one arm took the difficult but direct route by way of Safed; the other swept southward past Khân Jubb Yusif to the plain of Gennesaret at Khân Minyeh, and, following an easy line by the wadies to the north-west, joined the Safed road at Er-Râmeh. From Gennesaret a branch of this highway ascended the uplands west of the Sea of Galilee to Khân et-Tujjar, and, passing round the base of Tabor, crossed the plain of Esdraelon to Megiddo, and thence to the Philistine plain and Egypt. Another branch kept the valley along the shore of the lake, and southward past Bethshan to Jericho. This was crossed by a road, which, leaving D. in a more southerly direction, traversed the level reaches of the Haurân, came down into the valley from the Jaulân highlands east of the sea, by way of Aphek, and here dividing one limb crossed the Jordan below the lake, climbed the hills to westward, and reached Acre by way of Kefr Kennah; the other passed up the vale of Jezreel, and again bifurcating, one branch went straight to the sea over Esdraelon: the other, bending to the south-west, is identified with the ancient caravan road from Gilead, which passes by Dothan, and comes down upon the plain of Sharon. The old gold and frankincense caravan road from Arabia the Happy has frequently changed its course in the northern reaches. The traffic has long been confined to the passing of the Hajj, the Moslem pilgrimage to and from El-Haramain, El-Medinah, and Mecca. The great road from Aleppo in the north is split as with a wedge at Emesa by the Anti-Lebanon ridge. It throws an arm round either side of the mountain, that on the west traversing the valley of Coelesyria by way of Ba'albek, and unites again at Damascus. Eastward lay the highways across the desert to Palmyra and Baghdâd. Thus the great avenues of communication between north and south, east and west, along which flowed the commerce and marched the armies of the ancient world, meet at the heart of the city. Resting in the el-Haurân oasis on the edge of the changle desert, surrounded by desert hills, she formed the natural harbour whither steered the argosies from the sea of sand, bearing the treasures of the East—whence again the sombre mariners set forth upon their dreary voyage homeward. Herein we have the secret of her perennial greatness. A strong position she never was, and often has she bowed beneath the stroke of the conqueror, becoming 'a servant to task work.' But, ever as the tides of war rolled back, she has arisen again fresh and vigorous as of yore. She has been the meeting place and mart of the nations; and as she has been of use to all, to the desert nomad and to the more civilized and settled peoples alike, so the necessities of all have conspired to perpetuate her prosperity.

iii. TRADE.—It seems probable that the chief source of income to the people of D. would be the constantly passing caravans. But that they also traded on their own account is shown in Ezk 27<sup>18</sup>, the 'handyworks' of Tyre being exchanged for 'the wine of Helbon and white wool.' Helbon, about 12 miles north of D., is still famous for its vine produce; and the mountain shepherds of Anti-Lebanon would always have a supply of white wool for the D. merchants. From Am 3<sup>12</sup> (RV) we may gather that the city was already known for silken manufactures. Our word 'Damask' is derived from a product of the looms of Damascus. At a later time her armourers also achieved wide fame, and the 'Damascus blade' was highly prized. They were carried off en masse by Tamerlane, and settled in Samarkand.

iv. ANTIQUITIES.—The main stream of El-Barada, the true creator of the city, enters from the N.W., and, passing under the great square, part escapes to water the gardens on the north, while the rest is carried off through multitudinous conduits to the houses of the inhabitants. The distribution of the water has always been a matter requiring the exercise of both care and tact among these excitable people: so it has come to be a common saying that 'every drop of the water of Barada has to run according to law.' The ancient city was built on the southern bank of the stream. Much more ground is now covered to the north, and especially to the S. and S.W., while the long limb of El-Medân, terminating in the 'Gate of God,' Babwabet Ullah, whence issue the pilgrims for Mecca, stretches far to the S. The old walls may be traced, however, along the edge of the stream, and through the centre of the modern city, in circumference about 4 miles. For a city of such extraordinary age, D. is not rich in antiquities. The castle, a rectangular building of great extent, standing at the N.W. corner of the old wall, probably dates only from the Middle Ages, although the substructures are ancient. To the S. of the eastern gate part of the wall is very old. The gate itself dates from Roman times; and the line of the Via Recta, 'the street called straight,' may be traced from this to the western gate. It is still called Derb el-Mus taḡim, straight street, by the natives (Derb es-Sultān, 'the king's highway,' is the name given to every important road in the country). This is the straight street common to all Syro-Greek and Syro-Roman cities, of which fine examples are still to be seen at Bozrah and Shuḡbah. The great mosque possibly occupies the site of the temple of Rimmon (2 K 5<sup>13</sup>). It is in accordance with the conservatism of the Orient, that the spot has preserved its religious character under the dominion of successive faiths. It was a spacious Greek temple, then a Christian church, and finally it became a Moslem mosque; the only evidence of Christian use being the Greek inscription over the southern gateway, 'Thy kingdom, O Christ, is an everlasting kingdom, and Thy dominion endureth for all generations.' The Moslems say that the head of John the Baptist was buried here; but Christian tradition has it that the church was dedicated to John Damascenus, whose tomb was within it; and there his body was miraculously retained, when an effort was made to remove it. Of this mosque, which for centuries had been the pride of the Moslem world, a large part was destroyed by fire in October 1893.

The traditions associating certain spots with Abraham, Naaman, and Elisha are of the most shadowy character. Hardly more reliable are those relating to the spot of St. Paul. A spot about half a mile from the city is shown as the scene of his conversion, and as the Christian burying-ground. But tradition has several times contradicted itself as to the scene of this miracle: in any case it could not be here, as the traveller from the S. would not enter the city from the E. Between this and the gate is the grave of St. George, the kindly porter who connived at St. Paul's escape, and suffered martyrdom. The spot where the apostle was let down over the wall in a basket, 'the house of Judas' in Straight street, and also the house of Ananias, are pointed out; but considerable uncertainty attaches to them all.

W. EWING.

DAMN, DAMNABLE, DAMNATION. — These words have in the course of time suffered a process of degeneration, for which, says Bishop Sanderson, 'we are not so much beholden to good acts as to bad manners.' The Lat. damnare signified 'to inflict loss on one,' 'to condemn.' But, under the influence of the theology, the Eng. words thence derived soon acquired the sense of 'condemnation to eternal punishment'; and this special application ran alongside the orig. meaning from the 14th cent. to the 18th. In the 1619 ed. of the Bishops' NT, the translation of 1 Ti 5<sup>12</sup> is 'having damnation, because they have cast away their first faith'; and there is added this note: 'S. Paul doth not here speake of the everlasting damnation, but by this word damnation, doth rather understand the shame that those wanton widowes shall have in the world for breaking their promise.' Thus even then the sense to which the words are now wholly confined was the most familiar. But in earlier English it was not so. To Wyclif's ear the words must have had a very different suggestion, for he not only uses 'damn' freely in the sense of 'condemn,' as in his tr. of Job 9<sup>30</sup> 'If I wole make me iust, my mouth shall dampne me,' but even uses it of our Lord Himself, as in Mk 10<sup>33</sup> 'For lo! we stien to Jerusalem, and mannus sone schal be bitraied to the princis of prestis, and to scribis, and to the eldre men; and thei schulen dampne hym bi deith.'

is the tr. of καταδίκη Wis 12<sup>27</sup> (RV 'condemnation'); of ἀπόλυσ 2 P 2<sup>8</sup> (RV 'judgment'), of κρίσις Mt 23<sup>33</sup>, Jn 5<sup>29</sup> (RV 'judgment'), Mk 12<sup>40</sup>, Lk 20<sup>47</sup>, Ro 3<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>29</sup> (RV 'judgment'). RV. Thus the words are never used in AV in the sense now attaching to them, and they are completely banished from RV. See more fully Roberts in Expos. Times, iii. 549 ff., and the art. JUDGMENT. J. HASTINGS.

DAMSEL, now archaic or poetical, is freely used in AV; and it is retained in RV, except where the Gr. is παῖδιον (Mk 5<sup>39</sup>, 40 dis 'child') or παῖδιον (Mt 26<sup>69</sup>, Jn 18<sup>17</sup>, Ac 12<sup>13</sup> 16<sup>16</sup> 'maid').* In Gn 34<sup>2</sup> one word (נַחֲשָׁה; naḥśāh) is twice tr'd in AV 'd.' in v. 4 another (נָחֵשׁ; yalḏāh); and again in Mk 5<sup>39</sup>, 40 dis. 41 we have one word (παῖδιον), in vv. 41, 42 another (κορδαῖον). RV preserves the distinction in St. Mark.

J. HASTINGS.

DAN (דָּן 'judge,' Ḍān). — The elder of the two sons borne to Jacob by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The origin of the name is uncertain. Gn 30<sup>6</sup> (E), is that, after her long barrenness, Rachel had judged Rachel and had given her a son, the son of her handmaid counting as her own. No details of his history are given in the patriarchal narratives. Modern critics usually regard him as, like the other sons of Jacob, the eponymous ancestor of the tribe of Dan. These tribes are divided into two main branches, the Leah tribes and the Rachel tribes. Dan belongs to the latter; but the tribe of Dan and Naphtali as sons of Leah, that they were members of a single group. That the tribe was quite small appears from various indications. Only one son is mentioned in Gn 46<sup>23</sup> Hushim (in Nu 26<sup>42</sup> Shuham), that is, the tribe consisted of a single clan. It is referred to as a 'family' in the important narrative of its migration to Laish, Jg 18<sup>11</sup> 19. The fighting men on this expedition are only 600, and they seem to have been the majority of the tribe. It is unnecessary to attach much importance to the characteristic statement of P, which places the fighting men of Dan, during the wilderness wandering, at more than 60,000 (Nu 1<sup>39</sup> 26<sup>43</sup>).

After the settlement in Canaan, the clan seems to have broken off from the main Joseph group in order to secure a district for itself. In this it was only partially successful. Its territory lay to the S.W. of Ephraim, and joined that of Benjamin and Judah. It seems to have stretched forward towards the fertile lowlands, but whether it ever occupied any portion of them or not is uncertain. The reference in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5<sup>7</sup>) is itself very obscure, and the chronology of the period so uncertain, that we learn little from it. We do not know whether it refers to the northern or the southern settlements. The most obvious sense of the words is that Dan had pushed forward to the sea. But we have no other evidence that it ever reached the coast. Nor is it certain that the words require this interpretation. Moore translates: 'Dan, why does he live neighbour to ships?' and explains: 'Why does he live as a dependent under the protection of Phœnician seafarers? He thinks the northern Danites are meant. G. A. Smith thinks Deborah may speak 'in scorn of futile ambitions westward, which were stirred in Dan by the sight of the sea from the Shephelah,' but admits that Dan may have reached the coast at some time (Hist. Geog. p. 220). RV, 'Dan, why did he remain in ships?' is not a translation. It is most probable that the tribe never reached the sea; but even if it did so, it is never 'damself'; 'damself' occurs in Mt 14<sup>11</sup>, while 'damself' is found Gn 24<sup>61</sup>, Jg 19<sup>10</sup>. Elsewhere it is either 'damself' or (most freq.) 'damselfs,' with 'damselfs' for plural and possessive. This is nearer the Lat. domantella, dim. of domina, 'mistress,' and the Fr. demoiselle.

Although the tribe still retained this small district, it was so cramped in it that it became necessary to seek a new home. We have a most valuable account of this expedition in Jg 18. The narrative in this chapter <sup>1</sup> which it is a continuation, <sup>2</sup> Budde prints his analysis <sup>3</sup> followed in the main both by Kittel and by Moore) in his Richter and Samuel. It is not, however, important for our purpose to follow the analysis, as the outlines of the story are quite clear. A small party of spies was sent northward, and found in Laish (Leshem, Jos 19<sup>7</sup>, which Wellhausen thinks was originally Lesham), a city which from the fertility of the district was very inviting, and from its isolation, and the peaceful, unsuspecting character of the inhabitants, was likely to fall an easy prey. Six hundred armed men with <sup>4</sup> their families and possessions of Micah, an Ephraimite, of its images, and took his priest with them. He pursued them with a few neighbours; but his remonstrance was met with a grimly humorous warning that unless he was silent he might irritate them into killing him and his family, a hint which Micah discreetly took. The Danites then moved on to Laish, which they captured and burnt, while they butchered the inhabitants. They built a new city and called it Dan. Probably only a small remnant was left behind in the south, but at least a remnant, with its home between Zorah and Eshtaol in the camp of Dan (Jg 13<sup>26</sup>, in Jg 18<sup>21</sup> Mahaneh-dan is said to be in Kiriath-jearim, but this is less likely). That a remnant was left is made probable by the story of Samson, who belonged to this tribe. That it was small seems clear from the subsequent history. It plays no part in the later history of Israel. It is omitted from the tribes in the genealogies of Chronicles and in the list of the Apocalyptic.

'Dan shall judge his people,
As one of the tribes of Israel.
Dan shall be a serpent in the way,
An adder in the path,
That biteth the horse's heels,
So that his rider falleth backward.
I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord' (Gn 49:16-18).

his part with the other tribes in defending Israel. The writer probably has Samson in mind. The comparison in v. 17 is to the stealthy tactics adopted by Dan in war or in their frequent expeditions, by which, weak tribe as they were, they secured a victory over foes of superior strength. The attack on Laish is a good example. In the Blessing of Moses we read—

'Dan is a lion's whelp,
That leapeth forth from Bashan' (Dt 33<sup>22</sup>).

Here, too, the point of the metaphor is the suddenness with which the tribe would attack. The reference is not so much to war, probably, as to attacks on caravans, for which it would lie in wait. Although the second line refers to the 'lion's whelp,' yet the mention of Bashan makes it probable that the northern portion of the tribe is in the author's mind. From 2 S 20<sup>18</sup>, where we should . . . . . read 'in Abel and in Dan,' it seems . . . . . was regarded as a tribe that held fast to the good old Israelite customs.

A. S. PEAKE.

DAN (דָּן, Ḍān).—A city which marked the most N. point of Pal., and naturally became linked with Beersheba, the boundary town in the south. The phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba' was at once picturesque and suggestive of dimension, and in times of national crisis emphasized the fact that amid all tribal distinctions there was a common inheritance—the whole land of Israel (Jg 20<sup>1</sup>, 1 S 3<sup>30</sup>, 2 S 3<sup>30</sup>). The chief independent notice is the account of the Danite invasion given in Jg 18, where the route of the invaders is given as from Laish or Leshem in the north to Beersheba in the south. In all likelihood it is the same place that is referred to in the census-journey of Joab as Danjaan, 2 S 24<sup>6</sup>. If the reading ja'ar instead of ja'an be accepted, it would indicate the first point of contact with the rocky ground and oak scrub of Lebanon, which the Arabs call wa'ar.

At Dan Jeroboam set up one of the calves of gold (1 K 12<sup>28</sup>). Dan disappears from Scripture after the invasion of Sennacherib (2 K 15<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ch 31<sup>6</sup>). It is referred to by Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome in terms that identify it with the T el-Kadi (although G. A. Smith calls it T el-Kadi Dan at Banias). The mound rises out of a close jungle of tall bushes and rank reeds, with larger trees on the higher slopes, until an irregular oblong plateau is reached, about 40 ft. high on the N. side and 80 ft. on the S., and resting upon one of the broad fringe-like terraces with which the skirts of Hermon sweep down towards the plain of Huleh (L. Mucroni). On the W. side, amid the rough boulders and blocks of ancient masonry that cover the ground, there gushes out the immense fountain (Leddian) that forms by far the largest source of the Jordan current, where 5 miles down it meets the waters from the upper springs of Hasbeya and Banias.

DANCING is, in its origin, an expression of the movement of the body more or less controlled by a sense of rhythm. It was practised, therefore, long before it was raised to the dignity of an art, being simply a natural development of the tendency to employ gesture, either as an accompaniment to, or a substitute for, speech. We may distinguish three stages in the early history of dancing, as exemplified in the practice of ancient nations: (1) Its rudest and most unstudied form, the outward expression of exuberant feeling; (2) the pantomimic dance, in which, e.g., the movements of hostile armies were re-enacted; (3) the dance pure and simple, the exhibition of the poetry of motion, of all the grace of attitude and all the flexibility of which the body is capable. Social dancing, as we now understand it, was almost, if not altogether, unknown in ancient times.

Whatever view we may hold of the presence or position of Israel in Egypt, we have no evidence to show that the Hebrews borrowed thence their love or their methods of dancing. They never seem, in ancient times, to have reached the third of the stages which we have enumerated. We hear nothing of performances by professional artists, similar to those represented on the Egyptian monuments, and supposed to have been the direct ancestors of the modern Ghawazee. There is no mention of solo or figure dancing, of contradances (unless we attach this meaning to the קוֹמֵט Qamit, Ca 6<sup>13</sup>), or of anything in elaboration the performances of the Feast of Eternity. Still less can we expect a reasoned appreciation of the exercise as a means of developing the mind and body, such as we have in Plato's Laws. All the dances were spontaneous movements; in the absence of leaders would be impromptu on the part of the leaders, and more or less closely imitated by the others. Three ideas are represented in the vocabulary: leaping, circling, and making merry. Thus קָדַקַּד (Ec 3<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ch 15<sup>29</sup>), to leap; סָבַר, to circle (2 S 6<sup>14, 16</sup>); חָלַל (Jg 21<sup>23</sup>, Ps 87<sup>7</sup>), to twist oneself; עָמַס, עָמַס (Jg 16<sup>23</sup>, 1 S 18<sup>7</sup>, 1 Ch 15<sup>29</sup>), lit. to laugh. It is self-evident that these words might be used in a looser and in a more technical sense. They were applied to the artless play of the children (Job 21<sup>1</sup>), as well as to the dancing of the adults.

Few as are the references in the Bible, they show that almost any occurrence might be associated with dancing: the return of the prodigal, the commemoration of an hist. event, the welcoming of a hero on his return from battle, the ingathering of the vintage,—whatever called for an expression of joy or excited the heart to gladness. Of dancing for its own sake, of its practice as an art, there is no trace. Leyrer sees a possible exception to this in Ca 6<sup>13</sup>, but the passage is too obscure to admit positively of such an explanation. Whether we should look on Mahanaim as the name of a place, or as descriptive of a dancing in which two rows of performers took part, or whether, with Delitzsch, we should understand an allusion to the angels, must remain a matter of doubt. The only unmistakable instance of artistic dancing is that mentioned in Mt 14<sup>8</sup>, the performance of Herodias' daughter 'in the midst' of the guests assembled on Herod's birthday. This was due, however, to the introduction of Greek fashions, through contact with the Romans, who had adopted them, and hardly belongs to our subject.

It is with dancing in connexion with the religious rites and ceremonies of the Hebrews that we are mainly concerned in this article. Their religion was, esp. in pre-exilic times, predominantly social and joyful. It found its proper æsthetic expression in a merry sacrificial feast, which was the public ceremony of a township or clan. Then the crowds streamed into the sanctuary from all sides, dressed in their gayest attire, marching joyfully to the sound of music. Universal hilarity prevailed; men ate and drank and made merry together, rejoicing before their god (W. R. Smith, RS 236 ff.). To such a religion dancing would be a natural adjunct. The cultus was not a system of rites, artificially contrived to express and maintain theological doctrines, but the free outcome of the religious feeling, which found vent in the way suggested by, and in harmony with, the disposition and genius of the people. It is not surprising, however, that we find comparatively few references to this part of the cultus in OT, or that no provision is made for it in the regulations contained in the recognized standards of the priests. There is no trace of the existence among the Hebrews of any class of priests corresponding to the Sallii of ancient Rome, and their religious festivals are far from possessing the character of the great carnivals of the pagan world. The fact seems to be that the priestly historians and legislators resolutely excluded, as far as possible, everything that could infer any similarity between the worship of J<sup>h</sup> and that of heathen deities. Nevertheless, enough remains to show that dancing was practised and as part of the Heb. ritual. The dancing of Miriam and the women of Israel (Ex 15<sup>19-20</sup>) may have been due to an ancient ceremony connected with the Passover. In any view of it, the dance formed an essential part of an act of worship (cf. Is 30<sup>29</sup>). At the annual vintage festival at Shiloh—'a feast of the Lord'—the maidens came out and joined in dances in the vineyards (Jg 21<sup>19-21</sup>). When David took part in the procession at the removal of the ark, he did so in a priestly capacity: he wore the linen ephod, the official dress of the priests (2 S 6<sup>14</sup>). These references exhaust the list of religious dances in OT. But the allusions in the Ps. and Prov. to the references to the same direction; e.g. the calf (Ex 32<sup>19</sup>), and the etc.

The people retained in later times their fondness for dancing in connexion with religious rites, as is shown by the ceremonies connected with the Feast of Tabernacles and the Day of Atonement. On the latter day, and on the 15th Abib, the maidens of Jerus. are said to have gone in white garments, specially lent them for the purpose so that rich and poor might be on an equality, into the vineyards close to the city, where they danced and sang. The following fragment of one of their songs has been preserved, and is thus given by Edersheim—

'Around in circle gay, the Hebrew maidens see;
From them our happy youths their partners choose.
Remember! Beauty soon its charm must lose—
And seek to win a maid of fair degree.
When fading grace and beauty low are laid,
Then praise shall her who fears the Lord await;
God does bless her handiwork—and, in the gate,
"Her works do follow her," it shall be said.'

The other dance festival was held on the day preceding the Feast of Tabernacles, and is said to have been instituted by Judas Maccabæus. At the appointed time everyone went to the 'house of the Sho'ebah,' carrying branches with lemons attached, for the procession round the altar. In the court were large candelabra, each with four arms; four priests, or youths of priestly descent, climbed ladders, filled the vessels with oil, and lit the wicks, which were made of cast-off belts of the priests. All Jerus. was lighted from the fires. The whole multitude joined in the laudations that followed. Men famous for their piety and good works danced with lighted torches, and great scholars like Hillel were not above exhibiting their dexterity and agility to the admiring crowd. Meanwhile the Levites, standing on the steps that led from the court of the men to that of the women, accompanied the performance with psalms and canticles, and the sound of the kinnors and cymbals was heard, with trumpets and other musical instruments. The whole festival is proof of that inexpressible love of display and hilarity which revealed itself in the popular religion of Judaism.

DANDLE (prob. from It. dandola or dondola, a doll), to 'toss gently,' is found Is 66<sup>12</sup> 'be dandled upon her knees.' Cf. Palsgrave (1530), 'I dandyll, as a mother or nourryce doth a childe upon her lappe'; and Bp. Hall (1614), 'If our Church, on whose lappe the vilest miscreants are dandled.' It is doubtful, however, if this tr. is accurate enough, though RV retains it. The Heb. (דנדל) is to stroke or caress, rather than to toss or dandle. The older versions have 'be joyful upon her knees'; except Wyc. 1380, 'daunte you,' 1388, 'speke plesantly to you,' and Douay, 'speake you fayre.'

OT narrative of the restoration; that no post-exilic writer before the M<sup>1</sup> wrote about him; that no one, and that he, with all his patriotism, did not avail himself of the opportunity of turning to Pal.; and that, B.C. 170, should entirely omit him from the worthies of Israel, and also write (Sir 49<sup>25</sup>), 'Neither was there a man born like unto Joseph, a governor of his brethren, a stay of the people.' E. L. CURTIS.

DANIEL, THE BOOK OF, in the Heb. Canon, is placed among the Ketubim, between Est and Ezr, but in the Septuagint, and Eng. Bible as one of the four great Prophets. It falls into the history of Daniel; chs. 7-12, visions and revelations given to Daniel. In the original, 2<sup>42-728</sup> is written in Aramaic instead of Hebrew. In literary character the Bk. of Dn is mainly a collection of various historical epochs. The beginning of this kind of writing appears in Ezk and Zec; but Dn is far more complete and elaborate, and exercised a powerful influence upon subsequent Jewish and Christian writers.

i. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—The visions (chs. 7-12) are supposed as given in the words of Dn (7<sup>28</sup> 8<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>21</sup>), hence the inference that he wrote the entire book. This was the ancient Jewish opinion,* and the prevailing Christian one, until within recent years.† Now, however, it has generally been abandoned, and in its place are quite a variety of views all agreeing in this, that the book in its present form must be assigned to the age of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 175-163); and there is a growing consensus of opinion that the book as a whole belongs to that period, for the following reasons:—

1. Acquaintance with Ant. Epiphanes.—Ch. 11 shows a clear acquaintance with minor events in his reign and in those of his predecessors. In the veiled form of a revelation of the future it gives an outline of history from the time of Cyrus to near the death of Antiochus.‡ There are sketched the Persian period (v.<sup>2</sup>), the rise and conquest of Alexander the Great (v.<sup>3</sup>), the dismemberment of his empire (v.<sup>4</sup>), and then principally the varying relations of the Ptolemaic and Seleucid dynasties to each other and of the latter to the Jews (vv. 5-39). Attention is called in succession to Ptolemy I. and Seleucus Nikator (v.<sup>5</sup>), Ptolemy Philadelphus and Antiochus II. (v.<sup>6</sup>), Ptolemy Euergetes (vv. 7-9), Antiochus the Great (vv. 10-19), Seleucus Philometor (v.<sup>20</sup>), and Antiochus Epiphanes (vv. 21-42). While, from the obscurity of the history and the difficulty of determining the meaning of the Heb. text, some references are not perfectly plain, yet it is easy to point out definitely the accessions of these sovereigns, their alliances, intrigues, campaigns, victories, defeats, bestowment of gifts, treacheries, acts of violence, and frequently untimely deaths. The older commentators regarded these details as signal examples of divine prediction; but since such a revelation of the future is without analogy elsewhere in Scripture, and without any moral or spiritual import, this chapter is not in it are now allowed, even by those who regard Daniel as the author of his visions or the rest of the book, to belong to the period of Antiochus Epiphanes.* Similar references elsewhere, however, seem to require these to be taken with their natural force, indicating the true date of the entire book, and not as later additions. In ch. 8 is a clear description of the conquests of Alexander (vv. 5-8. 21) and the division of his empire (vv. 8. 22), and of Antiochus Epiphanes (vv. 9-12. 23-25). These appear again, acc. to the most probable view, in ch. 11, the fourth be- Alexander's kingdom and its suc- ceding dynasty (with which alone the writer here is concerned), culminating in Antiochus Epiphanes (vv. 8. 20-25). The descriptions are very exact. While the numbers of the kings, ten and three (v.<sup>24</sup>), might be taken relatively or symbolically, yet the correspondence to the Seleucidae is so precise that these kings seem evidently meant.† The eleventh corresponds exactly to Antiochus Epiphanes. Another clear reference to this sovereign seems also to appear in 9<sup>26</sup>.‡ Thus throughout all these

† We do not know, of course, just how the author reckoned these kings. Two main schemes have been suggested: (a) (Hitzig, Kuenen, Cornill, Bevan, et al.), (1) Alexander, (2) Seleucus I. chapters there are indications of the same kind of knowledge of Antiochus and of previous history as in ch. 11. Antiochus and his persecution of the Jews and desilement of their sanctuary seem ever present before the writer (cf. 1 Mac 1). When, however, he touches upon a subsequent period he gives nothing which need be interpreted as referring to later events.

Unity of Authorship has been the prevailing view among scholars of all schools.* That chs. 1-6 belong to one author is evident. Ch. 1 is a necessary introduction to the others. Without it 2<sup>14ff.</sup> and 2<sup>29</sup> would be . . . and 3<sup>23</sup> requires 2<sup>29</sup>; and 5<sup>10ff.</sup> require . . . Ch. 6 is closely connected with the preceding ones. The visions (chs. 7-12) require an account of D.'s personality and life, and the unity of the two sections is seen from the fact that the substance of the dream of the composite image (ch. 2) is repeated in the vision of the four beasts (ch. 7), and that 'they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men' (2<sup>23</sup>) is evidently a reference to the . . . of the Ptolemies and Seleucidæ . . . . .
 letical or didactic purpose of each section is also the same.†

2. Historical Statements. Daniel, according to 1<sup>1</sup>, began his career as a youthful student at the Bab. court in the 3rd year of Jehoiakim, and lived at least until the 3rd year of Cyrus, i.e. from 606 or 605 to 536 or 535 B.C. Within this period are mentioned as kings of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar (2<sup>1</sup>), Belshazzar (5<sup>1</sup> 30), Darius the Mede (5<sup>31</sup> 6<sup>25</sup> 23), and Cyrus (6<sup>28</sup>). Events are dated by the years of these kings (2<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>) showing that the writer must have regarded all of them as reigning sovereigns, and not in any way as subordinate rulers. Belshazzar is further described as the son of Nebuchadnezzar (5<sup>11</sup> 12) and king of Babylon at its capture by the Medes and Persians, when (acc. to 5<sup>30</sup>) he was slain and Darius received the kingdom. But history knows nothing of a Babylonian king Darius the Mede between Cyrus and the reigning monarchs within the Babylonian Empire, adnezzar, Evil-Merodach, Neriglissar, Nabunahid, and Cyrus. No Darius reigned in Babylon until a score of years later. The person whom Belshazzar represents was undoubtedly Bil-sar-usur, son of Nabunahid and commander of the Babylonian army during the last years of his father's reign (COT ii. p. 130 f.). + No reason is clearly perceptible why the book is partly written in Heb. and partly in Aramaic. The following have been suggested: (1) Diversity of origin (Strack, Menchold, see fn. above); (2) portion of the original Heb. lost and replaced by the Aram. translation (Lenormant, Bevan, Haupt); (3) the Aram. language a secret sign that the Chaldeans represented the Syrians, i.e. Antiochus and his followers (mentioned by König, Einleit. p. 382); (4) author preferred to give the speeches of the heathen in Aram. rather than in the sacred Heb., and being more at home in that language continued to use it (Behrmann).

than his father, he seems to have supplanted him in tradition as sovereign. In reality, however, he was never king. This is proved by the long series of contract tablets, 'which, dated month by month and almost day by day from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar to that of Xerxes,' make no mention of an intermediate ruler between Nabunahid and Cyrus (Sayce, HCM p. 523). Belshazzar also was not a son of Nebuchadnezzar even by descent, for his father, Nabunahid, 'belonged to a different family.* In introducing him into the story of the fall of Babylon, the writer shows the same confused idea of the order of events as the Greek writers.† Cyrus, we now know from the cuneiform inscriptions, obtained possession of Baby-
 During the reign of Darius (B.C. 522-486), he rebelled, and Darius was obliged to besiege the city, and took it by stratagem. In the tradition followed by Herodotus this siege is transferred to Cyrus (Her. i. 191). In both the legends the city seems to have been transferred to the king of the Medes.

A further confusion about Darius appears in 9<sup>1</sup>, where he is called the son of Ahasuerus or Xerxes. Darius I. was the father of Xerxes.

Another apparently inaccurate statement is that of Nebuchadnezzar's siege and capture of Jerus. in the 3rd year of Jehoiakim, B.C. 605 (Dn 1<sup>9</sup>). The historical books relate no such event, and that it did not happen seems attested by Jer 23<sup>1-9</sup>, and necessary from the movement of Nebuchadnezzar. Shortly after the battle of Carchemish (605) he returned to Babylon to secure his accession to the throne. The conquest of the West occupied four years more, since not until 601 or 600 did Jehoiakim begin to pay tribute (Tiele, Bab. and Assy. Gesch. p. 425 f.). §

A class of wise men or magicians are called Chaldeans (2<sup>a</sup>. 4<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>. 11). 'This signification is foreign to Assyrian and Babylonian usage, and did not arise till after the fall of the Babylonian empire' (COT ii. p. 125). These Chaldeans are also represented as addressing Nebuchadnezzar in Aramaic (2<sup>a</sup>), which probably was not spoken then at the Bab. court, and, in no case, in the western Aramaic dialect which the writer gives.

In 9<sup>2</sup> D. is said to have 'understood by the books the number of the years whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet.' This expression

§ 5 The writer perhaps drew his statement from a combination of 2 K 24<sup>14</sup> and 2 Ch 36, misunderstanding the three years in Kings and reckoning them from the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign. Or by reckoning backward he may have regarded the 3rd year of Jehoiakim as the beginning of the 70 years of captivity. That the author of Dn, both here and elsewhere, does not seem to have rightly apprehended or presented recorded facts of Of history, is no more surprising than the similar variations between the statements of Kings and Ch, and esp. the departures in NT from the Heb. text. Cf. G<sup>1</sup> 114<sup>12</sup>, i.e. (Moses) with Ac 7<sup>2</sup> (Lr), Dt 102<sup>2</sup> (70 souls) with Ac 7<sup>14</sup> (75), G<sup>2</sup> 23 (1 phron in Ae7<sup>2</sup>) with Ac 7<sup>16</sup> (Hamor in Shechem), Lx 12<sup>4</sup> 480 years in Egypt with Gal 3<sup>16</sup> (430 years in Canaan and Egypt).

|| The word אֲרָמִי = 'in Aramaic' (v. 4 RVm), may be a gloss. So Lenormant, Bevan, Kautzsch-Marti, P. Haupt (Bk. of Dn. Crut. Heb. Text, p. 16), et al implies that the prophecies of Jer. belonged to a well-known collection of sacred books, and suggests (this is the interpretation) the second division of the Canon, which was formed a century or more after the Exile. See art. CANON.

Thus the Bk. of Dn contains a series of historical statements which imply a misconception of the exilic period, and that their author lived considerably later, and may well have written during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes.

3. The Language of Dn is in the same direction.* The Heb. is from that of the exilic Ezk and the immediately following Hag and Zec, and resembles more nearly that of 1 and 2 Ch written about B.C. 300, and certainly does not belong to an earlier period. The Aram. also, as far as can be determined, is of the same late date. Persian words appear in both sections, some in connexion with the description of Bab. institutions before the conquest of Cyrus (see list, LOT p. 469). This indicates a period long enough after that conquest for Persian words to have become a part of the Jewish language. Three Gr. words, the names of musical instruments (קִינֹר, kitharis, flute; בִּשְׁמַרְיָן, ψαλτήριον, dulcimer or bagpipe; סַמְבַּרְיָא, σαμβουλα, dulcimer or bagpipe) occur. One of these, σαμβουλα, as the name of a musical instrument, is found in the Septuagint of the Book of Daniel (Dn 3:5). Polybius (Hist. 2:21) mentions it in the reign of Epiphanes (Bevan, p. 41). This evidence brings the composition of Dn to a date at least later than the conquest of Alexander, unless the supposition be made that the Gr. musical instruments had at an earlier period through channels of trade found their way into the East, and their names become domesticated in the Aram. language. This, however, is unlikely.†

4. The Doctrines of Dn with respect to angels and the resurrection are the most developed in the O.T. Angels have special personal names (8th 9th 10th 12th), special ranks (10th 12th), and the guardianship of different countries (10th 12th). These representations go far beyond those of Ezk and Zec, and are relatively identical with those of Tobit and other Jewish writings of the 1st cent. B.C. Dn plainly teaches a personal resurrection both of the righteous and the wicked (12th). This also is a decided advance upon the doctrine elsewhere in OT, and is mentioned by later Jewish tradition in connexion with the Maccabees (cf. 2 Mac 12<sup>45</sup>). Thus, while the determination of the date of an OT writing from its religious doctrines is always a delicate procedure, yet, as far as a doctrinal development can be found in OT, the Bk. of Dn comes after all the other OT writings, and approximates most closely to the Jewish literature of the 1st cent. B.C.

5. The Homiletical Purpose of the Bk. of Dn is most applicable to the Antiochian period. The homiletical nature of chs. 1, 3, 6 are exhortations to keep the Jewish law and to remain faithful to the worship of J<sup>h</sup>. While such teaching might be appropriate at all times, it was esp. so then in its peculiar form. The question of eating meat was at that time a test of faith. Then pious Jews 'chose to die that they might not be defiled with food, and that they might not profane the covenant' (1 Mac 1<sup>62</sup>). The lessons of the 'fiery furnace' and the 'lions' den,' chs. 3 and 6, never could have been more fitly presented than when 'came there forth out of Isr. transgressors of the law, and persuaded many, saying, Let us go and make a covenant with the nations that are round about us' (1 Mac 1<sup>11</sup>), and when Antiochus commanded the worship of foreign deities on pain of death (1 Mac 1<sup>41-50</sup>). The stories of the humbling of Nebuch. (ch. 4) and the fall of Belshazzar (ch. 5) would also be fraught with particular consolation when Israel was oppressed by the heathen. The visions (chs. 7-12), whatever view is taken of their date, are universally acknowledged to have been primarily designed for consolation during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes.

6. The External History of the Bk. of Dn likewise favours its composition at the time of Antiochus. There is no evidence in any OT or Apoc. writing of its earlier existence. The testimony of Josephus, written near the close of the 1st cent. A.D., that the book was shown to Alexander the Great (Ant. XI. viii. 5), prob. represents only a historically is of no decisive value. A possible reference is in the Sibylline Verses, iii. 388 ff. (about B.C. 140), where there may be an allusion to Antiochus Epiphanes and the ten horns (Dn 7<sup>7</sup> 20<sup>24</sup>; Schürer, HJP div. ii. vol. iii. p. 280). The next reference is 1 Mac 2<sup>59</sup>, where Matthias is said to have said 'I am believed and were saved out of the flame. Daniel for his innocency was delivered from the mouth of lions.' While this might imply a knowledge of these stories, it is not the author of 1 Mac (about B.C. 100), who evidently composed the speech of Matthias, was acquainted with our book. From this period on there are abundant evidences of its being well known. Its influence is very appreciable in NT, esp. in Rev, but it is only once directly mentioned (Mt 24<sup>15</sup>).

The place of the Bk. of Dn among the Hagiographa favours also its late composition. If it had been written during the Exile, notwithstanding its apocalyptic character, it naturally would have been placed among the Prophets.

The Conclusion, then, in favour of the Maccabæan date, in view of this accumulation of concurrent facts, seems abundantly warranted. The exact date of composition is usually placed within the year B.C. 165. The 'abomination of desolation,' 168, is clearly before the writer, and also the Maccabæan uprising in 167, but not the re-dedication of the temple in Dec. 165, and the death of Antiochus in 163.

The great difficulty, of course, in assigning the Bk. of Dn to the late date is the fact that chs. 7-12 are represented as revelations of the future given to Daniel during the Exile. But this difficulty vanishes the moment one considers how prevailing in OT and among Jewish writers was the custom of representing present messages as given in the past through ancient worthies. Thus the law of Deut. is given as though spoken by Moses in the land of Moab, and the legislation of P as though revealed to Moses in the wilderness. The Bk. of Eccles. is written as the experience of Solomon. While in 2 Es, Bar, the Bk. of Enoch, and the Jewish Apocalypses generally, this method of composition is abundantly illustrated, and was evidently a favourite one with the devout and pious of the centuries immediately preceding and following Christ.

Assigning the entire book to the Maccabæan period, destroys, it is true, the hist. reliability of chs. 1-6. These chapters must be regarded as a species

* This passage, like other similar NT ones, reflects the Jewish opinion of the 1st cent. A.D., but has no further weight in deciding the question of authorship. Christ or the writer of the Gospel naturally expressed himself in the opinion of his contemporaries, and never led them to suspect or correct their contemporaries on questions of literary and historical criticism.

of the later Jewish Haggada, or method of inculcating moral and spiritual lessons by tales of the imagination. Here, again, we meet with striking parallels in the OT Bk. of Jonah and in the Apoc. stories of Tobit and Judith. A quasi defence of chs. 1-6 is frequently made on the ground that the writer used authentic written material of the Exile which he revised. This, of course, is possible, but it is a mere hypothesis, and it is more probable that his material was only traditions or tales.*

The view which has been presented of the Bk. of Dn doubtless will appear to some to destroy its religious value and render it unworthy of a place within the sacred Canon. No one, however, under the modern view can read the book without being taught lessons of sublime faith, and having a firmer assurance of the ultimate triumph of the kingdom of God. The book has in the past been blessed as an instrument of the Holy Spirit for the enhancement of the faith of its readers. The difficulties in receiving its lessons will be removed, and the Church will be spared endless profitless discussion and exegesis necessitated by the old view.†

ii. THE INTERPRETATION.—The Bk. of Dn contains three representations of the world's history more or less closely related to each other, which, with their interpretations, may be outlined as follows:—

| Ch. 2   | Ch. 7         | Ch. 8                |
|---|---------------|----------------------|
| A. Golden = The lion head                           |               | = Babylonian Empire. |
| Silver = The bear breast                            | = The ram     | = Medo-Persian "     |
| Brass = The leopard belly and thighs                | = The he-goat | = Grecian "          |
| Iron legs = The fourth and iron beast and clay feet |               | = Roman "            |

* An objection is sometimes made on the assertion that the book are Oriental and esp. unfamiliar with them as the Maccabean, and reference is made to the colossal image, the fiery furnace, the martyr-like boldness of the three confessors, the decree of Darius, the lions' den, the dreams of Nebuch., and the demands of the Chaldeans, etc. (Fuller, art. 'Daniel,' Smith's Dict.) Such a view had the countenance and authority of L. NORMAN (The Divination, pp. 169-267). The truth is, however, that the Bk. of Dn contains no allusions to Bab. customs which might not have been known to a Jewish writer of the 2nd cent. B.C. (who even might have visited Babylon), or have been preserved in the tales from which he drew his material; while, on the other hand, there are the statements already given which seem to prove the author's real acquaintance with the Bab. empire.

† In this manner, it is not surprising that the Bk. of Dn is mentioned as 'chief governor over all the' (ch. 4). This, owing to the exclusiveness of Bab. sacred caste, even Lennorm regarded as impossible, and hence held the words 'all the world' to be an exaggeration. Indeed, the reader's own sense of the theory of the connection of the Bk. of Dn with the Maccabean story, though it is raised in the (the) period, is worth a word of adherence either of the truth of the narrative or of its origin, has been settled once and for all, and the early a date cannot be determined. The people of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity (ch. 4) has been thought to receive confirmation by a story given in the History of the historian Abydenus (preserved in Eusebius, Prep. Ev. ix. 41). The story relates that Nebuch. on the roof of his palace was inspired by some god or the future calamities of Babylon and the Chaldeans. from Farrar is worthy of quotation in this connexion: 'Though I am not a Jew, I am a Jew in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, and though I believe that its six magnificent opening chapters were never meant to be regarded in any other light than that of moral and religious Haggadoth, yet no words of mine can exaggerate the value which I attach to this part of our Canonical Scriptures. The book, as we shall see, has exercised a powerful influence over Christian conduct and Christian thought. Its right to a place in the Canon is

The parallelism between the composite image (ch. 2) and the four beasts (ch. 7) shows that they were the same world-powers. In the interpretation A, the Medo-Persian empire is agreed. The historic Bab. kingdom there was no distinct Median kingdom, but Media was united to Persia, and naturally gave the interpretation of Medo-Persian to the silver breast and the bear, and such a united kingdom appeared in the two-horned ram of ch. 8. The brazen belly and thighs and the leopard then well symbolized the Grecian kingdom of Alexander and his successors, who acc. to ch. 8 were represented by the he-goat. While the legs of iron and feet of iron and clay and the fourth beast with the ten horns, in connexion with which appeared the final everlasting kingdom (24 727), would represent the Roman Empire in whose days the Christ appeared. Elsewhere, both in OT and NT, there were indications of great wars and distress, and even an Antichrist to precede the final consummation of the kingdom of J<sup>h</sup>. Hence the interpretation A was most plausible, and became almost universal in the early Jewish and the Christian Church.*

The prevailing modern interpretation is C (B has had few advocates). The reasons for the adoption of C are as follows: Whatever may have been the author's view, the author does distinguish between the Bab. and Persian kingdoms. After the Bab. kingdom places the Median represented in the reign of Darius (530-484), who has the position of an independent and absolute sovereign, and then follows the reign of Cyrus the Persian (539-530). A Medo-Persian kingdom could scarcely have been designated by the writer as inferior to Nebuchadnezzar or the Babylonian (239), while this would aptly describe the short-lived Median of his scheme. This kingdom seems also well represented in the bear (72). The kingdom of brass which shall rule over all the earth (239), or the leopard to which dominion was given (72), with its four wings undisputed and indubitable, and there is scarcely a single book of the OT which can be more richly available for the purpose, for proof, for correction, for illustration, for the man of God may find in it complete answers to all the world's work. Such precious lessons are not in the slightest degree impaired by the fact that the author's view of the world is one which is almost entirely at variance with the view of the Continent and many of the most learned critics. Finally unfavourable to authenticity, the author's view is derogatory to the preciousness of this OT book (Smith's Dict. p. 31).

* Indeed it is difficult to see how a different interpretation could have been given according to the prevailing exegesis which ignored the original historical action and meaning of the prophecies, and sought some other meaning for the historical or expected future of the Church. Christ had appeared to His second coming the world of 1918 (M<sup>ss</sup> 24 142), and His parousia was regarded as preceded by the tribulation of 7 years, which thus became the Antichrist. Many commentators thought his kingdoms to represent the 10 horns, and since the Reformation the papal power has very often been regarded as the Antichrist. The numbers three, four, and ten have also been freq. interpreted symbolically (so Briggs, Mass. Proph. § 105).

representing rapid and successive conquests, and with its four heads (corresponding to the four kings of 11<sup>3</sup>), symbolizes particularly well the Persian kingdom which advanced so widely and rapidly under Cyrus and Cambyses, and whose dominion was so great under Darius I. and his successors. It must also be noted that the two horns of 8<sup>3</sup>, one of which comes up last, which are interpreted as the kings of Media and Persia (8<sup>20</sup>), can as well represent two successive kingdoms, the power of one of which entered into the other, as one consolidated empire. The fourth kingdom of the image, which shall be strong as iron and break in pieces and crush (2<sup>40</sup>), and the beast terrible and powerful with great iron teeth, that devoured and brake in pieces and stamped the residue with his feet (7<sup>7</sup>), seem identical with the he-goat of furious power (8<sup>7-9</sup>) interpreted as Alexander (8<sup>21</sup>). The feet, part of clay and part of iron (2<sup>42</sup>), represent well the successors of Alexander, often 'externally allied but inwardly disunited'; and the ten toes (2<sup>42</sup>) seem to be reproduced in the ten horns, which fitly represent the Seleucidæ (see footnote, p. 552). The mingling of the seed seems to refer to the futile endeavours of the Ptolemies and Seleucidæ to form stable alliances by marriages (cf. 11<sup>6, 17</sup>). But the clear description of Antiochus Epiphanes in the little horn (7<sup>24-25</sup>) is decisive for the modern interpretation. The introduction of the Messianic kingdom in connexion with or following (cf. 11<sup>16</sup>) the author's own time, is fully in accord with other OT representations. Isaiah places the advent of the Messianic king in immediate connexion with a deliverance from Assyrian oppression (Is 8<sup>16-9</sup> 10<sup>33-11</sup>), likewise Micah (5<sup>2-3</sup>); and Deutero-Isaiah blends in one picture the release and restoration from Bab. captivity, and the final consummation of the divine purposes for Israel. The same principle is illustrated in Christ's eschatological discourse in Mt 24.

Corresponding with the interpretations of the four beasts are those of 'one like unto a son of man' (7<sup>13</sup>). The prevailing Christian and Jewish view has referred these words to the Messiah. The favour of this view is their application by Christ to Himself (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Mk 14<sup>62</sup>, Lk 22<sup>69</sup>, cf. Mk 13<sup>26</sup>, Lk 21<sup>27</sup>, Mt 16<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>40</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>, Rev 14<sup>14</sup> et al.), and the repeated designation of Christ in NT by the term 'the Son of Man.' The Bk. of Enoch (1<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>) has expression to the Messiah (46<sup>1-6</sup> 51<sup>3</sup> 52<sup>1</sup> 61<sup>1</sup>) and this is the general exposition of our passage by the Jewish Rabbins, also in the Talm. (Sanh. p. 98, col. 1). A growing modern view, however, finds in 7<sup>13</sup> a symbolization of the kingdom of Israel, and this probably was the intention of the writer. The expression 'son of man' (Aram. ܫܢܝܢ ܕܝܢܝܢ = Heb. בן אדם) acc. to a common Heb. idiom is synonymous for man or one of mankind (cf. Ps 8<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>1-4</sup> 10<sup>17</sup> et al.), and stands here evidently for one in human form representing Israel, in contrast with the he-goat symbolizing the heathen powers. A striking parallel occurs in Ps 80, where in v. 17 'son of man' symbolizes Israel, and 'the he-goat' v. 18 the heathen. The interpretation in v. 27 seems also decisive for this view. 'The kingdom is given to the people of the saints of the Most High; his (the people's) kingdom shall everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him (the people).' Again, no other possible similar Messianic allusion appears elsewhere in Daniel. The 'coming with the clouds of the heaven' is in evident contrast to the heathen kingdoms 'rising out of the sea' (7<sup>2</sup>). The latter appearance is fig., indicating earthly origin; the former indicates then, by parallelism, a source in the special power of God, just as the stone cut out of the mountain without hands (2<sup>34, 45</sup>) stands in contrast to the image, an evidently human or earthly product. That later writers, esp. those of the NT, should find in this passage a direct allusion to the Messiah, is in exact accord with their interpretation of other OT figures which primarily denote mankind or Israel (cf. Ps 8<sup>4</sup> and He 2<sup>6-9</sup>, Hos 11<sup>1</sup> and Mt 2<sup>18</sup>, Gn 12<sup>1</sup> and Gal 3<sup>16</sup> et al.).

iii. THE 'TIMES' OF DANIEL (7<sup>25</sup> 8<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>24-27</sup> 12<sup>11, 13</sup>), are difficult of interpretation. The endeavour under the Antiochian answer the anxious and piercing cry, 'Lord, how long? Thou restore the kingdom to Israel? When will the Messianic hope be realized?' They express the thought that the time of the fulfilment of the divine promise is very near at hand. The assurances of Is 40-66 had never been to the Jews, in their pitiful poverty and national smallness, and above all in this hour of persecution, seemed still in their captivity, still within the period of the seventy years mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer 29<sup>10</sup>), and an explanation of their duration and the announcement of their end is the evident endeavour of our author in 9<sup>24-27</sup>.

Of the weeks subdivided into 7+62+1 (9<sup>25-27</sup>), as in the case of the image (ch. 2), and the four beasts (ch. 7), there are two views generally according to the historical and prophetic references in (a) 'the anointed one, the prince' (2<sup>5</sup>), (b) 'the anointed one cut off' (2<sup>2a</sup>), (c) the destruction (2<sup>2b</sup>), (d) the maker of the covenant (2<sup>2a</sup>), (e) the desolation (2<sup>2b</sup>). The prevailing view in the past in the Christian Church has seen in (a) (b) and (d) the Messiah, and in (c) and (e) the destruction of Jerus. by Titus, 70 A.D. The view received at present, the Maccabæan date of Dn, refers (a) to Onias III. (2 Mac 4<sup>34</sup>), (b) to Antiochus Epiphanes, (c) and (e) to the havoc and desolation wrought by Antiochus at Jerusalem. In the case of both interpretations a week has usually been held to represent seven years, but a difficulty has always been experienced in fixing the termini, and the various solutions proposed for adjusting the 49+434+7 years have been almost endless. The more prevailing one, in the old view, places the advent of Christ at the end of 69 weeks (v. 25 AV and RVm), and refers the commandment to the decree of the 7th year of Artaxerxes, B.C. 457 or 458 (cf. Ezr 7<sup>6-26</sup>), and then 483 yrs. later is A.D. 25 or 26, the date usually assigned for Christ's baptism, which, from His anointing with the Holy Spirit, might represent His proper Messianic advent (Pusey, Lect. IV.). This view and all other similar ones presented by those holding the genuineness of the Bk. of Dn contain their own refutation, for the termini a quo must be later than the period of the prophet, who would have died many years at the latest before the commencement of the 490 years or the 70 weeks B.C., and such a date could not have been taken as the basis of his reckoning, unless the history of Israel after his death had been revealed to him in detail.

Under the other view the natural interpretation would be as follows: To the decree of Cyrus seven weeks (v. 25), i.e. 586-49=537. From this decree the city stands rebuilt during 62 weeks of 434 years, but after this period (v. 26) the anointed priest Onias III. shall be cut off in B.C. 171 (i.e. 537-434=103. This should be 171; see below). During the next seven years, the last week (v. 26<sup>1st</sup>), occur the havoc and ruin wrought by Antiochus. The sacrifice ceased, and the heathen altar was set up in the sanctuary. The latter event was in Dec. 168 (1 Mac 1<sup>54</sup>); but the former, with the terrible in Dec. 165 (1 Mac 4<sup>52</sup>). These three years and some months represent the half week of the ceasing of the oblation, mentioned in the time, times, and half a time (7<sup>20</sup>), in the 23 . . . . . (8<sup>34</sup>), i.e. 1150 days, and . . . . . the 1335 days (12<sup>12</sup>). The representations, of course, are not exact, i.e. the number of days exceed in each instance 3½ years, or half a week. Did we know all the circumstances of the times, we might see a clear solution, or possibly the author designed an enigmatic surplus or remainder to be interpreted as he . . . . .

1 Mac 12<sup>20-40</sup>), oc. . . . .
The temple . . . . .

In the above interpretation the actual period between the decree of Cyrus and the death of Onias is shorter than the 62 weeks, i.e. 366 years instead of 434. This . . . . . arisen from the defective chronology . . . . . reign of Cyrus too early* (Bevan, . . . . .). Owing to the great difficulty of finding any consistent explanation of the 'times' of Dn, many writers have regarded the numbers as entirely symbolical.

iv. VERSIONS.—The LXX text of Dn has been preserved only in one MS, Codex Chisianus, which cannot be older than the 9th cent., and is perhaps much later (Bevan). In place of the LXX the Greek VS of Theodotion was used (even by Irenæus, † 202). There is no Targ. on Daniel. The following diagram (from Behrmann, p. xxx) shows tentatively the relation of the VSS to the original text and to each other:—

v. ADDITIONS.—There are three Apocr. additions to Dn: (1) The Song of the Three Children, preceded by the Prayer of Azarias, in LXX and Vulg. at 3<sup>24-90</sup>; (2) The Story of Susanna, in Vulg. ch. 13, in LXX a separate book (?); (3) The Story of Bel and the Dragon, in Vulg. ch. 14, in LXX a separate book (?). (See sep. artt.)

LITERATURE.—The literature on Daniel is exceedingly voluminous. 'On no other book' (says C. H. H. Wright) 'has so much worthless matter been written in the shape of exegesis.' The most important Commentaries are those of Bertholdt, 1806-8; Von Lengerke, 1835; Havernick, 1832; Hitzig (Kgf.

DAN-JAAN.—Joab and his officers in taking the census came 'to Dan-jaan and round about to Zidon' (דָּן וְצִידֹן וְסָבִיב לְדָן), 2 S 24<sup>6</sup>. No such place is mentioned anywhere else in OT, and it is generally assumed that the text is corrupt. It has indeed been proposed to locate Dan-jaan at a ruin N. of Achzib which is said to bear the name Khan Dāniān; but this identification, although accepted by Conder, has not made headway. The reference is more probably to the city of Dan which appears so frequently as the northern limit of the kingdom. Three leading emendations of the text have been proposed. (1) Wellhausen (Sam. ad loc.) instead of the MT . . . . . read . . . . . ('They came to Dan) and from Dan they went about.' This is accepted by Driver (Sam. ad loc., cf. Deut. p. 421), Budde (in Haupt's OT), Kittel (in Kautzsch's AT). (2) Klostermann would read . . . . . 'and to Ijon and they went about.' Ijon and Gesen are associated in 1 K 15<sup>20</sup> (cf. 2 K 15<sup>20</sup>). (3) Gesenius would . . . . . 'to Dan in the wood' (cf. . . . .). After els Adv LXX reads, B Elḏar kal Oūdār, A Ṭapār kal Ioudār. This does not help us much, but Wellh. points out that it indicates at least that the translators found . . . . . twice in their text and had a verb in place of . . . . .

DANNAH (דָּנָה), Jos 15<sup>48</sup>.—A town of Judah mentioned next to Debir and Socoh. It was clearly in the mountains S.W. of Hebron, probably the present Idhnah. This place is noticed in the 11th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Jedna) as six Roman miles from . . . . . (Beit Jibrin). It is now a small . . . . . slopes. See SWP, vol. iii. sheet xxi. LXX has Pevdā. C. R. CONDER.

DAPHNE (Δάφνη).—A place mentioned in 2 Mac 4<sup>38</sup> to which Onias withdrew for refuge, but from which he was decoyed by Andronicus and treacherously slain. Its site, which has been identified with the mod. Beit el-Mā, or House of Waters, is placed by Strabo and the Jerus. Itinerary at a distance of 40 stadia, or about 5 miles, from Antioch. This place, which owed its establishment to Seleucus Nicator, was famous for its fountains, its temple in honour of Apollo and Diana, its oracle, and its right of asylum. DARDA (דָּרְדָּא, Δαρδὰ B, Δαρὰ A, Δαρδᾶ Inc.)—Mentioned with Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, and Calcol as a son of Mahol, and a proverbial type of wisdom, but yet surpassed by Solomon (1 K 4<sup>31</sup>). In 1 Ch 2<sup>9</sup> apparently the same four (Dara is probably an error for Darda. See DARA) are mentioned with Zimri as sons of Zerah, the son of Judah by Tamar (Gn 38<sup>29</sup>). So Targ. in 1 K 4<sup>31</sup> interprets 'the Ezrahite' as בן זרה 'the son of Zerah.' This statement of Ch need not conflict with that of K, 'sons of Mahol,' since Zerah, as is suggested by the title 'the Ezrahite,' may have been the remoter ancestor, Mahol the immediate father. **DARIUS (דָּרְיָוֶשׁ, Δαρείος) —1. Darius, the son of Hystaspes (Vistāshpa), written Dārayavaush in Old Persian, was the true founder of the Persian empire. The usurpation of the crown by the Magian Gaumata, who pretended to be Smerdis the brother of Cambyses, had shaken the empire of Cyrus, and the usurper by Darius and six others (B.C. 521) caused it to break up. The nations of which it was composed revolted under different leaders and had to be reconquered. Darius. The history of all this is given in the trilingual inscription he caused to be engraved on the rock of Behistun (Bagistana). First Susiana rebelled under Atrina, then Babylon under Nidinta-Bel, who pretended to be Nebuchadrezzar, son of Nabonidus. Contract-tablets show that the latter pretender reigned from October B.C. 521 to August B.C. 520, when Babylon was taken and Nidinta-Bel himself put to death. Next came the revolts of Martiya in Susiana; of Phraortes in Media, who called himself Khshathrita, descendant of Uvakhshatara; of the Armenians; of Chitrantakhma in Sagartia, who said he was a descendant of Uvakhshatara; of Phraortes in Parthia and Hyrcania, where Hystaspes was satrap; of a second false Smerdis in Persia; of the Armenian Arakha, son of Khaldita, in Babylon, who professed to be Nebuchadrezzar, the son of Nabonidus. But the revolts were all suppressed and the leaders impaled, though many hard fighting were needed for the work. D. ascribes all his successes to the help of Ahuramazda (Ormazd), the supreme god of the Zoroastrian faith.

He now set about the organization of the empire, which he placed under a bureaucracy centralized in himself. The provinces were governed by satraps appointed by the king, and each province was required to furnish the royal treasury with a fixed amount of annual tribute. Justice was administered by royal judges who went on circuit.

The second revolt of Babylon took place in B.C. 514, as no Bab. have been found dated in the seventh year of Darius, and after its suppression a part of the walls of the city were pulled down. Soon afterwards Darius overcame Iskunka the Sakian or Scyth, and henceforward the Scythians became a part of the Persian army. The expedition against the Scythians of 513 was still later. Darius crossed the Danube near Ismail by a bridge constructed by the Ionians, who had already performed the same service in the case of the Bosphorus, and, leaving it in charge of the Ionian 'tyrants,' he marched eastward to the Don. Eight fortresses were built on the banks of the Oarus (probably the Volga), and Darius then returned through a desert country to the Danube, harassed by the Scyths. Histæus of Miletus saved his army by dissuading the Greeks from destroying the bridge. Histæus was afterwards the indirect cause of the Ionian revolt, which led to the burning of Sardis by the Athenians, and the determination of Darius to punish Athens and annex Greece. Thrace and Macedonia had already submitted.

Mardonius, the son of Gobryas, was sent against Attica; but his ships were wrecked off Mount Athos, and he was compelled to return. Another army was despatched accordingly the following year. Eretria was pillaged; but the Persian host was utterly defeated by the Athenians at Marathon (B.C. 491), and compelled to retreat. Darius now fitted out another, on a larger scale, but just as it was ready to revolt.

D. had already explored the Indian Ocean. Skylax of Karyandria sailed down the Indus, and, after a voyage of thirty months, reached Suez. One of the results of the expedition was the subjugation of the Indians.

The revolt was followed by the death of the king, B.C. 486. He had married the daughter of Gobryas in early life, and Artobazanes, his eldest son by her, was not allowed to succeed him, as he had been born while Darius was still a private citizen. After his accession he married Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus and wife of Cambyses and of the pseudo-Smerdis, as well as Parnys the daughter of Smerdis, and Phædyma the daughter of Otanes. Xerxes, his son by Atossa, was his successor to the crown.

It was in the reign of Darius that the second temple of Jerusalem was finished. The work had not till the second year of his reign, when Haggai and Zechariah excited Zerubbabel, 'the governor of Judah,' and the high priest Joshua to undertake it afresh (Ezr 5<sup>16</sup>). This made Tattenai, the Persian governor of Syria, inquire by what authority they acted (v. 3<sup>6</sup>). On being told that it was a decree of Cyrus, he wrote to Darius, who had search made for the decree, which was found in the palace of Ecbatana. Darius caused it to be published, and added that money for the building should be given out of the revenue of the province, as well as cattle and other things for the temple services, 'that they may offer sacrifice . . . the life of the king and of his sons.' The temple was finished the 3rd of Adar, in the sixth year of D.

According to Josephus (Ant. XI i. 3), whose narrative rests on chs. 2 and 3 of 1 Es, the goodwill of Darius towards the Jews went back to the time when he was a private individual, and had vowed that if he became king he would restore the sacred vessels to the temple of Jerusalem. He and Zerubbabel were old friends, and, after the return of the Jewish prince from Jerusalem, Darius made him one of his bodyguard. In this capacity Zerubbabel was called on to amuse the king one night when he was sleepless, in the first year of his reign, by determining the relative strength of 'wine, kings, women, and truth.' His explanation that truth was the strongest pleased Darius, who promised to grant whatever he asked. He therefore reminded the king of his promise to build Jerusalem and its temple, and Darius thereupon did all he could to further the work, giving fifty talents towards it, and relieving the Jews of all taxation.

2. DARIUS the Persian (Neh 12<sup>22</sup>). Which king of Persia is meant is uncertain. Some commentators have supposed it to be Darius II. (Nothus) B.C. 423-404, but it was more probably Darius III. (Codomannus), the last king of Persia, and the contemporary of the high priest Jaddua, who is mentioned in the same verse. Darius III. reigned from B.C. 336 to 330, when he was overthrown by Alexander of Macedon in the decisive battle of Arbela, and the Persian empire destroyed.

3. DARIUS in 1 Mac 12<sup>7</sup> AV is a false reading for the Lacedæmonian Areus. See ARIUS.

4. DARIUS the Mede.—See next article.

LITERATURE.—Spiegel, Die altpersischen Königsinschriften (1881). A. H. SAYCE.

Who this D. was, is difficult to ascertain with certainty. Besides other proposals, D. the Mede has been identified with (1) Cyaxares II., the son and successor of Astyages (Jos. Ant. x. xi. 4), but no proof is given to support this theory; (2) Darius I.; (3) Astyages himself; but all these seem quite untenable. It is true that D. Hystaspis conquered Babylon, but that was some thirty years later. Besides this, he was a Persian, not a Mede; and he was about thirty-six years old, not sixty-two, when he began to reign.

The passage in Dn 5<sup>31</sup> where he is described as having received the kingdom (RV) leads one to ask whether, in spite of the title of king which is given to him (6<sup>6,7</sup> etc.), he may not have been really governor only. In the Gr. historians and in the Bab. Chronicle the name of D. the Mede does not occur, he who preceded Cyrus to Babylon, on the occasion of the siege and capture of that city, being Gobryas, who may thus be regarded as having 'received the kingdom for him.'* Gobryas, like Darius the Mede (6<sup>1</sup>), appointed governors in Babylon, and seems also to have been in the attack which resulted in Belshazzar's death (Bab. Chronicle, Rev. col. i. l. 22). It will thus be seen that Cyrus gave great power to Gobryas, who was, in fact, his viceroy.† Apparently, therefore, the later Jewish writers looked upon Gobryas as having as much authority as Belshazzar, whom they regarded likewise as king, though he does not appear ever to have reigned. The confusion of the names of D. the Mede and Gobryas of Gutium (he being governor of that place, which is regarded as having included a part of Media), may have been due to the scribes, who, being more familiar with the Gr. form of the name of D. (the end of which, when carelessly pronounced, bears a certain resemblance to that of Gobryas in that language) than with the Heb. form Daryawesh, wrote one name for the other; and there is also the possibility that one of Gobryas' names was Darius,‡ which would be a mistake. Under these circumstances we must accept, until further proof, the explanation that D. the Mede was no other than Gobryas of Gutium, who, being practically viceroy, may have been regarded as king during the absence of Cyrus from Babylon, and who, under the name of D. the Mede, by which he was known to the Hebrews later on, conquered and entered Babylon on the 16th Tammuz, called Daniel to the very high dignity of 'one of the three presidents who were placed over the hundred and twenty satraps,' and issued a decree, after Daniel's miraculous deliverance, enjoining 'reverence for the God of Daniel' throughout his dominions. Josephus gets rid of all difficulties presented by the title of 'king' which is given to D. the Mede in Daniel, by explaining that he took Daniel the prophet with him into Media, and that it was there that he appointed him one of the three presidents whom he set over his 'three hundred and sixty' provinces. According to this authority, therefore, D. the Mede was in fact never ruler of Babylonia.* I. A. PINCHES.

DARKNESS (Heb. חָשֶׁךְ and אֶפֶס [and their cognates], עִיָּה, עִיָּה, Gr. σκοτός, σκοτία, ὄψος). Besides its literal meaning, darkness is frequently used in Scrip. metaphorically. Since God is light, because the perfect embodiment of rational and moral truth, and since the knowledge of Him is man's light, darkness is the natural antithesis of these ideas. Hence in OT it is emblematic of nothingness (Job 34<sup>5,6</sup>); more freq. in the Ps. (Ps. 10<sup>21,22</sup> 15<sup>23</sup> 17<sup>12,13</sup> 1 S 26<sup>18</sup> Ec 11<sup>5</sup> etc.), and to the unknown or undiscovered (Job 12<sup>22</sup> 28<sup>3</sup>, Is 45<sup>3</sup> etc.). So, too, it is the emblem of mysterious affliction, and of the i. . . and frailty of human life (2 S 22<sup>29</sup>, Job 34<sup>5,6</sup>, Ps 18<sup>28</sup> 107<sup>10,14</sup>, Is 9<sup>2</sup> 29<sup>13</sup> 42<sup>7,15</sup> etc.); of moral depravity (Is 50<sup>10</sup> 60<sup>2</sup>, Pr 2<sup>13</sup>), and of confusion and destruction visited on the wicked (Job 5<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>40</sup> 20<sup>26</sup>, Ps 82<sup>5</sup>, Pr 4<sup>19</sup> 20<sup>20</sup>, Is 8<sup>22</sup> 59<sup>9</sup>, Ec 2<sup>14</sup>, Jer 2<sup>1</sup> etc.). It is also the symbol of that which causes terror and distress (Gn 15<sup>12</sup>, Is 50<sup>10</sup> 47<sup>5</sup>, La 3<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 32<sup>3</sup> etc.). Since, moreover, God is incomprehensible, His ways mysterious, and His i. . . severe, darkness is sometimes associated with His operations in providence (Ps 138<sup>11</sup>), in punishing (Am 8<sup>12</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>15</sup>), and in His self-manifestations generally (Ps 97<sup>2</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ch 6<sup>1</sup>), even as the guiding 'pillar' was light to Israel but darkness to the Egyptians (Ex 14<sup>20</sup>), and Sinai was covered with dark clouds when J<sup>h</sup> descended on it (Ex 20<sup>21</sup>, Dt 4<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>23</sup>, Heb 12<sup>18</sup>). In NT darkness is prevaillingly the emblem of sin as a state of spiritual ignorance and moral depravity (Mt 4<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>, Lk 17<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>45</sup> 22<sup>53</sup>, Jn 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>35,46</sup>, Ac 26<sup>18</sup>, Ro 2<sup>19</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>, Eph 5<sup>8,11</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>4,5</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>28,29</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>), but also of the desolation of divine punishment (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>13</sup> 25<sup>30</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>14,17</sup>, Jude 6<sup>13</sup>).

Two instances of darkness, recorded in the Bible, call for notice. 1. The ninth of the plagues sent by God upon the Egyptians was a plague of darkness (Ex 10<sup>21,23</sup>). Many commentators explain this as due to a storm of fine dust and sand driven from the desert by the S. wind, the Ham-sin, noted for such effects in the spring. The LXX seems to have taken such a view, describing it as 'darkness, thick cloud (νόσφος), storm (θύελλα).' Some have regarded it as wholly miraculous; but the other instances of darkness in the Bible are due to God's use of natural agencies. 2. The darkness that came on at the crucifixion from the sixth to the ninth hour (Mt 27<sup>45</sup>, Mk 15<sup>33</sup>, Lk 23<sup>44,45</sup>). This the evangelists seem plainly to represent as supernatural. The true text of Lk 23<sup>45</sup> (τοῦ ἡλίου ἐκλείποντος or ἐκλείοντος, 'the sun failing' or 'having failed'); RV 'the sun's light failing') has indeed been thought to describe it as an eclipse. This reading and interpretation were noted by Origen, from whose remarks it appears that objectors to Christianity had so explained it. Origen rejected the reading, attributing it either to a scribe's wish to provide an explanation or to an enemy's wish to pervert the evangelical account (see WH, Notes on selected readings). Origen also rejected the view itself that an eclipse, natural or miraculous (for so some explained it), was intended by Luke, though his language elsewhere seems to imply the true text. The charge that it was a natural eclipse is put into the mouth of the Jews in the Acts of Pilate, contained in the pseudo-

* He brought the army of Cyrus to Babylon on the 16th Tammuz, Cyrus arriving nearly four months later, on the 3rd Marcheshvan.

† It is noteworthy that Xenophon (Cyrop. N. 6) says that Gobryas was 'a man in years.'

‡ Jos. (Ant. x. xi. 4, 8, 12) that Darius (the Mede), whom he represents as the kinsman of Cyrus, 'had another name among the Greeks.' Apparently, the name of Gobryas was present to his mind when he wrote this.

* Driver, who in LOT pp. 469, 479 n. maintained a cautious reserve, admitting the possibility that D. the Mede might prove to be a historical character, agrees in his later editions with Sayce, that the existence of such a ruler is completely excluded by the monuments (cf. Sayce, ICM 528 ff.). The latter, as well as P. Haupt (note on Dn 5<sup>31</sup> in Th. pc's OT), and a host of modern scholars, argue that 'D. the Mede' is due to confusion with D. Hystaspis, who conquered Babylon (B.C. 520). On the theory of the Median date of Daniel, such a confusion is held to be quite explicable.

10-29; see also Ru 4<sup>18-22</sup>; and (iii.) in the titles of many psalms. Of these three sources the first is alike the oldest and the primary authority; information derived from the other two can be used only

A portion of the history in 1 Ch is derived directly or ultimately from the Books of Samuel, and cannot be cited as an independent narrative, though it is often valuable for the restoration of the text. The fresh information given by the Chronicler consists mainly of lists of names and statistical details. In many cases the numbers given condemn themselves; where we have to deal with series of names, there is no absolute criterion to guide us; but it is to be noticed that the new narratives are nearly always marked by their late Heb. style, and by the characteristic language of the Chronicler, while the statements made are often more or less at variance with the older account in Samuel. It is rarely clear that the author had access to ancient documents other than the Books of Samuel, and his unverified statements must therefore be received with caution. The picture of D. presented by him differs in important respects from the earlier portrait; it is indeed the picture of an idealized David, such as was present to the minds of devout Jews of the 3rd cent. B.C., when the true founder of the Isr. monarchy was regarded as a model of piety; and the recognition of the full Priestly Code in the time of D. was a fact never questioned (see CHRONICLES).

Seventy-three psalms bear the title 'to David,' and in many cases, especially in Book II., there is a fuller inscription connecting the psalm with some particular event in D.'s life. Many of these titles recall the language of the Books of Sam., from which indeed they may be derived. The picture of D. which they suggest is not unlike that of Chronicles. On closer examination, however, it is seen that the contents of the psalm are often not suitable to the alleged occasion; and so frequently is this the case, that it becomes unsafe to accept the titles, or even the Davidic authorship of the psalms, unless the titles are directly supported by internal evidence. But, without entering upon the wide question of the date and authorship of the Psalter (see PSALMS), it may be said that in a large number of cases the thoughts and language even of 'Davidic' psalms remind us of the teaching of the great prophets, and are to be largely dependent on it; and the ideas of the psalmists are often those of the post-exilic Jews; and the religious ideas and spiritual tone of the Psalter as a whole differ widely from those which the most trustworthy authorities ascribe to D. himself, or to the period of the early monarchy. The tendency among the best scholars of the present day is to reduce the directly Davidic element in the Psalter to the narrowest limits. Hence it does not seem advisable to illustrate the history or character of D. by quotations from the Psalms.

For the history of D. we are thus practically reduced to the Books of Samuel (with 1 K I 2), but even this work contains elements of unequal historical value, and it is necessary to consider briefly the structure of the book, and to form a critical estimate of its contents.

One noticeable feature of the D. tradition is the existence of a number of very similar events, or divergent accounts of the same event. These may be summarized as follows: (1) the introduction of D. to Saul, 1 S 18:1-3 and 19:1-5; (2) the slaying of Goliath at Gath, 1 S 17:1-51; (3) Saul's death, 1 S 31:1-13; (4) Saul's intercession for D., 19:1-7 and 23:1-11; (5) the origin of the proverb, 1 S 24:1-11 among the prophets, 19:20-24 and 10:10-13; (6) D. at the court of Achish, 21:10-15 and 27-28; 29; (7) D. spares Saul's life, 24 and 26, (9) the death of Saul, 1 S 31 and 2 S 1<sup>1-16</sup>. These parallels are not all equally convincing; in certain cases the divergent narratives may be harmonized more or less satisfactorily, in others it is possible that an event occurred more than once in D's life, though it would be strange that with reference, e.g., to D's fight to Gath, or his sparing Saul's life, no allusion should be made in the narrative to a previous similar occurrence. We cannot, however, separate these peculiarities in the history of D from the history of Saul, where we find two parallel narratives, the first of Saul's rejection of D as king, and of his rejection of D as king, and of his rejection of D as king. We are therefore obliged to recognize the existence of two parallel narratives in the present 1 S, and these must be separated as far as possible, and compared, if we would gain a clear idea of D's earlier life. In 2 S the case is different. Of a double narrative there we have no trace. On the other hand, we have a detailed and continuous narrative (ch 9-20 with 1 K 1, 2), the work of a single author, which describes the history of D's family and reign. This is a document of the highest importance. The earlier chapters (1-8) and the appendix (21-24) are of composite origin, there are indications that their contents have been partially rearranged; and later editors or redactors have left their mark on these chapters. The following analysis, taken mainly from Budde (Richter und Samuel), will be found useful. Some comments upon it will be found in the course of this article; for fuller particulars see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

No account is taken here of minor interpolations and editorial additions

Of these different authorities the oldest and most valuable is the family history of D. referred to above (2 S 9-20, 1 K 1. 2); its detailed descriptions and graphic touches do not indeed prove the writer to have been a contemporary of the events, but he clearly possessed trustworthy sources of information, and must be placed not very long after D's time. The remaining portions of A are not so detailed, and are apparently of somewhat later date. B is still later, and in several points less reliable than A, while of the shorter sections some are shown by their contents, and by the ideas there expressed, to be of high antiquity (2 S 21. 24), others are certainly later than B, and in part dependent on B. All, however, are earlier than the time of Jc-31, and only in 2 S 1. 1-10, and in the Songs (2 S 22, 23-7) and the editorial 1 S 1. 1-10, do we trace the influence of Deuteronomy.

David was the youngest son of Jesse, a Judæan of Bethlehem, who seems to have belonged to one of the principal families of his native town (yet cf. 1 S 18<sup>18</sup>). No particulars as to the ancestry of Jesse are given in 1 Sam. (contrast the case of Saul, 1 S 9<sup>1</sup>); but in the (later) genealogy in Ruth he is called the son of Obed, and grandson of Boaz, and his descent is traced back to the family of Perez (Ru 4<sup>18-22</sup>; see also 1 Ch 23<sup>1-7</sup>). The name of D.'s mother is nowhere given; his three elder brothers were called Eliab (q. v.), 1 Ch 27<sup>18</sup>, Abinadab, and Shammah (Shimeah, 2 S 13<sup>3</sup>; Shimei, 2 S 21<sup>21</sup>), see 1 S 16<sup>6-9</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>. 1 S 16<sup>10f.</sup> and 17<sup>12</sup> speak of eight sons of Jesse, and in 1 Ch 24<sup>1-16</sup> three more names are given, Nethanel the 4th, Raddai the 5th, and Ozem the 6th. D. and his three brothers were termed the 7th. The sisters of D., Zeruiah the mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel) and Abigail (the mother of Amasa), were probably half-sisters, for in 2 S 17<sup>25</sup> Abigail is called daughter of Nahash and sister to Zeruiah; cf. 1 Ch 2<sup>16</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>).

We first hear of D. when he was introduced to the court of Saul. The king had been attacked with morbid melancholy, called by the historian 'an evil spirit from J',<sup>1</sup> His servants suggested that a skilful player upon the harp should be brought to soothe the king with his music, and D., the son of Jesse, was chosen for this office. The narrative (1 S 16<sup>14-23</sup>) is probably to be connected with the statement of 14<sup>52</sup>, that Saul gathered round him every valiant warrior in Israel; and in like manner D., who is described as 'a mighty man of valour and a man of war,' was summoned to the court. In addition to being a skilful musician, he was prudent in speech (or business), a comely person, and one who enjoyed the favour of J'. The young minstrel won the favour of the king, who made him his armour-bearer (cf. 1 S 14<sup>1ff.</sup> 314-6, 2 S 18<sup>15</sup> 23<sup>37</sup>), and kept him in attendance upon his person.

From another source, however, we have a different account of D.'s first introduction to Saul, in the beautiful and familiar story of the encounter with Goliath (ch. 17<sup>1-18</sup>). Here David is represented as a mere lad, a goodly youth of fair countenance, inexperienced in war (17<sup>33. 42</sup>), who used to tend his father's sheep. During a war with the Philistines, D. was sent by his father with a present to his three brothers, who were serving in Saul's army in the Valley of Elah. On reaching the camp he heard the defiant words of the giant, Goliath of Gath, and, undeterred by his eldest brother's reproaches, he inquired among the soldiers concerning the king's reward promised to any man who would overcome the Philistine champion. When brought before the king, the youth at once offered to go out against the Philistine, relating how he had protected his father's sheep from the lions and bears which had attacked them (tenses in 17<sup>34</sup>, frequentative, see Driver, Text of Sam.). Putting aside the armour offered by the king, he advanced to meet the giant. He brought his opponent to the ground by a stone slung against his forehead, and then cut off his head with his own sword. The fall of their champion was followed by the rout of the Philistine army. So far was D. at this time unknown to Saul, that the king instructed his chief commander, Abner, to inquire concerning the 'stripling's' parentage, — a question which D. answered truthfully as he returned from the fray with the giant's head in his hand. From this time forward D. was kept at the court of Saul, while a close friendship sprang up at once between him and the king's son Jonathan.

Many attempts have been made to harmonize the two narratives. It is suggested that D. had returned home from his position as minstrel, and had since grown out of his youth; or that Saul's question to Abner: 'Is he of the king's family, but that he personally was known to Saul. Neither of these explanations can be regarded as satisfactory, nor is the account for the discrepancy between the skilled warrior of 16<sup>18</sup> and the shepherd lad of 17<sup>33. 42</sup>. The difficulty attracted attention at an early period. 17<sup>15</sup> seems to be a harmonistic addition by some later editor, and represents D as going backwards and forwards between his home and the court. Similarly, 16<sup>19</sup> which is with the sheep, a clause which does not agree with v. 18, must be regarded as a later gloss. The LXX (cod. B) offers a more violent solution of the problem, omitting 17<sup>12-31. 41. 50. 55-18</sup>; it thus gets rid of the description of D. as sent to the camp by his father, and of Saul's question concerning the young hero, D. being represented (v. 32) as already in attendance upon Saul. The LXX text has been accepted as original by competent scholars (W. R. Smith, Stade, Cornill); but others with good reason adhere to the MT, and regard the omissions of the LXX as due to an attempt to reconcile chs. 16 and 17 (Driver, Chayim, W. R. Smith, [Composition], Kuenen, Budde, etc.). Even in the LXX text D. is a shepherd lad (vv. 33. 42), not the warrior of 16<sup>18. 21</sup>; in language and style the omitted parts do not differ from the rest of the chapter, and certain expressions which suggest a later hand (e.g. assembly v. 47, Jerusalem 54) are found also in the LXX; and the original covenant between D. and Jonathan, to which allusion is made more than once subsequently, is related only in 18<sup>1-4</sup>. In fact all these attempts to reconcile the two accounts of the first meeting of D. and Saul are unsuccessful; we can only recognize them as two versions of the history, and choose between them. And here we see the importance of the statement of 2 S 21<sup>19</sup> that 'Elhanan the son of Jair (cf. Driver, Text of Sam.) the Bethlehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam' (cf. 1 S 17<sup>1</sup>). The Chronicler indeed states that 'Elhanan slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath' (1 Ch 20<sup>5</sup>), but the 'harder' reading of 2 Sam is certainly to be preferred. It has been suggested that Elhanan was the original name of David (Bottcher, Sayce), — but of this there is no hint in either passage, and the father of Elhanan is Jair (or Jaïr), not Jesse; — or that the name of Goliath has been wrongly transferred to D.'s enemy, who, in 1 S 17, is usually termed simply 'the Philistine.' On the whole, however, it seems more probable that Goliath of Gath was slain at a later period by one of D.'s warriors, also a native of Bethlehem; and subsequently the victory was by tradition ascribed to D. himself, and put back to the period of his boyhood. In this case we must accept 1 S 16<sup>14-23</sup> as giving the true narrative of D.'s first introduction to Saul; but the popular tradition has left its mark on other parts of the history of David.

A story of D.'s earliest life is given in 1 S 16<sup>1-13</sup>, where we read how, after Saul's rejection, Samuel was sent in accordance with J<sup>17</sup>'s instructions to Bethlehem. There he invited Jesse to a sacrifice, and, after sending a special summons to the young David, who was tending the sheep, anointed him in the midst of his brothers. This narrative now forms the introduction to the history of D.; it is the counterpart to 1 S 10<sup>1ff.</sup> (the anointing of Saul by Samuel), and explains the coming of the Spirit of God upon D., and its departure from Saul; but, as it stands, the account can hardly be accepted as historical. Independently of any difficulties raised by the character and position here assigned to Samuel, which resemble what we find in the later narrative of the choice of Saul, the fact that D.'s anointing attracted so little attention has more than once been remarked as strange. His own brother Eliab seems unaware of it (17<sup>17</sup>), while D. himself is unconscious of his destiny (18<sup>18</sup>), and Saul regarded Saul as the Anointed of J<sup>17</sup> (1 S 24<sup>20</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>14</sup>). The explanation that this anointing was only a mark of favour bestowed on the most honoured guest, and that D. was here given a place like that assigned to Saul at Ramah (9<sup>22</sup>, so Klostermann, Ewald, W. R. Smith), does not do justice to the narrative, and anointing in the OT implies the conferring of some office.

Our authorities do not enable us to say how long D. continued in the position of Saul's minstrel and armour-bearer. His success in war against the Philistines; his popularity among the soldiers; the love of Michal and her marriage with D., the strong friendship between D. and Jonathan, who entered into a covenant of brotherhood, — these facts are all attested by more than one passage in both the main narratives. But it is not quite easy to trace and explain the beginning of the distrust which Saul conceived for his young favourite, who had been promoted to the position of captain of the bodyguard (1 S 22<sup>14</sup> LXX). It is only natural that there should be some want of definiteness in the narratives. The facts could be known only to those belonging to the innermost circle of the court, and all our records are written from the point of view of friends of David. If any ill-advised action on his part contributed to excite Saul's ill-will, we are told nothing about it. The main reason alleged for Saul's enmity is his jealousy of D.'s popularity and success in war, which is said to have been excited by the song of the women, who met the victorious warriors with the words, 'Saul hath slain his thousands, and D. his ten thousands.' But besides this there are hints of a suspicion that D. had conspired with Jonathan to dethrone him (cf. 1 S 20<sup>30f</sup> 22<sup>13</sup>). Everything that we are told of Jonathan goes to prove the baselessness of such a suspicion, and his continued affection for D. is evidence of D.'s innocence; but we can well imagine that the melancholy from which Saul suffered served to increase any jealousy or distrust when once aroused, and it is possible that he feared that his subjects might regard him, owing to his occasional attacks of madness, as no longer a fit ruler of the nation.

The chapter which describes the growth of the estrangement between Saul and D. lies before us in two forms. Here again the LXX has a shorter text, omitting from ch. 18 vv 9-11, 12b, 17-19, 21b, 29b, 37. Thus the account of Saul's casting his spear at D. is omitted, and the promise of marriage with the

Merab; the gradual growth of Saul's scribbled, and each stage is appropriately emphasized with the words 'Saul was afraid of D.' (v. 12), 'Stood in awe of him' (v. 16), 'was yet more afraid' (v. 29), and on account of the clear and consistent picture given in this version, many scholars accept the LXX text a Kuenen, Stade, Driver, W. R. But Cornill allows that the promise of Merab is a fragment of the king's promise to the (17<sup>26</sup>); and Budde urges the inconsistency of adopting the LXX recension in ch. 18, and rejecting it (as Wellh., Kuenen, Driver do) in ch. 17. He accounts for the difficulties presented by the MT by analysing the chapter into sections derived from the two principal documents (so also Cheyne); and this seems to be the most satisfactory solution of the problem. Comparing the parallel narratives, we gather that D. was placed by Saul at the head of an armed force, either as a mark of favour (18<sup>6</sup> A), or because of his growing distrust (v. 13 B); that Saul's jealousy was excited on some occasion when D. returned from a victory over the Philistines (vv. 6-9, probably A and B,—note the double introduction to v. 6); that this did not prevent the marriage of D. to Saul's younger daughter Michal (vv. 20-3) A, cf. 17-19 B). Indeed it is not improbable that the marriage was placed too early, and that Saul gave access to the popular and successful officer in order to bind him to his interests, rather than that he already desired to compass D.'s death. Jonathan's intercession for his friend failed to effect a real reconciliation (19<sup>7</sup> B, 20 A); and when Saul, in a fit of madness, hurled his spear at D. while he played the harp before the king, D. felt that his life was in danger, and that he must flee from the court (19<sup>10</sup> B, 18<sup>10</sup> A, probably removed from its original position when A and B were combined).

The two narratives differ. According to A, the dowry was fixed at 100 foreskins of the Philistines; but D. without loss of time, procured twice as many (18<sup>24</sup> A, MT, 100, LXX) and won his bride (19<sup>24</sup> A, MT, 100, LXX). The MT, however, attributes the life of D. when D. combined to the king's intention of killing him, and his true feelings, it was then agreed that D.

then agreed that D. was to excuse his friend's absence from the festival, while Jonathan was to excuse his friend's absence from the royal table on the pretext that he had been summoned to a family feast at Bethlehem. On the first day of D.'s absence nothing was said, on the next day, in answer to Saul's inquiries, Jonathan made the excuse agreed upon, whereat the king burst forth into furious reproaches against D. and his son, and hurled his spear at Jonathan, who attempted to interfere on his friend's behalf. In anger Jonathan left the table and went home, and D. appointed place in the field. Under a pile of stones, he hid himself, and sent an arrow beyond the stone where D. lay concealed, and while the boy carried back his master's weapons, the two friends took an affectionate farewell. On ch. 20 which his perhaps not reached us quite in its original form, it may be remarked that the denial of any wish on the part of Saul to harm D. (19<sup>17</sup>, 11-17, and that while a mere act of right leave D. uncertain as to Saul's intentions, he could not have any doubt after Saul had deliberately sent messengers to kill him (19<sup>11-17</sup>), or be expected to the king's table (20<sup>6</sup>, 27). The second narrative (B), it was owing to Saul's jealousy that D. was removed from the position of armour-bearer to that of captain of a thousand (15<sup>13</sup>), and when the time came for his promised marriage (cf. 17<sup>26</sup>), Merab the elder daughter was given to Adriel of Meholah. Our account of D.'s marriage with Michal seems to be derived from the other source, but the obscure words at the end of v. 21 are perhaps a fragment of the second narrative. Saul's ill-will towards his former favourite increased so greatly that he purposed to put him to death. Jonathan, however, pleaded to his father D.'s good deeds, and he brought D. out of his hiding-place in the night to his father (19<sup>1-7</sup>). The reconciliation, however, was of no long duration, for, shortly after Jonathan's appeal, Saul, in a fit of madness, cast his spear at D. as he played on the harp before him. D. fled to his house, but that night (19<sup>11</sup> LXX) Saul sent messengers to watch the house, and, while respecting his sleeping enemy in accordance with Oriental custom, he ordered them to kill him in the morning. D. was saved by the faithful Michal, who lowered him through the window, while he hid in his bed the teraphim or household image, and covered it with the bed-clothes. Next morning the messengers brought word that D. was ill, but, when charged to bring him in the bed, the fraud was discovered, and Michal had to plead in self-defence that D. had threatened her life if she hindered his escape. With regard to this series of narratives it may be pointed out that the similarities between portions of 19<sup>1-7</sup> and ch. 20 suggest, though they do not prove, that we have before us two different versions of the same event, while the reference to the victory over Goliath connects the former passage with ch. 17. Further, the difference of phraseology in 18<sup>24</sup> 19<sup>24</sup> (cf. also 20<sup>33</sup>) favours the view that these verses are the work of independent writers, rather than that the former passage has merely been borrowed from the latter after the time of the LXX.

For the rest of Saul's reign D. was an exile from his home, and an outlaw (1 S 21-31). Some incidents during this period of his life are described with minute and graphic touches, which bear the evident stamp of genuineness; in other cases the accuracy of the narrative is more doubtful. The analysis of these chapters does not present many difficulties, and more than once the existence of double versions of the same story can hardly be doubted. It is only natural that many stories of D.'s adventures should have been current among the people long before they were written down; and many a place in the wilds of Judah would doubtless claim to be the site of some memorable event in the outlaw life of the great national hero, while from ch. 30<sup>28-31</sup> it is clear that we possess but a fragmentary account of his many wanderings. According to the present Book of Samuel, D., after fleeing from Saul's messengers, fled first to Ramah, where he took refuge with Samuel at a prophetic school. Thrice Saul sent messengers to capture him (cf. 2 K 1), but each time the men were overcome by the sacred minstrelsy of the prophets; and when Saul came in person, he too was filled with prophetic frenzy, and stripping off his clothes lay naked all the night (19<sup>18-24</sup>). Grave doubts, however, have been raised against this narrative. For a Judæan like D., flight southwards was more natural from Gibeah than northwards to Ramah; the connexion between Samuel and the prophets is not that presented by the older history of Saul and Samuel, where indeed there is another explanation given of the proverb 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (10<sup>14f</sup>); while the present narrative can hardly be by the author of ch. 16, who implies (v. 35) that Saul and Samuel did not meet again. The conception of the prophetic school as here described is probably later than the time of D.; and we must regard it as at least doubtful whether D. had any dealings with Samuel.

If we reject this narrative as of later origin, the first place visited by D. in his flight will be the priestly city of Nob, which lay south of Gibeah and due north of Jerusalem. To Ahimelech, the head of the priests of Eli's family, he alleged that he was bound on urgent business for the king, and accordingly obtained through him, as on previous occasions (22<sup>13</sup>), an answer from the oracle. The only provisions which he could offer was the sacred shewbread, brought day from the sanctuary; and this David accepted, stating that he and his companions were ceremonially clean. Ahimelech is said also to have given to D the sword of Goliath, which was kept wrapped in a cloth behind the EPHOD. This visit to Nob was followed by important consequences. Shortly afterwards, while Saul was holding court under the tamarisk in Gibeah, he sent to his Benjamite followers of the tribe of Benjamin to take part against him with his own son and David. Hereupon the Edomite Doeg, the chief herdsman of Saul, or rather 'the mightiest of his runners' (21<sup>7</sup>, so Gratz, Driver), declared that he had seen D. at Nob, where Ahimelech had consulted the oracle on his behalf, and supplied him with food and weapons. Saul at once suspected that the priest also was party to a conspiracy against him, and perhaps that he had been consulting the oracle as to its success. He summoned to his presence Ahimelech and the priests of his family, and, refusing to accept their denial of any knowledge of a conspiracy, ordered his guards to put them to death. The guards hesitated, but Doeg carried out the king's orders. Eighty-five priests were slain, and the city of Nob completely destroyed. Only one member of Eli's family escaped the massacre, Abiathar, a son of Ahimelech, who fled to D., probably to Adullam; and the latter, feeling that the disaster was in some measure due to himself, promised the fugitive his protection. According to Budde, we have in 1 S 21<sup>1-9</sup> 22<sup>6-23</sup> two versions of D.'s flight, and the denunciation of Doeg: notice that 22<sup>10-15</sup> imply that Ahimelech consulted the oracle for David, whereas nothing is said of this in 21<sup>1-9</sup>. Budde connects the earlier passage with B, the second with A, and regards the allusions to Goliath's sword in 22<sup>10-13</sup> as added to connect the two narratives. Others (Wellh., Kuenen, Stade) ascribe both chapters to the same writer, and reject 21<sup>8-9</sup> (Heb. 9. 10) 22<sup>10b</sup> as later glosses. In any case, these verses presupposed the account of D. and Goliath in ch. 17.

Our present narrative represents D. as fleeing from Nob to Gath. Here, it is said, at the court of Achish, he was recognized as the Isr. warrior, and 'king of the land'; in consequence he feigned madness, drumming (v. 13 LXX) on the doors, and letting the spirit fall on his beard, so that at the command of Achish he was driven away (21<sup>10-15</sup>). It is doubtful, however, whether D. would really have taken refuge among the Philistines at such an early period of his wanderings; and when he appears at Gath at a later time, no hint is given of this earlier visit. Probably we have here again a 'doublet,' and our narrative represents a popular legend, the product of a desire to represent in a more patriotic light D.'s residence among the Philistines. Far more reliable is the account in 22<sup>1ff.</sup>, according to which D. fled (from Nob) to the cave, or stronghold (cf. Wellh., Stade, Budde; cf. v. 4), of Achish. This place must be looked for, not, according to a tradition dating from the 12th cent. A.D., on the south of Bethl'hem in the Wady Kharrutun, but in the Sheph'elah west of Hebron (cf. Gn 38<sup>1</sup>, Jos 15<sup>86</sup>; and see G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 229 f.). Here the wild character of the country afforded him a hiding-place; he was among his own tribesmen, and on the extremity of Judah Saul's authority was weakest. The brothers and kinsmen of D., who had to fear Saul's vengeance, gathered round him, together with distressed debtors and dispossessed men of every class, so that D. soon found himself the leader of a band of some 400 men. Of these, several doubtless were not of Israelitish origin (cf. 1 S 26<sup>8</sup> and perhaps 2 S 23<sup>37-39</sup>); according to 1 Ch 12<sup>8-18</sup> certain valiant Gadites and men of Judah and Benjamin joined him here, and not long afterwards (1 S 23<sup>18</sup>) D.'s followers are reckoned at 600. His parents he placed under the protection of the king of Moab, a step which may perhaps be explained by reference to the Book of Ruth, where D.'s descent is traced from Ruth the Moabitess. According to 22<sup>6</sup>, a verse of which the connexion is somewhat obscure, D., at the advice of the prophet Gad, removed from his stronghold to the forest of Hareth; but he is certainly again in the Sheph'elah when we next hear of him. News came to D. that the Philistines were raiding Keilah, doubtless a frontier town west of Hebron, and perhaps south of Adullam. An oracle now offered itself to him of at once gathering his countrymen and making a fresh name as a warrior. Having inquired of the priestly ephod, which Abiathar had brought from Nob, and received a favourable answer, D. marched down with his band, and drove away the Philistines from Keilah. To Saul it seemed that the time for capturing his enemy had now come. He summoned his army in order to besiege Keilah; but D., learning from the oracle that the inhabitants would save themselves by delivering over him and his men to Saul, escaped betimes, and Saul abandoned his expedition.

D. is next found in the wild and partially desert country to the south of Judah, or in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea. The wilderness of Ziph and of Maon are especially connected with his wanderings. Here doubtless D. was welcome, and probably he was able to protect the inhabitants from the inroads of wild nomad tribes living farther to the south and east.

At this point the double narrative reappears, as is specially noticeable in the case of the two accounts of D. sparing Saul's life. That ch. 26 refers to a second occasion, although no reference is there made to a former proof of D.'s generosity, seems to be confirmed by the fact that each is introduced by an offer of a hiding-place to Saul (23<sup>18</sup> 26<sup>1</sup>). D.'s noble conduct placed in the comparison of the language (see esp. v. 15) literary dependence of one upon the other, or the dependence of both on some common tradition. Owing to the occurrence in ch. 26 of certain antique conceptions (esp. v. 15) that this is the earlier narrative, Budde, on the other hand, connects ch. 24 with the A narratives, in which the archaic occurrence of ch. 26 may be due to the fact that it has undergone less editorial revision than 24 (see esp. 24<sup>40</sup>). Budde further argues from the fact that in ch. 24 the chapters between chs. 23 and 24 have been separated to separate the doublets, chs. 24 and 26. There are other traces in ch. 23, especially in the somewhat exaggerated description of the flight, and in the fact that the account of the two friends (vv. 40-42) as a mere doublet of 24<sup>1-10</sup>, which suggests the objection that the two narratives could hardly have thus definitely regarded D. as his father's successor. If, however, the transposition above mentioned has been made,

While D. was hiding in the hill of Hachilah and the neighbouring desert, the Ziphites sent word of his haunts to Saul, and at the king's request began to watch his movements, while an army was being collected. D. meanwhile withdrew southwards to the wilderness of Maon, on the edge of the Arabah, whither he was pursued by Saul. At one time, we are told, a single rocky ridge separated the two forces; but while D. was endeavouring to make good his escape before his band was completely surrounded, Saul was unexpectedly recalled to repel a sudden raid of the Philistines. Popular tradition has set out the cliff known as Sela (cf. e. prob. 'Rock of Divisions') as the scene of this narrow escape (23<sup>41-42</sup>).

One of the most detailed and most reliable accounts which we possess of the whole period of D.'s wanderings relates to the time when he was still in the region of Maon. Here dwelt a wealthy landowner named Nabal, belonging to the Calebites, a tribe closely connected with that of Judah, though originally distinct from it. His large flocks were pastured on Carmel, S E. of Hebron; and not molested by D.'s men, but the latter had served to protect them from the attacks of nomad tribes. Hearing that Nabal was shearing his sheep, D. sent ten men with a courteous request for a present for his band, but was met with a churlish refusal. In wrath D. at once commanded his men to arm; and while a third of the company was left in charge of the baggage, he marched with the rest to avenge the insult received from Nabal. Fortunately, Abigail, Nabal's beautiful and prudent wife, had been warned by a servant of her husband's unseemly conduct. She immediately caused a large supply of provisions to be prepared, and without informing her husband rode to meet D. with her present. She met the armed band coming down the mountain side, and throwing herself at D.'s feet begged him to accept the gift, and to pay no heed to her husband's insults, while she expressed a hope that in time to come no remembrance of blood needlessly shed might rise up to trouble his mind. Her discretion and her pleadings were not lost on D.; he accepted the present from her hand, and abandoned his purpose of vengeance and bloodshed. When Abigail returned home, she found her husband drunk at a shearing feast, but next morning she told him of the danger which he had just escaped. Fear and vexation caused a shock, of which he died ten days later; and D., who now felt that J' had indeed defended his cause, took Abigail to wife. He thus established a powerful family connexion with the south of Judah, and he further increased his influence by marrying Ahinoam of the southern Jezreel (1 S 25). At the same time his first wife, Michal, was given by Saul to Paltiel, the son of Laish, of Gallim (1 S 25).

It seems to have been after this, according to the original history of A, that David removed to the desert tract west of the Dead Sea, and made his abode in Engedi, whither he was followed by Saul, after the retreat of the Philistines. We are told that on one occasion Saul entered a large cave for a necessary purpose, at a time when D. and his men were hidden in the recesses of the cave. Though urged by his followers to slay his pursuer, D. refused to harm the 'Anointed of J'', and contented himself with cutting off a corner of the long robe which lay spread out before and behind the owner. D. followed Saul as he left the cave, and, holding out the portion of his robe, showed the king how he had been at the mercy of the man whom he was so relentlessly pursuing; and he begged him no longer to listen to those who charged D. with conspiring against him. Saul was touched at this generosity and in language which clearly reflects the thoughts of a historian of a later time, he is made to openly acknowledge his rival's superiority and to recognize him as the future king of Israel (1 S 24). The other version of this story (ch. 26), which, though coming from a later document, has preserved many original features lost in ch. 24, places D. in the hill of Hachilah, and attributes his pursuit hither by Saul to the information of the Ziphites. One night Saul encamped in a deep valley surrounded by steep cliffs; but he was discovered by D.'s spies, D., accompanied by Abishai, descended from the hill, and entered unobserved into the laager where Saul lay sleeping. Refusing to allow Abishai to smite a sleeping enemy, he bade him carry away Saul's spear and water-curse, and when they had again climbed the hill above the camp, D. shouted aloud, and thus aroused first Abner, whom he blamed severely for his careless watch, and then Saul himself. To Saul, who recognized his voice, D. made a passionate appeal: 'Why did the king continually pursue him? if J' had stirred him up to do so, might he be propitiated with an offering: or were men seeking to drive D. out of J''s land?' The king confessed that he had sinned, and promised to do D. no more harm, and the two parted their several ways.

Whatever be the exact details of this meeting, it is clear that D. felt himself no longer safe in Judah, and as a last resort he passed over to the national enemy, and took refuge with his family and his followers at the court of Achish, son of Maach, king of Gath. A tried warrior at the head of 600 men, he was readily welcomed; but, not liking to dwell in the capital, he asked for a settlement of his own, and received the southern town of Ziklag, where he established himself as the vassal of his protector. It was now necessary for David to devise some means of ensuring the confidence of his master without injuring or estranging his own people. Accordingly, he made a succession of raids upon the Amalekites, Girzites, and other desert tribes living between Egypt and the south of Palestine. By putting to death all who fell into his hands, D. was able to represent to Achish that his frays were directed against Judah, and against the allied tribes of the Kenites and Jerahmeelites (1 S 27). He had been at Ziklag some 16 months (v. 7), when the Philistines prepared for a decisive struggle against Israel. Achish called upon his vassal to join him to the war, and D. with profession- responded to the call. He had now placed himself in a false and dangerous position. Even if he were willing to aid the Philistines against his fellow-countrymen, success in the war would have effectually prevented him from becoming the accepted leader of Israel. Fortunately, the other Phil. leaders were less ready than Achish to trust him. When D. and his troops appeared in the rearguard with Achish at Aphek, as the Philistine hosts were mustering, the princes protested against the presence of the famed Israelitish leader, and urged that treachery to them in battle would be the surest way to a reconciliation with the king of Israel. Achish was therefore reluctantly compelled to bid D. depart, and next morning he turned homewards with his men (chs. 28<sup>ff</sup>. 29). Two days later they reached Ziklag, to find that a sudden raid of the Amalekites had laid the town in ruins and carried the inhabitants captive. D. was the first to recover his composure, and, encouraged by an answer from J' given through the prophet of Abiathar, he started to pursue the foe. At the brook Besor, probably the Wady Esheria south of Gaza, 200 of his men were compelled to remain, overcome by fatigue. The pursuit, however, was continued, and an Egypt. slave, who was found half dead in the way, offered in return for a promise of life and liberty to guide D. to the enemy's encampment. The Amalekites were surprised at dusk while feasting, and few of the men escaped. All the captives were recovered, and a large booty was taken. On the return to the brook Besor, a dispute arose as to the right of the men who had been left there to share in the spoil. D., however, decided in their favour, and thus established the principle that those who fought and those who guarded the rear should share alike. Of the rich spoil D. made a further use to make, for he sent costly presents to the elders of Hebron and other towns in the south of Judah, where he had been accustomed to find shelter during his earlier outlaw life (ch. 30). In this way he secured friends whose assistance was soon to be of the highest importance to him. It would seem, indeed, that these presents were sent after the battle of Gilboa, for it was only two days after his return to Ziklag that D. heard of the defeat of Israel and the death of Saul and his three eldest sons. The tidings were brought by a young Amalekite, who is said to have presented to D. the royal crown and bracelet; but the account given by him of the death of Saul (2 S 1<sup>3-10</sup>) cannot be reconciled with the more reliable narrative in 1 S 31. The messenger was rewarded for his tidings by being at once put to death (2 S 1<sup>13-16</sup>, cf. 41<sup>0</sup>); the defeat of Israel was commemorated with mourning and fasting, while D. himself expressed in a beautiful ode his grief for Saul and Jonathan. Of both he speaks in tones of warmest respect and affection; his love for Jonathan is expressed in a burst of passionate feeling; but it is noticeable that no religious thoughts are contained in the poem. Its genuineness is not unquestioned, but its Davidic authorship is accepted by Kuenen, Wellh., Stade, Brude, Chyzer, Driver, and others.

The king had at last arrived for D. to return to his country. After inquiring of J<sup>u</sup>, he removed to Hebron, the ancient sacred city of Judah, accompanied by his family and his followers with their households. His presence had already gained him the goodwill of the elders; a renowned warrior of their own tribe was more likely to defend their interests than a younger descendant of the house of Saul; and D. was forthwith anointed king in Hebron (2 S 2<sup>4</sup>). We hear of no opposition on the part of the Philistines. D. still retained Ziklag (1 S 27<sup>6</sup>), and doubtless continued to be a vassal. A division of the Isr. kingdom was conducive to the Philistine supremacy. According to the Chronicler, he had received accessions to his forces, outside his own tribe, while still at Ziklag; twenty-two men are named of Saul's tribe (1 Ch 12<sup>1-7</sup>), while of the tribe of Manasseh several chiefs are said to have deserted to D., when he came with the Phil. army against Saul, and to have assisted him against the Amalekites (ib. vv. 19-22). The Chronicler, indeed, makes no direct mention of the reign of Eshbaal (Ishbosheth), or of the division of the kingdom, but in reality there were still several years of fighting and waiting before D. was recognized as king over all Israel.

D.'s first public act was at once political. He sent messengers to the Gileadites, and thanked them for their loyal and courageous conduct in rescuing the bodies of Saul and his sons. But the adherents of the house of Saul still remained true to the family. The natural heir to the throne was the only surviving legitimate son of the late king, Ishbosheth, or rather Eshbaal (1 Ch 8<sup>33</sup>), who was perhaps still under age; for the later gloss in 2 S 2<sup>10</sup> is certainly incorrect. His kinsman Abner, Saul's powerful general, retired with him across the Jordan to the ancient city of Mahanaim, and there made Eshbaal king. His dominions extended over Gilead and Geshur (Vulg. and Syr.), and on the west of Jordan over Jezreel, Ephraim, and Benjamin; but Abner was the real ruler and the support of the dynasty, and perhaps he, too, was compelled to recognize the over-lordship of the Philistines (so Kampffmeyer). Regarding the seven years during which D. reigned at Hebron we have but the scantiest information. He seems to have acted on the defensive, and probably felt that his cause would gain by waiting. Possibly, it was only by degrees that Abner extended his authority, so that some time elapsed before the rival forces were brought into collision. Only of one engagement is any account given; Joab's followers were victorious, but in the flight Abner killed Asahel, Joab's youngest brother. The cause of Eshbaal was declining even before he alienated his projector Abner, whom he reproached for taking one of his father's concubines. In anger Abner entered into communication with D., offering to bring over the whole kingdom into his hands. The only condition made by D. was the restoration of his wife Michal, through whom he doubtless hoped to support his claim as Saul's successor. Michal was sent back by Eshbaal's orders, and Abner conferred with the elders of the various tribes, who had already begun to recognize the inability of the house of Saul to defend them against their foes, and to look to D. as the one hope of the nation. Abner then visited Hebron, where he was entertained by D.; but on his departure he was murdered by Joab, in revenge for his brother Asahel. D. already began to find his loyal but unscrupulous nephew too strong for him. He could only express his abhorrence of the murder, which was indeed likely to alienate the supporters of Saul's house, and cause Abner to be honourably buried in Hebron, while he himself composed the funeral which further increased the kin-
